has brought against it. Well, Sir, I think I have shown that the proceedings of the hon. Member recoil upon himself, and lead us to pass a sentence of condemnation upon the course he has thought fit to adopt on this occasion. I now turn to a little matter—a very little matter—the argument of the hon. Member. It may, perhaps, be said that I have dealt warmly with this matter; but I feel warmly with regard to it, and it will be a bad day for England, and a bad day for us all, when we cease to feel warmly upon such a subject, which involves the existence of the essential Rules of debate. The hon. Member has put forward two contentions—the first being that the Rule under which the Speaker acted was not intended to apply to the purpose to which you, Sir, applied it, but only to meet a case of persistent Obstruction. With all submission to the hon. Member, I am prepared to maintain that your application of that Rule was strictly justified. The Rule adopted by the House was intended, not only to meet the case of persistent Obstruction, but to insure the decency, the propriety, and the order of the proceedings of this House. The hon. Member says that you, Sir, are armed with a power of noticing, and, in certain cases, of punishing persons whom you may think require such notice or such punishment; but that you are not justified in using that power when it is merely a question of maintaining the decency and propriety of the language used. But what proof, Sir, does the hon. Member give in support of that assertion? That the power with which you are armed sprang out of a certain set of circumstances connected with a system of persistent Obstruction I fully admit—a system which came into existence contemporaneously with the entrance of the hon. Member into this House. The hon. Member quoted the evidence of yourself, Sir, and Mr. Cecil Raikes in support of his proposition. But although that might have been part of the argument used at the time, it did not limit the terms of the measure that was adopted. What are those terms? “Disregarding the authority of the Chair.” [Mr. PARNELL: Wilfully disregarding.] Although that may be so, what I contend is, that the limitation applied by the hon. Gentleman is a limitation imported by his private judgment into the Order of the House. I took it on the credit of the hon. Gentleman; but the Standing Order has just been supplied to me by my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair). It is dated the 25th February, 1880, and runs thus—

"Whenever any hon. Member shall have been named by the Speaker or by the Chairman of the Committee of the whole House as disregarding the authority of the Chair."

Therefore, I say the hon. Gentleman should not supply interpolations of that kind without verifying his ground in the first instance. The meaning of those words is much wider than that which the hon. Member placed upon them—namely, that the Standing Order only referred to cases of persistent Obstruction. But the hon. Member comes finally to this—that the words which were used by the hon. Member for Roscommon (Mr. O'Kelly) were covered by the previous ruling of the Chair. I will consider specifically the two words "lying" and "calumnious." I remember a portion of the circumstances cited by the hon. Member—indeed, I took the opportunity of referring to them on a former occasion, and they are now fresh in my mind. I feel, Sir, a debt of gratitude to Mr. Speaker Denison as a very able and excellent Speaker of this House, and who possessed an acuteness of mind and a capacity to deal with difficult questions which I think was not exceeded by any of his Predecessors. On the occasion referred to, Mr. Speaker Denison, on the appeal first of Lord Palmerston and then of myself, declined to exclude the word "calumnious" as un-Parliamentary. But, looking at the matter historically, I am not bound to assume that Mr. Speaker Denison was infallible in the matter.

Mr. HEALY: The Irish Members are compelled to recognize the Speaker as infallible.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Sir, the hon. Member is so carried away by his own feelings in this matter that he is totally unable to comprehend my meaning. I am dealing with an historical review. It is one thing to be compelled to submit to the authority of the Speaker at the moment, and it is another to look back to the annals of history. Though you may be bound to accept the ruling at the moment, there is nothing to prevent you impeaching that ruling at a future time. If I am cast by what I deem to be an unjust verdict, I must submit to it for the time, though afterwards I may condemn it. I do not hesitate, therefore, to say that with regard to the use of the word "calumnious" I should have felt under a great obligation to you, Sir, if you had reversed the decision of Mr. Speaker Denison, because it appears to me that the word "calumnious" inevitably and essentially involves the imputation of motive. I hope the one result of the present discussion will be to enable us to put an end to the Parliamentary use of that word. I come now to the most vital part of the argument of the hon. Member, in which it appears to me that his reasoning entirely breaks down. The hon. Member argues that the word "lying" is also covered by the previous ruling of the Chair. The speech, however, to which the hon. Member refers in support of his contention does not contain the word "lying," but merely asserts that the statement in question had not a word of truth in it. Such an expression as the latter may be discourteous; but it does not necessarily imply that the Member who makes it is uttering an untruth to his knowledge; but the use of the word "lying" imputes that the Member knows that he is telling and intends to tell a lie. One word upon the case itself. The word "mendacious" had been used by another Member, and there had been an appeal to the Chair, and immediately after the word "mendacious" had been used, censured, and withdrawn, another Member described the statement to which the word "mendacious" had been applied as "lying and calumnious." I say, in the first place, that the expression "lying and calumnious" was not merely a repetition, but it was a heavy aggravation of that which had been just before declared to be offensive, and acknowledged as offensive and withdrawn. And this is what the hon. Member for the City of Cork rises to cover and defend to the extent of saying that it ought to have been treated tenderly. He has instructed us as to what the Speaker ought to do, and says hon. Members should be guided by him in the course which they should adopt. You, Sir, have very frequently given warnings to Members as to the evil way in which they were walking before resorting to an exercise of your authority. You have done this with a patience that is astonishing—with a patience, let me tell you, that sometimes make Members impatient—and then I am to be told that because of this patience, by which you are even spoiling Members of this House—if I may make such a charge—when a great outrage is committed, when most violent language is used, and used by a person who must have known it was a very great aggravation, the matter should be taken up by an hon. Gentleman who occupied about an hour of the time of this House in contending that you came down too rapidly upon an innocent and valuable Member. ["Oh!"] I beg the pardon of the hon. Member. Let him listen to his own Leader. The hon. Member for the City of Cork urged the special claims of the hon. Member for Roscommon because he was innocent and valuable. I deny that because he is innocent and valuable he is to be allowed to violate the Rules of this House, the rules of common courtesy, and the rules which I do not hesitate to say ought to influence gentlemen in private life. I hold that the arguments of the hon. Member have not been maintained, that the discussion is ill-timed and ill-chosen, and that by this manner of impugning the Chair by a censure directed against a tribunal of the highest authority, a tribunal untainted with the least suspicion of partiality, when he knows that no issue can be taken, and no verdict of conviction or acquittal pronounced, the hon. Member does no credit to himself or to those with whom he acts.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the charge against members of the Land League on the occasion in question was that they were participes crimines in a murder committed in a particular district. Members of the Land League had a right to repel that charge with indignation. The Prime Minister, with an animation of manner which he had so much at his command when Party purposes demanded his warmth, had justified the conduct of the Speaker; but that was not the course he took yesterday when the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster supported a Resolution which virtually condemned the conduct of the Speaker. On the contrary, the Prime Minister sat in complacent silence. The style of reply which had now become stereotyped in the case of Questions put by Irish Members to Members of the Government ought to be given up. There were precedents for the use of the word "mendacious" in that House. One of the Predecessors of the Speaker had decided that it was not un-Parliamentary for one Member to say of another Member that he had made a mendacious statement. The word "calumnious" was an epithet, as the Prime Minister justly observed, which imputed motives; yet that epithet was actually allowed to pass by two Predecessors of the present Speaker, and its use was not discouraged on a former occasion by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. Nothing could be more dangerous than that the Irish Members should have any just reason to suspect that they were treated with a severity which was not extended to other Members of the House. ["Oh!"] He was not asserting that that was now the case. The rights of majorities were always safe; and he thought it was the duty of the Chair to be the guardian and protector of any Party in the House, however small it might be numerically, which was likely to be unfairly dealt with in the chances and struggles of political warfare.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY admitted that the words "calumnious and lying" were somewhat too strong for fair Parliamentary discussion; and he confessed that he did not particularly admire even that sort of invective which an eminent authority had pronounced to be "an ornament of debate." He thought that on the 3rd of June both the hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Tottenham) and the hon. Member for Roscommon (Mr. O'Kelly) had offended against the unwritten law of Parliament. But the latter Gentleman, it should be remembered, was a prominent member of the Executive of the Land League, a body which the hon. Member for Leitrim had charged with inciting to murder. In the heat, naturally excited by disgust at so odious and calumnious a charge, it was not surprising that any hon. Member should have lost his temper, although it was also perfectly fair that the Chair should have interfered to prevent the use of such strong epithets as "lying and calumnious." With every respect, however, for the Speaker, he thought the Chair might well have interposed to prevent the application of such an abominable charge as that brought by the hon. Member for Leitrim against the Executive of the Land League. He could not refrain from protesting against the theory, which had lately been encouraged by Her Majesty's Ministers, that the Members of the House were the bondsmen of the Chair—that the Speaker was the master, the dictator, and the law-giver of the House, and that in questioning anything which he said or did they were offending against the law and order of Parliament. Such a notion was, to quote the language of the Prime Minister, a gigantic innovation in the history of this country.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT said, reference had been made to something which took place in the House yesterday; and it had been sought to make it appear that he especially, and some others, had called in question the action of the Speaker yesterday, and had, in fact, given some support to a Motion which was intended to censure the Speaker. Both of those things were entirely inaccurate. In the observations which he made yesterday he said distinctly that the Speaker had no option; that he was only carrying out the instruction of the House, given in a certain Resolution passed some months ago. It was a Resolution which he had voted against, and which he was going to say was one of the most foolish Resolutions, but that that term would not be respectful to the House. It was, however, he thought, one of the most unhappy Resolutions which had been come to in his time. The Motion of the hon. Member for Northampton yesterday had not the intention of censuring the Speaker. That hon. Member, and the seven or eight other Gentlemen who had voted with him, voted in condemnation of the general proceedings of the House on the question in regard to Mr. Bradlaugh. No Member of the House had the slightest intention of censuring the Speaker. What had been done was most unhappy; but it was not to be attributed to the Chair, but to the course which the House itself had taken, and many of the Irish Members sitting opposite had supported the policy which had led to the unfortunate transaction of yesterday. It seemed to him that the whole discussion was beside the question, because it was not a question of precedent at all. What had happened was this. The hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Tottenham) put a Question which was not a very friendly one to the Irish

Members who sat opposite. The Speaker himself said that had he previously seen the words of the Question he should have objected to them. However, the Question was put, and the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) characterized it as "mendacious." The Speaker called the hon. Member to Order, and the word was withdrawn. Almost immediately afterwards the hon. Member for Roscommon rose in his place, and there was this excuse for him, that he seemed to labour under the influence of passion that was not simulated. ["Hear, hear!"] Well, he had seen a great deal of passion lately which was simulated. The hon. Member, with feeling which was not simulated, said that a certain statement was calumnious and lying. The Speaker thereupon called him to Order. [MR. HEALY: No, no!] What, then, was the state of the case? The hon. Member for Galway had withdrawn words he had used as un-Parliamentary, and almost immediately afterwards another Member, sitting behind him, got up and uttered words in a fierce manner, even far more un-Parliamentary than the words which had been withdrawn. The Speaker immediately rose, and, in accordance with the Standing Order, declared that the hon. Member for Roscommon was disregarding the authority of the Chair, because he had risen and spoken words far more blameable than those the Speaker had just been condemning. It was not, then, a case of precedent. It was a case of violent disregard of the authority of the Chair; and, therefore, the Speaker was not only within his right, but within his duty—he was sorry to say—when he found it necessary to take the step he did. He must say that he thought at the time the language of the hon. Member for Roscommon was a passionate expression, which possibly, in a quieter mood, he would not have made, and he was sorry the hon. Member did not rise immediately and withdraw it. [MR. HEALY: He had no opportunity.] It was clear that the authority of the Chair had been disregarded; and the Speaker was not only within his right, but within his duty, in taking the steps he had adopted. If the hon. Member had withdrawn the words, the necessity for the Speaker taking those steps might have been avoided; but as to the propriety, legality, and consistency of those steps, he thought there could be no doubt whatever. He thought that the hon. Member for the City of Cork, notwithstanding some rough experience which he had had in that House, would admit to his own conscience that the Speaker had been entirely free from blame, and that he could not hope for either that Assembly, or the visionary Assembly to which he was looking forward, to be presided over by a Speaker that was more distinguished for impartiality and a wish to do justice to every side than was the right hon. Gentleman who now occupied the Chair.

MR. TOTTENHAM said, he desired to state the reason which had actuated him in putting the Question, to which reference had been made, upon the Paper. There had been three or four murders committed within a very few weeks in districts governed by the Land League, and the perpetration of one of those murders was known at the time it took place, or within an hour afterwards, at a village five miles from the place where it occurred. The prisoners who were arrested on a charge of having committed some of those murders were furnished with counsel and food by the Council of the Land League. It was, therefore, a justifiable conclusion to arrive at that the Land League were at the bottom of those occurrences. His conviction was as strong now as it was then that the Land League were directly responsible for those murders, and for the outrages which had disgraced Ireland for the last 12 months.

MR. HEALY said, that the hon. Member for Leitrim might as well say that the Government of Ireland were responsible for those murders, as to say that the Land League were responsible for them. With respect to the question under discussion, the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken admitted the whole case when he said that his hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon had not had an opportunity of withdrawing the words he had used. [MR. JOHN BRIGHT: What I said was that I regretted he had not withdrawn them.] His hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon (Mr. O'Kelly) had not an opportunity of doing so; and he was not, in fact, asked to withdraw them. In his (Mr. Healy's) opinion, the remark of the right hon. Gentleman strengthened the position of the Irish Members; for it appeared to him to be an admission that the hon. Member had been suspended without being afforded an opportunity of withdrawing his statement. Having referred to former debates, it appeared that because one hon. Member used an expression not so strong as others that had already been allowed, therefore he was to be suspended. This was on the principle that, because Solomon was a wise man, because someone else was a strong man, therefore someone else played the harp. It was astonishing to him to notice the way in which Irish affairs were treated by the occupants of the Treasury Bench. A charge of murder being made against Members sitting near him was described by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster as being not particularly friendly; but the same right hon. Gentleman used the most delicate and silken words when referring to anything that might be alleged against Members sitting on his own side of the House. As far as he and those who sat near him were personally concerned, they had become so inured to this sort of thing that they took no notice of anything that proceeded from the Treasury Bench, and were simply amused at the means by which they were tried to be enmeshed. When the Prime Minister got up that evening, there were few Members in the House; but the Liberal Whip soon procured an audience to witness the mechanical passion of the right hon. Gentleman, and to hear him work himself up to that pitch of wrath with which the House was so familiar. It would have been more in consonance with the view of the Irish Members if they could have taken a vote of the House upon this matter; but, that being impossible, they had been compelled to content themselves with calling attention to the matter.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that the hon. Member for Leitrim had declared that the Land League was a "murderous organization," which the hon. Member for Galway had declared to be a "mendacious" statement. The Speaker having ruled that "mendacious" was an un-Parliamentary expression, the hon. Member for Galway withdrew it, whereupon the hon. Member for Roscommon asked whether there was to be no protection against "lying and calumnious" statenents. The use of those words by no means imputed to the hon. Member for Leitrim that he was knowingly stating that which was false. Speaking as a journalist, and as one accustomed to write the English language, he maintained that there was no journalist who did not know the vast difference between saying that a statement was a lying and calumnious statement, and saying that a statement had been made mendaciously by any man. In the one case you said a man was a liar, in the other that he had made a lying statement, and you threw on him the onus of showing how that statement got into his paper.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(1.) £52,400, Divine Service.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, he was not going to raise any objection to this Vote, but merely desired to make a suggestion to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. There was a certain number of military chaplaincies provided for in this Vote which were in the gift of official personages, amongst these were the chaplaincy of the Tower and the chaplaincy of the Royal Hospital, Chelsea. With regard to these, it seemed to him that it was rather an anomaly that they should not be in the gift of the Secretary of State for War. He had nothing whatever to say against the manner in which these places had been filled up. The present chaplains were both known to him; they were Army chaplains, although by no means senior chaplains of the Army, and it therefore seemed to him that it would be advantageous if the Secretary of State for War would take these appointments into his own special patronage, and reserve them in future for men who had for many years served their country at home and abroad. He reminded the right hon. Gentleman that there were very few prizes for Army chaplains who had to retire from the Service in the full vigour of their age.

MR. CHILDERS said, the question raised by the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite should be looked into.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £39,800, Administration of Military Law.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT asked the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the fact that the charges for a number of officials under this Vote were given in a lump sum, instead of in detail. For instance, there was one item of £9,229, which represented the pay of the Governors, chief warders, warders, assistant warders, messengers, and others, at the military prisons. The same observations applied to the charge for the pay of the provost staff and military police, £7,000; and likewise to the item of £5,000 for the pay and extra duty pay of provost marshals and military police in garrisons and camps. He failed to see any reason why these items should not be given separately in detail, and trusted that in future the Estimate would be framed on that principle.

MR. CHILDERS said, he would look into the subject to which his attention had been drawn by the hon. and gallant Baronet opposite, with the view, if possible, of giving the desired information.

COLONEL ALEXANDER asked whether the right hon. Gentleman could do anything to improve the cumbrous and clumsy procedure now adopted in general courts martial. The Committee might possibly not be aware of the dilatory way in which the proceedings in these cases were conducted. Every question originated, either by the prosecution, by the prisoner, or by any member of the court, must, in the first instance, be reduced to writing; it had then to be passed to the Judge Advocate and the President, and, if approved by them, it was then read aloud; but, if it was not approved, it was returned to the person who propounded it. In the case of Colonel Crawley the delay was so intolerable that the two sides came to an arrangement with regard to the questions; and, as stated in The Times, after a few days, the plan was adopted of allowing each party to read its own questions. He remembered that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the present Home Secretary, who appeared for the defence, was, according to the present practice, which permitted a lawyer to advise the prisoner but not himself to address the court, not allowed to read the speech which he had prepared on the occasion, and which, being read by another, sufferred very much in consequence. He was aware that these things did not occur very often; but still they were not so infrequent as not to deserve attention. The Committee would remember that last year a sergeant was tried for fraud, in connection with the marking at Wimbledon; and he ventured to say that the questions which had occupied the court martial for so many days in that case would have been settled in one by a civil court. He should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman could see his way to remedy this form of procedure.

MR. CHILDERS said, he was much obliged to the hon. and gallant Gentleman for calling attention to the subject. Under the Army Discipline and Regulation Act of 1870 it became necessary to draw up a totally new set of rules, which would very much simplify the procedure of courts martial; and the Government had had to consider whether these rules should be included in the Bill introduced a few nights since—the Regulation of Forces Bill—or whether they should wait until the Bill was passed, and then establish one simple and entire Code. The rules were finished, and would be issued before the end of the year. With regard to the point raised by the hon. and gallant Gentleman, he should mention that he was himself rather in advance of the opinions of some hon. Members.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he had given Notice some time ago of a Motion for a Return of courts martial; but the Secretary of State for War had not seen his way to grant it. He thought the present was not an unfitting occasion on which again to call attention to the subject, and to ask what objection there was to a Return of the punishments awarded by courts martial being furnished. It might be urged that this Return would draw invidious distinctions between some regiments; but, for his own part, he could see no reason why contrasts should not be made between one regiment and another in respect of the punishments awarded by courts martial. On the contrary, he thought the Return would be of great use in drawing the attention of commanding officers to the position of the various regiments. There might, of course, be reasons why the authorities should refuse the Return he asked for; but the question, at any rate, was one upon which information should be afforded.

MR. CHILDERS said, he would rather see the Return asked for by his hon. Friend included in the General Annual Return of the British Army than given separately. The Return would be very voluminous; but his hon. Friend might rely that the subject should receive his attention.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON pointed out that the present system of procedure in courts martial was very much in favour of the prisoner. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be content with the changes he had already made this year in Army affairs.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £300,500, Medical Establishments and Services.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, here, again, the whole charge for the pay of the officers in this Department were lumped together in one sum of £227,723. As he had said before, there was no reason whatever why the Committee should not know what these officers received. Further details were also desirable in the case of Netley Hospital on page 30.

MR. CHILDERS said, he believed that if the hon. and gallant Baronet would refer to the Appendix he would find there much of the detail that he desired. At the same time, he would look further into the matter.

SIR HARRY VERNEY hoped the right hon. Gentleman would see that the class of men best qualified for the duty were placed in the position of hospital attendants. Short service men were, in his opinion, not the best for the purpose of nursing soldiers; and he thought that when men were found to be good orderlies they ought to be retained in that position.

MR. FINDLATER wished to urge upon the Secretary of State for War the claims of the Army medical officers. Many of these gentlemen, in addition to risking their lives in the field, incurred serious illnesses in the discharge of their duties; and he contended that they should be placed in the same category as combatant officers of the Army. It must be clear to hon. Members that the medical officer who, without the excitement to support him which was felt by the combatant officer, really displayed the highest degree of true courage in attending to the wounded. The records of our recent wars furnished many instances of the bravery displayed by medical officers, the terrible risks they ran, and the sacrifice of life in action which their duties entailed upon them. But these officers, although running the same risks as their combatant brethren, for the simple reason that they were non-combatant, were deprived of the privilege conferred upon other officers of the Army by the Army Circular of March, 1880, in respect of counting time not exceeding one year on half-pay towards voluntary retirement. The right hon. Gentleman had, on a former occasion, promised to look into this matter; and he could assure him that it was very desirable that some steps should be taken, because, undoubtedly, great discontent existed amongst the medical officers of the Army, who felt strongly the invidious distinction that was drawn between them and the combatant officers in the Service. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman would hold out some hope to these very deserving gentlemen that, at an early day, he would be able to do something for them.

MR. CHILDERS said, he considered that the proposal of the hon. Member, that medical officers should be placed on the same footing as combatant officers, would involve a great disadvantage to them, inasmuch as they were, in some respects, as compared with combatant officers, much better treated. The Regulations with regard to medical officers had been settled by his Predecessor with extreme care and after long consideration; and, on the whole, he believed that the alteration proposed by the hon. Member would place them in a worse position than they now occupied.

(4.) £476,900, Militia and Militia Reserve.

EARL PERCY said, he rose to call attention to a subject upon which he had before asked a question of the right hon. Gentleman, and which had excited considerable interest amongst the officers of Militia regiments. It had been for a long time past the custom of the Government of the day to make constant changes in the uniforms of the Army and Militia; and during the years he had served in the latter branch he had, in consequence of these Regulations, changed the character of almost every garment once or twice. Now, these repeated alterations were not only vexatious in themselves, but they were the source of very serious expense to officers whose means were rather limited. In the present instance, it was proposed to change the whole of the uniforms of the Militia, and to assimilate them to the uniforms of the linked battalions of the Regular Forces of the district. He had, through the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, addressed a question to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, as to whether the proposed change would not entail upon the officers of the Militia the very serious cost of £80,000; and the answer received from him was to the effect that he had, to a great extent, exaggerated the expense which it would entail—that he had no reason to believe that the expense would approach the sum named, and that in many cases but a small outlay would be necessary. He would not enter upon a lengthy discussion on the expediency of the proposed change; but, for his own part, he was quite unable to see the advantage of dressing the Militia officer in borrowed plumage. Although he was aware that his opinions upon this subject were not shared by all the officers of the Militia, yet it was hardly correct of the right hon. Gentleman to say that the proposed alterations had been received with general approval, because he had received many representations from Militia officers that they extremely disliked them. Nor was it a correct statement to say that the substitution of gold for silver lace had been recommended by the Committee, because their Report did not contain one word about any change in this respect. They pointed out that, in their opinion, a strong ground existed for establishing similarity of colour, and that it seemed a question whether the Militia should not be clothed in the undress of the Regular regiments. But that was quite a different thing. His estimate of £80,000 as the cost to the officers of the Militia of making the alterations contemplated by the authorities was arrived at by taking £20 as the cost to each officer, and multiplying that figure by 4,000—the number of officers in the Militia. He had, in consequence of the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that his estimate was incorrect, taken the trouble, by actual experiment, to ascertain the accuracy of the figure of £20, which he had adopted as the basis of this calculation; and he was entitled to say that his estimate was fully borne out by the fact that the amounts quoted by the Army tailors, to whom his inquiries had been addressed, all ranged between £34 8s. 6d. and £30 13s. 9d. for field officers, and £20 0s. 6d. and £18 1s. 6d. for subalterns. Moreover, in addition to his estimate of £20 for each officer, there would be special extra expenses in assimilating the Militia uniform to that of particular regiments of the Regular Forces. As an instance of which he would mention the cost of £5 5s. for a new bearskin in the case of Light Infantry battalions assimilated to Fusilier regiments. Now, considering that the Militia were only in training for a month during the year, the change must necessarily be a very gradual one, and, besides the hardship of compelling them to incur this great expense, there would be the disadvantage that it would take many years before the officers of the Militia were all dressed alike. The variety of costume which would result from this would be intolerable; and if the change must really be carried out, he would put it to the right hon. Gentleman whether it should not be effected more rapidly than was proposed. It was most desirable that no slur should be cast upon the officers of the Militia; and, therefore, he entreated that the points to which he had invited the attention of the Secretary of State for War should receive his serious consideration. The proposed changes would undoubtedly throw a great strain upon the Militia, and any help which the right hon. Gentleman could give would be thankfully accepted, and would, at the same time, tend to efficiency and to the preservation of good feeling and esprit de corps.

COLONEL KINGSCOTE said, he thought the noble Lord the Member for North Northumberland (Earl Percy) had done much good in bringing forward this matter. For his own part, he was at a loss to see the object of the authorities in making this change, one result of which would undoubtedly be that for years Militia officers would be dressed some in one uniform and some in another. If he could be made to understand the reason for the proposed alteration, it might possibly meet with his approval. The change would throw a considerable expense on the Militia officers, and particularly on the mounted officers, for which he thought they should certainly receive some compensation. He was himself an honorary colonel of the Militia; and, as an old soldier, he regarded that branch of the Service as most valuable. It had been called upon by the country more than once, and it had never been found wanting. It supplied the Army with recruits; and he rejoiced that endeavours were being made to amalgamate it more closely with the Regular Forces. But why, he asked, was this burden of expense to be cast upon the officers of Militia without compensation? He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would reconsider this matter, and that the few remarks he had felt it his duty to make would have the good effect of obtaining compensation for the officers in question, if the change proposed must indeed be carried out.

MAJOR CHESTER-MASTER said, he entirely agreed with the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just spoken (Colonel Kingscote). He had been for 21 years in the Militia, and he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that there were reasons, beyond those which had been advanced, which tended to show that by the contemplated changes the Militia would be placed in an unfair position. It appeared that the lace and facings of the uniforms were to be changed; and he would point out, as the result of the inquiries he had made, that the cost of this alone would amount to £30 in the case of colonels, and £15 for second lieutenants, the other ranks being in proportion. He also pointed out that a new uniform was incumbent on an officer of the Line when he retired from his regiment and joined the Militia, but that it was not so in the case of the Yeomanry and Volunteers. He could not see the reason for this inequality. It appeared to him only fair, as the Militia were made one with the Line, that the same benefits should be enjoyed by both with regard to promotion.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he could see no reason whatever for making the proposed changes of uniform in respect of the Militia. What possible advantage could there be in putting the crown on the shoulder-strap instead of on the collar? The crown and other marks of rank were more visible on the collar than on the shoulder-strap, and less likely to be rubbed by the cloak. These alterations had imposed a tax never less than £5, and up to £30, on every officer. He could only suppose that they were proposed at the instance of the Army tailors. For his own part, he was in favour of a very simple and inexpensive uniform; and he pointed out that the efficiency of some foreign armies was in no way secured by the quantity of lace displayed.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, that ever since he commenced soldiering there had been one constant complaint that perpetual changes were being made for no purpose whatever. He could not but think that the right hon. Gentleman would do well to leave these matters in relation to the Army and Militia as they existed at present. But he rose principally to ask the right hon. Gentleman to state his views with regard to the advantage to be derived by the country from the formation of territorial regiments composed of two battalions of the Regular Army and two battalions of the Militia. He would be glad to know in what way the War Office were going to make use of the two Militia battalions, and how they were going to draw more closely the connection between the Militia and the Army. Certainly, he did not think that this close intimacy would be promoted by merely placing gold lace upon the uniforms of the Militia officers. Again, what was to be done with the two Militia battalions in case of imminent danger to the country? Did the right hon. Gentleman intend to make it compulsory that the men should go into the Army, or did he expect to get more volunteers for the Army than he had before? There was an opinion abroad to which he would refer on the present occasion, because it was one which ought either to be contradicted or affirmed, that it was the deliberate intention of the War Office to do away with the officers of the Militia as they now existed, and to place in the Militia officers who had retired from the Army on half-pay. That was a question as to which he should very much like to receive an answer from the right hon. Gentleman. The proceeding might be wise, or it might be one of those things which were inevitable; but, whatever might be the truth with regard to it, he thought it should be at once clearly stated in what way the Militia was to be dealt with. He believed that a far larger Army Reserve could be got out of the Militia Reserve than out of the Reserves that it was now attempted to create. He believed the Army and Militia Reserves might be amalgamated with advantage, and that they ought to be annually drilled with those regiments with which they would have to serve in case of emergency. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would state his views upon that question. There was another point to which he would refer. In places where there were not two regiments of Militia, was it the intention that a second regiment should be formed? Because there were many places where there was only one weak regiment, and yet it was said to consist of two battalions. He wished again to suggest that the Militia Reserve and the Line Reserve might be called out and drilled together, so that when they joined their regiments they would know each other and also their officers. It was a great object, when men were sent on foreign service, that they should know their officers; but, as the Reserves were formed, he would undertake to say they would not know their officers, and recent occurrences showed what disastrous consequences would occur. Another matter was this. He was informed that when the 3rd and 4th Battalions of the Royal Lancashire Militia were out they had no waterproof sheets provided for them, and everything they had was saturated with rain. Such a thing ought never to occur in this country; and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would inform the Committee how such an occurrence could have taken place.

MR. CHILDERS said, with regard to the amalgamation of the two Militia battalions with the two Line battalions, he would refer the hon. and gallant Member to the Report of the Committee in 1876, presided over by his right hon. and gallant Predecessor (Colonel Stanley), which strongly recommended the combination, by which they hoped to effect a better system of recruiting, both from the Militia to the Line and to the Line direct. Those arrangements would strengthen both the Militia and the Line; and he hoped the time was not far distant when it would be more practicable to attach the Reserve men residing in the regimental district to the regiment in their district, instead of the men having to belong to regiments scattered all over the country, and not knowing where to go when called out. It was one of the objects of the combination that the men should have no doubt upon that point when called out either in an emergency or for training. He believed a great advantage would be gained by amalgamating the two battalions of the Line. With regard to the question of uniform, although that was of less importance than some other considerations, he believed that if the uniform was practically the same that would tend to attach the men of the Militia battalion to the Line battalion, for they would feel that they belonged to the four battalions, with headquarters at the place from which the regiment drew its men. As to the number of field officers in the Militia, the whole system of promotion and retirement in the Militia was distinctly different from that in the Line. In the Line the age of retirement was much earlier than in the Militia. With respect to the question raised by the noble Lord (Earl Percy), the experience of the War Office was that there was a great desire on the part of the officers in the Militia to have the same uniform as the Line. There was no intention to change the dress of the Yeomanry this year; and, with regard to the question of the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) respecting the change made some months back in the uniform of officers, that was a matter with which the Secretary of State had nothing to do; and he could, therefore, give the House no practical information upon it. But, in consequence of representations made to him, he had given an order that no further alteration of the kind should be made without the sanction of the Secretary of State for War.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL wished to draw attention to a matter of more importance than the difference between gold and silver lace. As at present carried on, the musketry instruction in the Militia was nothing but a farce. The time of training was necessarily very short, and might very fairly be occupied by ordinary drill, without any laborious and delicate work such as musketry instruction. Of the 27 days allowed for training, three must be set aside as Sundays, one or two days were absorbed in settling into camp, or barracks, or billets, four days must be allowed at the end of the period for inspection and leaving quarters. There was thus very little time for drill and musketry instruction. A few years ago an officer in command of a company out for training was ordered, on a certain evening, to take his company to a range five miles distant on the following morning and fire 20 rounds. The company consisted of 113 men, and for that number to fire 20 rounds each in a single day was a farce if it was supposed to be done at all properly. No means of transport were provided, and the officer had to transport the men at his own expense, and to provide rations of bread and cheese at the range. He made no complaint of the expense; but he felt it humiliating to have to hurry the men through the instruction in that way. That was only a sample of what took place in every battalion of the Service; and the only way out of that system was either to give up musketry instruction entirely, or to call out each company during the non-training period for leisurely instruction in musketry, with every necessary facility, or, again, to have alternate annual trainings for field exercise and musketry.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he wished to draw attention to the question of assimilating the two corps in the field when in action. Five mounted officers had lately been added to every Infantry battalion; but it now appeared that that increase was not for the performance of duties in the field, but merely for the sake of promotion. If that was the case, he believed the time would come when the House of Commons would not allow the addition of mounted officers not for the performance of duties, but for the sake merely of promotion. The system of drill for the Infantry must now be changed to suit the increased mounted officers. The same drill ought, therefore, to be applied to the Militia; otherwise, the Militia and the Line would not be able to act together in the field at the critical time. It would be too late, when the Militia were called out to defend the country, to assimilate them by adding the same number of mounted officers and the same system of drill. The two corps could not act together as one brigade unless their drill was identical; and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would consider the point.

LORD EUSTACE OECIL said, he had little sympathy with the noble Earl (Earl Percy) as to the question of clothing, for everyone in the Army knew that changes of dress were more for the benefit of the tailors than anyone else. He thought there might be a service dress as well as a dress for the ball-room; and he wished to suggest that the kersey dress used by officers might be used for drill. Officers who wanted a smart dress could have it at their own expense. Then, with regard to the number of the Militia, the total at the training in 1880 was 115,307; but the maximum voted by Parliament was 139,000. That showed a deficiency of over 23,000 men, and he wished to urge the right hon. Gentleman to adopt some way of bringing up the attendance of the Militia to the maximum voted by Parliament. There had been an improvement in the number of Militia officers who had obtained certificates; but he wished to know the proportion of field officers who had passed in the same way; for now that the Militia was to be amalgamated more or less with the Line, it was essential that the field officers and captains should be equal in every respect to the same officers in the Line.

SIR HENRY FLETCHER wished to know what arrangements had been made for giving proper quarters to Militia adjutants? They were appointed from the brigade depôts; but when they joined the Militia they had to give up their quarters, and put up with one room. That ought to be inquired into; and he also wished to know whether any further remuneration would be given to them, as to the dépôt brigade adjutants.

MR. RITCHIE said, he wished to draw attention to the question of second battalions of Militia. In his regiment there was some difficulty in raising a sufficient number of men for the single battalion the regiment had, and he did not see how these second battalions were to be raised, unless some steps were taken in that direction. He hoped, further, that the right hon. Gentleman would not adopt the suggestion of the noble Lord for a cheaper dress. There ought to be a uniform laid down for officers of Militia, and it ought to be a sine quâ non that all such officers should obtain the full uniform. He agreed that the proposed change in the uniform was one that was desired by Militia officers generally, for they were extremely anxious to be identified as much as possible with their brethren of the Line. The question of uniform might be considered a sentimental one; but to his mind it would be a good thing to increase the sympathy between the Militia and the Line by rendering the uniforms identical. The hon. Member who had brought the matter forward had reason, he thought, to be satisfied with the assurance the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Childers) had given him, and his noble Friend might reasonably conclude that all he desired would be carried out. No doubt it was the desire of the Militia officers that their uniforms should be the same as those of the Line; but, he presumed, it was not merely because of the desire of those officers that the change would be made. It would be made in the interest of the Service; therefore, he did not think the Militia officers should be called on to bear the whole of the expense.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, he would not take up the time of the Committee for more than two minutes; but he wished to say that the Report of the Inspectors of Musketry recently issued as to the Militia fully bore out all that had been said by the hon. Member for Wigtownshire (Sir Herbert Maxwell). The Report said that though one or two regiments were good in rifle practice, notably the South Wales Borderers and the Wiltshire Regiment, the firing, altogether, was not satisfactory. The Report referred to the insufficiency of the musketry drills; and hon. Members had only to look at the Army Returns published this year to convince themselves of the fact that there was not enough spent on musketry practice. The Inspector General of Musketry said that in some individual cases the firing was good; but the volley firing was very unsatisfactory. Why was the individual firing satisfactory? It was because individuals who were good shots were nursed and coddled beyond all conception. The musketry instructors thought only of their averages. Their whole ideas were concentrated upon averages, just as some hon. Members looked to their averages in divisions. At Aldershot, there was a flag put up to say when regiments should fire and when they should not. Sometimes the firing was discontinued for days and days together, the weather seeming beautiful. They might be at a loss to account for it, and might ask a question about it, when the answer they would receive would be something like this—"There is a strong wind blowing from the left rear." But that strong wind might be blowing from the left rear for months and months. No doubt, there was a strong wind blowing from the left rear during the battle of Majuba Hill; and the Boers, unfortunately, would not wait until that wind changed. The system pursued was thoroughly antiquated, only 90 rounds a-year being allowed, and that was clearly not enough. The Volunteers fired 2,000 rounds, and that was not too much. There had been some alteration made in the Regulations, he believed; 10 rounds less in volley firing, and 10 more in skirmishing being allowed; but the fact remained the same, that 90 rounds were insufficient. Our Army was one of the most expensive in the world, and that being so, no pains should be spared to render it efficient. However unpleasant the fact was, they must face it, and it was this—that our soldiers were the very worst shots of any army in the world. There was one other point on which he wished to say a word—one which had been referred to by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War—namely, the new rules as to retirement in the Militia. It appeared that the right hon. Gentleman had been dealing rather tenderly with commanding officers in the Militia, in allowing them to serve on to the age of 67 in command of regiments, when they knew that field officers of the Line retired at the age of 55. Eventually, he knew, that would not be the case; but he was talking now of present commanding officers, who were to retire absolutely at 67. He found fault with the provision in the Regulations which followed that fixing the age, and which dealt with special cases. He was afraid this provision would open the door to a great deal of jobbery. What were special cases? Were men to be retained because they were thoroughly good officers, or because they were county men? How was the general officer commanding a district to decide upon the special cases? They were throwing a very unpleasant duty on the general officer, and he was sure that would not work. The Department should make a rule and abide by it; but there had hitherto been a rule that officers should retire at the age of 60, and that rule, as he had been told the other day, had not been carried out. He was afraid that, in a similar way, they would find out that this new Regulation would not be carried out. He wished, further, to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it was true, as reported, that the recruiting for the Militia had fallen off lately, in consequence of the men being called up for training immediately on enlistment? The Militia Committee had expressed an opinion on this matter, and he wished to know if the Report in question was correct?

MR. CHILDERS: I saw a statement similar to that now made by the hon. and gallant Member in the newspapers the other day, and I asked if it was true. I was told that it could not be, and for the best of all reasons, that the new system has not yet been put into operation. I quite agree with a deal of that which has fallen from the hon. and gallant Member with respect to the musketry practice of the Militia and the Line. Something ought to be done to improve it; and, feeling this very strongly, some months ago, as the Committee are aware, I appointed a Committee, presided over by Sir Daniel Lysons, to consider the subject, and that Committee has been inquiring into it with great patience and great care, both in regard to the Regular Army and the Militia. It is not, to my mind, a question which should be lost sight of. As for our soldiers being the worst shots in the world, I cannot agree with that. There are, at least, two Continental Armies whose shooting is far worse than that of our Army; but, at the same time, there are other Armies whose shooting, no doubt, is better. The British Army should not be behindhand in this matter, and I have reason to believe that the Committee will make such a Report as will enable us at the War Office to introduce great improvements into the whole system of musketry instruction. With regard to retirement from the Militia, the change has not been made on the ground of economy.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, it was not as a matter of economy that he had raised that objection, but as a matter of numbers and efficiency in the field.

MR. CHILDERS: If the arrangement is challenged, I shall be able to show that it was not made for purposes of economy. A question has been put to me about adjutants of Militia, and their position has been compared with that of adjutants at the dépôt. The question has not been before me, but I will look into it. I know nothing about additional uniforms for the Militia.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, he did not think the right hon. Gentleman had quite understood his suggestion, which was that, there being two uniforms, one of blue—in which all the Militia officers, he believed, performed their drill—and one of red, the young officers, who had to wait a year or two years before going into Regular Line regiments, should be only called upon to provide themselves with blue uniforms, and should not be forced to get the red.

MR. CHILDERS: I must confess that I am not familiar with this point; but I promise the noble Lord to look into the matter. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) said I had not answered the question put to me by an hon. Gentleman behind me. Yes; we do wish to encourage the formation of a second Militia battalion where such does not exist now, in, of course, those districts where the formation of a second battalion is feasible. One difficulty with which I am met in the matter is this—that where proposals have been made to raise that second battalion, they have been accompanied, generally, with awkward questions as to interfering with the recruiting ground of other Militia battalions. I should be loth to form second battalions where there was a serious difficulty of this kind. I may say that I am anxious to get both the Militia and the Militia Reserve up to their full numbers.

MAJOR-GENERAL BURNABY said, that with regard to musketry practice he could not agree that ours was the worst shooting Army in Europe. Perhaps the Militia were not as good marksmen as the hon.

and gallant Member (Colonel Alexander) and himself (General Burnaby) could wish; but the Militia did not have those advantages which were given to the Army, and which, he trusted, shortly would be conferred upon them. The present system was to “cram” the men in this respect—if he might be allowed to use the word. He trusted that this would be altered, and that the men would not be compelled to fire a certain large number of rounds within a short space of time. The number of rounds appointed to be fired should be distributed over a certain number of months in the year. Then, as to extra ammunition which the men either purchased themselves or were supplied with at their captain's cost, he thought it should be sold at as low a price as possible. The men complained that this ammunition was too dear for the purpose, and that the Government charged for it more than it cost them to manufacture. This ammunition should be supplied at as low a price as possible, for the lower the price the greater would be the number of shots fired, and the greater the number of shots fired the more efficient would the men be. As to the change of badges, facings, and in some cases head-dress, of certain regiments, in order to adapt them to the territorial system, the cost was one which should not be borne by the officers, but by the State. In Leicestershire, the 45th and 17th Regiments and the Militia were put together under the territorial arrangement. The 45th had no badge, but the 17th happened to have a tiger; whilst the Militia regiment had a harp, and was sore at having to give it up. They did not know why they should have a tiger any more than an elephant. The harp was an emblem which they very much respected, owing to their connection with Ireland, and they hoped they might be able to retain it, not only as a matter of sentiment, but also for economical reasons.

MR. O'SHEA wished to put a question with regard to the quartermasters' quarters, because, he believed, the same thing would occur in regard to the Militia as would occur in the Army. A Memorandum of the Horse Guards gave quartermasters a right to field officers' quarters, so that a quartermaster just promoted from the ranks had a right to similar quarters to captains of 20 years' standing. There was great complaint about this.

MR. CHILDERS: I have done a great deal for the quartermasters; but I doubt whether the complaint the hon. and gallant Member speaks of is one of importance.

MR. ROUND wished to know whether, in the case of Rifle Militia regiments, where a change of uniform was determined on, the same allowances would be made by the Government as it was understood had been made in the case of Highland regiments of Militia under similar circumstances? He would also like to know whether field officers of Militia, who had retired with permission to wear their uniform, might continue to wear that uniform, although it had been changed in the case of their regiment?

MR. CHILDERS: I will consider the question of allowing a change of uniform on retirement. With regard to the Rifle Brigade, as I have said, allowance will be made to them for the difference.

EARL PERCY begged to thank the right hon. Gentleman for the manner in which he had met his appeal. If the change proposed was a good one, it should be made whether the Militia officers liked it or not; and, if those officers had a claim on the Government for assistance in paying for their uniforms, that claim should be met.

MR. CHILDERS: The Government having made the concessions they have made, should hardly be asked now to make others.

SIR ROBERT LOYD LINDSAY said, that before the right hon. Gentleman proceeded to add a second battalion to existing battalions, he hoped he would take an opportunity of informing himself whether such additions would be advantageous in the individual districts. The right hon. Gentleman should call for a Report from the commander of each battalion and ask him to state whether, in forming the second battalion, injury would not be done to the first battalion. The same thing should be done in the case of the Volunteers. In his district they could not find in the county officers sufficient to officer two battalions of Militia and Volunteers; and he was under the impression that in forming second battalions the first battalions would suffer.

Vote agreed to.

Mr. O'Shea

(5.) £73,900, Yeomanry Cavalry.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he could not so organize the Service as to render the existing number of adjutants in the Yeomanry unnecessary? In the Cavalry there were only 19 adjutants on duty all the year round; but in the Yeomanry there were no less than 39. By a better organization, also, something else besides the annual eight days' training might be found for the adjutants to do. They were only at work eight days, and during the rest of the year they were paid for doing nothing. [An hon. MEMBER: It is a mistake.] It was no mistake at all. They only attended the training, and he did think some plan might be adopted by which greater economy and more perfect organization might be secured. Surely the duty that was performed by 19 adjutants in the Cavalry all the year round could be performed in the Yeomanry for only eight days in the year by a similar number.

SIR THOMAS ACLAND said, he was no advocate for the Yeomanry as it at present existed; but he could assure the Committee that both the officers and men took a great deal of trouble to render themselves efficient. The hon. and gallant Member (Sir Alexander Gordon) said the adjutants were only up for eight days in the year; but that was not the fact. He had known an adjutant at work for a month going amongst the men and instructing them in shooting and other matters. If a regiment was to be properly kept up they must have an adjutant who would give the necessary amount of attention to it.

Vote agreed to.

(6.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £540,500, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Volunteer Corps Pay and Allowances, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882."

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, that, in the first place, he wished publicly to thank the right hon. Gentleman opposite—and in so doing he was expressing the feeling of the whole Volunteer Force—for the way in which the Volunteers had been treated at the recent Review at Windsor, not only by the right hon. Gentleman himself, but by the War Office and the Horse Guards. The Volunteers had done their best to show what they were worth and what they were made of, and they had been well backed up by the Staff; and he would venture to say that nothing could have been better arranged, not only for the reception of the different corps at the different stations, but also for their despatch from those stations. Every civility and attention was shown, the most complicated arrangements were admirably carried out, and, in fact, nothing was omitted which made up the sum and substance of a most successful Review. The Staff showed that they had the interests of the Service at heart; and he trusted the right hon. Gentleman and the officials with whom he was associated were of opinion that discipline, which was so essential to the well-being of the force, had been well maintained. It was essential that the Volunteers should go into camp every year. The Volunteer Force to be useful must be efficient and in a good state of discipline; and the only way to effect that was by putting it into camp every year. He was quite sure that money spent in that way would be well spent. He also advised that sergeant instructors should be compelled to go to the dépôt centre every year for drill, because they were apt to become rusty. He sent his every year; and he thought such instruction should be given, and at the public expense. There was some doubt as to the retiring allowances and the age in the case of adjutants, and he would like to have some information on that point.

SIR THOMAS ACLAND said, he was not prepared to say that sending sergeants to the dépôt would be enough, for although a civilian he had seen a great many sergeant instructors; and, while he had a high respect for their many qualities, there was a great deal to be done in the way of teaching them the art of teaching others.

SIR HENRY FLETCHER corroborated the hon. Baronet, and wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War if he could not, now that he had taken the Volunteers in hand, do something more for them than had been done during their 22 years of existence? The Volunteers had no great-coats or water-bottles, and although the commanding officers had put their hands into their pockets very frequently the regiments were still deficient in those necessary articles. With regard to the pay of the adjutants, the old adjutants were in some doubt as to whether they would be placed on the same footing in regard to retirement as Militia adjutants were; and if the right hon. Gentleman could say that they would be placed on the same footing it would give great satisfaction. The Volunteer officers had great difficulty in getting colour-sergeants, because those men were not fully acquainted with what they would receive when they had finished their term of service. In the present system a colour-sergeant, when transferred from a Line regiment to a Volunteer regiment, was simply a sergeant; and what he was anxious to know was whether colour-sergeants, on the completion of their 21 years' service, would receive the pension of a colour-sergeant or simply that of a sergeant?

MR. W. N. NICHOLSON said, he had been requested to bring before the notice of the Secretary of State for War the claim of Volunteer officers to be exempted from service on juries as a small boon which they deserved in acknowledgment of the time they gave to the country. Referring to a recent reply of the Secretary of State for War on this subject, that the rank and file had an equal claim for exemption, he believed it would be found that but few were eligible, and that even if the exemption were extended to the whole body of Volunteers, he thought, considering the comparatively small number, the pressure on the public would be very slight. He regretted to see, under the head of "Miscellaneous Charges" for Volunteers, a reduction of £5,000 this year. Those items included travelling expenses for attendance at camp, regimental drill, and gun practice. Last year the grant was so small that officers complained that many of their men were prevented from attending camp drill because their regiments could not afford it, and he hoped that next year the allowance would be increased. He also urged an increased Capitation Grant to relieve the commanding officers from the disagreeable necessity of having to ask for subscriptions to meet the expenses of their corps.

SIR ROBERT LOYD LINDSAY also wished to draw attention to the diminution of the allowance for attendance at military camps. The last Secretary of State for War appointed a Committee to inquire into the financial and other conditions of the Volunteer Forces; and amongst other things they considered the question whether the Capitation allowance was sufficient to meet the burdens which were cast on the Volunteers, such as uniforms, ranges, and other items of expense. After very careful consideration, that Committee reported that the Capitation Grant was sufficient with a close economy, but could not bear all those extra charges for camp drill. He therefore recommended that an allowance of 2s. per head should be granted to Volunteers for the six days while they were in camp. Thus, every Volunteer might earn, during encampment, 12s.; but the number of men who were to receive this allowance was limited. Therefore, if a regiment sent 600 men into camp, it might be that only 300 would receive the allowance; and thus, although 2s. per head was given, the result in that case would be, practically, that only 1s. a-head was allowed. He knew that at a time of great pressure in regard to the Estimates the weakest must go to the wall; but he wished to draw attention to this matter now, in the hope that in the future the War Office would give this full allowance to every man who went into camp.

Mr. CHILDERS begged to thank the hon. and gallant Member for the manner in which he had expressed himself with regard to the concessions made by the War Office to make the Volunteer Service successful. Although a great failure had been anticipated for the Windsor Review, he thought the arrangements that had been made were sufficient to justify the encomiums which were accorded to the War Office. That, however, would have been nothing but for the efficiency of the Volunteers themselves; and he could not speak too strongly of the discipline of the Volunteers and the knowledge shown by their officers at the Review. Since the first Review in the early days of the Volunteer Force, the Volunteers had shown a remarkable improvement; and the result was that at Windsor they had aroused the admiration of not only the general spectators, but of a large number of distinguished and experienced military officers, both English and foreign. Great credit was due to the Railway Companies for the manner in which they conveyed the troops to and from the ground, but far more to the admirable discipline of the men and the experience and skill shown by the officers. With regard to the allowance for attending camps and travelling expenses, the amount taken this year was really the same as last year, taking the two Votes together. A larger number of men had attended the camps this year, and that would have to be considered in framing the Votes for next year. He had no wish to exercise an unwise economy in a matter of that kind, for it was a great advantage to Volunteers to gain experience in camp. With regard to adjutants, Volunteer adjutants would be placed on precisely the same footing as the Militia adjutants. If 55 years of age with 20 years' service they would be retired compulsorily at 10s. a-day. With regard to service on juries, he could not see why a Volunteer officer should have absolute immunity from that duty. But, as a matter of fact, the question had been decided by Act of Parliament, and he had no power to excuse Volunteer officers from serving on juries. He did not see how the privilege could be given to the officers and not to the men; and, if the men were exempted, the exemption of 200,000 men would throw a serious burden upon the rest of the community.

Mr. PARNELL said, he regretted to be obliged to take a division on this Vote; but he must do so on the ground that, although Ireland was compelled to pay a contribution towards the cost of the Volunteer Force in England and Wales, she was not allowed to have a Volunteer Force. This matter had been brought before the House several times, and in dividing against the Vote he did not do so out of any hostility towards the English Volunteers, whom he recognized as a fine body of men of whom this country ought to be proud. But there was no way of separating the amount paid by Ireland from that paid by England, and, consequently, he must divide against the whole Vote. In 1879 a Bill was brought in by Mr. O'Clery for the constitution of a Volunteer Force in Ireland, and passed by the House of Commons; but the House of Lords threw it out after very slight examination. When the Liberal Government came in, and announced their intention to equalize the laws of England and Ireland, it was supposed they would take some steps to remedy this grievance; but now, in their second Session, they seemed to have no intention to give a Volunteer Force to Ireland. The Irish Members were thus obliged to begin again to protest, and the only way to do that was to oppose this Vote.

MR. CHILDERS said, he admitted that the hon. Gentleman had stated his case in a fair spirit; but he would remind him that there had been a Bill on the subject introduced this Session, upon which the views of the Government might have been stated. The Bill was, however, dropped, and he regretted that, because he had desired such an opportunity of giving the objections of the Government to the formation at this juncture of an Irish Volunteer Force.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the Bill alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman was in charge of the junior Member for Tipperary (Mr. P. J. Smyth), who sat on the Ministerial Benches, together with several other Members representing Irish constituencies. It was a remarkable phenomenon that those Gentlemen made proposals, and when the proposals came forward they themselves disappeared. However, he thought the Irish Members might bring in a Bill next Session; and he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman, following the example of the late Government, would give them his support. He objected to the Vote on different grounds from those of his hon. Friend. The Volunteer Force had been described by Sir Garnet Wolseley as a force for increasing the martial spirit of the people. He objected to the martial spirit of the English people; and he thought the increase of their martial spirit was detrimental to the public peace, and essentially hostile to the principles of the Liberal Party. If it had not been for the Volunteer Force and the unwholesome feeling it had created, he did not think the Government would have had much difficulty in keeping down public opinion on the Eastern Question. He should take every opportunity of protesting against the Volunteer Force.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, the right hon. Gentleman had stated that after 15 years' service they would receive 10s. per day, if compulsorily retired; but he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) wished to know what a man who voluntarily retired after 15 years' service would get?

MR. CHILDERS: There is no change in the present scale for ordinary retirement. For compulsory retirement 2s. a-day has been added at the top of the scale.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, he was much pleased to hear some observations which had been just made. He saw, on looking at the Votes, that they had 315,000 troops for Home and Colonial service. If they could not carry on all the wars they wished to wage with these, it was time they gave up fighting.

MR. CHILDERS: Our Army, if maintained in an efficient state, will do more to maintain peace than if so reduced as to provoke attack.

Question put.

COLONEL ALEXANDER wished to know what provision had been made for drilling and training the Army Reserve. He knew the rule was that they should be called out for 12 days each year; but, as a matter of fact, except when they were permanently called out in 1878, calls had only been made upon them in rare instances, and even then only a few at a time had been called up at Aldershot and other places. It would be better to call them up twice during their entire Reserve Service for 28 days each time, instead of 12 days annually. It was when a man had got half-way through each period of non-activity in the Service that he became rusty; therefore, instead of only calling the men up for 12 days annually, it would be better to call them up for two periods of 28 days each. There was one other point to which he wished to call attention. He had seen some of the Reserve in his own district, and they had struck him as being men who would be by no means fit for active military service if called upon. It did not seem to him that sufficient precautions were taken to see that the men were thoroughly fit if called upon for active service. He wished to ask whether, in the case of the men who enlisted to pass into the Reserve after three years with the Colours, and who, failing to obtain employment in civil life, wished to rejoin their regiments, the right hon. Gentleman could not, under any circumstances, allow them to do so? He had seen a letter from General Luard, commanding the Royal Canadian Militia, who stated that when he was employed at Manchester he found many cases of men who had been passed, after three years' service with the Colours, into the First Class Reserve, and who subsequently came to him to be re-admitted into their old regiments, but had to be refused and sent away. The consequence was that many of them re-enlisted under other names.

MR. CHILDERS: I am not prepared at this moment to say whether a change in the practice of not annually calling out the Reserve for drill is desirable. It is certain that the more you impose obligations on the men, the more unpopular the Service will become. We require to be very cautious in this matter of calling out the Reserve. Some weight is, no doubt, to be attached to the point contained in the letter the hon. and gallant Member has quoted. I can well imagine that some of the men have a difficulty in finding employment; and it is a fact that a few—but, probably, very few—have come back again into the Army.

Vote agreed to.

“That a sum, not exceeding £444,800 (including a Supplementary Sum of £40,000), be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Commissariat, Transport, and Ordnance Store Establishments, Wages, &c. which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882.”

MR. CHILDERS: I think, perhaps, hon. Members will allow me to make a brief statement on this Vote. This is the first Vote we have taken to-night in which we have incorporated a portion of the Supplementary Estimate for the War in South Africa, and I ought to explain why that Estimate is necessary. The original Estimate this year was framed in January and laid before Parliament, I think, on the very day the news of the first action was received and a request by Sir George Colley for more troops. In moving the Estimates I explained that beyond the amount incorporated in the General Estimate for the War in South Africa, and which was shown separately in each item, later in the Session there would have to be a Supplementary Estimate, as the original Votes only provided for the troops arranged to be sent out to the end of January. That we have done now. I may say, as to the framework of the Estimate, that it assumes this—that the present force in South Africa will be retained until the end of the three months allowed for the ratification of the Treaty—that is to say, at the end of October. After that the force will be reduced to about half, and we provide for this during what remains of the present year, 1881. If in the remaining three months of the present financial year—that is to say, up to March, 1882, there should be any necessity to make an addition to the normal force in South Africa—that is to say, if all the excess on the normal force is not withdrawn at Christmas, we shall have to ask for a Supplemental Vote next Session.

COLONEL DAWNAY wished to call attention to the condition of the troops serving at the Gold Coast, the most unhealthy climate in the world. The normal unhealthiness of the place rendered it necessary that the greatest precautions should be taken to put the towns in as good a sanitary state as possible. The sickness amongst the British troops, which had been extremely great this year, was owing to the severity of the summer and the defective sanitary state of the Native towns. He would urge the right hon. Gentleman to consider the desirability of putting the Fanti towns in the neighbourhood of Cape Coast Castle under proper sanitary regulations, and of compelling the Native populations to keep the towns clean and get rid of the horrible cesspools and open drains which existed there. There were several healthy stations in the interior within a few miles of Cape Coast Castle, and to these places our troops should be sent, if, indeed, it was deemed necessary to keep any British troops in the country at all. We could have our West Indian regiments quartered at Sierra Leone; and these, with the Native Houssa Police, officered by Englishmen, would be quite sufficient to protect the settlement.

MR. CHILDERS: I entirely sympathize with the object of the hon. and gallant Gentleman; but I would point out that the state of things at the Gold Coast recently was quite exceptional. A large additional body of troops were sent there. The mortality of the small force at Cape Coast Castle, I am informed, is not unusually great, and the place is not in a worse sanitary condition than might be expected. I do not think it is worse than Sierra Leone, or other places in that part of the world. The exceptional state of things I have referred to was the necessity of taking very prompt defensive measures to meet the action which was expected on the part of the King of Ashantee. We sent off the troops in great haste, and it was very well that we did so, because their arrival undoubtedly prevented the outbreak of hostilities. We sent the troops in such a hurry that there was no time to communicate with Cape Coast Castle before they arrived, so as to enable the authorities to take measures for putting the place in a better sanitary condition. The troops suffered severely in consequence. Ordinarily, the men are not quartered in the Native towns, and the accommodation provided for them is not more unhealthy than is usual in these bad climates. On the general question, I may say it is not in my power to give orders for the improvement of these Colonial stations. The matter rests with the Colonial Office; and as to the hon. and gallant Member's suggestion that we should withdraw British troops altogether from Cape Coast Castle, that is a thing I should be loth to do without the distinct approval of the Colonial Office. Up to the present time, I have been advised by the Colonial Office that it would not be proper to leave the Cape Coast Castle solely protected by the Houssa police without Her Majesty's troops. We, therefore, must keep a small force there.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he wished to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to some complaints that were made by the Assistant Commissary General of the Ordnance Stores. Two years ago the Secretary of State for War had said that the Ordnance Store officers should be placed in the same position as other officers. They believed they suffered under a disadvantage from the fact that while there was at headquarters one Commissary General, they had there no permanent representation. A very decided opinion had been expressed by them as to the importance of having permanent representation at headquarters, having regard to the vast number of details which came under their notice. That was the first point

The second was that the Ordnance Store officers were not placed in a fair position with regard to pay as compared with the Commissariat officers. The wording of the Warrant relating to them was almost the same as that of the Warrant which regulated the pay of Commissariat officers; but, as a matter of fact, the operation of the two Warrants was very different. Almost every Assistant Commissariat officer of 25 years' service could draw 30*s.* a-day; but he believed there was no single assistant officer in the Store Department who could draw more than 24*s.* a-day. Most of the assistant officers of the former department could, if they thought fit, retire on 20*s.* a-day. The third grievance related to the titular rank of the Ordnance Store officers. It was a fact that in consequence of the regulation that officers of the Army who were appointed to the store branch should retain their military titles, many seniors in that Department would be styled "Mr.," while their juniors would be described as "Captain." Although some hon. Members might be disposed to laugh at the importance attached to that distinction, it undoubtedly constituted a great anomaly, and had given rise, as he understood, to a good deal of heart-burning. Such were the three points which he knew had led to much dissatisfaction in the store branch; and he would suggest that a very slight alteration in the Warrant of 1880 relating to officers in that branch would fulfil the promises which those gentlemen thought they were warranted in understanding that the noble Lord on the Front Opposition Benches gave them two years ago.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL admitted that he had stated, when the last Government were in Office, that they were prepared to put the officers of the Store Department and the Commissariat Department on an equal footing. He understood the three points raised by the hon. Member for Queen's County to be—first, that there were no Ordnance Store officers at head-quarters; secondly, that they received less pay, as compared with the officers of the Commissariat Department; and, thirdly, that a grievance existed amongst them with regard to titular rank. All these questions were attentively gone into at the time referred to by the hon. Member. As regarded titular rank, he believed civilian officers in the Commissariat Department still held the title of "Mr.;" and, consequently, in that respect, there was no difference between the two branches. It was an understood thing that the Army officers who came into these Departments should retain their military rank; and, of course, having been competent officers, it would have been very hard to take that rank away from them. On the other hand, he thought it would be impossible for any Government to give military titles where they did not already exist. He did not think there was ever any intention to give Army titular rank to the officers of the Commissariat or Ordnance Store Departments who did not already possess them—that was to say, to those who had not gained it in the Army. With regard to the Commissary General at head-quarters, no doubt hon. Members would know that the Commissary General was under the Commander-in-Chief. The number of officers of the Commissariat Department was larger by 60 or 70 than that of the Ordnance Store Department, and it was believed that the Assistant Commissary General would be able to represent both Departments. He certainly had said that this matter should be considered, and that, if it were possible, a gentleman of the Ordnance Store Department should be appointed. Then, as regarded difference of pay, he had not been able to discover that there was any difference between the two Departments in respect of pay. Such differences, however, might exist, and he had promised to look into the question to see what could be done. It was perfectly true that he had made that statement; but it was, of course, not binding on his successors in Office, who would answer for themselves; and he had no doubt whatever that the right hon. Gentleman opposite would have good reasons for what he had done, and for what he might do in future, with regard to this Department of the Public Service.

MR. CHILDERS said, since the present Government had been in Office the question to which the hon. Member for Queen's County had drawn attention had not come before him in any shape. The hon. Member would understand that there were some extremely difficult questions in connection with the subject he had referred to. For his own part, he had every wish to see the Ordnance Store Department treated fairly.

Lord Eustace Cecil

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he hoped that something like an equality of pay would be established. As a matter of fact, the officers belonging to the Store Department had had very much longer service, and yet they received a lower average rate of pay than the officers of the Commissariat Branch.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he observed on page 40 a charge of £5,202 for police employed under the Contagious Diseases Prevention Acts. There was a good deal of difference of opinion with regard to the operation of those Acts. He should not enter into any detail, because the subject was not an agreeable one; but, no doubt, while there were arguments which might be used in their favour, a considerable number of persons were opposed to them, some on the ground of inefficiency, others on the ground of immorality, while others believed that they could not be carried out without doing wrong to respectable persons. Under these circumstances, he did not think there was sufficient general assent in their favour to justify public money being spent upon them. He should, therefore, move that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £5,202.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £439,698 (including a Supplementary Sum of £40,000), be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Commissariat, Transport, and Ordnance Store Establishments, Wages, &c. which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he regretted that the hon. Member for Northampton had brought forward this Motion on the present occasion, because, although his present opinion was in favour of it, he should have liked a little further time for consideration. As it was, however, he should have no choice but to vote with the hon. Member. With regard to the quartermasters in the Store Department, he understood that considerable dissatisfaction existed amongst those officers on account of the loss or deterioration of social position, which they believed they sustained in connection with the alteration of their titular rank. If the right hon. Gentleman would say a word or two on the question, it might, perhaps, remove a good deal of the feeling which existed amongst these gentlemen in consequence of their being treated with a great want of consideration by the military authorities.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, he was aware of the difference of opinion which existed on the subject of the Contagious Diseases Acts; but he trusted that the hon. Member for Northampton would not press his Motion to a division on this occasion. He reminded the Committee that a Committee, of which he himself had been a Member, was sitting for the purpose of considering these Acts; and until that Committee had reported, it was certainly necessary that police should be employed to carry the Acts into operation.

MR. CHILDERS said, he would venture to add his request to that of the hon. Baronet opposite, that the hon. Member for Northampton would not think it necessary to call upon the Committee to proceed to a division upon his Motion. He made this appeal in the interest of those persons who were opposed to the Acts, because a great many hon. Members would vote for the Estimate as requisite so long as the law was in operation, although they did not agree that the present state of the law was satisfactory. He could speak for several Gentlemen who were not satisfied with the present condition of things, who could not but vote the necessary expenditure for carrying out the law, but who, if the question were whether the law should be changed or not, would certainly vote against its continuance.

AN hon. MEMBER said, he also hoped that the Motion would not be pressed. He believed the Acts in question were both useful and moral in their tendency. Anyone who had heard the evidence given before the Committee upstairs must have been impressed with the benefit which had been derived from their operation in garrison towns.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he regretted he was unable to yield to the appeals made to him to withdraw his Motion. But he felt very strongly upon this subject, as did also his constituents. No Report of any Committee, nor even the opinion of his constituents, would ever convince him that an error had not been committed in regard to these Acts.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 13; Noes 80: Majority 67. — (Div. List, No. 354.)

(9.) £780,000, Clothing Establishments, Services, and Supplies.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL wished to urge the Secretary of State for War to go very thoroughly into the prices at the clothing establishments, especially in regard to the cloth for tunics and caps and badges. These might be small things, but they involved a large sum of money. There was a great deal of waste; and he also would suggest that a large amount of the clothing made elsewhere might be made at these establishments.

MR. CHILDERS said, he quite agreed that these small things were important, and promised to consider the matter.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, there was a large reduction in the amount of material sold to contractors; and he wished to know if any substantial change was to be made in the Clothing Department?

MR. CHILDERS said, that this was only a matter of account, and that there was really no change.

SIR HENRY FLETCHER said, the new Regulation required soldiers to surrender their uniform on retiring from the Army, and to purchase new clothing. Would any allowance be made on that account? There was, he added, great dissatisfaction among the men.

MR. CHILDERS said, he did not think there was anything like general dissatisfaction upon this matter, and that the change was made on the recommendation of the whole body of commanding officers.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, the commanding officers had advised that the men's uniforms should be taken away on their leaving, for many men had gone about begging in their uniforms, and so disgraced the Service.

Vote agreed to.

(10.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,290,000 (including a Supplementary Sum of £120,000), be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Supply, Manufacture, and Repair of Warlike and other Stores (including Establishments of Manufacturing Departments), which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882."

LORD EUSTACE CECIL desired to know in what position the question of breech-loading guns stood; what the Committee on that subject were doing; whether they had hit upon a gun that would suit the Naval Service; and whether they proposed any change in the breech-loading guns for land service? He also wished to know if there was any disposition to consider magazine guns as any part of our armed service; and why there was so large an increase for gunpowder? Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would explain the decrease for materials and metal; and why there was an increase of £17,400 in regard to machinery?

MAJOR-GENERAL FEILDEN moved that Progress be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Major-General Feilden.)

MR. CHILDERS said, he hoped the Committee would not report Progress at a quarter before 2, considering what had still to be done in the few remaining days of the Session. There was no contentious matter in the remainder of this Vote, and he hoped the Committee would proceed.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. CHILDERS said, in reply to the noble Lord the Member for West Essex (Lord Eustace Cecil), that the question of breech-loading guns would come up on the Navy Estimates, and he should take part in that discussion. Undoubtedly, the use of prismatic powder did necessitate longer guns and larger chambers. Both those considerations pointed to the advantage of breech-loading guns over muzzle-loading guns, especially when the guns were in a confined position, and when a larger chamber was required for the powder than for the projectile. Guns which were not in a confined position, or in turrets—muzzle-loading guns—could be loaded, so far as their length was concerned, as well as breech-loaders; but the larger chamber was coming more and more into use, and that tended more and more to the use of the breech-loader; and he did not doubt that there would be a large increase in those guns, especially for service at sea. The Committee were making most careful experiments, and he had not hurried their operations. The question of magazine guns was not yet settled; but he had seen them all, and he was satisfied they had a great many faults. As to the items of the Vote, there had been a saving on metal due to the requirements having been less this year, and the stock sufficient for all that was wanted. The increase in gunpowder was owing to increased demands, and to the stock having become low.

MAJOR-GENERAL BURNABY said, he believed that the gun-spikes carried by the pioneers in Infantry regiments would not effectually spike any modern gun; moreover, the number carried was too few.

MR. CHILDERS thanked the hon. and gallant Member for drawing attention to the matter.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT moved to report Progress. He was willing, if necessary, to sit there; but he thought it too much to put forward, at 10 minutes past 2, all these Estimates, and to force them down the throats of hon. Members. He protested against the practice.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir Walter B. Barttelot.)

MR. CHILDERS said, he had no intention to force these Votes against the wish of any considerable number of Members, and he would agree to take the remaining Votes to-morrow.

Motion agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

IRISH CHURCH ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 235.]

(Mr. William Edward Forster, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON), in moving that the Bill be read a second time, said that at that late hour the House would probably consider it desirable that he should only give an outline of the measure. The term of the Commissioners of Church Temporalities in Ireland under the Irish Church Act had come to an end, and their powers were now temporarily continued by the Expiring Laws Continuance Act. Practically, all that remained to be done was to pay the annuitants that remained of the former establishment, to collect the income that remained for the Temporalities Office, and to pay off the debt due to the National Debt Commissioners and the debt for Intermediate Education. The object of the Bill, therefore, was to provide for the dissolution of the Church Temporalities Commission, and to transfer to the Irish Land Commission all the property vested in the Church Temporalities Commission.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

MR. WARTON asked, if the Irish Land Commission was not appointed, what would be done?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, the Church Temporalities Commission would be temporarily continued for another year by the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill now before the House.

MR. HEALY said, he did not object to the policy of the Government; but he wished for an exact statement of the affairs of the Church Temporalities Commission. When a particular Bill of this kind, involving an important change of policy, was advanced, the House ought to have a distinct statement of accounts.

MR. WHITLEY said, the measure had only been distributed to Members a very short time, and they had not had sufficient opportunity for examining it and turning it over in their minds. Were the Church Temporalities Commissioners aware of the Bill? Either the measure should have been introduced earlier, or the Commissioners should have received some intimation of it.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, he knew the Commissioners were aware of the existence of the Bill, because in an interview which he had had with Mr. Justice Lawson, who was one of them, this subject had been mentioned. There had been published a complete Report of the Church Temporalities Commissioners for the year 1880; and this summed up all that the body, with so much advantage to the public and credit to themselves, had done from 1869 up to the present time.

MR. WHITLEY: What is the title of it?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, it was entitled "The Report of the Commissioners of Church Temporalities in Ireland for the period from 1869 to 1st July, 1880." It gave a brief summary of what had been done. It stated that they had realized all the land, and had sold it to occupying tenants willing to purchase, and, outside those purchasers, had sold to the general public. The manner in which the sales were made, the simple method in which the whole of the arrangements were carried out, and the plainest information carried in the most intelligible manner to the doors of the poorest, were shown in the Report.

MR. CALLAN: When did the Act expire?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): In 1879.

MR. CALLAN: And how long do the present Commissioners hold office—when was the Act continued?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): The present Commissioners hold office until the 31st December, 1881, under the Expiring Laws Continuance Act, which was passed in 1880.

MR. CALLAN said, the 3rd clause of the Bill said they should be entitled to receive salaries up to the 31st December next. Mr. Justice Lawson would have no objection to this measure, because it would continue his salary and that of his brother Commissioners up to that date, although the duties had entirely ceased. There was an evil spirit pervading the whole of the Bill, and its practical effect would be to hamper and impede the action of the new Land Commission. It would place on their shoulders an incubus—a new "Old Man of the Sea." The Land Commission would have to take over an old effete staff of officials, and be hampered with men whose old duties in no way resembled those to be imposed on the new Land Commission. The Land Commissioners were to have the power of appointing a Secretary and Solicitor; but the effect of this Bill would be to hand over a Secretary and Solicitor. If this was not intended, the clause in the Bill to which he was referring was merely unnecessary verbiage, and should be struck out. He should like to hear from the Government when the salaries of Mr. Justice Lawson and the other Commissioners would cease, and why, considering that their work had ceased, and that they had only technical duties to perform, a Bill should be brought in to confer upon them salaries up to the 31st December? If the salaries were merely a gift to these gentlemen, let it be so stated. In the provisions of the Bill nothing was said about the payment being merely a gratuity.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, that if the Bill were now read a second time, the Committee should not be taken before Monday. Time should be given for its consideration.

MR. BIGGAR said, he could not agree with the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan) upon one of the points he had raised. The hon. Member objected to the staff of the Church Temporalities Commission being transferred to the Land Commission; but it seemed to him (Mr. Biggar) that if the Secretary and Treasurer and other officers of the former Commission were efficient, it was desirable that, instead of abolishing them, they should be transferred to a new Department. His opinion was that as little patronage as possible should be placed in the hands of the Government. They knew it must always be extremely difficult to refuse a whole crowd of applicants. He would, however, remind the Government of this in making the transfer—that at the time the Church Temporalities Commissioners made their sales under the Church Act, land was much more valuable in the market than it was now; and it would be very injurious if the valuers in their transactions acted upon the same principles that guided them a few years ago.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

CORRUPT PRACTICES (SUSPENSION OF ELECTIONS) BILL.—[BILL 238.]

(Mr. Attorney General, Secretary Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Solicitor General.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that it consisted of only one section, and it was absolutely necessary that it should be passed. When it became necessary to postpone the consideration of the greater question, there arose this difficulty—that there were constituencies in which corrupt practices had extensively prevailed which had elected Members, and if those Members died, new ones could be elected; also, if there were a Dissolution of Parliament, new Members could be elected. The object of the Bill was to suspend for a limited time the holding of Parliamentary Elections in certain cities and boroughs.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

MR. WARTON said, he thought that before they took away from a city or a borough the right to return Members there should be some reason given for it in the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

BRITISH HONDURAS (COURT OF APPEAL) BILL.—[Lords.]—[BILL 233.]

(Mr. Courtney.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. COURTNEY, in moving that the Bill be read a second time, said, the measure was of a very simple character. The Court of British Honduras consisted of only one Judge, and he was not, he believed, supported by a very strong Bar. At present, the appeal from this Court was to the Privy Council. The Supreme Court of Jamaica had three Judges, and it was proposed in the Bill to make the appeal from the Court of British Honduras to the Court of Jamaica. The Legislative Council of Jamaica had assented to this course.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Courtney.)

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, he hoped the Bill would be read a second time. There had always been a difficulty about appeals in British Honduras; and as both Colonies agreed to the pre-not proposal, and as it was distinctly desirable to bring British Honduras and Jamaica into closer union, he looked upon this as a step in the right direction.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

PEDLARS (CERTIFICATES) BILL.

[Lords.—[Bill 234.]

(Mr. Courtney.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. COURTNEY, in moving that the Bill be read a second time, said, that, owing to the present state of the law, pedlars were exposed to great inconvenience. They obtained hawking certificates from the places in which they resided; but when they went into other districts they were bound to obtain an endorsement. If they visited three or four different districts in one day, they were obliged to obtain a separate endorsement in each. The opinion of the police authorities had been asked on this matter, and they had reported in favour of a relaxation of the law; consequently, it was now proposed that the certificates obtained in the district in which the pedlars resided should be deemed sufficient, without endorsement, to enable them to carry on their trades in other districts.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Courtney.)

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he did not want to oppose the Bill, which was a very reasonable one; but he wished to bring under the notice of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department that which in the suburbs of London—and, in fact, in the suburbs of all large towns—was an intolerable nuisance to the respectable poor. Pedlars were in the habit of going through the streets where these persons resided, knocking at every door, and inquiring whether the inmates desired to purchase any of their wares. In some small streets sometimes as many as 20 summonses of this kind were answered in a day. It appeared to him it would be a good thing if the Home Office authorities would direct the attention of the police to this matter, which was really a very serious grievance.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

UNIVERSITIES (SCOTLAND) REGISTRATION OF PARLIAMENTARY VOTERS, &c. BILL.—[Lords.—[Bill 232.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he wished to draw the attention of the Speaker and of the House to a point in this Bill which, he thought, was of some importance in a general sense, though it might not appear at first sight to involve anything very serious. He read in the 16th clause of this measure these words—

"On and after the passing of this Act, no person shall be allowed, after examination, to graduate at any of the Universities of Scotland until he shall have paid, as a registration fee, a sum not exceeding twenty shillings to the general University fund of the University at which he wishes to graduate."

Now, that was an imposition of a tax on the subject, and the Bill containing it had been brought from the House of Lords. The House of Lords, he believed, had no right to impose such a charge. On more occasions than one—on many occasions—the House of Commons had declined to proceed with a Bill which involved the imposition of a charge upon the people coming from the House of Lords; and in Sir Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice he found these words—

"So strictly had the right of the Commons been maintained in regard to the imposition of charges upon the people, that they denied to the Lords the power of authorizing the taking of fees, and imposing pecuniary penalties, or of varying the mode of suing for them, or of applying them when recovered; though such provisions were necessary to give effect to the general enactments of a Bill."

Then Sir Erskine May went on to say—

"A too strict enforcement of this rule, in regard to penalties, was found to be attended with unnecessary inconvenience; and, in 1831, the Commons judiciously relaxed it; and, again, in 1849, they introduced a further amendment of their rules, by the adoption of the following Standing Orders—

'That, with respect to any Bill brought to this House from the House of Lords, or returned by the House of Lords to this House with Amendments, whereby any pecuniary penalty, forfeiture, or fee shall be authorized, imposed, appropriated, regulated, varied, or extinguished, this House will not insist upon its ancient and undoubted privileges. In the following cases:—

'1. When the object of such pecuniary penalty or forfeiture is to secure the execution of the Act, or the punishment or prevention of offences.' "

As to the 1st clause, he (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) admitted that this particular provision in the Bill was not covered by it. The second provision was—

"Where such fees are imposed in respect of benefit taken, or services rendered, under the Act, and in order to the execution of the Act, and are not made payable into the Treasury or Exchequer, or in aid of the public revenue, and do not form the ground of public accounting by the parties receiving the same, either in respect of deficit or surplus."

He would submit that this imposition of a fee was not of such a character as to come within the condition of that Standing Order, because it was not imposed in respect of "benefit taken or services rendered." It was imposed after examination, precedent to graduating in the Scotch Universities. The object of this Bill was, not to enable people to graduate, but to make provision for the registration of voters. The last condition was this—"When such Bill shall be a private Bill for a local or personal Act." He would submit that this was not a mere local or personal Act; therefore, it did not come within the third condition of the Order. Therefore, having regard to the invariable practice of the House, there was only one course open to the House—namely, to decline to proceed with the consideration of the Bill. He submitted this matter to Mr. Speaker, first of all, as a point of Order.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER (Mr. LYON PLAYFAIR): This is not a tax at all. The Universities have to appoint registrars and clerks to keep the registration books; and, having no fund out of which the expenses can be defrayed, they charge a small fee for the services they render in making the graduate a member of the General Council for life. In some of the Universities the fee just about pays the cost of the service the University renders. In one of the Universities it yields rather a small profit; but, as a rule, it just represents the amount expended by the Universities on the registration book. It is no tax, but a payment for a service rendered by the University to the men it enrolls.

MR. HEALY said, on the point of Order, he wished to remark that so recently as Monday last, in the Coroners (Ireland) Bill, the House of Lords having inserted a provision to the effect that the Grand Juries might, at the end of five years, if they thought fit, revise the salaries of the Coroners, which salaries were a charge upon the county rates, this House disagreed with the Lords' Amendments, and refused to allow it to be considered. In this case there was no tax imposed on the public whatever.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER (Mr. LYON PLAYFAIR): It was a charge on the county rates.

MR. HEALY: It was not a charge on the county rates. The Amendment was simply to give power to the Grand Juries every five years to reconsider the question of Coroners' salaries.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that not only was there a charge made on the graduates for the purpose of defraying the expense of having them enrolled for voting purposes, but it imposed a fee on him in his character of graduate for a degree in the University. The words are—

"No person shall be allowed, after examination, to graduate at any of the Universities of Scotland until he shall have paid, as a registration fee, a sum not exceeding twenty shillings to the general University fund of the University at which he wishes to graduate."

He contended that this, coming from the House of Lords, was against the Privileges of the House of Commons.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER (Mr. LYON PLAYFAIR): It appears to me that this case is governed by the second paragraph of the Order of 29th July, 1849, which states that—

"Where such fees are imposed in respect of benefit taken, or service rendered, under the Act, and in order to the execution of the Act, and are not made payable into the Treasury or Exchequer, or in aid of the public revenue, and do not form the ground of public accounting by the parties receiving the same, either in respect of deficit or surplus."

It appears to me that the fees contemplated are to be charged for the purpose of effecting this registration; and I do not, therefore, see sufficient ground for the Bill being laid aside in consequence of informality. That is my own view of the subject.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, his objection was that the clause said that a man should not be allowed to graduate without paying the fee, not that it said he should not be eligible to vote. The object of the Bill was to establish a proper registration of voters, and yet it declared that a man should not be allowed to graduate without paying a certain sum of money.

Mr. R. N. FOWLER said, that the fee was paid by the intending graduate at the London University before any examination took place at all.

Mr. HEALY said, that was not the point. The point was whether the House of Lords had a right to impose a fee upon the public before allowing them to enter the Universities.

Mr. J. A. CAMPBELL said, that the object of the Bill was to effect an improvement in the manner of conducting Parliamentary Elections in the Universities, simplifying the existing arrangements and assimilating them; so far as practicable, to those already in use in elections for the University offices of Chancellor and General Council's Assessor in the University Court. This matter was referred to by the Scottish Universities Commissioners, who reported in 1878. A Bill dealing with the subject was introduced into this House and passed in the early part of the present Session; but in the House of Lords, owing to an accident, it became a dropped Order. A noble Lord who had been a Member of the Commission had accordingly introduced another Bill—the one now before the House—which equally carried out the recommendations of the Commission as well as other minor changes which had commended themselves to the Universities. It proposed what was believed would be a great improvement in the matter of registration. There were evils found attending the present system of registration, and it was to cure those that the provision to which the hon. Member for Queen's County objected had been inserted in the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

EXEMPTION FROM DISTRESS BILL.

[BILL 116.] CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND, in moving that the Order for the consideration of this Bill be discharged, said, he regretted that a measure intended to benefit the agricultural interest, and to exempt the property of third persons from liability to distress, should have been blocked by hon. Members who professed to represent the Farmers' Alliance.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Order for the Consideration of this Bill be discharged,"—(Sir Henry Holland,)—put, and agreed to.

Order discharged; Bill withdrawn.

ROYAL UNIVERSITY OF IRELAND BILL.—(No. 194.)

(The Lord Privy Seal.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD CARLINGFORD, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, its only object was to provide, by a charge on the Irish Church Fund, the necessary means to enable the Royal University of Ireland to commence operations. That University was created by Act of Parliament two years ago, under the auspices of the late Government; and as the present Bill contained nothing beyond the provision to which he referred, he was sure their Lordships would not object to it.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Privy Seal.)

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH said, that, having no objection to the proposal contained in the Bill, he did not rise to oppose the second reading, but merely to remind Her Majesty's Government, when they were making this large provision of £20,000 a-year for the Royal University of Ireland, that there were some very poor Universities in Scotland; and, should money be asked for them in case of their requiring assistance, it was to be hoped that Her Majesty's Government would show towards them the same corresponding liberality they were now exhibiting.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

PART II.

INTERVENTION OF COURT.

Clause 7 (Determination by court of rent of present tenancies).

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that if the noble Viscount (Viscount Monck), whose Amendment stood first, and who was not now present, had deserted his own offspring, he (the Marquess of Salisbury) was prepared in a charitable spirit to take it in. He would be happy to move the Amendments of which the noble Viscount had given Notice, which appeared exceedingly valuable. He had himself on the Paper Amendments directed to the same object; but they were not so satisfactory as those of the noble Viscount. He begged to move the first—namely, in page 9, line 39, after ("term,") to insert ("and on any such application.")

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

THE EARL OF PEMBROKE moved, as an Amendment, to leave out, in line 40, the words ("made payable,") and to insert the word ("increased.") The object of the Amendment was to prevent the rent being increased on account of improvements made by the tenant. It was supposed that, by the words of the Bill, the tenant might be misled as to his rights, and might claim a deduction of rent on the ground that the farm would be deteriorated, if it were not for the improvements he had made. The words he proposed had been suggested by Mr. Healy.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, it would be safer to keep the words as they stood. They must contemplate extreme cases, which the Amendment would hardly meet.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he understood the object of the noble Earl (the Earl of Pembroke) was to meet the views of the people of Ireland and their most popular leaders. This Amendment would restore Mr. Healy's words, which had been abandoned by the Government.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he did not consider that the alteration was necessary.

After a few words from the Earl of Airlie,

On question? resolved in the negative.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY moved the following Amendments, standing in the name of Viscount Monck:—In line 40, leave out ("8,") and also ("in any proceedings under this Act;") and in line 42 after ("title") insert ("during such statutory term.") The effect of these changes would be to amalgamate sub-sections 7 and 8, and make them read as follows:—

("During the currency of a statutory term an application to the court to determine a judicial rent shall not be made except during the last twelve months of the current statutory term, and on any such application no rent shall be made payable in respect of improvements made by the tenant or his predecessors in title during such statutory term.")

Amendments agreed to.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he had to ask their Lordships' attention to a sub-section which he proposed to add after sub-section 8, and which he thought it was impossible to exaggerate the importance of with respect to the Bill. The sub-section which he proposed to add was—of any money or money's worth paid or given by the tenant or his predecessors in title on coming into the holding.")

The great controversy which had arisen, and which had been so keenly disputed in all the discussions that had taken place in regard to the Bill, had been with regard to the origin, nature, and economical bearing of that indefinite "something" which they had given to the tenant to sell, and which the tenant had never possessed before. It had been attempted to be shown that the sale of the goodwill was the sale of something which had grown up by reason of the occupancy, and that to sell it was to sell something which did not belong to the landlord, and that it could not affect the rent. In saying this, he was not speaking of the tenant's improvements, for they were all agreed that the tenant's improvements should be protected. He believed, indeed, that the tenant's improvements were protected by the existing law; but, if they were not, at all events they would be amply protected under the provisions of the Bill; but there was the indefinite something beyond the improvements—namely, the tenant's goodwill—and they would naturally be anxious to know where the goodwill came from, and from what source it might arise, seeing that it was to form part of the tenant's saleable property. The usual impression had been that two and two make four, and that if there was anything to the tenant over and above the profit of his labour and capital that matter was necessarily to be taken out of the landlord's right to the rent. But among all the ambiguous expressions that had been used by the Government, one thing was perfectly clear, that they had been advised by the Government that that something did not come out of the landlord's fair rent. Where it came from he had not exactly been able to discover. It seemed to justify the theory of the spontaneous generation of wealth. It was derived from no source; it grew out of no soil; but it descended suddenly from heaven upon the tenant, and when he had received it, of course it was right that he should be allowed to sell it. But the only thing that concerned them was that it did not come out of the landlord's rent. Where it came from would be an interesting topic for discussion among the politico-economic writers of the future. That matter was one of purely scientific interest; and if he was satisfied that it did not come out of the landlord's rent he would leave it with much pleasure to the scientific inquirers of the future to determine what its exact origin might be. He should like to quote from the debate on the Bill—and he believed he was in Order in doing so—the words which the Government themselves had used with respect to this interesting subject. Two quotations would suffice for the purpose of showing that that was the view taken by the authors of the Bill. The noble and learned Lord the Lord Chancellor, last Tuesday, said—

"I deny that under the provisions of this Bill there is any ground whatever for saying that the tenant is enabled to sell, either in Ulster or in places where no Ulster tenant custom prevails, what is the landlord's, or is taken from the landlord. I deny that it will diminish in any degree whatever the rights of the landlord."

And the noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal, speaking on the preceding evening, said—

"Is it true that the occupation element, the goodwill element, must be taken out of the landlord's fair rent? I utterly deny it. We do not admit it for a moment. We believe that the goodwill element of tenant right grows up inevitably side by side in conjunction with, and outside of, the landlord's rent; that it is not carved out of the landlord's rent; and that it does not cut down the landlord's rent."

Those were brave words, and he (the Marquess of Salisbury) desired to make them realities. It was always interesting to have assurances from the Government; but they had not the force of an Act of Parliament, and he desired, by his Amendment, to make the intentions of the Government a reality, and to introduce words into the Bill which would make it more clear, and prevent the honest and beneficent intentions of Her Majesty's Government from being, by any accident or inadvertency, evaded by any proceedings which arose under the Bill. The danger was not an imaginary one. There were two schools of thought on this subject. There were those who maintained that this purchase money was not to come out of the landlord's pocket; and there were other people who maintained that the land belonged not to one proprietor, but two proprietors, and whatever portion was fixed, the tenant had a right to something which was taken from the landlord's share. He would not stop to discuss to which of the two schools the new

[Second Night.]

Commissioners belonged—the sound orthodox school of Her Majesty's Government, or the other school which gave so much trouble in Ireland—but he would say that, while he fully admitted that the Commissioners were the most conscientious and honest people in the world, that was not the point of importance. If the Commissioners were honest and conscientious, they would act according to their view of what was just, and according to their particular theory of what goodwill was. He wished to make it perfectly clear, by words inserted in the Bill, that they should be worthy members of the school to which he was happy to recognize Her Majesty's Government belonged. It was not only a question of the existing Commissioners, be they ever so sound or orthodox. They were, unhappily, mortal, and if any of them disappeared during the existence of the Act, and that was inevitable, Parliament would have no share in determining who should succeed them, and, therefore, no share in determining the precise school of thought by which the difficult line between goodwill and fair rent should be drawn. Who the Government might be at that time, to what school they might belong, what political exigencies they might recognize, how far they might think it right to subordinate to the political pressure of the moment the convictions which they themselves had, at other times, loudly pronounced, how far they might think it right to adopt the unscientific, incorrect, and unjust doctrines of the school which was unfortunately dominant in many parts of Ireland at that moment, it was impossible for him to prophesy. They only knew it might be in their power to introduce into the administration of that Commission the unjust and unscientific doctrines which the present Government repudiated and denounced; and he thought their Lordships would only be taking a wise and just precaution if they took care that the price of goodwill was not in any degree taken from, or did not cut down, the landlord's rent. He believed the Amendment to be of the first importance as deciding whether, in a pecuniary sense, the Bill should or should not be a measure of gross confiscation; and he would only say for himself that it was only on the understanding that some such Amendment might be made with their Lordships' approbation that he consented to the second reading of the Bill.

Moved, in page 9, line 42, after ("title"), to insert ("the rent of a holding shall not be reduced in any proceedings under this Act on account of any money or money's worth paid or given by the tenant or his predecessors in title on coming into the holding.")—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

LORD WAVENEY opposed the Amendment, on the ground that it was insidious, and that its effect would be to diminish the Ulster Custom to a very great extent. The great difficulty now experienced in Ireland was for a tenant once out of his holding to get another. There was no room for him, and he would refer their Lordships to an instance in which a tenant who had emigrated, not doing well, came back again, but being utterly unable to get a holding, he became desperate, procured a gun, and shot his landlord. He thought it very natural that doubts should arise as to the origin of the third element in the value of the Ulster Custom; but, on the whole, he was satisfied with the intentions and explanation of the Government.

VISCOUNT POWERSCOURT, said, that there seemed to be a great misconception of tenant right on the part of the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury). The tenant right had never, in Ulster, been supposed to come out of the landlord's rent, but was subject to it, being the difference between the rent and the full annual value of the holding; because a landlord in Ulster recognized that the buildings, which had, in most cases, been erected by the tenant, and reclamation of land by the tenant, were his property, and no rent was charged upon the tenant's improvements.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, if the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) wished to learn from what quarter the goodwill element of an Irish tenant right claim was derived, he could only refer him to the Province of Ulster, where it had existed and been tested for many generations, and where he (Lord Carlingford) thought it was pretty clear that the element was not carved out of the landlord's fair rent. But the question now before their Lordships was that of the noble Marquess's words. He did not believe that there was any question of principle at issue between the noble Marquess and the Government upon those words; still it did not follow that it would be expedient to accept them. The words which the noble Marquess proposed to add were totally unnecessary for the object he himself had in view. The Government believed that they would add nothing to the security which all parties would possess at the hands of the Court in fixing the fair rent; and they preferred, with respect both to this Amendment and that of which the noble Marquess had given Notice to follow, as a definition of fair rent, to adhere to their own wording of the clause. But he did not put the matter entirely on that ground. It was easy to perceive that an imperative direction of this kind given to the Court might lead further than was anticipated, and might cover cases which probably, by the admission of all, ought not to be covered. For instance, these words of the noble Marquess did not say who the party was to whom the "money or money's worth" had been paid. The money might have been paid to the landlord himself. It was conceivable in an extreme case—and they were legislating for extreme cases—that a landlord might have taken a fine from a tenant, might have fixed his rent accordingly, and subsequently, for no other reason than his own will and pleasure, might have raised that rent, in which case the proceeding would evidently have been an inequitable one, and one which the Court ought not to be debarred from considering. Then there was another case, perfectly conceivable, also, and one which would distinctly come within the words as they stood. It was the case in which the tenant might, upon coming into his holding, have paid a sum of money, perhaps a large sum, to the tenant before him, with the knowledge and privity of the landlord—exactly the case contemplated by the 7th section of the Land Act of 1870, a transaction out of which the landlord had probably considerably profited himself by the recovery of arrears of rent. Supposing, subsequently, the landlord, from no reasonable cause, had raised this tenant's rent, choosing to ignore the transaction to which he was a party, was the Court in such a case to be debarred from even considering the question? If such extreme cases might follow, it would be extremely dangerous to adopt the words of the Amendment; in fact, they believed in many cases they would lead to inconvenient and improper results. On these grounds the Government would adhere to their own framing of the sub-section.

EARL CAIRNS said, the noble Lord (Lord Carlingford) had, after much consideration, presented to their Lordships two cases which he thought might cause embarrassment if the Amendment were agreed to. One was the case where the incoming tenant might have paid a considerable sum of money to the outgoing tenant, with the knowledge of the landlord, and where the landlord might have had his arrears of rent paid out of that money. That was, in reality, nothing more nor less than the active principle of the Ulster tenant right. In 999 cases out of every 1,000, the landlord not only knew that money passed, but knew also the amount of it. Not only so; but on many of the large estates not only was the landlord aware of the money passed, but there was a fixed sum beyond which the ingoing tenant was not allowed to go in giving money to the outgoing tenant. The noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal declared the other night that the custom of Ulster was such that the rent was perfectly independent of the money paid for tenant right; but now the noble Lord said that if the sum paid by the incoming tenant was paid with the knowledge of the landlord, the Court ought to take that into consideration. In other words, the Court was to do the very thing which the noble Lord said the other night it ought not to do. The clause might be modified in order to meet the other case to which the noble Lord referred. There need, therefore, be no difficulty in accepting the Amendment from any of the cases cited by the noble Lord. It had not been proposed without careful consideration. It was quite plain that, however this right was acquired, it affected a large sum of money; and it was quite right that the landlord should have some safeguard that if a value was to be attached to goodwill it should not diminish the rent.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH said, if the proposal in the Bill was that the Commissioners should take into consideration any sum that the tenant had paid for his holding, and estimating that as against the landlord's rent, he should go with the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) in opposition to a clause to that effect. The Amendment also would be futile; it would not be possible to get behind the mind of the Commissioners and prevent their taking into consideration any such payment if so disposed; but there was another point in regard to the matter he would call their attention to. Let him ask, why had their Lordships accepted the second reading of the Bill? It was with the idea—whether it was to be realized or not—that the measure would do something towards the pacification of Ireland, and because they wished to put an end, if possible, to a grievance, partly real and partly imaginary, felt by the Irish people in respect to the Land Question. Now, if they sent the Bill to Ireland with the words of the Amendment in it, so far from the measure being a measure of pacification, it would tend to make disloyal the only loyal portion of the people of Ireland. The insertion into the Bill of the sub-section would wave a red flag in the face of every tenant in Ulster, and lead him to believe that he was deprived of his tenant right, for he would look upon the sub-section as a direct attack upon the tenant right already existing.

THE DUKE OF ABERCORN said, that, having had an experience of nearly half-a-century of tenant right in Ireland, he could not understand why the Government, in view of the understanding that was generally attached to the custom, could refuse to accept the Amendment. He contended that if Ulster tenant right was correctly described in Mr. Sharman Crawford's definition of it, there could be no objection to the Amendment of the noble Marquess.

VISCOUNT LIFFORD supported the Amendment.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL expressed the opinion that the logic which had been used in support of the Amendment, while it, no doubt, would enable the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) to achieve an easy victory over Her Majesty's Government, would hardly suffice to induce their Lordships to agree to this proposal. Indeed, no one who had regard to the peace of Ireland could wish to see the Amendment adopted. The Government had over and over again declared, and no one more so than his noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal (Lord Carlingford), that goodwill in Ulster had no effect whatever on rent. He (the Duke of Argyll) had never believed it; for it was capable of absolute proof that tenant right and rent were, to a certain extent, conflicting, and there must be a balance struck between them. He could not understand how so many of his noble Friends in Ireland sincerely believed that goodwill had no effect upon rent. He supposed the reason was this—that they saw a good deal of land in Ulster let at say 30s. an acre, bringing what they thought to be a fair rent; but they might depend upon it that, without the tenant right, the land would let at 40s. or 45s., or some higher figure. As a general rule, it was an arithmetical certainty, therefore, that tenant right contributed to the reduction of rent. There was no doubt, too, that tenants often paid a pretium affectionis for the tenant right. While he said this, however, he could not agree to the proposal of the noble Marquess. It might be perfectly true that the Government ought to accept the Amendment; but he could not accept it, because he believed that tenant right in Ulster was a legal custom that ought to be sanctioned, and because he believed that this custom gave the tenant a share in what would otherwise be rent. Let them see what the declaration of the Amendment was. It was that consideration as to goodwill should be absolutely excluded by the Court in the determination of rent.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Only excluded in the reduction of rent.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL pointed out that, notwithstanding any limitation such as was pointed to, the Amendment would be a very dangerous one, for if the words of the noble Marquess were accepted, goodwill would not be allowed to enter into the minds of the Court in considering what was a fair rent. He admitted that the principle would be fair if applied to other parts of Ireland than Ulster, where the goodwill had never been acquired; but it was the principle of the Bill that that right should be extended to all tenants; and, after their Lordships had agreed to the second reading, they could not, in his opinion, draw back from the principle. At all events, in Ulster it would be confiscation to infringe upon the right now existing; and he therefore thought the Amendment ought not to be accepted by the House.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he would not enter into a discussion with the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) on controversial questions as to tenant right and rent; but quite agreed with the practical conclusion to which his noble Friend had come, and was glad to find that he opposed the Amendment. The great objection to the Amendment was that, in the form in which it was proposed, it dealt partially, and not completely, with the subject which it touched, and so tended to bring them back into the quagmire of insoluble problems. The interjection of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury), with reference to the reduction of rents, was, in his opinion, a remarkable illustration of the imprudence of attempting to give any instruction of this kind. The noble Marquess had explained that he did not say the Court was not to take the premium paid for the goodwill of the farm into account; but only that it was not to be taken into account on the reduction of the rent. Under that arrangement, however, it might be quite open to the landlord to go to the Court, and say—"See how low the rent is, and how much cause there is for making addition to it when such a large price has been paid for the tenant right," so that the operation of the words, as proposed, would be most unfair. All attempts at definition, when equitable principles ought to be applied, were highly objectionable. It was enough that the Court should consider all the circumstances of the case, district, and holding. The tenant might have cause of complaint as well as the landlord. The Amendment was a most improvident one, and there could be no better proof how little its consequences had been considered than in its omission to provide for the case in which the tenant might have paid a fine or premium to the landlord himself on coming into the farm, an omission which it was now hastily proposed to supply. They were endeavouring to solve a difficulty by definitions which were neither complete, exhaustive, nor clear in their practical application. This would be a dangerous and unprofitable course, and it would be better to leave the matter to the equitable judgment of the Court. They must trust the Commissioners not to lay down principles which would eat into tenant right on the one hand, or into the landlord's interest on the other.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, as regarded the Bill generally, he wished to make this observation—In 1870 Mr. Gladstone had told them that he inadvertently gave the tenant a share of the landlord's property; and now, by this measure, they were called on to give another share of the landlord's property to the tenant. He liked the frankness of the noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal, who expressed his approval of "fixity of tenure," though the Bill, it was said, only meant to give "security" of tenure. The noble Lord could just as well have said that the Bill was an unjust Bill. He would have liked to see the same candour on the part of the Government; he would have liked to have heard them say—"The principle of our Bill is unjust, no doubt; but we are obliged to bring it in." But they could not help themselves. Like the apothecary in Romeo, paraphrasing the words, the Ministers might declare with regard to the Bill—"My necessity and not my will consents." At the same time, as the measure had not been thrown out, he must oppose the Amendment of the noble Marquess, as he believed the effect of it would be to disturb Ulster, as well as dissatisfy the rest of Ireland, and he could not see the necessity for doing that.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, they were placed in this unpleasant position as regarded the Amendment. They had to make up their minds to do one of two things—either to reject that which, undoubtedly, in some cases, would probably lead to the commission of a hardship and injustice; or, if they accepted it, they committed themselves to a statement which seemed to his mind, with all due respect to the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury), to be an economical absurdity. Suppose a tenant had two farms of equal natural value, and for one he had given nothing at all, and for the tenant right of the other he had given 20 years' purchase, he could not accept the proposition that in that case the rents of the two would be the same. He could not see how tenant right could exist without creating a corresponding diminution of rents. The proposition contained in the Amendment would create a widespread feeling of discontent among the tenants; and he, therefore, could not support it, for he believed that if it were carried, it would be thought in Ulster that it was wished to diminish tenant right. Such a course of proceeding would be highly impolitic.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN said, if their Lordships accepted the Amendment, they would be doing a manifest injustice; for if any deterioration of the property occurred the whole deterioration must fall upon the tenant right before the tenant or the landlord was affected at all. Nothing, he thought, could be more unjust than that, because the tenant might have given a large sum for the tenant right, and it might have been quite worth it; and yet, if the land depreciated in value, the whole depreciation would fall upon him, and the rent would not be affected until the tenant had lost his whole interest. That could scarcely be intended; and he therefore hoped the Amendment would not be accepted by their Lordships.

VISCOUNT POWERSCOURT said, he would appeal to the noble Marquess to withdraw the Amendment, which went to the root of the Ulster tenant right, a custom their Lordships had so much difficulty in understanding. If it were accepted, it would be ruinous to the custom. Such a proposal, if engrafted on the Bill, would be considered as an attack on Ulster tenant right, and, consequently, must give rise to increased agitation, at all events in the North of Ireland.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD said, that nearly every speech had been logically in favour of the Amendment. It was admitted that if the tenant right was to be taken into consideration, it would reduce the rent to a minus quantity. It had been stated that land in Ulster must be let below the value, because there was no tenant right. Well, he had some property in the North of Ulster under the most unlimited form of Ulster tenant right, and other property in the South free from it, and the rents upon both were almost identical; but, curiously enough, in the South the rents were never changed, while in the North they were revised every 20 years. It was almost impossible for even an Ulster man to understand tenant right. Tenant right was never taken into consideration in fixing the rent. He thought that this was the most important Amendment that had yet been moved, and he hoped that their Lordships would adopt it, if his noble Friend should, as he (the Marquess of Waterford) hoped he would, press it to a division.

The Earl of LEITRIM and Viscount MONCK rose together and began simultaneously to address the Committee. Neither noble Lord giving way, and there being calls for the former,

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE thought that, as many noble Lords on the Government side of the House had addressed the Committee, the noble Earl (the Earl of Leitrim) ought to be heard.

Viscount MONCK then resumed his seat.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM said, that he only wished to remark that the Amendment was of the greatest importance, especially with reference to Ulster. Perhaps it would be a surprise to noble Lords on the Ministerial side that he intended to vote with them. He felt inclined to trust the Court in this matter, because he wished to leave no opening by which tenants could complain that their interest was left unconsidered. He was a great believer in the Ulster Custom; it had worked with the greatest advantage, and under the Bill, while not approving of the extent to which it went, he felt certain that, by the extension of the custom of free sale to all Ireland, the landlords of estates in those parts which were overcrowded would derive the greatest possible benefit.

VISCOUNT MONCK observed, that tenant right in Ulster arose from the forbearance of the landlords in not exacting the highest possible rent; and he hoped that they would not get into any complication through discussing the theory of rent. That forbearance on the part of landlords was not confined to Ulster; and what, through consideration, landlords had done for Irish tenants the Bill would make certain and permanent. Although the Bill would take certain powers away from the landlord, hitherto enjoyed by him, it practically would not take anything that was of real importance. He opposed the Amendment. He quite agreed with the remarks that had fallen from the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll), and believed that amongst the rights that the Bill would take from the landlord was that of exacting from a tenant the highest commercial rent.

The Earl of Derby

LORD INCHEQUIN supported the Amendment, contending that if it were not inserted in the Bill landlords in Ireland would be treated very unjustly. He would draw the attention of their Lordships to a case of a tenant who took a grazing farm and said he had paid nothing for the goodwill. In a year he applied for a reduction of rent, and then, after considerable pressure, he had admitted that he had paid a considerable sum for it. If rent was to be reduced by the interest of the sum so paid for tenant right, landlords would suffer the greatest injustice.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, there seemed to be an impression among their Lordships that the Amendment would attack the existing tenants of Ulster, and operate to the derogation of tenant right. Nothing could be more untrue. There was nothing in the Amendment which would affect any existing rights or past transactions of the tenant. The whole object and effect of the Amendment would be to prevent future rises in the price of tenant right from gradually eating away the rent of the landlord by the Commissioners having any doubt as to their duties, or taking an improper view of them. The interests which were at stake were very large. If it was allowed that a general rise of the tenant right, rising continually in proportion as the rent was lowered, was to have the power of eating away the rent, it was difficult to assign a limit to a process by which the rent would entirely disappear. The tenant right of the past would not be affected, the actual rights and the present privileges enjoyed by the Ulster tenants would in no degree be affected; but the rights and rents of the landlord would be saved from the future deterioration which would ensue if, unfortunately, the Commissioners should think that the prices given for the tenant right in the future were to be considered as a solid reason for reducing the rent.

THE EARL OF ANNESLEY wished to ask the noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal to tell him what he thought the Court would be likely to do in the following case:—Suppose a tenant in Ulster had given 60 years' purchase for an acre of land, and that the land to the landlord was only worth 20 years' purchase, how did the noble Lord think the Court would act if the tenant applied to them to fix a judicial rent?

VISCOUNT TEMPLETOWN supported the Amendment.

LORD CARLINGFORD, in reply, said, as far as he understood the noble Earl's (the Earl of Annesley's) question, it stated a miraculous case. Supposing, however, that such a miracle occurred, he should neither expect nor approve any such result flowing from it as was apprehended by the noble Earl. In fact, there would be no such result from the Bill.

THE EARL OF ANNESLEY thought he was entitled to have an answer to his question. He asked the noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal to give his opinion as to what the Commissioners would do in that given case. Evidently, the noble Lord was not acquainted with the prices paid for tenant right in Ulster. Forty years' purchase was no extraordinary price for tenant right in Ulster. The price had often gone as high as 50 and 60 years' purchase.

Amendment agreed to.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, it would not be necessary to move the other Amendments of which he had given Notice to the clause, they being directed to the same object as the Amendment agreed to—that was, to prevent the rent of the landlord from being ground down by the proceedings of the Court.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY in moving, as an Amendment, in page 9, after sub-section (8), add as new sub-section—

"(9.) Whenever a judicial rent has been fixed by the Court, if the payment of that rent shall be withheld more than six months after it shall have become due, the tenant shall pay interest on that rent at the rate of five per centum per annum from the date of its becoming due."

said, that, apart from other causes, there was great probability that rents would still be withheld, owing to the general aversion to punctuality in money payments, which was greater in Ireland than elsewhere. The Bill did not provide for enforcing the payment of rent when due, and the expectation of the public was that the new rents should be punctually paid. A clause such as this was common in Scotch leases, and in some cases they contained a much higher penalty for unpunctuality, amounting to 20 per cent. At present Irish landlords were obliged to borrow—if they were able to borrow—at a much higher rate of interest, while the tenants who kept back their rents put their money on deposit into the banks. This sub-section would be a boon to tenants under judicial rents, since it would give them six months' law, instead of their having to pay immediately their rents were due, as was supposed by the Bill.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE observed, that the Irish Government was in the habit of charging 5 per cent on all payments due to the Government.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY opposed the Amendment, remarking that the payment of arrears was already a difficult matter in Ireland, and would hardly be facilitated by the addition of a charge of 5 per cent.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE said, that the Amendment was not an extraordinary proposition; but he did not think that, if agreed to, it would be of any use.

Amendment negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 8 agreed to.

Clause 9 (Lease approved by Court during its continuance to exclude provisions of the Act).

VINCOURT MONCK moved, as an Amendment, in page 10, line 31, after ("tenancy") insert ("and for a term not exceeding sixty years.") The effect of the Amendment would be that, at the expiration of a judicial lease of a tenancy for a term not exceeding 60 years, the lessee of such tenancy would be deemed to be the tenant of a present ordinary tenancy from year to year.

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved, as an Amendment, in page 10, line 32, to leave out ("present") and insert ("future") in the provision that, at the expiration of a judicial lease, the lessee shall be deemed to be the tenant of a present ordinary tenancy from year to year at the rent and subject to the conditions of the lease.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he could not accept the Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 10 and 11 agreed to.

Clause 12 (Regulations as to sales and application to Court to fix rent).

EARL CAIRNS moved, as an Amendment, in page 12, line 25, to leave out ("founded on notice to quit,") and insert—

("As in the case of a power of re-entry upon condition broken contained in a lease. Provided always, That the tenant may, before any such proceedings are taken by the landlord, apply to the Land Commission, or, during the pendency of such proceedings, apply to the court in which the same may be pending, for relief; and the Land Commission or the said court may grant or refuse relief as the Land Commission or the said court, having regard to the conduct of the parties and to all the circumstances of the case, thinks fit, and in case of relief may grant it on such terms, if any, as to costs, expenses, damages, penalty, or other matters relative to the breach as to them seems fit. Provided also, that no relief shall be given to any tenant under this section unless at the time of the application for relief such breach shall have absolutely ceased.")

The noble and learned Earl remarked that the only way in which, after a breach of a statutory condition other than the payment of rent, a landlord could get rid of a tenant was by giving notice to quit. Two serious consequences would flow from that arrangement, as it at present stood. One would be that the landlord would be liable to pay the tenant compensation for disturbance under the provisions of the Act of 1870, and another was that, in consequence of the long notice required to be given in Ireland, the landlord might have to wait for 12 or even 18 months before he could get rid of a tenant. That, he thought, was undesirable, and he therefore hoped the Government would accept the Amendment.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was sorry he could not agree with the view taken by the noble and learned Earl (Earl Cairns); and he must therefore express a hope that their Lordships would not accept the Amendment. Its effect would be to entirely invert in point of severity the practice which had hitherto prevailed in Ireland with regard to non-payment of rent and breaches of conditions of this character. He should therefore advise their Lordships to adhere to the present state of things, which afforded many practical advantages, and which was understood by the tenants. If they gave the landlord the power of immediate re-entry, a power almost unknown in Ireland, the effect of such stringent legislation would be to produce a large amount of irritation. In the Act of 1870 there were clauses which prevented, in a great many cases of this kind, the granting of compensation for disturbance; and he thought it would be better to leave the matter in the hands of the Court.

EARL CAIRNS said, that if he understood the Government to say that the clauses referred to would prevent compensation in all the cases at which his Amendment was aimed, then he would be satisfied.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR was afraid that his noble and learned Friend was asking too much.

EARL CAIRNS said, he was quite willing to withdraw his Amendment, in order to take a division on the Amendment which had been put on the Paper by his noble Friend (the Marquess of Waterford), and which would raise the same question further on.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

EARL CAIRNS said, the Bill provided that a tenant in arrear could sell his holding, and pay the rent out of the purchase money, and the idea of the Bill seemed to be that in this way eject-ment would be superseded. But there was no mode of putting the tenant in motion for the purpose of selling his holding and making that payment. The landlord, therefore, had to go through the circuitous process of ejectment, and then the tenant could sell. That, he thought, was an objectionable mode of procedure, and in order to obviate it he would move, in pages 12 and 13, to leave out sub-section ("4,") and insert—

"(4.) Where not less than one year's arrears of a judicial rent payable in respect of a holding is due to the landlord, it shall be competent to the landlord (without prejudice to any other remedy for the recovery of such arrears) to apply for and obtain from the court an order that, unless the amount of arrears of rent be paid within a time to be named in such order (not being longer than three months from the making of the order), the interest of the tenant in the holding shall be sold by the sheriff in like manner as chattel interests in land are now sold under a writ of fi. fa. ;

"Provided that—

"(a) The interest so sold shall be assigned to the purchaser by a deed to be executed by the court which has made the order for sale; and

"(b) The purchaser shall be entitled to an order from the court, in the nature of an injunction, for the sheriff to put the purchaser into possession of the interest which shall appear by the said assignment to have been granted to the purchaser; and

"(c) Where a sale takes place under such an order the landlord shall have no right of pre-emption; and

"(d) The arrears of rent and the cost of the proceedings under this section shall be a first charge upon the purchase moneys."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was surprised that such a scheme should be recommended by his noble and learned Friend. He could not see his way to accept the Amendment, which was in no way necessary for the protection of the landlord's interests, and which would practically take away the tenant's right of free sale. Under the law as it stood the tenant was entitled to six months' notice, and it was his interest to avail himself of the power of sale. He deprecated the idea of making that power compulsory. He therefore hoped their Lordships would not accept it. The Amendment also proposed to attribute to the Court under this Bill, which was in principle a Court of Arbitration or conciliation between landlord and tenant, the functions of the ordinary Courts of Law, including that of issuing writs to sheriffs for process of execution. He thought it would be better to leave the question to the present legal authorities, and trusted his noble and learned Friend would not press it.

LORD O'HAGAN, said, that a sale under a writ of fi. fa. in Ireland was not generally satisfactory. He thought such a sale would be injurious to the tenant and not beneficial to the landlord; and as the landlord had ample power at present he saw no occasion for the Amendment.

EARL CAIRNS thought the tenant would be much worse off if the landlord treated him as an ordinary creditor would treat him. The Amendment was really in the tenant's favour. He would not, however, press his Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD moved in page 13, line 13, after ("tenancy,)" to insert—

"(5.) A tenant compelled to quit his holding during the continuance of a statutory term in his tenancy, in consequence of the breach by the tenant of any statutory condition, shall not be entitled to compensation for disturbance."

His object was to prevent the landlord being under the necessity of paying his tenant for compensation for disturbance when the tenant had broken his statutory conditions. It was just that such an Amendment should be agreed to, and he therefore hoped his noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal would accept it.

LORD CARLINGFORD opposed the Amendment. He held that the tenant deserved some measure of compensation, and, in aggravated cases, he would only get it on a very small scale. Indeed, in such cases as were contemplated by the noble Marquess the landlord would undoubtedly not have to pay compensation for disturbance. But there were cases in which the landlord might serve notice to quit for a breach of conditions that might only be of a trifling technical character; and in such the Government deemed it best not to deprive them of the opportunity of appealing to the benefits of the compensation clauses. The matter was dealt with, and, he considered, sufficiently dealt with, by the Act of 1870.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD said, that his noble Friend seemed to have forgotten his own Bill. If the condition broken was of such a moderate character as contemplated by the noble Lord, then the Court would grant the tenant relief under Section 4 of the very clause they were discussing. He contended that the Bill was not specific upon the subject, and urged that it would be a terrible thing if the tenants were able to break the standing conditions and then claim compensation. The Amendment was a very proper one, and he should press it to a division.

LORD HARLECH supported the Amendment.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, the Government had not shown sufficient reason why the Amendment should not be introduced.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR repeated the assurance given by the noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal, that the Land Act of 1870 covered the subject of the noble Marquess's Amendment. He did not think it was really worth while to alter the Bill in such a small matter.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN said, it might not always be a tenant's fault that he could not keep the statutory conditions; and, if it were not his fault, it was hard that he should be debarred from making a claim for disturbance. He might be bankrupt through no fault of his own.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, the intention was to restrain capricious eviction; but would anybody say that it was capricious eviction for a landlord to get rid of a tenant who was defaulting in payment? It was not a trivial Amendment. Could anyone imagine a condition more unpleasant than to be surrounded by tenants who were in a condition of bankruptcy? But, as the clause stood, unless the landlord was prepared to face a sweeping claim for compensation, he could not afford to evict, but would be forced to retain bankrupts as tenants. The noble Lord depended very much on the Court restraining action of this kind. All he could say was, he wished the Court existed now, and that its jurisdiction extended to the conduct of Her Majesty's Government.

THE EARL OF PEMBROKE said, the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack had tried to argue something which the Prime Minister had declared to be unarguable.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE said, he could not see why a landlord should pay a fine because a tenant was unable to pay his rent.

LORD PENZANCE said, if a breach of the statutory conditions was of a slight character, the reasonable conclusion was, that the tenants should not be evicted for it. To say, however, that a tenant ought to be evicted for breach of statutory conditions, and then that the landlord should give him compensation, seemed to be absurd on the face of it.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 13 (Limited administration for purposes of sale).

On Motion of the Earl of BELMORE, the following Amendment made:—In page 13, line 27, leave out ("may"), and insert ("shall.")

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 14 (Provision for determination of estate of immediate landlord).

LORD CLONCURRY said, he observed that the noble and learned Earl on the Front Bench (Earl Cairns) had a Motion on the Paper to strike out the clause altogether. He (Lord Cloncurry) himself had two Amendments to it on the Paper. He would, however, withdraw the first, and would ask their Lordships' favourable consideration to the second. The clause provided that in the case of a tenancy from year to year, if the estate of the immediate landlord was determined during its continuance, then the next superior landlord should stand in the relation of immediate landlord to the tenant, and have the rights and be subject to the obligations of an immediate landlord. The Amendment he would move was to add at end of clause the words—

("Provided, that a superior landlord shall not be subject to any obligations in respect of any under-tenancy created without his express consent.")

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the middleman occupied for the time being the position of the superior landlord, and the tenant was clearly entitled to the same benefits he would have had under the middleman, just as the tenants in a settled estate were entitled to expect that a succeeding life tenant would carry out the engagements of his predecessor.

EARL CAIRNS said, that, so far as regarded settled estates, it was obvious that the tenant for life must represent the whole estate for the time being, and on his death his position as landlord ought to be carried on by the next in succession. If the clause were confined to that he should not have a word to say. But from communications he had received from various quarters, the question of middlemen was one of extreme importance in Ireland upon many estates, large and small, and in cases brought to his knowledge property to the extent of many thousands a-year was involved. Under some old leases land was let to middlemen at what was then supposed to be a fair rent, or at less than a fair rent where a fine had been paid. The middleman let to subtenants, and now hundreds of tenants were in possession, having no connection whatever with the owner who had made the lease to the middleman. The property had probably changed hands, and the purchasers bought it upon the footing that the lease would shortly terminate, and fully anticipated at the close of these leases, that they should be allowed to resume possession of their property. They had made arrangements on that supposition, and a number of leases would shortly fall in to the superior landlord. The effect of this clause would be that the head landlord, between whom and the under tenants there was no privity whatever, would be compelled to come into Court at the instigation of the tenant, who would claim to be tenant in perpetuity. Thus every arrangement which had been made would be nullified, and the loss to landlords would be incalculable. He hoped the Committee would be careful, therefore, before they adopted a clause which in this aspect seemed to be perfectly foreign to all the other provisions of the Bill. If this was to be the effect of the clause, he hoped their Lordships would adopt the Amendment he intended to propose.

THE EARL OF BELMORE asked the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack (the Lord Chancellor) whether, under the wording of the clause, if a tenant had possession from length of occupancy without paying any rent, against a middleman, the superior landlord would not be bound by the middleman's neglect? He had heard of such a case.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR replied, that such would not be the case.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he was not inclined to take part in that rather legal discussion; but he saw clearly enough that to strike out this clause would be a very serious injury to the Bill. Not only that, but the Amendment of the noble Lord as proposed would evidently sweep out of the purview of the Bill all the advantages which it was intended to confer upon a very considerable number of occupying tenants scattered all over Ireland. From the moment the Bill was passed, every occupying tenant would have under a middle landlord all the rights of any other occupier in Ireland. If this clause were struck out, the moment the middleman disappeared every one of these tenants would lose the rights conferred upon them by Parliament. That was a result which their Lordships would not wish to arise, as if an Irish proprietor thought fit to part with his land, and handed over his rights to another person, he must be prepared to abide by the results, unless the middle landlord had created occupying tenants contrary to his lease. But if, consistently with his lease, he had created those occupying tenants, it would be highly impolitic to deprive them of the rights which all occupying tenants would possess in Ireland. The probability was that upon the falling in of the lease the rents of the occupying tenants would be found to be extremely high. Probably those tenants would come to the Court and ask for a reduction; but a reduction would do no harm to the landlord; not the least, because the middle landlords were in the habit of obtaining rents, which the superior landlord would probably not think of asking. Not only that, but the reduced rent would be worth more to the landlord than the rent which he at present received from the middleman for a lease made possibly 100 years ago. Take, for instance, the case of Lord Portsmouth. Lord Portsmouth's income was very much increased by the falling in of old leases, although he reduced the rents which the occupying tenants had been paying to the middlemen.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY contended that it would be a piece of injustice to give a leaseholder perpetuity of tenure. He would refer their Lordships to the case of a man who, having bought 600 acres in the Landed Estates Court, found, on the expiration of the lease of a middleman, a sub-tenant who neither had ability to farm properly nor was able to pay a fair rent, but who yet would obtain by the Bill perpetuity or "durability" of tenure. It would be well for the Government to accept the Amendment, and thus remove the question of leases from this clause altogether. Unless the Government consented to make some considerable modification in the clause, the Opposition would have no alternative but to go to a division.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, that the remedy in such a case as that suggested by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) would be to fix a judicial rent for the tenant. On that being done, if the tenant could not pay what the Court deemed a proper rent he would have to go. He thought the clause, as it stood, afforded ample protection to the occupying tenant.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE thought that many hard cases would occur under the clause as it now stood.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL took the same view; but held that it would be a serious thing to exempt any considerable number of sub-tenants from the operation of the Bill. It should be distinctly declared whether the sub-tenants or middlemen, on the expiration of their leases, were to be regarded as present or future tenants under the Act.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, they would rank as present tenants.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

EARL CAIRNS said, he wished to move Amendments to the clause. As it stood upon the Bill, it provided that—

"If in the case of any holding the estate of the immediate landlord for the time being is determined during the continuance of any tenancy from year to year, whether subject or not subject to statutory conditions, the next superior landlord for the time being shall, for the purposes of this Act, during the continuance of such tenancy, stand in the relation of immediate landlord to the tenant of the tenancy, and have the rights and be subject to the obligations of an immediate landlord."

He moved that the words ("immediate") and ("for the time,") in page 13, lines 31 and 32, be omitted from the clause.

Amendments agreed to.

Moved, In page 13, line 32, after ("being") to insert ("a limited owner.") —(The Earl Cairns.)

Resolved in the affirmative.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 15 agreed to.

Clause 16 (Letting for labourers' cottages not to be within the restrictions of Act).

On the Motion of the Earl of Limerick, the following Amendments made:—"In page 14, line 6, after ("may") insert ("after service of the prescribed notice upon the landlord"); and in line 8, after ("land") insert—

("In a situation to be approved by the landlord, or failing such approval to be determined by the court.")

THE EARL OF LIMERICK moved to leave out from ("land") in line 13 to ("acres") in line 20, and insert—

("Any portion of any holding so let does not exceed half an acre in each case, and that the total number of such lettings of portions of a holding does not exceed one for every twenty-five acres of tillage land contained in the holding.")

His desire was to put the Bill back in its original shape as it passed through the Committee in "another place." As it now stood, it would be possible for anyone with a holding of four or five acres to establish another cottage; but as it passed the Committee of the other House, the holding must be of 25 acres, or another cottage could not be erected. He desired to restore these words, and to say that a cottage should only be erected where there were 25 acres of arable land in the holding. As the Bill stood, anyone could erect a cottage upon a holding up to 25 acres. If it consisted of 26 acres, two cottages might be erected, and if the holding had 51 acres three cottages might be established, and so on in proportion. It would be a dangerous thing to increase to such an extent the power of building cottages, and he would only allow one when the holding was actually one of 25 acres of arable land, because unless that were the limit constant occupation for the inmates could not be found.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD considered the Amendment to be a reasonable one, and hoped it would be accepted by the Government.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, there seemed to be a sufficient reason why a hard-and-fast line should not be drawn at 25 acres, because a cottage might be required when the holding was only 24½ acres. It was, therefore, thought better not to draw an absolute line, but to leave power to put up a cottage, although the holding might be below 25 acres, of course under the sanction of the Court, without which in no case could it be done. There was also this positive condition—that the cottage must be required for the purposes of the holding.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, that if a man held 24½ acres of arable land upon his holding, he could easily till half an acre more to bring it up to the 25 acres which would entitle him to ask for another cottage. He supported the Amendment, because it was certain that an extra cottage was not required on the small holdings. This was really the sort of sub-division that they wanted to guard against.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY supported the Amendment.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY pointed out that their object was to encourage the building of cottages where they were needed. He did not think the tenants would desire to build much under the restrictions of the clause. If there were no such restrictions, no doubt they could build and sub-let; but the Courts would have to decide whether the proposal was necessary and reasonable or not. He failed to see any danger, because the clause was fully guarded.

THE EARL OF LIMERICK said, the great danger would arise in the case of smaller farms. The tenant would put up a house for the use of some member of his family, calling him a labourer.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, in that case it would not be necessary for the holding.

Amendment agreed to; words substituted accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 17 (Power of court, on application for the determination of a judicial rent, to impose conditions as to labourers' cottages).

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY moved, in page 14, line 26, to leave out ("may, if it thinks fit"), and insert ("shall.") The object of the Amendment was to make the action of the Court compulsory instead of optional.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, it was impossible to accept the Amendment, as it would bind the Court down by imperative rules.

Amendment negatived.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, in moving, as an Amendment, at end of clause, to add—

"Provided that such rent shall not be more than five shillings in excess of the amount due upon the holding in proportion to the rent of the entire holding paid by the tenant to the landlord, exclusive of the cost of any buildings erected by the tenant for the sub-tenant."

said, that whilst the tenants were paying 10s. or 15s. to the landlord for the land of these holdings, yet the sub-tenants were frequently paying to them as much as £8, and even £12. The worst dwellings in Ireland were those which were sub-let by farmers; many of them were not fit for habitation, yet the landlords got the discredit of them. The Lord Privy Seal would hardly repeat what had been said in "another place," that labourers had no votes; and the accepting of this Proviso would do a great deal towards relieving the labourers, and avoiding more time being taken up next Session on their behalf through the neglect of them by the Government on the present occasion.

LORD CARLINGFORD opposed the Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 18 (Rules as to determination of tenancy).

The EARL OF DUNRAVEN moved, in page 15, sub-section (3), line 22, to leave out ("present,") and insert ("future.") As the sub-section stood, it read as follows:—

"Where a present tenancy in a holding is purchased by the landlord from the tenant in exercise of his right of pre-emption under this Act, and not on the application or by the wish of the tenant, or as a bidder in the open market, then if the landlord within fifteen years from the passing of this Act re-lets the same holding to another tenant, the same shall be subject from and after the time when it has been so re-let, to all the provisions of this Act, which are applicable to present tenancies."

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he could not accept the Amendment, as it would defeat the Government's purpose in making a period of 15 years' rest after the Bill passed. The object of the clause was to guard against the risk of the powers of the landlord being exercised to a large extent during the first years of the operation of the Act for the purpose of converting present into future tenancies on a larger scale, by which the policy of the measure might be thwarted, and its effect impaired.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE supported the Amendment, which was similar to one of which he had himself given Notice, and said he could not see the force of the objection taken to it on behalf of the Government.

EARL CAIRNS was understood to say that it seemed to be presumed that the landlord's right of pre-emption could always be exercised against the will of the tenant. That was not necessarily so. The effect of the clause would be that if the landlord exercised his right of pre-emption he must retain the land; otherwise, if he re-let it within 15 years he would create a perpetuity tenant.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he could not let that opportunity pass without entering his solemn protest against the policy of the clause. He believed it to be wholly wrong, and calculated to prove ruinous to the peace of Ireland. The clause was proposed on the principle of "anything for a quiet life." It was proposed in order to prevent the landlord from doing with his property for a period of 15 years that which it was admitted he might do with perfect reason, and with advantage to the community—and all because it would be displeasing to the Land League. That was the long and the short of this policy. It was a thoroughly false policy with regard to Ireland; and it was tending more and more to the demoralization of public opinion, by giving to such a course the sanction of the Government. Let the Government give to the tenants of Ireland everything it thought was just, and take from the landlord every power it thought they had abused. Let them do what they liked in that matter; but, when they had given a residuum of power to the landlord, leave them to the free exercise of that. Do not let them teach the tenantry of Ireland that nothing was to be done for 15 years, lest they should agitate against it. The policy of the Government was entirely wrong, and might produce serious delay to the progress of the agriculture of the country; for, if a landlord wished to consolidate farms, he might not be able to keep them on his hands for 15 years. The sub-section was a piece of pure cowardice made out of pure fear of the Land League, and if there were a division he should vote against it.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) had taken advantage of a particularly important matter to denounce the Bill.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: No; the clause.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My noble Friend takes advantage of the opportunity afforded by a small clause of the Bill to say that our policy is dictated by cowardice.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: Only this clause.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: No, no, no!

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: Yes, yes, yes! It arose from his noble Friend not understanding the nature of the clause.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: The object in the sub-section was not to prevent agitation caused by the tenants, but to prevent agitation caused by the landlords. The Government were afraid that the landlords might take advantage of this power of pre-emption, to adopt the course of destroying present tenancies and convert them into future tenancies on a large scale. If that were done by landlords, it would produce an agitation that it was expedient to prevent; and they, therefore, thought it right to insert the provision in the Bill. As to the statement that the Government were actuated by any fear of the Land League, there was not the slightest ground for it.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD: There is no danger of an agitation being commenced by the landlords. I hope the Amendment will be pressed to a division.

LORD EMLY said, he hoped the Government would re-consider their decision on this matter. There would be comparatively few landlords who would be able to exercise this right of pre-emption, so that the Government were afraid of an imaginary difficulty.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, the cowardice imputed to the Government was fear of responsibility; for it was not certain that, 15 years hence, the class who raised the agitation now would not raise an agitation then. It was, therefore, simply deferring it to a time when other persons would have to cope with it; because, even if a Liberal Government were in power, it in all probability would not be constituted as now, or hold the same views. He could not help thinking there was some other hidden policy, which the Government would not confess, that was at the bottom of these mysterious provisions. If so, he would exhort them to unbosom themselves, and state the nature of the evil that might follow landlords buying up the tenancies on their estates. What agitation could the landlord produce by buying up his own property, and letting it to somebody else? If they anticipated that such an agitation would be produced, and that it would be dangerous to the peace of Ireland, the Government had better put a bold face on it and abolish landlords altogether. The subject was of great importance, and there was no ground for believing that future tenancies would be an evil to Ireland 15 years hence.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, they were not going to waste the time of the Committee by entering into any disquisitions as to their motives and moral conduct, as the noble Marquess seemed to wish. The noble Marquess was, happily; not Grand Inquisitor; but if he were, and if he put the Members of the Government on the rack, they could discover no other motives for their conduct than those they had already avowed to the Committee.

LORD DENMAN thought the clause contained a most extraordinary provision, and supported the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to; word substituted accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 19 (Provision as to existing leases).

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE, in rising to move, as an Amendment, to leave out the following words:—

said, that, in moving the Amendment, he certainly did not wish to go behind the principle to which their Lordships were committed by the second reading of the Bill. When they agreed to the second reading, they accepted the principle that contract was not in future to regulate the relations of landlord and tenant in Ireland; but he (the Marquess of Lansdowne) ventured to submit to the Committee that there was a point beyond which they ought not to go or carry this crusade against contract. The words he proposed to omit did go beyond that point. Those words, it must be remembered, formed no part of the original Bill as introduced by the Government. The Prime Minister said that it was not his intention to make what he called a "holocaust of freedom of contract," and he added that they thought it no part of their duty to interfere with current leases. But some time after, for some reason or other not yet explained, Her Majesty's Government changed their minds, and they changed their minds with a vengeance, for they proposed that tenants, at the end of existing leases, should be ordinary tenants from year to year. What was the effect of that proposal? That landlord and tenant make a contract—a perfectly fair and honourable engagement on both sides; the landlord parts with his holding for the term of years at a reasonable rent; the tenant has submitted to the covenants, one being that at the expiration of the lease the landlord should resume the holding. But what the Proviso of the Government proposed was what neither party ever contemplated, for the clause imported into the contract the term, that, over and above the 31 years or longer period of the lease, the tenant, at the end of that period, should have another lease for 15 years, renewable for ever, and not only that, but that he should have the further privilege of going to the Court, and getting his rent revised, and possibly reduced. Suppose during the 31 years of the lease the value of agricultural produce had become affected by American competition or otherwise, the tenant might go into Court, in spite of his lease, and have his rent revised, and the Court would compel the landlord to continue him in possession at the reduced rent, though the landlord might have other uses to which he would wish to put his land. His Amendment proposed to restore the Bill to its original shape. He wished particularly to observe that there were two descriptions of leases which would not be touched by it—one, the Ulster leases, with regard to which particular precautions had been taken in another part of the clause; and the other, the leases imposed by the landlord on the tenant under threat of eviction—leases considered by the Court unreasonable and unfair. The only leases touched by his Amendment were bond fide leases, which there was no reason to override. For years past it had been the reproach of the Irish landlords that they did not give security to their tenants. From the time of the Devon Commission that complaint had been made. The Devon Commissioners warned the landlords of the impolicy of refusing to the tenants the security of properly framed leases; and now those landlords who had accepted that warning and had granted these leases were to find that the State interposed in order to tear them up. And, just as the policy of the Devon Commissioners had been in favour of leases, so the policy of the Act of 1870 had been in favour of them. At the time of the passing of that Act, 11 years ago, it was enacted that the landlord, by granting a 31 years' lease, might exclude the tenant from compensation under the other clauses of the Bill; and now what Her Majesty's Government proposed was to override leases entered into under those circumstances. A statement was made at that time by Sir Roundell Palmer, which he would like to read. Sir Roundell Palmer, on April 4, 1870, said—

"Surely the necessity of interfering with existing contracts cannot possibly apply to holdings above a certain value, nor to bond fide leases of definite duration. As to those leases, it has been truly said that the men who take them understand perfectly well that they take them for a definite term, and that they are to give up their holdings at the end of that term; and they have no right afterwards to say they have made arrangements, or done anything whatever, except in view of that well-understood part of their contract. I speak of bond fide leases, because I have not forgotten what was said the other night by my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government, and which deserves our attention—namely, that if you except everything that looks like a lease, you might have a nominal lease made for a year or so, merely to get out of the operation of the Bill. Now, I think you might, perhaps, take the limit of seven years, though I would not bind myself to that. Seven years would, at all events, be a bond fide and not a merely colourable lease; and I do not see why, if a farmer enters into a lease for seven years, or for any longer period, you are to alter his contract, and to say that after the expiration of the seven years it shall be continued as a lease from year to year, which is a totally different thing."—[3 Hansard, cc. 1213-14.]

But the Government were now proposing that the tenant should be continued as a tenant from year to year at the end of a lease, not of seven, but of 31 years.

or a longer term. There was only one argument in favour of that proposal, and it was rather a strange one—namely, that in Ireland a lease was not a lease, but an agreement between the parties fixing the rent for a particular period. That was not a description which could be applied to all Ireland. But if, in some parts of Ireland, leases were habitually granted on that understanding, he would suggest that those cases should be provided for by special and exceptional legislation. They had been told that Her Majesty's Government looked forward to a time when they should revert to freedom of contract, and when a wholesomer state of things than the Bill introduced would prevail. But how were they to get into that wholesomer state of things if, one after another, they closed up every avenue to freedom of contract? They were teaching a most mischievous lesson to the people of Ireland, when they were told that men who were perfectly able to enter into contracts, and who had done so at the express invitation of the Legislature, were to have the contracts they had entered into torn up by the State. This provision would strike a great blow at public confidence if it was necessary to put an end to free contract in Ireland. Let them do so; but let them, at least, bury it decently, and not inflict upon its remains the wanton affront involved in this most mischievous clause. He begged, in conclusion, to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Moved, In page 16, line 9, to leave out from ("Provided that") to ("on") in line 14.—(The Marquess of Lansdowne.)

LORD GREVILLE said, that the provision which the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) proposed to amend did not interfere with any lease whatever; but only said when the lease came to an end that the tenant should be in the same position as other tenants under the Bill. The Amendment would affect tenants in the same position as their neighbours. From his own experience, he could say that what was in the mind of the Irish tenant when he took a lease was, that during a particular period he was to pay a certain rent. It would be a grievance and an encouragement to agitation to exclude so considerable a class as the leaseholders from the benefits of the Bill.

EARL STANHOPE said, a lease was either a contract entered into voluntarily between two parties, or it was not. His own experience as the owner of a small Irish property was that the tenants, as a rule, were well able to take care of themselves, and would never take a lease without informing themselves fully of the circumstances. If a lease was to be no longer a lease, as proposed under this clause, then this principle might be further extended, and apply to house property in London. It would be very agreeable to many householders in their Lordships' House to be told that at the expiration of their leases they might continue on as yearly tenants, paying the same rent. He thought the Amendment most reasonable, and had heard no argument whatever against it; and he should, therefore, certainly support it.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, the noble Marquess who had moved the Amendment (the Marquess of Lansdowne) had fixed his eyes and thoughts simply on the legal aspects of the case; and it did not require much ingenuity or the abilities of his noble Friend to support the Amendment on such purely legal grounds. What would have become of Ireland if it had been the habit of landlords to act on their right to get rid of their yearly tenants upon six months' notices; or if they had made use of the legal power they possessed before 1870, and had treated their tenants' improvements as their own? It had only been because these legal conditions had not been observed, but on the contrary, habitually neglected and left in abeyance, that Ireland had got on at all for generations past. The Bill, in that respect, attempted to deal, not with the mere legal, but with the real conditions of tenure in Ireland, with conditions which were practically observed upon all the best and happiest estates in Ireland. Was the case of a lease to be absolutely distinguished from the treatment which the Bill applied to all other forms of tenure? No doubt, they were importing new terms into Irish tenure; but they thought they were doing so on sufficient grounds. Was there something so sacred and magical about a lease that that which they were doing in the case of minor tenancies was not to be thought of in the case of leases? The Government proposal was, that in the case of an occupying tenant who, after having had a lease, possessed it no longer, the same protection should be extended to him as was given to other occupying tenants. If the Government did not make such a provision, a large class of occupying tenants would be excepted from the protection of the Bill, for they would be debarred from making use of the tribunal constituted for settling rent. Besides, it was just when a lease expired that the burning question of rent was most likely to arise, and that was a strong reason for not refusing protection to the leaseholders. He contended that it would not be wise to exclude those who had held leases from the benefit of the Bill. Whatever might be the strict legal effect of a lease in Ireland, in 99 cases out of 100, it was never intended that relations between the parties should end with the termination of the lease, but really that the parties should continue together upon much the same terms as before.

EARL FORTESCUE doubted whether the Government saw anything sacred in any contract, seeing that they were perpetually keeping the whole of the tenantry of Ireland in swaddling clothes. The Government seemed to be quite uneasy at the notion that this tribunal would not have enough to do, and thought they should have some additional work given them for the satisfaction, they said, of both tenant and landlord. It appeared to him, however, that the leaseholders were able to guard their own interests without the intervention of the Court. And that, apparently, had been the original opinion of the Government also; for the present proposal, which it was now sought to amend, was not in the original draft of the Bill. It was not till some time after what was said to be the last of the 22 editions of the Bill before it was presented to Parliament that this unhappy afterthought of the Government appeared. It was suggested by a desire to conciliate the Land League, the leaders of which body had already told them plainly that the Bill would not satisfy them, and that they looked forward to obtaining "Ireland for the Irish," and to the ultimate ejection of all landlords.

LORD HOUGHTON thought that to place landlords and tenants who had been parties to leases under totally different conditions from other landlords and tenants would be contrary to the whole spirit of the Bill. Besides, the measure would not prevent the renewal of leases. If the principle of freedom of contract was to be violated at all, the clause was one with which there was less reason to find fault on the grounds of political economy than any other in the Bill. It seemed to him that it rigidly upheld present contracts with regard to leases.

LORD OLONCERRY pointed out that in the important district formerly known as the Pale estates were managed exclusively on the English principle. If the clause were passed as it stood, it would be impossible for any landlord to take possession of his own property in order to set an example which was so much needed of proper farming and good management. He, therefore, hoped the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) would press his Amendment to a division.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN sincerely hoped the Committee would not agree to the Amendment. He admitted that the rights of individuals were interfered with by the clause; but the whole of the Bill interfered with individual rights, and he could not see that there was any more hardship in this than in a great many other cases. The result of the Amendment would be that, with very few exceptions, all tenants holding under leases, at the expiration of the lease, would be outside the Bill altogether; and if the Bill were to give any satisfaction whatever, as they hoped it might, there was no doubt whatever that the Amendment proposed would give a great deal of dissatisfaction to a considerable number of the most intelligent men in the country, and he could not see why they should make those dissatisfied who would otherwise be ranged on the side of law and order. Their Lordships had already excepted from the provisions of the Bill estates managed on what was called the English system, although nobody seemed to be able to define what that meant. They had also excepted the case where landlords had bought up the tenant right, and now they were asked to make another exception. He confessed he could not understand why the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) opposed the Amendment to exclude from the operation of the Bill tenancies of over £100, and now supported the present one. If their Lordships desired to play into the hands of unscrupulous persons, who wished to carry on agitation, they could not do better than go on making these exceptions in the Bill.

LORD HARLECH thought that if anybody was more capable than another of taking care of himself it was the intelligent leaseholder, who formed the most intellectual body of the farmers of Ireland. Every encouragement had been given by the Act of 1870 to give leases, and now the House was asked to break those leases.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL felt almost insuperable objections to the Legislature breaking contracts of the most formal character. The noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal had stated that tenants in Ireland took leases with no other object than to prevent an increment of rent during the continuance of the lease, and that they had no intention of going out at the expiration of the term. That, he believed, was true with regard to a large class of small tenants; but he would observe that there was nothing in the Amendment to prevent renewing the lease, and he (the Duke of Argyll) believed there was nothing in the Bill to prevent the landlord and tenant going into Court at the end of the lease. Though there might be many cases in which small farmers took their farms on lease as a safeguard against increment of rent, there were many cases in which farms were taken in Ireland under exactly the same circumstances as in England, and there were large farmers who had taken their farms on condition that they should either leave them at the end of the lease or retake them. He knew of a case in which a family let on lease a farm, which they regarded as their home, to go abroad for health, and when their health was restored they would come back to enter their home again at the end of the lease, the tenant having taken it on the full understanding that he must leave it at the end of the lease. But under this Act that lease would be broken, and the tenant could remain on the farm. He called that a great hardship. He did not know that he should have insuperable objections to give the Court power to renew all leases in cases where the tenants had reasonable expectations that they would be allowed to remain in possession of the holdings; but to say that all leases indiscriminately should be broken was surely a most violent proposition. Some years ago he had been astonished at a proposal that was made that at the end of an Ulster lease the tenant right should survive; but now many noble Lords seemed to think that a tenant should have the enjoyment of the tenant right at the end of his lease, it having been his reasonable expectation that he would have it. Well, he did not know that he would have an insuperable objection to that; but he did most strongly object to the indiscriminate violation of leases proposed by the Government. It was no part of the Bill when it was introduced to the House of Commons, and he could not conceive why it should exist. He cordially supported the Amendment.

LORD EMLY suggested that the Government should except from the operation of the clause cases in which the landlord wished to resume the farm for his own occupation. He hoped, however, that the Government would not stultify themselves by adopting the Amendment.

EARL CAIRNS observed, that it was said that if they accepted the Amendment they would cause great dissatisfaction to the occupying tenants. But the question was, whether they ought to give cause for dissatisfaction to the rightful owner, or to the person who was the occupying tenant? It would be quite impossible to satisfy both the landlord and the tenant, one of whom could alone be the occupier of the farm. But who, he asked, would have the better right to its occupation? Surely the landlord to whom it belonged. In reference to the point, he had received a letter from a correspondent, showing how he had let a farm for a certain period with the intention of handing it over to his son at the end of the lease. With this in view, he had trained his son to agricultural pursuits; but now that the Land Bill had been introduced, he feared his object would be frustrated, for by its provisions the present lessee would, at the expiration of his term, become nominally a yearly tenant, but virtually a tenant for a minimum period of 15 years more.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY, in reply to the statement of the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) that a man at the end of his lease could go to the Court, said, that only a present tenant could go to the Court under the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY was of opinion that their Lordships might safely accept the Amendment, and reject the proposals of the Government, for the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had said, in the House of Commons, that he could not exclude from his consideration that this question did not rest with the Commons alone, but that there was another House which was constitutionally entitled to give its independent vote on the provisions of the Bill; and he felt that, if having brought it in as one measure, the Commons sent it up to the Lords as another, most justly might the Lords say—"We are dealing with a set of men who do not know their own minds, and we refuse to bow to their authority."

Resolved in the negative.

EARL CAIRNS, in moving the omission, in page 16, of lines 24 to 36 inclusive, which provided for the cancellation of leases forced upon the tenants since the Act of 1870 by threat of eviction or undue influence on the part of the landlord, said, he thought the insertion of those words was one of the instances in which the Government did not seem to know their own minds, for it was a change that was outside the original Bill, and might be well described as an encroachment on it. What the clause proposed to do was to give a Court of three Judges power to cancel all leases made since 1870. In law there was no power in a Court so great and transcendent as that of cancelling contracts executed between the parties. It was a power exercised in but rare cases, always with the greatest caution, and on certain well-known principles. He should like to know what were the facts on which a clause of this kind was justified. That part of the clause which referred to terms of lease "unreasonable or unfair to the tenant, having regard to the provisions of the Act of 1870," he did not understand. Nor could he understand the effect of the words "undue influence," which seemed to be used in a sense different from that which was usually attached to them in law; and he should, therefore, like to hear the Government inform them of the facts which justified the clause, which seemed to suppose that the leases which had been granted since 1870 contained unreasonable terms, and that they were obtained from the tenant by undue influence.

What were the facts which justified a statement of that kind? He himself was not aware of any. He looked to the clause to see what were the grounds on which executed leases should be cancelled. He found that the Court was to be satisfied that the terms of the lease were unreasonable or unfair to the tenant, having regard to the provisions of the Act of 1870. He looked to the Act of 1870, and he found that it authorized certain leases to be made on certain terms. If those terms were complied with the leases were valid. If they were not complied with the leases were invalid, and nothing more need be said about them. They did not require to be put aside. Therefore, he hoped the Government would tell them what was the meaning of the terms he had referred to—"that the lease contains terms which are unreasonable," &c. The second term was one well known to the law; but what was the meaning of a lease entered into under threat of eviction? The Act said that the landlord might evict on paying the cost of eviction; therefore he had the right to evict; and he might threaten to do that which he had the legal right to do. He could not understand that there was any legal or moral wrong to be redressed in a lease made under this Act. If a Court cancelled an ordinary lease, it would say that the tenant must restore possession of the land; but in this case the tenant was to continue to occupy the land for a term of 15 years, which might be indefinitely extended. The Prime Minister, in 1870, said that the Act of that year was framed upon the principle that from the moment it passed every Irishman must be absolutely responsible for every contract into which he entered. Now, he was told that if he had taken a lease at a certain rent the Court would cancel it, and the same Court would give him continuity or perpetuity of tenure at a revised rent. That was a proposition beyond anything ever presented to Parliament. What facts were there to justify such legislation? What proof was there that the landlords had in one or in 100 instances been guilty of conduct which required such legislation—legislation which was absolutely without precedent? If there were no such facts, as he believed there were none, he hoped the Committee would not sanction the proposal of the Government.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, the power to which the noble and learned Earl (Earl Cairns) had objected was a temporary power proposed to be given for six months to the Land Commission, on the belief of the Government that there had been extraordinary and exceptional transactions of the kind referred to during the last 10 years in Ireland. Unless the Government were greatly mistaken, there was reason to believe that in certain cases leases, such as they had no conception of in this country, had been forced upon tenants by the threat of eviction—leases violating the whole spirit of the Land Act, and absolutely contrary to the interests and wishes of the tenants. That was the foundation of the portion of the clause which it was proposed to omit. The lease provided by the Land Act of 1870 as an alternative for the other provisions of the Act was to be a lease of 31 years' duration, and it was to leave to the tenant, at the end of the term, a claim for permanent improvements such as buildings and reclamations; but the leases which had been forced on tenants had compelled them to abandon that right to the value of their improvements which had been secured to them. It must be remembered that the conditions which alone would make the sub-section applicable were, that it should be proved to the satisfaction of the Court that the tenant had accepted a lease of the character he had described, and that he had been compelled and coerced into accepting it under the threat of eviction; and it was on the supposition of such facts being proved to the Court that it had been decided to give to the Government this exceptional power. Undoubtedly, there was a large body of evidence to the effect that this kind of thing had been going on in Ireland, and it was the kind of evidence on which there was reason to rely. ["Oh, oh!"] He said that advisedly. The evidence of a man bringing forward his own grievance must be received with suspicion; but there was a large body of evidence before the Land Commissioners given by men of experience who knew what had been going on in their own neighbourhoods. To say that no attention whatever should be paid to such evidence seemed to him absurd. He would remind the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Richmond) that there were produced before the Commission over which the noble Duke had himself presided five separate leases which had been forced upon one tenant, and in each case with an increase of rent, the leases being of terms of seven, two, one, six, and 21 years, and the last one being after the passing of the Act of 1870. These leases could not be called free contracts between man and man, because they were forced on the tenant by threat of eviction. A witness before the Bessborough Commission described the leases enforced on his brother tenants. The leases, he said, were compulsory; there was a memorandum sent by the agent, stating that if they did not accept the leases their rents would be raised; the rents were raised, at the same time the landlord claimed all existing improvements, and, at the expiration of the lease, they were denied the right given by the Act of 1870 to claim for improvements made during their term. These facts would prove that this provision had not been wantonly proposed by the Government. The cases they wished to interfere with were those which were totally contrary to every notion of anything like free contract; indeed, to call them so was a farce; and he contended that they justified, for a limited time, the intervention of the Court. The Government would abide by the proposal which they had made.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, there were great objections to this part of the clause. He regretted that the proposal should have been made; but as it involved a serious charge against the landlords, and as the matter was one to which the noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal attached some importance, he thought it might be questionable prudence on the part of the landlords if they receded from the challenge and refused to submit these leases to the scrutiny of the Court. In order that the landlords might not have even the appearance of refusing to submit to the sort of investigation the clause contemplated, he should not vote against the Government.

ficial to the landlords. He had about 20 tenants holding under leases made since 1870, and all complained that the leases had been forced on them. There was not the smallest ground for that complaint; and, for his own part, he welcomed the proposed investigation. But some cases might have occurred which were objectionable to the Act of 1870. He would not vote for the Amendment.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that the generous and chivalrous spirit in which the two noble Lords who had last spoken proposed to submit to the judgment of the Court was conclusive as far as they were concerned; but there were other landlords in Ireland who might not be so ready to submit to a trial without the faintest trace of evidence being adduced to establish a prima facie case against them. For the smallest accusation against the meanest person, some prima facie evidence sufficient to satisfy a Grand Jury must be brought forward, and the documents upon which the accusation rested must be produced. But in both these respects Her Majesty's Government were wanting in making out their case. The noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal had said that there was conclusive evidence on the subject in many leases. Well, he would like to have some of the leases of which mention had been made, with the terms therein described as unreasonable and unfair, produced. The noble Lord mentioned a case brought before the Richmond Commission of a 21 years' lease made since the Act of 1870, in which very hard terms were imposed; but the only proof given was that the rent was raised. Last night the House had heard nothing but praises of those who proposed to raise their rents.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, the rent had been raised five times over within a few years in the case he had mentioned.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, it must be remembered that the phrase "threat of eviction" was a very hollow one. It constantly happened that a man said to a tenant—"I wish that this holding should be held under lease. If you are willing to take a lease of years, I shall be delighted to go on with you. But if you are not willing, somebody else will be." It was the ordinary right of the landlord to decide the kind of tenure under which the land should be held. If the Government intended to attach this novel and totally unheard of condition to leases contracted after 1870, they ought not to have included within that Act provisions that greatly encouraged the making of leases; they ought to have warned the landlords of the danger they ran in contracting instruments hitherto regarded as sacred by the law. This was only another instance of utter disregard of all sanctity of contract, and of all rights belonging to the landlord, and of how the Government rushed in directly anybody suggested that it was the means of satisfying the tenant class in Ireland.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in objecting to the Amendment, said, it appeared to him that the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) had forgotten that in the evidence before the Bessborough Commission it had been stated that, in some parts of the South of Ireland, considerable pressure had been put upon tenants to contract themselves out of the Act of 1870, in a manner which could not, without inquiry, be presumed to have been, in all cases, fair and reasonable. That being so, he should have thought that his noble and learned Friend (Earl Cairns) and the noble Marquess would have said that it was not within the spirit or intention of the Act of 1870 to encourage that class of transactions. There certainly was evidence enough to justify an inquiry whether these things had occurred or not. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) and the noble Earl (the Earl of Dunraven), on whose estates it was most improbable that anything of the kind had taken place, said that it was for the public interest that, if there were such transactions, the Court should inquire into and decide against them. If the Court was of opinion that there was no improper pressure the leases would remain; if the Court should decide otherwise, he owned it would not be in accordance with his ideas of equity that the leases should remain. But the worst thing that could happen was that that House should say there should be no such inquiry.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that after the speech of the noble and learned Lord (the Lord Chancellor), who had declared that there was a prima facie case showing that tenants, especially small ones, had been coerced, he should be unwilling to refuse to give this jurisdiction to the Court. He felt, however, that the allegations in 99 cases out of 100 were absolutely false. Yesterday he met an agent well-known in the North and South of Ireland, and he asked him whether such cases had occurred. The agent said that he knew of none himself, but he had heard of one. He (the Duke of Argyll) believed the result of an investigation would come to that—a result not unfavourable to the landlords of Ireland, and he hoped the House would not refuse to grant the jurisdiction.

EARL CAIRNS said, that the question was whether the House ought to sanction legislation of an absolutely novel character. Nothing like it, or approaching it, had hitherto been known; and a most dangerous precedent, and one that would probably be often used in the future, would be created if the clause were allowed to pass without amendment. The noble and learned Lord (the Lord Chancellor) seemed to be aware of that, and most ingeniously he glided aside and took up a new position. The noble and learned Lord thought, having looked at the evidence, there was a case for inquiry. Well, let there be inquiry, and then after inquiry they would see what legislation ought to be made. But do not let them legislate first, and then make the inquiry afterwards.

LORD TALBOT DE MALAHIDE supported the argument of the noble and learned Earl (Earl Cairns). The policy of the Government might be described in two words, as "Jedburgh justice," or execute first and try afterwards. The proposal embodied in the latter portion of the clause was manifestly unjust, and he hoped that it would be rejected.

VISCOUNT POWERSCOURT supported the clause.

LORD DUNSANY objected to legislating first and inquiring afterwards.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH considered that the evidence taken before the Bessborough Commission was of an extraordinary nature, and was given principally by tenant farmers. As that evidence would be brought before the Commissioners in consequence of its character, he ventured to say it could not be safely relied upon as enabling them to arrive at proper decisions.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR remarked that the evidence to which he referred did not come from tenant farmers, but from landowners, and land agents, and other experts.

On question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause?" Their Lordships divided:—Contents 90; Not-Contents 150: Majority 60.

Resolved in the negative.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 20 to 22, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 23 (Purchase of estates by commission and resale in parcels to tenants).

LORD EMLY, in moving the omission of the condition that, for the purposes of the section, a competent number of tenants should mean a body of tenants who were not less in number than three-fourths of the whole number of tenants on the estate, said, he was sorry that Her Majesty's Government did not attach to these portions of the Bill the importance they deserved, for, in his opinion, there could be no more real peace and contentment in Ireland until the basis of property was extended by largely increasing the number of proprietors. With that end in view it was necessary to pass this Amendment.

Moved, In page 19, line 12, to leave out from ("tenants,") to ("who") in line 13.—(The Lord Emly.)

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he could assure his noble Friend that the Government attached the greatest importance to this part of the measure; but, at the same time, they did not think it would be prudent to relax the condition contained in the words which it was now proposed to omit. The effect of leaving out that condition would be that it would be possible for two large tenants paying two-thirds of the whole rent of the estate to settle the question of the purchase. The result would be that the residuum of the estate occupied by the small tenants, who were unable or unwilling to pay, would be thrown into the hands of the Commissioners. The Government, therefore, thought it would be imprudent to accede to the Amendment.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, his noble Friend (Lord Emly) did not wish to saddle the Land Commission with the residuum of the small occupiers; he only wished to leave the hands of the Commission a little less closely tied than they were at present by the terms of the Bill. It was perfectly fair to limit the responsibility of the Commission by enacting that that responsibility should not extend beyond two-thirds of the whole purchase money; but a numerical limit, which prevented the sale taking place unless three-fourths of the tenants were willing to become purchasers, was a needless restriction of the Commissioners' powers.

VISCOUNT MONCK thought it necessary that a certain defined majority of the tenants ought to be secured before an estate was offered for sale.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY hoped the Government would accept the Amendment.

Resolved in the negative.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 24 to 30, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 31 (Proceedings of Commissioners).

LORD GREVILLE asked if the 1st sub-section could not be given up.
 nly, if their Lordships had any confidence in the Commission which they had appointed, they might leave it to them to be satisfied of the expediency of purchasing the estate.

LORD CARLINGFORD, in reply, said, the clause was necessary to the Bill, it being a Treasury clause, and the Government could not give it up.

LORD GREVILLE then moved the omission of the 1st sub-section, which provides that—

“The Land Commission, before buying any estate, shall reasonably satisfy themselves that a resale can be effected without loss, and that the purchasers will be in a position to work their holdings profitably.”

The noble Lord said he did it on the ground that a discretion should be left to the Court in these matters, and that the Court, already overburdened with work, if further encumbered with specific directions, would probably come to a dead-lock.

Moved, In page 25, line 14, to leave out from (“The”) to (“profitably,”) in line 17.—(The Lord Greville.)

VISCOUNT MONCK said, that the work before the Commissioners seemed to him to be appalling. He was afraid that the Commissioners would be so flooded with work that the whole thing would fall through. A little more might be left to their discretion without binding them down by so many conditions as existed in the clause. He would advise their Lordships to accept the Amendment of his noble Friend.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY hoped the Government would not put the Committee to the inconvenience of again parading through the heated Division Lobbies, if it could be avoided.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, it would be unpardonable to ask the Committee to take another division; but he had felt it his duty to take the last division upon this matter, which involved the expenditure of money. He should regret that the words “and that the purchasers will be in a position to work their holdings profitably” should be omitted, seeing that, in this case, it was the duty of the Government to consider the importance of looking to the interests of the public Treasury. It was only natural that the landlords should wish to make the terms and conditions as easy for themselves as possible. The clause gave simple directions for the protection of the public purse. The Land Commissioners were to be reasonably satisfied that the sales could be effected without loss.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY protested against the interpretation that the landlords wished to get rid of their estates at the most advantageous terms. They simply wished to give every facility possible to that policy of creating small proprietors in Ireland which would have beneficial results.

Amendment agreed to; sub-section struck out accordingly.

On the Motion of The Earl CAIRNS, sub-section (2.) struck out of the clause.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 32 (Transfer of purchase powers of Board of Works to Land Commission).

On the Motion of The LORD PRIVY SEAL, the following Amendments made:—In page 26, line 13, after ("Act,") insert ("and subject to the provision of this Act;") and in line 14, leave out ("Act,") and insert (Acts").

Clause, as amended, agreed to

Clause 33 agreed to.

Clause 34 (Court to mean civil bill court).

THE EARL OF ROSSE moved, in page 27, line 24, after ("accordingly,") to insert—

("Where the judicial rent in respect of any holding is fixed by the court or the Land Commission, the court or Land Commission shall cause an entry of the amount of such judicial rent to be made in a book to be kept for such purpose in the prescribed manner, and in every case in which the amount of the judicial rent so fixed shall be higher or lower than the rent theretofore payable, the Land Commission shall add to such entry the circumstances and reasons in and for which such judicial rent was fixed at such amount, and in every case the court or the Land Commission shall give to the landlord and tenant a copy of such entry.")

THE LORD CHANCELLOR hoped the noble Earl would not press the Amendment. It would not work, and, in his opinion, the latter part of it would be in the highest degree undesirable, and would be calculated to raise much controversy.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 35 to 40, inclusive, agreed to.

The Earl of Kimberley

Clause 41 (Quorum of Commission).

EARL CAIRNS moved, in page 30, line 11, to leave out from ("by") to the end of the clause, and insert—

("All three Commissioners sitting together, and thereupon such case shall be heard by all three Commissioners sitting together, except in the case of the illness or unavoidable absence of any one Commissioner, when any such case may, with the consent of the parties, be heard by two Commissioners sitting together.")

The noble and learned Earl said, the clause informed them that all the powers of the Bill were to be exercised not only by the Commission, but by the Sub-Commissioners; but who the Sub-Commissioners were they did not know. The clause provided that where a person was dissatisfied with the judgment of a member of the Commission or of a Sub-Commissioner, the party might require the case to be re-heard by at least two Commissioners. He proposed to amend the clause so that it would require the case to be re-heard by all three Commissioners sitting together.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR opposed the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 42 and 43 agreed to.

Clause 44 (Powers of Commission).

EARL CAIRNS moved, in page 31, line 1, after ("may,") insert—

("In case it thinks fit to permit any party aggrieved by the decision of the Land Commission in any proceedings to appeal in respect of any matter arising in such proceedings to Her Majesty's Court of Appeal in Ireland.")

THE LORD CHANCELLOR remarked that the Land Court was constituted with special powers, involving a large discretion as to their exercise, and their decisions were more like those of arbitrators. The questions it dealt with were not, like legal questions, suitable for appeal. There was power given by the clause, as it stood, to send any questions of law which might arise to the Court of Appeal. He, therefore, objected to the Amendment.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, it was essential to the character of arbitrators that they should be appointed by the parties concerned in the dispute. Therefore, it was impossible to deal with this as a question of arbitration. These Commissioners were appointed by Her Majesty's Government, who were certainly not impartial as between the two sides in these questions. Judges appointed with such exceptional powers, and in such an exceptional manner, possessed all the attributes of arbitrators except that of impartiality. Their proceedings were very likely to be regarded with discontent and suspicion, and nothing was more calculated to remove that discontent and suspicion than the knowledge that there was a power of appeal to an admittedly impartial body. Therefore, he trusted Her Majesty's Government would allow the Amendment to pass.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR regretted the tone of the noble Marquess's remarks. To say that the Commission was not an impartial tribunal, because its Members were appointed by the Government, was a very rash assertion, and he utterly repudiated it. Men of all political Parties, when they accepted a judicial office, might be trusted to decide with judicial impartiality the cases brought before them.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he did not question the perfect honesty with which these gentlemen would address themselves to their task; but he could not forget the fact that the matters on which they were about to decide were matters which had been fiercely contested by rival schools of thought. The majority of the Commissioners were known to be under a prepossession in favour of one of those schools of thought, and they had been appointed by a Government whose prepossessions in regard to that particular controversy there could be no doubt about whatever, and who had announced the necessity of their appointing gentlemen who had such prepossessions. He asserted that it was not a tribunal of arbitration, and that the circumstances in which it had been appointed deprived it of that particular kind of trust which was reposed in arbitrators who were appointed by the two contending parties.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 45 to 52, inclusive, agreed to, with Amendments.

Clause 53 (Arrears of rent, how dealt with).

Lord CLONOURRY moved, in page 34, to leave out from ("valued," in line 28, to ("exceeding," in line 30, both inclusive, and insert ("the rent payable in respect of which does not exceed.") The noble Lord said, it was well known that Griffith's valuation was no indication of the real value.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY agreed that Griffith's valuation was unsatisfactory; but it would be still more unsatisfactory and inconvenient to take the actual rent. The rent did not represent the value of the holding, as various drawbacks ought to be taken into consideration.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, it was certain that whatever might be a bad test of valuation, Griffith's valuation was utterly detestable and untrustworthy.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that might be true as a general proposition; but the question was what was desirable in this case.

LORD CLONCURRY withdrew the Amendment, as it was too late to discuss it, and said he should raise the question on the Report.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 54 agreed to.

Clause 55 (Definitions).

On the Motion of The Lord INCHQUIN, Amendment made, in page 37, line 31, by leaving out from ("Act") to ("and," in line 34.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 56 agreed to.

Clause 57 (Saving in case of inability to make immediate application to court).

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY moved, in page 39, lines 22 to 30 inclusive, to leave out the following words:—

("Whenever, within six months after the passing of this Act, any action shall be pending or be brought against a tenant to recover a debt or damages before or after an application to fix a judicial rent, and shall be pending before such application is disposed of, the court before which such action is pending shall have power, upon such terms and conditions as the court may think fit, to stay the sale, under any writ of execution in such action, of the tenancy in respect of which such application is pending until the termination of the proceedings to fix such judicial rent.")

The noble Marquess said that if the words that he proposed to omit were now rejected, after a short discussion, they would only die by a process similar to that by which they had received their birth. At the very end of the Report, in the House of Commons, Mr. Parnell suddenly moved this singular pendant to the clause, and obtained its acceptance by the Government. It was a most extraordinary clause. By its operation any tenant who had not paid his rent to his landlord, or his interest to his banker, or who had not satisfied his mortgagee, or who had not paid his tradesman, would be able to defer any action taken against him by a creditor by the simple process of applying for a judicial rent to be fixed. The respite thereby gained would not be small or unimportant. Besides the immorality of the proposal, it threw upon the Land Commissioners work far in excess even of the labours of Hercules, much less of those exalted natures, notwithstanding that they were already over-burdened with an amount of business which he (the Marquess of Salisbury) would say would result, as one of the first phenomena of the Bill, in a hopeless dead-lock. A further delay might be interposed if the debtor were ingenious enough to induce his friends also to apply for judicial rents to the already overworked Assistant Commissioner of the district. By that process there would speedily be a general suspension of payment of debts throughout Ireland. He believed in Eastern countries, on the occasion of any great public rejoicing, it was sometimes the habit of despotic Sovereigns to announce that all debts should be remitted. He did not know whether such an announcement was received with as much rejoicing amongst the creditors as amongst the debtors; but on the principle of satisfying everybody, considering that the debtors were much more numerous than the creditors, he could imagine that the Government could produce no more popular measure than one announcing to all debtors in Ireland that for six months or two years they need not pay their debts. He ventured, however, to claim justice for England. If these benefits were to be given to Ireland, he thought it would be found that a very large number of people on this side of St. George's Channel would be of opinion that this legislation ought not to be confined to Ireland, and would press Her Majesty's Government to take into consideration the condition of the oppressed

[Second Night.]

The Marquess of Salisbury

English debtors. He thought he had said enough to show that the Amendment, which was hastily brought in by Mr. Parnell, without Notice, at the last moment, and accepted by the Government, ought not to be allowed by their Lordships to form part of this measure.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he did not think the Amendment of Mr. Parnell to the clause was quite so wonderful as the noble Marquess seemed to fancy. It was evidently constructed on the analogy of Clause 12, and the whole raison d'être of it was that it did follow that analogy. Clause 12 provided that when any proceedings of a landlord against a tenant were pending in a County Court, the Court should have power to stay those proceedings within certain limits in order to enable the tenant to have an opportunity of availing himself of this Bill. It was thought that when proceedings were pending in the Court above, the same opportunity should be given with certain restrictions to the tenant. The House would observe that the Court was empowered to impose such terms on the applicant as it might think fit. For instance, the Court would be perfectly at liberty to require the tenant to pay half his rent into Court or to give security for the payment of it. The Government, however, would have no objection to insert words of limitation like—"If the Court shall think the application reasonable." The landlord could not be injured by the clause; because, the moment he issued his writ, and lodged it in the hands of the sheriff, the land was at once bound against all other creditors.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the provision was fenced round with so many safeguards that it could not very well act injuriously.

EARL CAIRNS supported the Amendment, on the ground that it would be a startling innovation on all previous legal arrangements to confer the extraordinary power which the Government had consented to insert in the clause at the last moment. He remembered only one precedent of this kind. It occurred two centuries ago, when the Exchequer was shut up, and the people could not be paid. The course was then taken of applying to the Court of Chancery for an injunction to prevent any creditor from recovering his debts from the bankers. Under the clause, an app ation might be made not for the bond fide purpose of obtaining a judicial rent, but for the collateral purpose of preventing debtors from having their debts recovered from them. In the extreme hurry in which the clause was drawn, by a curious oversight, it seemed to have been overlooked that it did not relate to proceedings in bankruptcy. Consequently, a landlord might make a tenant a bankrupt, and then he would be perfectly free from the operation of this Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

The Report of the amendments to be received on Monday next; and Standing Order No. XXXV. to be considered in order to its being dispensed with; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No 204.)

QUESTIONS.

INDIA—MORTALITY, IN INDIAN GAOLS.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether it is true, as stated in the "Times" of August 1, that the mortality in the gaols of the principal provinces of India for two years averaged from 8 to 11 per cent. per annum; and, if so, whether, considering that after many years discussions and great expenditure the mortality is still so large, he will take steps to make very searching inquiry into the subject?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, it is true that the mortality for the years 1878 and 1879 in the gaols of Bengal, Madras, Bombay, the Punjab, and Central Provinces ranged from 8 in Bengal to 12 per cent in the Punjab. My attention has already been directed, among other matters, to the mortality of Indian gaols. I have communicated by telegraph with the Viceroy, and am now awaiting a promised despatch on the subject. Meanwhile, I have requested a Committee of the Council of India to investigate the Returns on the subject which are already at the India Office.

INDIA—MADRAS CIVIL SERVICE.

MR. GIBSON asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether he has received a Copy of the reply of the Government of India to the communication of the Government of Madras of April 1880, forwarding the Memorials of certain members of the Madras Civil Service complaining of their present position and future prospects; and, if so, whether he will state the nature of the reply; but if no copy has been received, whether, with regard to the delay which has already taken place, and to prevent further delay, he will communicate with the Government of India by telegraph, so that the desired information may be furnished at an early date?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, further Correspondence on the subject has been received. It appears that the Government of India are awaiting further information from the Madras Government asked for so long since as January, 1879, and on its receipt promised to lose no time in considering whether any, and, if so, what, measures should be adopted to meet the complaints preferred by certain members of the Madras Civil Service. I am afraid that decision will not be made known before the rising of the House.

VACCINATION ACT, 1867—AWARDS TO PUBLIC VACCINATORS.

MR. BURT asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, as the awards for vaccination (paid under section 5 of 30 and 31 Vic c 84) are now very considerable in amount, and as they are given year after year to certain public vaccinators, though the Act prescribes that they shall be paid for "number and quality" only, he will state what is the officially recognised principle upon which these awards are given, in addition to the ordinary salaries of the public vaccinators?

MR. DODSON: Sir, the principle upon which these awards are given is that an Inspector of the Board should be satisfied in every case, by a careful personal examination of the arms of a considerable number of recently-vaccinated children, that the results are up to the prescribed standard of merit—namely, that the scars should cover a certain area and be thoroughly well marked. Moreover, the Inspector is required to see that the public vaccinator has been regular and punctual in his attendance at the vaccination station at the appointed times, and that the cases have been duly certified and registered. If it is found that these conditions have not been complied with, the award is withheld.

STATE OF IRELAND—JULY CELEBRATIONS, CO. DOWN.

LORD ARTHUR HILL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been drawn to a proclamation issued at Downpatrick, county Down, and dated 11th July 1881, prohibiting the erection "of any arch of whatever description across any street, lane, or road within the boundary of said borough;" whether such proclamation was issued consequent upon sworn information to the effect that a breach of the peace would probably ensue if such arch were erected; and, whether he will cause to be laid upon the Table of the House all Correspondence bearing upon the subject?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he found that the magistrates of Downpatrick, acting on sworn informations, issued a proclamation on the 11th of July prohibiting the erection of arches of any description within the boundary of the town. The noble Lord was doubtless aware that the erection of arches in Downpatrick on the 15th of August last gave rise to rioting. He did not know that there was any Correspondence to produce.

Mr. Burt

STATE OF IRELAND—MURDER OF POLICE-CONSTABLE LINTON.

LORD ARTHUR HILL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in the case of Police Constable Linton, who was murdered in Church Street, Loughrea, county Galway, at about 10.20 p.m. on the 24th of last month, the authorities are prosecuting any inquiries as to the circumstances under which the deceased came by his death; and, whether any, and, if any, what, reward has been offered by the Government for the apprehension of the person by whom Police Constable Linton was murdered?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the authorities were making all possible inquiries into the case referred to, and that two persons had been arrested on sworn informations. As yet no reward had been offered; but, if it was found necessary, there would, of course, be no hesitation in offering a reward.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—INTERMEDIATE AND HIGHER EDUCATION (WALES)—REPORT OF THE COMMISSION.

MR. RATHBONE asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether he will take care that the Report of the Commission on Higher Education in Wales is laid upon the Table of the House before it separates, so that there may be no unnecessary delay in circulating so important a document?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, I am informed that this Report is on the eve of completion, and will be ready in time to be laid on the Table before the close of the Session.

SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM—THE PLANE TREE.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether there is any intention to cut down the beautiful plane tree which stands opposite the old entrance to the South Kensington Museum?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Sir, there is no intention to cut down the tree to which my hon. Friend refers, and I have given directions that it shall not be subject to maltreatment. I may observe, however, that if the plans for the extension of South Kensington Museum, decided upon in 1876, be carried out, and if a frontage be added to the blank wall of the Art Library recently erected, it is difficult to see how the plane tree can be preserved; but, at the rate at which money has been voted for the South Kensington Museum during the last few years, it will be about 20 years before the period of danger is reached.

ANCIENT MONUMENTS (RESOLUTION MARCH 11TH).

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he proposed to take any, and, if so, what, steps to provide for the better preservation of Ancient Monuments, in accordance with the Resolution of the House of the 11th of March?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, that a wish had been expressed by the House that any plan submitted to the Government with regard to the preservation of ancient monuments should be carefully considered by the Government. No such plan had, however, been submitted, and he must confess that he had not been in a position, nor did he know when he should be, to undertake what was expected from the Government. Seriously, he hoped that, after what had happened, some plan would be brought forward to which the Government might be able to give careful attention.

ARMY ORGANIZATION — THE NEW ROYAL WARRANT—RETIREMENT.

MR. HEALY (for Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether similar conditions of retirement will be sanctioned for the Captain and Lieutenants of Orderlies, A.H.C., who do not wish to serve under the new Royal Warrant as Hospital Quartermasters, to those granted by the Royal Warrant of the 12th July 1878 to the Assistant Commissaries who declined to accept the position of Quartermaster in the Commissariat Department?

MR. CHILDERS: No, Sir; the circumstances are entirely different. The Assistant Commissaries were largely reduced in number, and were no longer eligible for promotion in the Department, and it was reasonable to offer them, under such circumstances, facilities on a liberal scale for leaving the Department. This is not the case with respect to the officers referred to by the hon. Member.

PARLIAMENT—THE HOUSE OF COMMONS—CONDUCT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS—NEW RULES.

MR. RATHBONE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Government will consider the necessity of bringing before the House, at the commencement of next Session, proposals for amendment of the Rules for the conduct of the Business of the House?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I am sure my hon. Friend will understand, with his knowledge of Parliamentary proceedings, that the Government are not able to give any definite pledge, in the present state of their knowledge upon the question, as to what Business it may be their duty to submit to Parliament at the commencement of next Session; but, undoubtedly, subject to reservations which are necessary as to everything in the future, I cannot hesitate to say, with increasing strength of conviction from every week's and month's experience, that the question of the re-organization of the arrangements of the House in such a way as to restore it—for I must use the expression—to its full efficiency, has become a question of the very first order, not only in point of magnitude, but in point of claim to precedence. I may, perhaps, Sir, while I am addressing you, say, with regard to the Boer Convention, on which I spoke yesterday, that the Paper has been presented to Parliament, and it will be distributed, I believe, very shortly. I do not know what day it will be distributed, but copies of it are to be obtained in the Agenda Office by anyone who wishes to see it. I also wish to refer to a Question put to me yesterday by my right hon. Friend the Member for the City of London (Mr. Hubbard), on which the right hon. Baronet opposite offered some observation, with regard to the Bill for the conversion of certain Stocks into certain Annuities. I am very much disposed to regret that there should be any difficulty or any burden upon the time of the House in respect to the passing of that Bill in its integrity. If I am pressed about it, with a desire to escape from all unnecessary labour, there is this to be said. There is only one portion of that Bill which is of great practical influence to pass, with the view of relieving the Exchequer from unnecessary charge with relation to the conversion in Stock of £7,500,000 of Exchequer Bonds, on which we are paying 3½ per cent. The portion of the Bill which relates to that I should feel myself bound, in any circumstances, to go forward with. There is also another enactment of the Bill for the purpose of curing a legal flaw which has been discovered in the Act of last year relating to the Savings Bank Fund. If it is desired that such a course should be taken, I would, in lieu of going forward with the Bill as it stands, be willing to read the Bill a second time, and pass it through Committee pro forma with the view of striking out all that relates to the larger function with regard to conversion, and reduce it to the provision I have now spoken of. If I find that is so, I will take the stages of the Bill accordingly.

PARLIAMENT—PRIVILEGE—MR. BRADLAUGH.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I apprehend, Sir, that I shall be in Order in laying before you the conduct of a Member of this House within the precincts of the House. I need not say I refer to the hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. R. N. Fowler). I have received the following letter from my Colleague in the representation of Northampton:—

"20, Circus Road, St. John's Wood, N.W.
"August 4.

"My dear Labouchere,—Among the excessively painful incidents of yesterday there is one matter which I cannot help bringing to your notice. Alderman R. N. Fowler (London) followed me downstairs, and at the door leading on to Palace-yard, just as the police and other officials were forcibly ejecting me, I heard Mr. Fowler say, 'Kick him out,' and the people near on this hooted at Mr. Fowler. Surely, as this took place within the precincts of the House, and as I was debarred by my being in the hold of 12 men from retorting as this deserved, and am also debarred from protecting myself in my place in Parliament, I may appeal to you to bring this matter before the House. If the House should hold that this did not occur within its precincts I shall at once summon Mr. Alderman Fowler for endeavouring to excite to a breach of the peace.

"Yours very sincerely,

"C. BRADLAUGH."

I need not add anything to that letter, and I shall leave the matter, Sir, in your hands.

Mr. Gladstone

MR. R. N. FOWLER: I have to thank the hon. Member for his courtesy in deferring this Question from yesterday until to-day to suit my convenience. If I take any notice of the letter it is not from any respect to Mr. Bradlaugh, whose admission to this House I have always opposed, and shall continue to oppose by the best means in my power. It is because I think it would be inconsistent with the duty of any Member of this House to interfere with the police in the discharge of a difficult duty, which I may say, from what I saw, they discharged with very great moderation and forbearance. All I have to say is, that I never used the words in question, and I emphatically deny the statement made in the letter read to the House.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL— THE NATIVE TRIBES

SIR HENRY HOLLAND asked whether the Papers to be laid before the House with respect to the Boer Convention would include the address of Sir Hercules Robinson to the Natives, which he thought might have an important bearing upon the construction of the Convention?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, he had not heard from the Colonial Office any account of the receipt of that Paper officially in this country. What he had just said had reference not to Papers in relation to the Transvaal generally, but only to the Convention. They had received a copy of the full text of the Convention, but had not had time to lay it on the Table. He quite agreed with the hon. Baronet that the address of Sir Hercules Robinson ought to be presented to Members immediately on its receipt.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked what was the extent of territory to be handed over to the Boers?

MR. GLADSTONE begged to refer the hon. Member to the Convention. The hon. Member would find there authentic terms, which he was unable to supply from memory. He might say, however, that it was not thought that there would be any advantage in retaining the strip of territory between Zululand and the Transvaal.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE NEW CODE.

In answer to Mr. BRIGGS,

MR. MUNDELLA said, if the Education Estimates were taken on Monday, he should lay on the Table the proposals for the revision of the Education Code.

SEIZURE OF EXPLOSIVE MACHINES AT LIVERPOOL.

LORD JOHN MANNERS asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary whether he could inform the House as to any communications which had passed between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States with reference to the recent discovery at Liverpool of infernal machines which have been sent to this country from America?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, Her Majesty's Government, as I stated some days ago, thought it their duty to make representations to the Minister of the United States in London, on the subject of the machines which were discovered at Liverpool. The Government have received from the Government of the United States a communication, couched in the friendly and satisfactory spirit which I ventured confidently to anticipate. With the leave of the House I will read the answer from the Government of the United States. It is from Mr. Lowell, the Minister of the United States—

“August 1, 1881.

“My Lord,—Referring to my conversation with Lord Tenterden on Friday, the 29th ult., in relation to the discovery of explosive machines at Liverpool shipped from the United States for criminal purposes, I have the honour to acquaint your Lordship that I sent to Mr. Blaine on the 30th ult. by cable a memorandum of this conversation, and that I have received from him this morning a despatch by telegraph in which he instructs me to inform Tenterden that the National, State, and municipal authorities of the United States are all engaged in the work of discovering the wicked authors of the dynamite plot. Mr. Blaine adds that it was a stealthy, secret crime, and it is not believed that any considerable number of accomplices were engaged in it. He further states that no pains or expense will be spared in the detection and prosecution of the guilty parties.

“I have, &c., “J. R. LOWELL.

“The Earl Granville.”

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. GLADSTONE said, it was proposed, after the Army Estimates had been completed, to proceed with the Civil Service Estimates in the order of the Votes as they stood, with the exception of the Education Votes, regarding which a special arrangement would be made. It was also intended, if possible, to, in a similar way, make a special arrangement in regard to the Irish Votes. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had given Notice of an Amendment in connection with those Votes which would raise important Irish questions, and he thought it was the duty of the Government to afford that hon. Gentleman every convenience in their power to bring on the discussion which he desired to raise. No Irish Votes would, therefore, be asked for either to-night or to-morrow (Saturday), but another day would be given to their consideration. No idea of urgency in regard to these Votes had been entertained by the Government. It would be necessary for the Secretary to the Admiralty, who was nearly out at elbows, to ask for a Vote on Account to-morrow; but he would not propose to take any Votes on which discussion was likely to arise, but to deal with the non-effective Votes. The House would meet at 12 o'clock to-morrow. It was intended to propose the Education Estimates on Monday.

MR. CALLAN asked whether it was intended to postpone the Irish Votes until after the Land Bill had been returned to this House from “another place?”

MR. GLADSTONE said, there was no such intention, and added that, in the view of the Government, they would be justified in asking urgency for the consideration of any Amendments that might be proposed.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked when the Irish Land Bill was likely to be returned to this House from the House of Lords? With regard to the statement of the Prime Minister as to the Terminable Annuities Bill, he entirely concurred in the course which had been proposed by the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was inclined, in answer to the good-humoured question of the right hon. Gentleman, to ask the same question of him.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: The right hon. Gentleman has misinterpreted my meaning. I should be glad to know whether, if the Bill comes back on Monday or Tuesday, the Government propose to consider the Lords' Amendments the same day or on some day or days after?

MR. GLADSTONE: If the Bill comes back on Monday night we shall propose to consider the Lords' Amendments to it on Tuesday; but if it comes back on Tuesday night, we shall take the sense of the House whether they shall be considered on Wednesday or on Thursday. The Amendments will be placed in the hands of Members with all possible dispatch. They will be printed separately. To insert them in the Bill would necessitate the breaking up of type, so that I cannot promise that a copy of the Bill shall be supplied as amended.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked what were the intentions of the Government with reference to dealing with the subject of local self-government in Ireland?

MR. GLADSTONE said, the strong desire of the Government, conveyed through the medium of the Speech from the Throne, at the commencement of the present Session, might give the hon. Member every assurance that it was in their power to convey with regard to the very earnest desire of the Government to proceed with that very important matter.

In answer to Mr. OTWAY and Mr. MACFARLANE,

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he could make no further statement on the subject of the day on which the Indian Budget would be taken than that which had been made by his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. He hoped that they might take it next week; but he could not say positively, nor could he even say whether it would be taken the week after. He would take care that the usual Papers incidental to the subject were laid upon the Table of the House before the discussion came on.

AFGHANISTAN—REPORTED MOVEMENTS OF TROOPS.

CAPTAIN AYLMER asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether he had received any recent news as to the movements of General Hume's force on the frontiers of Afghanistan?

Mr. Gladstone

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: No, Sir. The Viceroy of India has informed me that no important movements have taken place on the Afghanistan Frontier.

FRANCE AND TUNIS — MILITARY OPERATIONS—THE BOMBARDMENT OF SFAX.

MR. BOURKE: I should like to ask my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question which he will probably be able to answer, although I have not given him Notice of it—namely, whether since the bombardment of Sfax any British claims on the French Government have arisen, or are likely to arise, out of that affair?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: No British claims have yet reached the Government at home. But I think that it is probable, from a telegram sent by Mr. Reade, the British Consul, that British claims will arise out of the bombardment of Sfax. He had an interview before the bombardment with some British subjects at Sfax possessing considerable property which was of a nature likely to be injured by a bombardment, and I have reason to believe that a portion of that property was destroyed. It is, therefore, very likely that British claims will arise out of the matter.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

LAW AND JUSTICE—OUTRAGE UPON THE PERSON.—RESOLUTION.

MR. MACFARLANE, in rising to move—

"That the administration of the Law in cases of outrage upon the person has long been a reproach to our Criminal Courts; that outrages and assaults of the most brutal character, especially upon married women, even when they cause a cruel death, are commonly punished less severely than small offences against property; that the admission of the crime of drunkenness as an extenuation of other crimes is immoral, and acts as an incentive to persons about to commit outrages to wilfully deprive themselves of the guidance of reason ; ”

said, in bringing forward this subject he did not propose in any way to censure Her Majesty's Judges ; but he desired to draw the attention of the House to the striking inequality of sentences passed upon persons guilty of offences against the person as compared with those passed upon persons guilty of offences, often of a trivial character, against property. Thus, whereas the Lord Chief Justice sentenced a man to six weeks' imprisonment who had, while drunk, assaulted his wife in such a manner that her death resulted from it, others, like the man Murphy, who was convicted at the Surrey Sessions of stealing a few pieces of indiarubber, were sentenced to 10 years' penal servitude. A man met a woman in the street, struck her a violent blow in the face, knocked out four of her front teeth, loosened the remainder, and cut her lip in two. He was sentenced to two months' imprisonment, the magistrate observing that the sentence ought to be more severe. He had taken these few cases out of the papers since he asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman a Question on the subject, and he had no doubt he might have found hundreds of similar cases. There was no person in any class of society who did not admit that there was in this country an undue tendency to punish the smallest possible offences against property, and, comparatively speaking, almost to ignore offences against the person. He knew the Home Secretary would tell him he had no power to revise sentences. He had no doubt that if the right hon. and learned Gentleman would say that in the one class of cases the sentences were too severe and in the other were not severe enough, that would have considerable influence on the Judges. At any rate, he did his duty in bringing these cases before the House. A man of the name of Harcourt—he begged the right hon. and learned Gentleman's pardon, William Harcourt—was charged with having beaten a woman in a most unmerciful manner. His plea was that that he did not know he had struck her—that was to say, he was in a state of brutal intoxication at the time. The magistrate sentenced him to a month's hard labour. But if that man had put his hand into her pocket and had taken 6d., he would probably have been sentenced for some years to penal servitude. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “ That ” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “ the administration of the Law in cases of outrage upon the person has long been a reproach to our Criminal Courts ; that outrages and assaults of the most brutal character, especially upon married women, even when they cause a cruel death, are commonly punished less severely than small offences against property ; that the admission of the crime of drunkenness as an extenuation of other crimes is immoral, and acts as an incentive to persons about to commit outrages to wilfully deprive themselves of the guidance of reason, ” —(Mr. Macfarlane,) —instead thereof.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he must point out to the House that the Motion which they were asked to accept was of a very grave character. It was not an impeachment of particular decisions into which that House certainly could not enter with advantage, but it was a general charge against the administration of the law in cases of outrage, which the hon. Member asserted to have been long a reproach to our Criminal Courts. In this Motion the hon. Member included the whole of the magistrates of this country, from the Chief Justice down to the borough and county Justices. He must point out that those magistrates came from the same class as hon. Members themselves, and were members of the same community ; and he would ask the hon. Member how he could account for the fact that many hundreds, he might almost say thousands, of persons having the same feelings of humanity, the same sense of right and wrong as himself, should have all conspired together habitually to do that which was injurious to the society in which they lived ? The thing was improbable on the face of it. It was certainly contrary to his experience and conviction. He could not believe that the Chief Justice and the whole Bench of Judges—[“ No, no ! ”]—yes, that was the hon. Member's proposition. He could not read it in any other sense, for the Motion said the administration of the law had been long a reproach to our Criminal Courts, and the hon. Member had started his illustrations with a case in which the Lord Chief Justice was the Judge, and descended to cases in police courts. He could not regard the Motion or the speech of the hon. Member otherwise than as a general indictment and impeachment of the administration of the Criminal Law in all its branches. If the hon. Member had had the same experience as he (Sir William Harcourt) was obliged to have of the reports which went forth to the public of these cases, he would know how extremely inaccurate those reports were, and how much they led to prejudice. Half the work in his office consisted in writing to inquire, either at the instance of other people or on his own motion, for explanations of reports in which improper sentences were alleged to have been given, and in 99 cases out of 100 he found that the report of those cases omitted to notice the material particulars on which the sentences were based. Why they were to assume that a magistrate or Judge whom they had every right to suppose was as fit to form a judgment as they themselves were, should have gratuitously come to a foolish and ridiculous conclusion, disadvantageous to society, he could not understand. His official experience showed that in 99 cases out of 100, popular prejudice on the matter was not well-founded, because it rested on reports which did not accurately convey the condition of things on which the magistrate had acted. He did not mean to say that there were not occasional cases in which sentences were imposed which he could not approve of, or, at all events, different from what he himself would have imposed; but it must be borne in mind that that was the greatest and insoluble difficulty in the administration of the Criminal Law. The hon. Member had complained of inequality in sentences. There was great inequality of sentences. There must be inequality in sentences as long as we found sentiment varied; and he did not see, unless they could secure uniformity in the temperament of the human mind, that we could ever get that uniformity of sentences which the hon. Member desired. He had no doubt the hon. Member and himself would claim for themselves sentiments of equal rectitude and benevolence; but it was quite possible that in judging of the same case, with the most honest intent, they would pronounce very different sentences. That always must be so. They never could, by Act of Parliament, settle absolute sentences. All they could do by statute was to fix the maximum sentences; but between the maximum and minimum there would always be immense room for diversity of feeling and judgment on the part of the magistrates who administered the law. He was quite conscious of that, and could see no remedy for it. The hon. Member had complained that there was a broad distinction between the manner of dealing with offences against the person and offences against property. One fact, which did not solve all the cases, but which had a bearing on them, was this. They often saw what seemed to be a very small offence against property visited with a very heavy sentence, but newspaper reports almost universally omitted the circumstances, that it might be the sixth, seventh, or tenth conviction. People saw that a man had been punished for larceny with, say, five years' penal servitude; but they did not know the fact that that man was a confirmed offender, whereas in these cases of personal outrage, however brutal, they were more commonly than not first offences, a circumstance which very often accounted for the variety of sentences. Those were some of the difficulties which surrounded that matter. He had no objection whatever to the hon. Member discussing it. It was very useful and wholesome that sentences should be canvassed and considered by public opinion with a full knowledge of the facts. He felt sure, however, the House would not accept or endorse the general and severe condemnation of the magistrates of this country contained in the Resolution. If that Resolution were well-grounded they ought to dismiss all their magistrates and Judges. He knew no other remedy, because if for years those magistrates and Judges had been acting in a manner which was a reproach to the Criminal Courts, the only cure was to get rid of them. The House could not properly review the decisions of Judges without informing themselves of all the circumstances, and hearing the Judges' explanation of the reasons which induced them to pass the sentences complained of.

Sir William Harcourt

Mr. MACFARLANE said, that, as his object had been gained, he was willing to withdraw his Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF EDMUND GALLEY.—OBSERVATIONS.

Sir EARDLEY WILMOT, in rising to call attention to the case of Edmund Galley, to whom Her Majesty graciously granted a free pardon in 1879, in accordance with the Prayer of this House, said, that the Motion just submitted to the House having been negatived, he was thereby prevented from bringing forward the Resolution of which he had given Notice in a substantive form; but that circumstance would not prevent him from presenting it in the shape of an appeal to the Government, in fulfilment of the pledge which he had given to those who, both inside the House and out of it, had taken a deep interest in the case of the unfortunate man Edmund Galley. He would commence by apologizing to hon. Members and to the Government for taking a course which, at that late period of the Session, and in the pressure of so much Public Business to be dealt with, would postpone their going into Supply; but the interests of a much-injured man had been intrusted to him, and he knew that the ear of the House of Commons was never closed against the humblest of Her Majesty's subjects, when he sought justice at its hands. They would remember that in 1879, at the close of the Session, the case of Galley had been carefully considered in a long debate, which lasted from 9 p.m. till 2 in the morning, and that the discussion ended by the House unanimously resolving to pray Her Majesty to grant him a free pardon. He (Sir Eardley Wilmot) would not re-open the details which convinced the House of the innocence of Galley. Hon. Member after hon. Member arose to express that conviction; and he might mention that the hon. and learned Gentleman the present Attorney General, who spoke strongly in favour of his innocence, stated in the course of his speech that out of the 114 members of his own Circuit he believed that there was scarcely one who was not of the same opinion. He (Sir Eardley Wilmot) recollected that the speech of Sir Lawrence Palk—now Lord Haldon—made a great impression upon the House. As a young man, Sir Lawrence Palk had visited the scene of the murder, and the particular locality where the principal witness, the woman Harris, swore she saw the outrage committed; and Sir Lawrence Palk said, from the nature of the ground, and the circumstances of a thick copse closely bordering the road on each side, it was quite impossible that she could have seen the murder committed without being herself seen. He need scarcely call to their recollection the able and eloquent letter of the late lamented Lord Chief Justice, or the testimony of Sir Montague Smith, both of whom were present at the trial in 1836. In the debate in 1879, he had read a letter from the latter, saying he considered it a case of mistaken identity, an extract from which letter was to be found in Hansard, which he held in his hand. He should not have alluded to it now had he not heard that doubts still existed in some minds as to Galley's innocence, and had he not felt that there were some present upon whose minds the minute circumstances of the trial and conviction were not so deeply engraven as upon his own. He would proceed to what had taken place since 1879. Nothing, as far as he knew, had transpired either at the time of the debate, or since, on the subject of compensation. He certainly had never alluded to it himself. But it appeared that someone had held out a hope to Galley, or that he had got the idea into his head, that compensation would be made him by his country for the long and unmerited injuries he had sustained for a period of upwards of 40 years. At all events, Galley felt that he was entitled to it, for he had written early in the following year a letter to Mr. Latimer of Exeter, from which he (Sir Eardley Wilmot) would read an extract. But, before he did so, he could not help paying his warmest tribute of admiration and respect to the persevering exertions of that gentleman on behalf of Galley, for to those exertions Galley's pardon was mainly to be ascribed. Mr. Latimer had been present at the trial at Exeter, and had heard Oliver, who was really guilty, avow in open Court, after the verdict was given, the entire innocence of Galley. He afterwards stood by Oliver on the scaffold when he said—

"I declare in the face of this congregation that I am guilty, and that the other man is innocent."

From the moment when Mr. Latimer heard, in 1877, that Galley was still alive, and that the really guilty man, Longley, had confessed in the Colony, he most warmly and zealously took up Galley's case, and never slackened his exertions till, first by the letter of the late Lord Chief Justice to the Home Office, and afterwards by the debate in Parliament, he had the happiness of seeing those exertions crowned with success. The letter to him from Galley was as follows:—

"Tkalong, Binilong, June 4, 1880.

"For Thomas Latimer, Esq.

"Dear Sir,

"I hope you will excuse me for taking the liberty of writing to you once more concerning my unfortunate affair, having never heard from you for some months past, I may say never since I received Her Most Gracious Majesty's free pardon. I beg of you as a good friend and Christian to put some of the Home Authorities in mind, according to their promise, that something will be done for me in the way of compensation. I am beginning to think that the excitement in England caused by my unfortunate affair has all died out, and I begin to feel that it's a long time about. I feel that I must be drawing near to the grave, and I feel anxious for those I may leave behind."

In May of the present year, he (Sir Eardley Wilmot) had himself received a letter from Galley, which he would also read to the House—

"Binilong, New South Wales,

"March 1, 1881.

"Sir J. E. Wilmot, bart., M.P.

"for Warwickshire.

"Dear and honored Sir,

"I beg of you once more to try and do a most injured man a kind favour by laying my case once more before the house of commons, interceding on my behalf for some compensation for the sufferings that I have undergone during my Life as a Prisoner.

"Now I am freed from the awful crime for which I have suffered over 40 years wrongfully, I consider as a most injured man, that I am entitled to some compensation from the English government.

"Through your own kind benevolence and other good gentlemen of England, I received the royal free pardon for which I can never be too thankful.

"I beg to say that the good gentlemen of England that have done so much for me appear to have forgotten me and my troubles.

"I hope you, as a good Christian and a gentleman, seeing, that I am an old man now, will try and do something for me in the way of recompense for my troubles. Thanking you for all the kindnesses you have done for me, I beg to remain your most humble Servant Edmund Galley.

Sir Eardley Wilmot

"Binilong, N.S.W.

"Care of A. B. Paterson, esq.

"Sir, I forgot to add that I wrote to you some years ago, but never received any answer."

He (Sir Eardley Wilmot) was under the impression that he did reply to Galley's former letter; but, at all events, the best answer that could be sent was Her Majesty's free pardon. ["Hear, hear!"] Soon after he received the above letter, he heard from Mr. Latimer that the people of Devon were preparing a Petition to the House of Commons, and also a Memorial to the Home Secretary, to ask for compensation to Galley, and after Whitsuntide both documents were sent to him (Sir Eardley Wilmot) for presentation. The Petition was signed by upwards of 5,000 of the inhabitants of Exeter and Devon (5,230), and comprised most influential signatures, headed by the Dean, the Mayor and ex-Mayor of Exeter, the Mayors of Plymouth, Tiverton, and Totnes, and many Aldermen and Town Councillors of the various boroughs in Devonshire. There were the names of 34 magistrates, 43 clergymen of all denominations, 306 professional and independent men, 18 journalists, and 2,115 merchants, tradesmen, and farmers, besides 2,714 miscellaneous signatures. There were also the names of Mr. Sanders, J.P., Mr. Latimer, J.P., and Mr. Rose, late Governor of Exeter County Gaol, all three having been present at the trial of Galley in 1836, and throughout convinced of his innocence. The Memorial, which he (Sir Eardley Wilmot) took himself to the Home Office for presentation, was, he understood, as numerous signed, though he did not examine the signatures as he did those to the Petition. Having left an interval of time, in order that the Home Secretary might consider the Prayer of the Memorial, he proceeded to put a Question in the House as to the course the Government intended to pursue, and the reply of the Home Secretary was that, in the opinion of the Government, enough had been done for Galley by the grant of a free pardon. This, however, did not satisfy the people of Devon, who not only had all along felt and expressed a deep sympathy with Galley, but also considered that a certain discredit attached to their county by the fact that an entirely innocent man had been convicted and sentenced to death in it. They, therefore, urged him (Sir Eardley Wilmot) to proceed further in the matter, which he not unwillingly undertook, for he always had considered that a pardon bestowed on an innocent man was an anomaly, and that the laws which had inflicted the injury should provide amends and compensation. Sir Samuel Romilly, as far back as 1808, brought in a Bill with that object; and he (Sir Eardley Wilmot) intended to bring in a Bill next Session for the institution of a Court of Criminal Appeal, one of the provisions of which would be to empower the Court to award compensation where it was proved satisfactorily that injustice had been done and unmerited suffering had been sustained. Returning, however, to the case of Galley, before he gave Notice of his Motion asking for compensation to him, he went to the Home Office in order to seek an interview with the Home Secretary, or Mr. Liddell, the Under Secretary of State, to see if they would not re-consider their decision, and thus avoid the necessity of bringing the matter forward in the House. He was not fortunate enough to see either of the Secretaries; but he saw one of the Assistant Secretaries of the Criminal Department, and also the Private Secretary to the Secretary of State, and, to his surprise and astonishment, he learnt that a belief still existed at the Home Office that Galley was guilty. He thought that that idea had long since been banished from the Home Office; and, bearing upon that, he might mention that, accidentally meeting abroad one of Her Majesty's Judges—one most distinguished in his knowledge of Criminal Law—that dignitary had informed him that at the period when Galley's case was about to be brought before Parliament, in 1879, a late Home Secretary had sent him the Papers connected with the case, and asked his opinion on it. His reply had been—"Galley no more committed that murder than I did myself." At all events, the inquiry by him (Sir Eardley Wilmot) not being what he hoped for, he put down his Motion on the Notice Paper the same afternoon, and to-day they had come to its consideration. It might be said that such a case would afford a precedent for others if the Government consented to give compensation; but he would ask, had not the precedent been already established on more than one occasion? He would refer hon. Members first to the well-known case of Barber, a solicitor, of London, who was convicted, in 1844, of forgery at the Central Criminal Court, along with one Fletcher. Both were sentenced to transportation for life, and sent to Norfolk Island in the autumn of that year. A near relative of his (Sir Eardley Wilmot's) own—in fact, his father—was Lieutenant Governor of Van Dieman's Land at that time. Norfolk Island was under the charge of an official subordinate to the Lieutenant Governor's jurisdiction, and at some distance from Hobart Town; and he was sorry to say, as they all well knew, that dreadful enormities were committed there. Barber was placed, on his arrival, in a most menial occupation, and underwent great and cruel indignities, which injured his health, and he was afterwards removed to Van Dieman's Land, where he obtained a free pardon in 1848. For, in the meantime, the humane and excellent chaplains, Messrs. Rogers and Naylor, who did their best for the convicts on Norfolk Island, had convinced themselves of Barber's innocence; and Fletcher himself, his alleged partner in the forgery, had entirely exonerated him from any participation in it. Well, Barber returned to England, and endeavoured to resume his practice in London as a solicitor, in 1855, but in vain. Though a free pardon had been given him, his clerk gave evidence before the Select Committee afterwards appointed by the House of Commons, that he was avoided by clients, as having had the stain of a conviction, though wrongfully, upon him. In his misery, Barber petitioned this House for inquiry; and, through the exertions of Dr. Brady, a respected Member of it, a Select Committee was appointed to inquire into the circumstances of his case, Lord Hotham being its Chairman. After several sittings of the Committee, before whom Barber himself, Major General Childs, and other witnesses were examined, the Committee came to the unanimous opinion that Barber was entirely innocent of the crime for which he had been punished, and "they recommended him to the favourable recommendation of the Government." He (Sir Eardley Wilmot) had the Report of the Committee in his hand (Vol. xii., 1857-1858, page 617), but he would not trouble the House with it. But the Report stated "that the allegations in Barber's Petition had been substantially proved." He would, however, read to them what occurred in the House afterwards. Dr. Brady, on 19th March, 1859, asked the Secretary to the Treasury (Sir Stafford Northcote) what the Government intended to do in reference to the Report of the Select Committee on the Petition of William Henry Barber? Sir Stafford Northcote said—

"The case of Mr. Barber had been under the careful consideration of the Government for some time, and no little difficulty had been experienced in deciding how to deal with it. On the one hand, a precedent ought not to be laid down which might operate injuriously in other cases of an analogous nature; and, on the other hand, this particular case was taken out of the ordinary category by the fact that it had been investigated by a Select Committee, who had unanimously recommended it to the special consideration of the Government. The various propositions that had been brought forward had received the attention of the Government, which had felt that the only unobjectionable mode of proceeding would be to give some recognition of the sufferings which Mr. Barber had certainly undergone. This would be attained by a grant of public money to Mr. Barber; and, accordingly, in the Estimates for the coming year such a sum would be included as, without pretending to compensate him for what he had endured, would still be an acknowledgment on the part of Parliament and the country that he had suffered considerably, and was therefore entitled to some consideration of this nature."

The other case he would mention was that of Habron, convicted not long since of murder committed by a man named Peace. Through the confession of Peace, entirely exonerating Habron, the latter had received a free pardon. The circumstances of his innocence being established were not unlike, in some respects, to those attending Galley's case, and compensation was awarded to him by the Government. In Barber's case the sum granted was, he believed, £5,000; in Habron's it was £1,000. And now, he would ask, was not Galley entitled to similar amends? For 45 years he had been an exile from his country—at first, a slave condemned to hard and severe labour in a penal Colony; then, as Lord Chief Justice Cockburn had eloquently pointed out, equally a slave on the public roads; and at length assigned, as was the custom with our transported felons at that time, to a landowner, like a beast of burden, in New South Wales, where he had been ever since, with the stigma of a crime which he never committed branded upon him. But, latterly, he had experienced kind treatment, especially from his master, Mr. Friend, now dead. So acutely did he feel his position, that he would not enter the state of marriage till the publication of Lord Chief Justice Cockburn's letter reached him, for he said he would not wish, innocent as he felt and knew himself to be, any woman to take the name of one who had been convicted of murder. He (Sir Eardley Wilmot) had now finished his task. He thanked the House for the kind indulgence with which they had listened to him; and it only remained for him to appeal once more to the Home Secretary and the Government. He asked them favourably to consider, as the House of Commons had done in Barber's and Habron's cases, the unhappy case of this poor old man. They had heard his own appeal in the letter which he (Sir Eardley Wilmot) had read, and in which he besought his fellow-countrymen to do him justice. He (Sir Eardley Wilmot) asked for that justice for him. He asked it in the name of the county of Devon, where Galley had been unjustly convicted; he asked, in the name of all England, that this unhappy man, after 45 years of unmerited suffering, might be enabled, through the generous act of his fellow-countrymen, to return to his native land, and there pass the short remainder of his life in peace and comfort.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that the hon. Member had spent a considerable portion of time in proving the innocence of Galley, and he was surprised to hear it stated that at the Home Office a doubt as to his innocence prevailed. That opinion he understood to be founded on private conversations with his Private Secretary. He was only too glad to afford hon. Members all possible facilities for making inquiries at the Home Office; but he must say that if mistaken opinions gathered from private conversations held there were to be brought before the House, he would be compelled to take steps to prevent such conversations taking place. But the hon. Gentleman's opinion was altogether unfounded. No one at the Home Office, and least of all his Private Secretary or himself, entertained a doubt as to the innocence of Galley. At the beginning of the present year he went carefully through all the Papers, and he held the opinion that the view taken by the late Lord Chief Justice and by Sir Montague Smith was the correct view, and that the case was one of those lamentable miscarriages which sometimes occurred in the administration of justice, and which showed the fallibility of human testimony and of human judgment. Having disposed of that matter, he started with the assumption of the innocence of Galley, as to whom the House had voted that he was entitled to a free pardon. It should not be supposed that he was opposed to compensation being given; but he had a public duty to perform, and would state the considerations which had influenced their decision. The hon. Member said that in all cases of unjust conviction compensation should be given. That was a very large proposition, pregnant with very important consequences, and it was one which had never yet been adopted. There was the case of Mr. Barber, which the hon. Gentleman had referred to, where the Government, from the peculiar circumstances, had decided to award him compensation; but they expressly stated that it was not to be considered as a precedent. But the first thing the hon. Gentleman did was to make it a precedent for another case. They could not do these things without establishing a precedent. It was, of course, entirely for the House to consider in what way they would dispose of the money of the country, and if they were of opinion that compensation should be given in the present case they would say so. He was sorry the House was not in a position to give a vote on this matter, for it was for the House and not for him to decide that point. He had, however, to observe that the hon. Member had given no hint in his speech as to what he considered should be the measure of the compensation, while in his Resolution he suggested that Galley should be allowed a free passage home. If that were all he meant, then he was sure the hon. Member—as he himself would, or many hon. Members present—would find the necessary funds for that purpose.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, he had purposely refrained from naming a sum, being desirous of leaving that matter to the Government.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he supposed he was to assume that the hon. Gentleman asked for some substantial compensation. Well, there was no evidence before them that Galley himself desired to be compensated, or even that he desired to return home; and what was the use of furnishing a man with the requisite means to enable him to return home if he did not desire to do so? The principle which was laid down by the hon. Baronet was not confined, as he understood it, to the case of Galley, but was intended to apply to all cases in which innocent persons had been convicted of crime. It was scarcely for the Government to accept this principle, but it might be done by the House, in which case great care ought to be taken in fixing the bases on which compensation to be paid out of the public purse ought to be fixed.

MR. NORTHCOTE said, he thanked the right hon. and learned Gentleman for the generous and candid manner in which he had admitted the abstract justice of Galley's right to reasonable compensation. He (Mr. Northcote) was not in the least disposed to make raids upon the Treasury in the interest of individuals upon any except the most serious grounds; but he did think that the exceptional hardship of Galley's case entitled him to reasonable compensation, and he trusted the matter would be dealt with as soon as possible. He would suggest that a sum equal to that paid to the Irishman Habron, who had also been unjustly convicted, and suffered two and a-half years' penal servitude, should be given to Galley.

MR. J. COWEN said, he had listened with great satisfaction to the speech of the Home Secretary. Under the circumstances, it was all that the House could expect. He had admitted in the most unqualified way that Galley was innocent, and he did this after having perused the whole of the documents in the case—both the letter of the late Lord Chief Justice and the information exclusively in possession of the Home Office. Such a declaration made by the Home Secretary would be a source of unfeigned pleasure to the unhappy man himself, to the number of gentlemen who had taken an interest in him, and, he believed, to the House at large. He did not wish to mix the case up with any general argument as to the wisdom or necessity of establishing a Court of Appeal and granting compensation in all cases where justice miscarried. That was a very wide subject, and one upon which there might be great difference of opinion. It was not desirable to encumber the present inquiry with broad debates on such a very complicated question. What they wanted the Government to do was to judge the matter upon its merits and to deal with it. He did not believe there had ever been a harder case, in recent years, submitted to the consideration of the Legislature. It was very simple, but it appealed to the sympathies of every generous person. This unfortunate man had, after the lapse of nearly half-a-century, been declared guiltless of the crime of which he had been accused. Apart from the agony of mind that he must have endured over his trial and conviction, the personal hardships he had been subjected to were such as few Gentlemen present could realize. They should remember that transportation to Botany Bay, at the time Galley was sent there, was one of the most severe punishments that could be inflicted. It was a pandemonium of vice and cruelty. He had the acquaintance of Mr. John Frost, the Chartist, who was also transported to New South Wales; and he remembered hearing from him a recital of the misery and suffering that the unfortunate convicts were subjected to. With a knowledge of these facts—seeing that Galley himself was now 80 years of age, and that he could not long live to enjoy any compensation the Government could give him—the necessity for action, and for prompt action, was urgent. No private Member could make a proposal for a sum of money to be granted; but if the Home Secretary would undertake to say that the Government would favourably consider the question—and if they could promise to give such a sum as had been given to Habron, who was convicted of murder, but afterwards found to be innocent, by the confession of the man Peace—he was sure it would give satisfaction, not only to Members of that House on both sides, but to the country. He recollected the discussion that took place there last Parliament. He never in his experience had seen the House of Commons so unanimous as it was on that occasion. It would not only be an act of justice, but it would be an act of generosity, if the Ministry could lighten the load of misery that had accumulated round this unfortunate man during the 45 years that he had struggled under the stigma of murder, and been subjected to the punishment of penal servitude.

MR. WARTON said, he wished to express his general satisfaction with the statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary. He was sure the ratepayers would cheerfully provide for a grant of £1,000.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF admitted the prudence of not establishing a precedent for such cases, but hoped the Government would accede to the appeal.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY said, he had derived much pleasure from the way in which this proposal had been received by hon. Members on both sides of the House. The Government of the day, by consenting to commute the punishment to which Mr. Galley was sentenced, had admitted that they were in the wrong, because if they believed that he was guilty they should have allowed justice to take its course, or if they believed that he was innocent they should have liberated him at once. As it was, the poor man had been kept in penal servitude for 44 years; and now, when he was past 80, he had been thrown upon the world without any provision for himself or for his family. It would be a mere farce to give this man an annuity, looking at his age. What should be done was to give him such a sum as would enable him to make some small provision for his family.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY observed, that this was eminently one of those cases in which the Government required to be pressed from both sides of the House. It was a case in which justice should be done. Nothing in the form of private subscription would meet the case, or would satisfy the feeling of the House of Commons, as reflecting that of the country. He hoped that the Home Secretary would not forget the old adage, that "Bis dat qui cito dat." The case of this unfortunate man had frequently been debated in that House, and at length, after great difficulty, and mainly owing to the efforts of the hon. Member opposite (Sir Eardley Wilmot), he had received a free pardon. It was, however, very little use giving a man who never was guilty a free pardon, if he was to be deprived of the opportunity of getting his livelihood at his extreme age; and therefore he trusted that the Government would show no more official coyness in the matter, but that the Home Secretary would take a course with regard to it which would reflect honour upon himself and would be appreciated by the country.

SIR HENRY TYLER agreed that the provision for the old age of this poor man should not be left to private subscription, but should be voted by Parliament. The mere fact of his receiving a free pardon after enduring 44 years' penal servitude, might leave it open to be supposed that he had only received the benefit of a doubt; whereas if Parliament made provision for him, it would be clearly understood that he was entirely innocent of the offence of which he had been convicted. He trusted that without any further debate the Home Secretary would yield to the universal feeling of the House, and would consent that a grant should be made from the public purse to this old man. The occasion was one for the exercise, not of mercy, but of justice.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that, speaking on behalf of the Home Secretary, who was precluded by the Rules of the House from again addressing the House on this subject, he would state the course which the Government intended to pursue in reference to this case. His right hon. Friend had not been an inattentive listener to the discussion that had taken place; and as he now understood that it was the opinion of every Member of the House apparently that some money payment should be made to this man, he was not disposed to put himself in antagonism to that view. At the same time, he (the Attorney General) was sure hon. Members would feel that it was impossible that the Home Secretary could propose that compensation should be given in every case where a man who had been convicted was afterwards proved to be innocent. If, however, in the present case Parliament should by a strong expression of opinion be disposed to take upon itself all responsibility in the matter, and if it were universally understood that this was an exceptional case, and that it was not to be drawn into a precedent, the Home Secretary was not disposed to do other than give consideration to what had fallen from hon. Members on both sides of the House, and would make inquiry into the circumstances and position of this man, and hoped to be able to give effect in a short time to the wish of the House in the matter.

ISLANDS OF THE PACIFIC—JURISDICTION OF THE HIGH COMMISSIONER OF POLYNESIA.—OBSERVATIONS.

SIR JOHN HAY, who had given Notice of his intention to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the safety of Her Majesty's subjects engaged in commerce in the Pacific, as well as the well-being of the Native races, would be more completely attained, now that the seat of the Lord High Commissioner has been removed from Fiji to New Zealand if the duties of the Lord High Commissioner were performed by the Naval Commander in Chief in those seas, assisted by Naval Officers holding the requisite commission for this purpose;"

said, he did not propose to stand for any long time between the House and the Business before it in Committee of Supply; but the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty agreed with him that it was desirable that a few words should be said on the subject, even at this late period of the Session. In the numerous archipelagoes of the Pacific, none of the islanders, with the exception of those who resided in the Sandwich Islands, were in the slightest degree civilized. No fewer than 40 murders of British subjects had taken place in those islands during the past 12 months without any punishment being inflicted upon the guilty; and he had brought forward this subject in the hope that to try offences of this character some Court different from that which now sat at Fiji might be constituted. The three great Powers who had the most influence among the islanders were France, Great Britain, and the United States. France had a naval force in those seas consisting of 73 ships, manned by a force of 11,000 men, while we ourselves had a naval force in that quarter of the world consisting of 39 vessels, manned by 7,000 men, only a small proportion of which force, however, was available for service in that particular locality. The great Powers also exercised considerable influence in the islands through their missionaries and their traders. The process of obtaining the free labour of the Natives was one which had been liable to very considerable abuse. Persons whom he would call scoundrels proceeded in vessels under the pretence of hiring honest labour for the purpose of employment in French Colonies or in our own Colonies. These scoundrels were the worst description of persons who ever conducted the slave trade. Much had been done by this country to stop them; but the Native races who were so betrayed by these persons resorted to outrages, not, unfortunately, upon the guilty persons, but upon honest traders, missionaries, and other persons who were pursuing their lawful occupations and who were doing their best for civilization. The House would remember the murder of Bishop Patteson, in 1871, and, at a more recent period, of Commodore Goodenough, who, to the end of his life, did his utmost to benefit the Native races. The Pacific Islanders' Protection Act of 1872 was in a right direction. It was amended in 1875 by an Act after the Fiji Islands had become part of the territory of Great Britain. No doubt, a very eminent person, Sir Arthur Gordon, did his very best to remedy the evils that were complained of; but Sir Arthur Gordon was translated from the Government of Fiji to the Government of New Zealand, and was, therefore, at a very considerable distance from the place where the Court sat. If a trader were murdered in some outlying island in the Pacific, some naval officer at Fiji or New Zealand was ordered to go to the place where the outrage was said to have been committed, and he had to do that which he was ordered to do. Great loss of time occurred through that process. The naval officer was sent to exact retribution at some unfortunate village where, perhaps, the inhabitants hardly knew the person who committed the outrage. The Natives' means of livelihood were cut down; fruit trees were destroyed. If you were absolutely certain that persons in that village had committed a murder, and would not give up the murderer, he thought it might be a legitimate and proper punishment. The arrangement for the protection of life ought to be in the hands of the Naval Commander-in-Chief, who was on the spot, who was, no doubt, selected for his ability and discretion, and who, he thought, would carry out this duty with more satisfaction to the country than Sir Arthur

Gordon, who was at so considerable a distance, could. Some legal officer would, of course, require to be associated with the Naval Commander in carrying out sentences. Commodore Erskine, the present Commodore in those seas, was well qualified to do what was necessary. On one point that officer differed from the views now put forward, but only because he thought that the performance of additional duties might interfere with his usefulness in discharging the duties already devolving upon him; and to meet that objection it might be necessary to increase the naval force under his command. France, for the maintenance of order at Tahiti, New Caledonia, and the Marquesas Islands, had 73 vessels and 11,000 men; whereas we had in Australia, in China, and on the West Coast of Africa no more than 39 vessels and 7,000 men. He made no charge against the Government; he only called on them to express some opinion with regard to this very difficult subject, and, perhaps, show that the present arrangement was better than that which he had suggested for the consideration of the House. He thanked the House for their kind reception of him, and hoped the Secretary to the Admiralty would give good reasons for the course the Government had taken.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, that he heartily concurred in the Resolution moved by the right hon. and gallant Admiral. He observed that reference was made in the Resolution to the safety of Her Majesty's subjects engaged in commerce, and the well-being of the Native races. He believed that the safety of Her Majesty's subjects depended mainly upon the well-being of the Native races. There was no doubt that cruelties of an abominable character had been committed upon the Natives of these islands by kidnappers, and that these cruelties had naturally irritated and excited the Natives, and endangered the lives of those who devoted themselves to Missionary work among the islands as well as of those who benefited the Natives by introducing among them an honest and profitable trade. It was for the purpose of checking this kidnapping that the Pacific Islanders' Protection Act was passed in 1872. He (Sir Henry Holland) was then in the Colonial Office, and necessarily took an active part in preparing and working out the details of that measure; and there was no part of his work in the Colonial Office to which he looked back with more satisfaction. That Act empowered certain officers and consuls to seize and detain suspected vessels, and provided for the trial of the offenders in the Australasian Courts of Law and in the Vice Admiralty Courts. The Act worked well and greatly checked these kidnapping outrages. But it was found desirable to have, if possible, a more direct and constant and local check upon these offences, and hence, when we had obtained Fiji, the Amending Act of 1875 was passed and the Queen was empowered to appoint a High Commissioner. This was a wise step in the right direction. Large powers were vested in the High Commissioner, and Sir Arthur Gordon, then Governor of Fiji—to whose merits as a zealous and able Governor he desired, in passing, to add his tribute to that given by the right hon. and gallant Admiral—was appointed High Commissioner. Sir Arthur Gordon exercised these powers satisfactorily so long as he was Governor of Fiji; but the question was whether he could continue to do so as Governor of New Zealand? This he (Sir Henry Holland) ventured to doubt. He thought it would be necessary, if the Acts were to be efficiently carried out, that the High Commissioner should be either the Governor for the time being of Fiji or the Naval Commander-in-Chief for the time being on that Station. If, however, it was decided to retain Sir Arthur Gordon as High Commissioner, he (Sir Henry Holland) would urge upon Her Majesty's Government to take steps for the appointment of one or more Deputy High Commissioners. He was disposed to think that legislation would be necessary for this purpose, but it would be of a very simple character. He doubted whether Her Majesty could now appoint a Deputy High Commissioner. The Act of 1875, 38 & 39 Vict. c. 51, only empowered her to appoint a High Commissioner; and though reference was made in the last paragraph of the 6th section to Deputy Commissioners, these Commissioners were only members of the Court of Justice established under the same section, and were not Deputy High Commissioners with the full powers attached to the office of High Commissioner. The powers of the existing Deputy Commissioners, as members of the Court, did not extend as far as the powers vested in the High Commissioner, which he (Sir Henry Holland) thought ought to be vested in some officer, whether the Governor of Fiji or naval officer, nearer to the scene of action than New Zealand was. He trusted the subject would receive the careful consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. TREVELYAN said, that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had touched a great and complicated question, with regard to which he had made a very definite proposal—a proposal with which the Government found themselves unable to agree, but which they were very glad to discuss. Recent events had drawn public attention to the islands of the Pacific. Those events had excited strong feelings—feelings of indignation at barbarous outrages, of sympathy with fellow-countrymen who had been cruelly murdered, and of grave uneasiness and dissatisfaction at the necessary imperfections in the methods by which those outrages had been visited and punished. It was under the influence of those events that the right hon. and gallant Member had brought forward the Motion which stood in his name; but he could not but think that the impression which they had produced had given him a somewhat onesided view of a question which had many sides, though none, perhaps, as striking as that. For when he proposed to intrust a naval officer, and that officer our Commander-in-Chief in those seas, with the office and duties of High Commissioner, he could not but think he lost sight of the fact that the punishment of outrages by Natives was at present no part, and the prevention of conduct of Europeans which might tempt Natives to those outrages was only a part, of the duties of the High Commissioner. On that point Sir Arthur Gordon spoke positively. It was by no means “to see that Whites were protected from outrages by Natives” (p. 47), and but in a secondary sense “to protect Natives from outrages by Whites” (p. 47), that that Court was formed. He said—

“It was principally designed to provide means for the settlement of disputes between White men themselves and to prevent Her Majesty's subjects from breaking Her Majesty's laws. It was found that in Samoa, in Tonga, in the New Hebrides, and in other places small communities of British subjects were springing up over which no Court had jurisdiction and no law had force. Debts were incurred, and the debtor could at pleasure evade his creditor's claim; contracts were entered into the performance of which could not be enforced; wills were made which could not be proved; disputes arose as to successions which could not be settled; crimes were committed which either escaped punishment altogether or were dealt with by a lynch law demoralizing to those engaged in it. It was primarily to remedy this state of things that the Deputy Commissioners' Courts, under the High Commissioner, were established at Apia and Nukualofa. It was, no doubt, also an object that the letter and spirit of the Western Pacific Acts should be carried out by Her Majesty's subjects and that the Court should enforce their strict observance; but no one who looked carefully at the Orders in Council can fail to perceive what was their primary object—the establishment of a Court to which British subjects who had no locus standi before any other judicial tribunal might resort."

If hon. Members would study the very voluminous Order in Council of the 13th of August, 1877, and the still more voluminous Schedule, they would find that the functions of the High Commissioner embraced the powers of every species of tribunal, civil and criminal, judicial and administrative, legal and equitable. It was impossible that a naval officer, with a naval officer's training, should face such a range of duties, so special and, at the same time, so multifarious in their nature. A Commodore who, in the intervals of inspecting quarters and putting his men through gun-drill, could deal with questions of partnership, questions of probate, questions of bankruptcy, questions of intestacy, would be a sea-lawyer with a vengeance. And if it was impossible, it was at the same time most unadvisable. He could hardly imagine anything more certain to distract an officer's mind from the very important cares which the safety of his ships and the security of his station demanded. And if, by some happy chance, the Admiralty secured an officer who had the legal knowledge which qualified him for the post, the mere fact of his being tied down to the head-quarters of his Court would be an immense disadvantage to the Service. Litigants who had business before the Court at Sydney would be hardly used if the exigencies of the Service required the High Commissioner to go on a four months' cruise to Western Australia. The main principle of naval administration was that our ships and our squadrons should be able to sail whenever and wherever they were ordered. The elasticity of our Navy depended upon our vessels being always, as they were now, ready for war on a moment's notice in any quarter where need might arise; and to fetter the commander of four vessels on an important station with judicial duties which would cramp his movements as much as they would absorb his energies, would be contrary to the whole spirit on which our Service was conducted. And then there was another consideration which weighed with the Admiralty greatly, and that was that to appoint our Commodore High Commissioner would place him in a position with regard to the Colonial public in which, for every reason, it was inexpedient that a naval officer should be placed. Colonial opinion on some important matters was not English opinion. Nor did it always express itself after the fashion which was observed in English politics. He had seen something in India of the mode in which non-official British residents attacked an official, be he Judge or Administrator, who was supposed to deal tenderly with the darker races when their interests clashed with those of the White man; and it was a species of attack to which he did not desire to see our naval officers exposed. And as it was in India, so it had a tendency to be in other quarters of the globe. In January of this year there met an Intercolonial Congress at Sydney, composed of leading gentlemen from the different Governments of Australasia. There was no one under the rank of Colonial Secretary, Colonial Treasurer, Attorney General; and yet these gentlemen were pervaded with the feeling with regard to questions between the Native races and the British race, which never failed to prevail where those races came freely into contact. The Intercolonial Conference printed in the appendix to its Report a certain number of letters and articles from newspapers, and so gave those letters and articles, to speak very moderately, a certain stamp of authority. Now, it was well known to the House that Sir Arthur Gordon was High Commissioner, and Chief Justice Gorrie was Judicial Commissioner; and how were those high functionaries treated in those letters and articles which, after being printed in that Report, had become, as it were, the semi-official expression of Colonial opinion? The first letter was from a Mr. Julian Thomas to the Secretary of the Intercolonial Conference. He said—

"Having lately returned from Fiji, I have seen the pernicious results of the Exeter Hall policy of Sir Arthur Gordon and Judge Gorrie, the High and Judicial Commissioners of Polynesia. I was witness of the supineness and indifference of the High Commissioner to the outrages committed. Native policemen have power to arrest White men on the most frivolous charges; and the insolence of the whole aboriginal race of the South Seas proves Sir Arthur Gordon's public statement that these are not the countries for White men."

And the next extract was from an article—

"Both these officials (Sir Arthur Gordon and Chief Justice Gorrie) have been for years playing to the gallery of Exeter Hall, and, no doubt, have acquired in Great Britain a great reputation for philanthropy, earned, as results show, at the cost of the blood of their countrymen. To try cases before Judge Gorrie is a mockery. The Colonies should join together to protest that the property and lives of their citizens shall no longer be at the mercy of the High Commissioner or his judicial assistant."

Now, he asked the House, and he asked the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, whether that was the sort of language which we should wish to see applied to the officer who commanded Her Majesty's squadron in those seas? Sir Arthur Gordon took these attacks in that spirit in which a high-minded man took all attacks which it was part of duty, and he might say a condition of his calling, to face. When a civilian administrator undertook such a post as that of Sir Arthur Gordon, he regarded that sort of criticism as all in the day's work. But it would be in the highest degree calamitous if the chief representative of the fighting power of England was to be abused twice a-week by two out of the three Colonial newspapers as a partial magistrate and a maudlin humanitarian. It was an ordeal which naval officers could not be called upon to face, and which they should not face either for their own sake or for the sake of the country. That was not the way to maintain the popularity of our Navy. But, without taking the strong step of making the Commodore a High Commissioner, there was still something to be done. The Intercolonial Conference, among other recommendations, made two that were specially worthy of notice. They resolved that—

"Extended powers should be conferred upon the High Commissioners for the punishment of Natives of the said islands for any crimes or offences committed by them against British subjects."

And Sir Arthur Gordon supported their view in his very powerful Memorandum of the 26th of February, which was a sort of comment on their Report. He said—

"Unless a jurisdiction were created competent to take cognizance of offences committed against British subjects in the Pacific beyond Her Majesty's possessions, the infliction of punishment on British subjects for outrages against Natives in the same regions was sure to excite on their part not unnatural irritation and a sense of being treated with injustice."

Well, that great question—for a very great question it was—was beyond the scope and power of the Board of Admiralty, though they took the strongest view in favour of a change of system. But there was another suggestion of the Intercolonial Conference to which they had directed their earnest attention—

"That the more frequent visits of Her Majesty's ships among the islands would have a beneficial effect upon the Natives, and tend to lessen in a great degree the crimes now so prevalent."

That suggestion was enforced in an excellent and moderate series of articles in The Sydney Morning Herald; and the Admiralty had despatched two vessels—the Cormorant and the Beagle—to cruise in and about the islands, visiting every mission and commercial station, with a civilian Deputy Commissioner, Mr. Romilly, on board. The Admiralty had likewise taken the same view as the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, to the effect that a naval officer should be appointed Deputy Commissioner, and that charge had been conferred on Captain Maxwell, who would now have, among other important powers, the all-important power of removing by deportation any British subject whose conduct was of a nature to produce or excite a breach of the public peace, from the neighbourhood where his presence was oppressive or dangerous. It was one thing for a naval officer to be High Commissioner himself, exposed to the fierce light which beat upon that post at Sydney or Wellington, and quite another to be a Deputy Commissioner on the high seas, with the redoubtable presence of Sir Arthur Gordon to stand between himself and public criticism. In the words of Lord Northbrook's letter to the Colonial Office—

"My Lords were convinced that the influence of a sensible naval officer, whose duty is not confined to the distasteful task of punishment, but who can investigate and decide differences on the spot, will be more likely than any other measure gradually to produce a cessation of the serious outrages which seem to threaten the extinction of the valuable trade with the islanders."

That was what the Admiralty had done; for that lay within their own power. And Lord Northbrook's strong recommendation to the Colonial Office to obtain, if legally possible, authority to check outrages on the part of Natives by the course of law, instead of by acts of hostility, which too often confounded the innocent with the guilty, represented what the Admiralty, and he believed Her Majesty's Government, as a whole, regarded as at least a partial remedy for evils which could not be altogether remedied except by that policy of annexation to which hon. Gentlemen who most deprecated the severities and irregularities of the present system of retribution would, he imagined, be the last to urge them.

In reply to Mr. Hopwood,

MR. TREVELYAN promised to lay the despatches on the Table of the House.

ARMY (RECRUITING)—IRISH SOLDIERS.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BIGGAR said, his hon. Friend the Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) had given Notice that he would move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, recruiting for the Army should be suspended in Ireland pending the restoration of the constitutional liberties of the people of that Country;" but he was mainly anxious, at present, to ascertain the number of Irish soldiers recruited into the British Army from time to time, their length of service, and the proportion sent to foreign countries. The Motion would be deferred until next Session. When his hon. Friend had raised the question on a former occasion, the Secretary for War promised him information in relation to it.

MR. CHILDERS said, what the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) had been promised was a Return showing the number of Irish soldiers as compared with English and Scotch soldiers sent on foreign service for a period of five years; also the number on foreign service at present. He had not had time to complete the latter Return; but he could supply the former. It was very curious that the proportion of Irish soldiers to the whole Army was exactly the proportion of Irish soldiers sent abroad—22 and 23 in 100.

Mr. Trevelyan

MR. BIGGAR said, he thought the answer would be satisfactory to his hon. Friend.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £758,900, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Superintending Establishment of, and Expenditure for, Work, Buildings, and Repairs, at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882."

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, he wished to point out that while certain works in connection with the battery at Dover Pier had been estimated at £111,310, £136,210 had already been granted. Would the right hon. Gentleman give him an explanation of the excess?

MR. CHILDERS explained, that in general terms the excess was due to the great storm at Dover a year or two ago.

MR. BIGGAR said, it was a just ground of complaint that a very much larger sum was spent on fortifications in England and Scotland than in Ireland. He did not say that money should be spent simply for the sake of spending it; but he thought the amounts should be apportioned more equally. A very large sum was spent in protecting English seaports, and it was only reasonable that similar consideration should be shown for the Irish seaports. For that reason he should move to reduce the Vote by £50,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £738,900, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Superintending Establishment of, and Expenditure for, Works, Buildings, and Repairs, at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882."—(Mr. Biggar.)

MR. CHILDERS said, a very large sum had been spent on the fortification of Irish ports, and he did not think the amount had been inadequate.

MR. BIGGAR said, there was an enormous sum of money scattered over the English coast, and if money was to be thrown away, he did not see why Ireland should not have a share of it. He should not consider that an argument for giving money to Ireland; but it was an argument for curtailing expenses in England.

MR. CHILDERS replied, that Ireland should get its share of any money that was thrown away; but he did not intend to throw away any money. This Vote was merely for finishing off works which were nearly completed.

Question put, and negatived.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT wished to know how the examination of Militia officers had answered? He also observed that fewer commissions were now given both to those who passed through Sandhurst and also to those who entered through the Militia. One of the most difficult things the Secretary of State for War had to decide was whether the examinations were a fair and reasonable test of candidates' capabilities for the Service. He had known many men who had passed extraordinary examinations, and had got commissions, and were certainly not first-class officers, while many others who had not passed would have made far better officers. In that way many men who would have made first-class soldiers had failed to obtain commissions.

MR. CHILDERS said, he agreed with the hon. and gallant Baronet on the last point, for what he had to do was to see that the examination was the best possible test, not merely of literary powers, but of fitness for the Service; but that was a most difficult matter. He had not been able to go thoroughly into the matter yet; and all he had been able to do was to lay down certain questions to be put, and to throw out suggestions, such as that about modern languages, in regard to which he had laid Papers on the Table. He hoped, however, during the autumn and winter, to go thoroughly into the question of the best examination both for the Line and the Militia; and he would rather not speak more definitely now, because it was a very large question. With regard to officers passing from the Line to the Militia, his own impression was that the present system was within limits not unsatisfactory.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he was glad to hear that the right hon. Gentleman intended to consider the examination question, and hoped he would also consider the doing away with such requirements as poetry. He knew of many young gentlemen eminently qualified for the Army, who had been rejected because they were not strong in the Faerie Queen and other poems. He wished to know whether there was to be any further change with regard to the number of candidates for commissions?

MR. CHILDERS said, there would not be any reduction in the number beyond the extent already notified.

COLONEL ALEXANDER inquired whether candidates for commissions in the Infantry received any instruction in the use of the sword, in single-stick, and fencing? That was a most important matter, for our officers generally were the worst swordsmen in Europe. Scarcely one of them knew how to use his sword. The men were the worst shots, and the officers were the worst swordsmen; and he did not know how they could be otherwise when they received no instruction.

MR. CHILDERS observed, that when he was at school fencing and single-stick and drill were commonly taught to boys of his own rank of life; but he was afraid that no progress in this direction had been made lately. He should like to see this instruction more common, and he would make a note of the matter.

SIR HENRY TYLER thought the statement of the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Alexander) should not go uncontradicted. Having been in the Army himself, and having constantly engaged in single-stick exercise, he was able to contradict that statement so far as a great number of the officers were concerned; but he thought riding and swimming ought to be more generally required.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR mentioned that this Vote included the Royal Military Academy and the Staff College, and drew attention to the fact that in the former metaphysics were taught, and in the latter French, drawing, fortifications, mathematics, and half-a-dozen other subjects; but there did not appear to be any instruction in military administration. If they compared what was done at the British Staff College with what was done in the German Army, or in the Military Schools of France, they would see that there was a good deal that was entirely left out in the programme of this country. The science of military administration was absolutely neglected, so far as the appointment of a Professor was concerned.

MR. CHILDERS said, there was a Professor of Military Administration at the Staff College. There was none at Woolwich or Sandhurst. He quite agreed with the hon. Member that the question of military administration was of considerable importance.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked if it would be possible to obtain a programme of the studies showing the curriculum for particular years at the Staff College?

MR. CHILDERS said, he had no objection to show the hon. Member the Report on the College if he wished to see it.

MR. BYRNE wished to say a few words in regard to the manner in which the Royal Hibernian Academy was conducted. He thought that some of the officers of the School were overpaid, while the pay of others was not fairly or properly adjusted. In the first place, he found that the Commandant had altogether failed to give satisfaction either to the people of Ireland or to Her Majesty's Government. Questions had been asked in the House of Commons in reference to that gentleman; and he thought he was correct in saying that the answers given by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War were not only not satisfactory to the House, but that they were not satisfactory to the right hon. Gentleman himself. He believed the reason was that the right hon. Gentleman had not as much or as complete control over the Institution as he would like. The conduct of the Commandant in connection with the discipline of the School had several times been called in question; not that the officer in question was not a good commandant or a good governor, but because his treatment of the children was alleged to have been very brutal indeed. In some instances he had had the children stripped from head to foot, and flogged with some instrument he had brought from abroad. In one case, this species—this inhuman instrument—of torture was stolen by the Commandant's daughter, in order to prevent it from being used. The Commandant, however, charged the boys with stealing it, and beat them with such barbarity that the daughter, in order to save the boys, had to confess that she had taken it away. He believed that the Commandant had failed to give satisfaction to anyone in Ireland, and his conduct ought not to be passed over by Parliament. He received half-pay and 9s. 6d. a-day, and for such an amount of remuneration they ought to be able to secure the services of a humane officer who had not lost all his humanity, and who would render proper services. The Commandant also received half-pay as an Adjutant; and he (Mr. Byrne) was of opinion that the multiplication of offices in this way in the same individual was unsatisfactory. Then, again, he found, in reference to the chaplains, that while the Protestant chaplain received £200 a-year, the Roman Catholic chaplain only got £150, and the Presbyterian £60. He thought that such a disproportion was highly improper. He would venture to say that the number of Protestant children was not larger than that of the Roman Catholic children; and, at any rate, so long as they employed chaplains of different denominations, they ought to provide that their remuneration was the same. All the chaplains who administered to the spiritual wants of the children ought to be equally paid, and a sum of £60 a-year to the Presbyterian chaplain was certainly not sufficient to pay him for his time and trouble. If there was a sufficient number of children to require the attendance of a Protestant chaplain, the Government should provide that the chaplain was remunerated at the same rate as the Protestant chaplain—£200 a-year. Having regard to the want of humanity displayed by the Commandant, and the unsatisfactory manner in which that officer performed his duties, he would move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £216 18s. 8d.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £163,883 1s. 4d., be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for Military Education."—(Mr. Byrne.)

MR. CHILDERS said, he agreed with the hon. Member in some of the remarks he had made as to the different rate of remuneration awarded to the chaplains of different denominations; and he had already stated, in reply to an hon. and gallant Member opposite, that, in regard to responsibility for these appointments, he thought a better arrangement might be made than that which now existed. But, at the same time, it was not possible to dispose of such a matter as the government of Kilmainham School at a moment's notice; and he could not undertake to say, on the spur of the moment, that he should be prepared to make an entire revision of the arrangements under which the Institution referred to was conducted. Passing from the general principle to the particular case the hon. Gentleman referred to, he believed that the state of the discipline of the Royal Hibernian School was not considered satisfactory by the military authorities last year; and Sir Thomas Steele, who was Vice-Chairman of the Governors, had in November appointed a Committee of Governors, presided over by that most admirable public servant, Sir Patrick Keenan, to examine into the state of the School, with reference particularly to the discipline administered by the Commandant. He had received their Report in the course of the spring, and, after careful consideration, he had come to the conclusion that it was not satisfactory—in fact, that it disclosed circumstances which were most unsatisfactory. It was accordingly sent back to the whole body of Governors for their consideration with reference to the facts disclosed in it. The Governors took great pains in going thoroughly into the whole question contained in the Report, and the end of the matter was that they—including the members of the Committee who made the first inquiry—unanimously reported that, although, in some respects, the Commandant had not been successful in carrying out the discipline of the School, yet, on the whole, he had made great improvement in the state of things which existed before he became Commandant. The Governors, therefore, recommended that he should be retained as Commandant until they had further experience of his efficiency. That was the unanimous recommendation of the whole body of Governors, including the three gentlemen who made the original inquiry. Upon that recommendation he (Mr. Childers) had felt it his duty to act, and the Commandant had been provisionally continued in his office. He (Mr. Childers) had taken very great pains in the matter, having read the whole of the Report and Evidence, and he had not come to this conclusion without being supported by those who generally advised him in such matters. He therefore hoped, under the circumstances, that the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Byrne) would not press his Motion for the rejection of this item. If, after further experience, the conduct of the Governor was still found to be unsatisfactory, he would be removed. In regard to the emoluments of this officer, he thought the hon. Member was mistaken. As a rule, the gentlemen selected for these appointments were not old officers who had been retired; but they were paid in the same way as officers in the Army holding Staff appointments. As to the chaplains, the hon. Member stated that the Protestant chaplain received £200, and the Roman Catholic chaplain £150 a-year. The salary of the Protestant chaplain was originally £231, and it was now, in the present year, £200. The Government considered that that was a very fair salary, having regard to the duties performed. He believed, but he was not quite sure, that the Presbyterian chaplain was a gentleman who was engaged in the performance of other duties, and that the number of boys under his charge was very few.

MR. BYRNE said, he was much obliged for the courteous and full explanation of the right hon. Gentleman. He understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that in future he would make himself responsible for watching the conduct of the Commandant, and seeing that he did not commit any of the barbarous acts he had been charged with persistently committing. After the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman, he would withdraw the Amendment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. OTWAY thought the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Byrne) could take no other course than that which he had taken, after the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. But, at the same time, he wished that his right hon. Friend had been able to say a little more. He thought the right hon. Gentleman should insist on the entire abolition of punishments of this kind. It was a mistake to suppose that the boys of a British soldier could not be managed as other boys were. Nor was this sort of punishment given in all cases to English boys. They had, side by side, two Schools, in which the system pursued was entirely different. In one of them—and the boys educated in it were not inferior to those of any other school—no boy was allowed to be struck by anybody. The instruction given to a Sandhurst boy was that if he was ever struck he was to strike again, and no sergeant dare lay a hand upon him. It was absurd to tell the House that an English boy could not be managed without the use of the stick. He, therefore, hoped that his right hon. Friend would go a little beyond the statement he had made, and would see that in future the education in the Military Schools was conducted without corporal punishment, so that a stop might be put to this barbarous system of flogging.

MR. CHILDERS said, that the general use of corporal punishment in the School was the special subject of complaint.

MR. BYRNE said, he had never in the past, and would never in the future, make a statement which he did not believe to be entirely capable of proof. If the right hon. Gentleman would direct an inquiry to be made, he would undertake on behalf of his hon. Friend the Member for Wicklow (Mr. M'Coan) to bring evidence forward in substantiation of all the charges which had been made, and to show the brutal conduct of this gentleman.

MR. CHILDERS stated that the case had already been thoroughly investigated, and the result was the censure upon the Commandant, which he had already explained.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR remarked, that there was something which sank deeper into the mind of a boy than a blow, and that was words of opprobrium and insult. There was no doubt that in this case the Commandant had flagrantly offended, and the accusations against him had been repeated in every quarter of Ireland, until an amount of feeling had been excited against him which it was impossible to over-estimate.

MR. CHILDERS said, that if any further serious complaint of the kind was made, and it could be proved, he could only say that the Commandant would not be allowed to retain his position.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £40,100, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Miscellaneous Effective Services, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882."

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Secretary of State for War, if he could explain the reason why the expenditure on this Vote for 1879-80 was nearly double the amount of the expenditure in the three preceding years? In 1878, it was £27,000; in 1879, £28,000; and in 1880, £28,000; and they were now asked to vote more than £40,000.

MR. CHILDERS said, he had not got with him an account of the expenditure for the last two or three years; but the increase this year had reference to services in South Africa.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, there was a sum of £5,000 for extra batta, which had nothing whatever to do with the war.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR wished to take up as little of the time of the Committee as he possibly could; but having last night given a silent vote when the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) moved the reduction of the Vote, he did not wish to repeat that step upon the present Vote. At the same time, he had no desire to do more than satisfy his own conscience; and he would, therefore, content himself by moving the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £6,360, as a protest against the Contagious Diseases Acts.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £33,740, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Miscellaneous Effective Services, which will some in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882."—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor.)

Mr. CHILDERS said, he must oppose the reduction of the Vote; and in regard to the question asked by the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon), said he had ascertained that the reason for the increase of the Vote was as he had stated—namely, that there had been a large expenditure in connection with the war in South Africa.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 11; Noes 53: Majority 42.—(Div. List, No. 355.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(5.) £34,000, Rewards, &c.

Sir WALTER B. BARTTELOT wished to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War in regard to colonels who were retired when in receipt of distinguished Service pay. Would they be allowed to retain that pay? He had also understood the right hon. Gentleman to say the other day that a colonel who was retired, and who had a prospective claim to a regiment, would receive the actuarial calculation of his chance of obtaining such regiment.

Mr. CHILDERS said, he would answer the hon. and gallant Member on a later Vote.

Vote agreed to.

(7.) £1,054,700, Retired Pay.

Sir WALTER B. BARTTELOT thought he would now be in Order in raising the important question he had referred to a few moments previously. It was a question in which a large number of officers were interested, and many of them were looking forward with anxiety for the statement which the right hon. Gentleman might make as to the amount it was intended to award, and the way in which the New Warrant was to be carried out. He would first take the case of the colonels; and he wished to know whether the case of those who had a claim to become prospective colonels of regiments would be taken into consideration? Would an actuarial calculation be made as to the sum they would in that case have become entitled to? The next question he wished to put had reference to the case of generals who were compulsorily retired, not on account of age, but on account of not having been employed for five years. He knew of one or two instances in which generals so retired were quite young men, and they found themselves mulcted of £10 per annum for every year they were under 62 years of age, so long as the amount did not exceed £100 in the whole. He understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that he would consider the point with the view of providing that when such officers reached 62 years of age they should receive the same amount as if they had been retired at that age—namely, £700 per annum. Many of these officers, as the right hon. Gentleman knew perfectly well, would be rather hardly dealt with under the New Warrant. They would be hardly dealt with in this way—that, being young, they had not been employed as they might have been, older officers having been selected in preference to them, simply because they were older officers. Therefore, some consideration ought to be given to their case. Then there was the case of officers who were retired at the age of 70 by the Warrant which was passed in 1877. There were not many of them—he believed not more than 12—but the officers who had been so retired had been looking forward with hope to the arrival of the time when they might get regiments. But regiments were scarce, and they had been retired on an allowance of only £450 a-year. Those who were fortunate enough to obtain a distinguished service pension had £100 a-year extra, or a pension of £550 a-year; but there were generals who had only £450. And he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, in fairness to these men, he did not think the case was one which ought to receive serious consideration? He knew one officer who, after 50 years' service had been compulsorily retired on £450 a-year, with a distinguished service allowance in addition of £100 a-year. And this officer had always been on full pay, and repeatedly on active service. Where there was the prospective chance of obtaining a regiment, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether some allowance should not be given beyond the compulsorily retired pay of £450 a-year. Some of the more fortunate brethren of these officers, retired now under the New Warrant, would receive £700 per annum.

MR. CHILDERS: My hon. and gallant Friend has stated the two cases quite clearly. In the first case, that of the senior colonels whose case is specially provided for by the Warrant of 1877, but who will not be promoted under this New Warrant, they will be allowed such a rate of retired pay as will represent the full actuarial value of their prospect to obtain an honorary colonelcy of a regiment. Each case will be referred for calculation to the Purchase Commission. Therefore, I answer that question in the affirmative. The second question which my hon. and gallant Friend has asked me has reference to the case of general officers who have retired at less than the fixed age of retirement under the clause which relates to non-service, and who have a certain deduction made from the amount of their fixed retired pay. He asks me if it is true that since that scheme was laid down we propose that they may receive the full amount of retired pay when they reach the maximum age? Yes, Sir, we have determined that that shall be so, and I believe that the change will remove a great deal of heartburning on the part of general officers subject to retirement. Thus, major-generals will get their full rate of retired pay when they reach the age of 62. I believe that that is a fair and equitable arrangement. The third question asked by my hon. and gallant Friend is this, whether an officer retired under the Warrant of 1877, and who receives the present rates of unattached pay, will have a prospective chance of the value of a regiment? Certainly; he will have not only the prospect, but the £1,000 a-year in his turn, precisely as now. But I could not go back as to such officers and give them the choice of the new rates of retirement.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT said, he did not think that his right hon. Friend had quite understood the question. What he had put was the case of those who chose to accept the scheme of retirement; and he had simply asked whether they would have any chance of getting an actuarial calculation of their prospects of getting a regiment. He asked the right hon. Gentleman to consider that point, and by allowing them an actuarial calculation give them a chance of getting the £1,000 a-year, or such addition to their pay as such a calculation would entitle them to.

MR. CHILDERS: I am not sure that I quite understood the exact proposal, but I will consider it.

MR. BIGGAR said, that some time ago he had asked a question as to the pensions of officers who had been placed on half-pay. The reply of the right hon. Gentleman was that, legally speaking, the officer was not entitled to a pension. He wished to know whether the Government would reserve to themselves the right of conferring upon these officers the rights they were entitled to if they had not been placed on half-pay?

MR. CHILDERS: The case has been most carefully considered, and, as I have already stated, it was treated in a purely judicial manner.

MR. BIGGAR expressed a hope that no reflection was cast upon the half-pay officers of their having displayed any want of zeal in the Service.

MR. CHILDERS: Certainly; I did not look upon the question in that light. I did not understand that anything underlay the bare fact that they had been placed on half-pay.

Vote agreed to.

(8.) £124,200, Widows' Pensions.

COLONEL ALEXANDER asked whether the widow of a quartermaster who died with the rank of a captain would receive the pension of a captain's widow, and whether the widow of a quartermaster who died with the rank of a major would receive the pension of a major's widow?

MR. CHILDERS said, the widow of a quartermaster who held the rank of a major while serving would receive the pension of a major's widow.

COLONEL ALEXANDER remarked, that it was an important point, and many officers were anxious about it. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able to give a definite answer before the close of the Session.

MR. CHILDERS said, he would make inquiry, and take an opportunity of answering the question on the Report.

Vote agreed to.

Sir Walter B. Bartleet

(10.) £33,900, Chelsea, &c. Hospitals.

MR. CHILDERS said, he was now able to answer the question which had been asked by the hon. and gallant Member for Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander). In the case of a quartermaster, riding-master, &c., the pension of the widow would be according to the relative rank of the officer while serving.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that upon the present Vote for Hospitals the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan), two years ago, drew the attention of the Committee and of the then Secretary of State for War to the disparity between the remuneration paid to the Roman Catholic chaplain of the Chelsea Hospital and that paid to the Protestant chaplain at Kilmainham. In the first case the salary was £400 a-year, the principal inmates being Protestants, the Catholic chaplain only receiving a 16th part of that sum; but in the case of Kilmainham, where the great proportion of the inmates were Catholics, the Catholic clergyman only received £60 a-year, as compared with £400, notwithstanding the fact that the Catholic inmates of the latter hospital were four times as many as those which the chaplain of the majority had to deal with in the Chelsea Hospital. He understood that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State had promised to make an inquiry as to the number of Catholics and Protestants in the two Institutions, and to see whether in future some arrangement might not be carried out by which something like an equitable proportion should be maintained between the salary and the number of inmates attended religiously.

MR. CHILDERS: The stipend of the Roman Catholic chaplain in Chelsea Hospital was brought under my notice, and the allowance has lately been increased. Some questions were raised at the same time as to the facilities for attending Mass, especially in the case of children; and I believe the requests that were made have been acceded to. We are endeavouring, as far as possible, to act impartially towards the chaplains of different religious creeds.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR stated that a representation was made to the War Office some time ago as to the inadequacy of the allowance made, not to the priest personally, but on account of the fact that the priest was compelled to keep a curate owing to the existence of the hospital in his parish. If it were not for the existence of the hospital in the parish a single priest would be sufficient to perform all the duties; but because the hospital did exist there, the duty was imposed upon the authorities of the Catholic Church of seeing that the Chelsea priest had a curate. He thought it was hard upon the Catholics of London that they should be saddled with the extra expense of providing a curate for a particular parish to do work for which the small remuneration of only £25 a-year was allowed by the State. [MR. CHILDERS: The allowance has been increased.] That was not all. His main objection to this Vote was that while in London, where the majority of the inmates of the hospital belonged to the Established Church, the Protestant chaplain was allowed £400 a-year, and the chaplain of the minority only £25, in Ireland, in a similar hospital, where the majority of the inmates were Roman Catholics and the minority Protestants, the chaplain of the minority got four times as much as the chaplain of the majority. That was considered in Ireland to be a great grievance. The mere amount of money was not of very much consequence; but it was the feeling of religious ascendancy which was involved, and which, until every trace of it was removed, would continue to work like a canker in the minds of the Irish people.

MR. CHILDERS: The present allowance to the chaplain at the hospital has been £250 per annum, but it is intended to reduce it. The allowance has only been provisional. The question of appointing chaplains to attend small numbers of men where a regular military chaplain is not necessary has always been one of considerable difficulty. This very day, it so happened that I had before me the question of chaplains in the Mauritius, where very few men required the attendance of clergymen, and I have been careful not to disturb vested interests, which happen here to be Roman Catholic. The hon. Gentleman may rest assured that the whole matter will be fully and fairly considered.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he was sure the right hon. Gentleman was the last man in that House to allow his own religious views to affect the distribution of the allowances of the State. He hoped, when the opportunity served, that the right hon. Gentleman would revise the present scale of allowances and render them more equitable. It was manifestly unjust that a Protestant chaplain should receive a larger rate of remuneration than a Roman Catholic chaplain, when the latter was attending to the spiritual wants of a much larger number of persons.

MR. CHILDERS said, that where allowances were made to ministers, not regular Army chaplains, the rates were the same for all denominations.

Vote agreed to.

(11.) £1,386,500, Out-Pensions.

(13.) £37,400, Militia, Yeomanry Cavalry, and Volunteer Corps.

MR. BIGGAR said, the people of Ireland considered it very unreasonable that a sum of money should be annually voted for a Volunteer corps in England and none in Ireland. Some hon. Members were decidedly of opinion that there ought to be a Volunteer force in Ireland. At the same time, in the absence of such a force, it was a substantial injustice that the Irish people should be called on to bear a large proportion of the taxation for Volunteers. He did not see why a grant of this nature should be given to Volunteers in England when there was no corresponding force existing in Ireland. Then, in regard to the Yeomanry Cavalry, he thought they were all agreed that the money voted for that service was not required. The Yeomanry Cavalry were mostly farmers, who met together once a year for some seven days' drill. They were not soldiers at all, and would never make soldiers. He would, therefore, move the reduction of the Vote, unless he received a satisfactory explanation from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War.

MR. CHILDERS said, the Vote was for pensions, not for services rendered by existing officers and men, and he trusted the hon. Member would not move the rejection of any part of it. A farmer, or even a provision merchant, might be a useful member of a Yeomanry corps.

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

MR. BIGGAR said, he could only look upon the member of a Yeomanry Cavalry corps as a tailor on horseback. Most of them when out for drill got thrown from their horses. But, as the right hon. Gentleman had pointed out, these persons were not responsible for the weakness of their organization, and therefore he would not divide against the Vote.

MR. BYRNE wished to ask a question in regard to the Militia in Ireland. He understood that it was owing to the Militia not having been called out—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I must remind the hon. Member that this Vote is simply for pensions for the Militia, and has nothing to do with the organization of that force.

MR. BIGGAR asked if no question could be put in regard to the Militia?

THE CHAIRMAN: It would not be regular upon this Vote; but if it were only a simple question, not likely to lead to discussion, perhaps the Committee would allow it to be put.

MR. BYRNE said, he was desirous of asking the question, because the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had hitherto been so courteous in giving information, and it might prevent the question being asked at another period. The Militia in Ireland had not been called out this year, and the consequence had been that a number of gentlemen had been deprived of the opportunity of serving for a sufficient period to qualify themselves for becoming officers of the Line. He wished to know whether any steps would be taken to place them in the same position they would have occupied if the Militia in Ireland had been called out this year, and whether provision would be made that they would not suffer?

MR. CHILDERS: I have done my best to meet the case referred to by the hon. Member. In some instances the officers have been excused from undergoing the full period of training, and in other instances they have been allowed to train with other regiments, so that practically we have met the case.

Vote agreed to.

MR. CHILDERS: I propose now to take two items in the Supplementary Vote which I explained last night, and which has reference to the expenditure in South Africa to the end of the year.

(14.) £1,100,000, Army (Indian Home Charges).

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT asked whether this was a liberal Estimate, and would cover the whole of the expenditure to the close of the year? He also wished to know what number of troops it was proposed to withdraw from South Africa on the 1st of November, or about that time?

MR. CHILDERS: The Estimate is framed—I do not know whether “liberally” is the right word—on such accurate information as the Department can obtain; but, of course, these things are often merely conjectural. I am not quite sure that I can state at present the number of troops that will come home.

MR. ARTHUR O’CONNOR said, he did not propose to move the reduction of the Vote, or to oppose it in any way; but this was the last opportunity he would have this Session of protesting against the manner in which Vote 10 of the Army Estimates had been passed this year—absolutely without any discussion at all upon the merits of the items which went to make it up. It was introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War at 10 minutes past 1 o’clock in the morning in an attenuated House, when not more than five Members were conscious that it involved the voting of millions of money. He had strongly protested, in general terms, against the propriety of introducing such a Vote on such a miscellaneous collection of subjects at such an hour and in such a state of the House. The money was at last voted, but without anything in the nature of criticism of the component parts of the Vote. The services which the Vote covered were never properly canvassed this year any more than they had been in previous years. He mentioned the matter only for the purpose of entering a further protest against the system upon which the Estimates were voted.

MR. CHILDERS: I regret that there was not a full discussion; but the circumstances of the present year have been such that I hope some allowance will be made.

Vote agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICES.

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

(17.) £36,281, to complete the sum for Law Charges.

MR. ARTHUR O’CONNOR said, that before the Vote was passed he wished to put a question, but he did not see anybody present to whom he could put it. The noble Lord the Financial Secretary was an efficient and exemplary public officer; but it would be scarcely fair to question him upon a purely Legal Vote. He would, however, ask the noble Lord one or two questions. First of all, in regard to the Note on page 173, in regard to the alteration of the system of accounting for the expenditure. He wanted to know if the noble Lord could explain why the regular practice had in this case been departed from? The second question was, why the allowance of the War Office Agent at Malta of £75 had been considerably increased; whether the increase had anything to do with the purchase of land at Malta; and, if so, whether he had been officially concerned in a question of the purchase of land at Malta, which for two years or more had kept a number of persons very busily engaged in an extensive correspondence, and whose want of business habits was brought more than once before the Public Accounts Committee? The first question came under sub-head J, in connection with the revision of the Statute Law, and as the consolidation of the statutes had been undertaken, he would like to know from the noble Lord what was the state of the work. The allowance for that purpose had, he perceived, been increased from £150 to £250. If he were not mistaken, he was under the impression that the work was to have been completed before the present date, and for a less sum than had been already voted.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, the first question related to the expenditure for criminal prosecutions and quasi-criminal proceedings. It was now the practice to give the net charge in criminal cases, and it had been found desirable to apply the same rule to legal proceedings other than criminal. With regard to Malta, he did not know whether the item referred to had any connection with the purchase of land in that island; but he would ascertain before bringing up the Report. He believed that the Statute Law Commissioners were doing useful work. Every year a Bill was brought in for the repeal of obsolete statutes. There was one on the Paper now, which he hoped hon. Members would allow to become law during the present Session. Thanks to the labours of the Commission, it was hoped before long that we should have all our statutes in an accessible form. The work was proceeding rapidly, and there could be no doubt that it was being done most usefully.

MR. WARTON said, they all knew that the work of revising the statutes had been going on for several years, and he would not say that what had been done had not been done fairly. But the Bills that were introduced in successive years were really Bills to enable the rules of Court to override the rules that already existed in the Statute Law.

MR. BIGGAR asked for an explanation of a material increase in one of the salaries mentioned on page 175. The increase appeared to be from £100 to £260 per annum.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, the hon. Member would see in the Votes for the Legal Departments many similar instances. They arose from the fact that these various Legal Departments had undergone extensive reorganization, and the salaries had been put upon a more satisfactory footing. It had been thought right to introduce a new scale of salaries altogether.

Vote agreed to.

(18.) £2,021, to complete the sum for the Public Prosecutor's Office.

MR. BYRNE asked for an explanation in regard to the item for a Messenger on page 176. This year the sum appeared to be £75; but last year it was £450. Was that a saving? Was the salary really reduced to £75?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, the office was newly established last year. The allowance of £450 was found to be more than was necessary, and therefore it had been reduced.

MR. WARTON desired to call the attention of the Committee to the broader topic of the appointment of a Public Prosecutor. He wished to know whether the Government really did believe in a Public Prosecutor or not; because, if they did believe in him, why did they not carry out the Act of 1879, which required that six assistants should be appointed to assist the Public Prosecutor? If, on the other hand, they did not believe in a Public Prosecutor, why not abolish the office at once? The present Public Prosecutor had one assistant instead of six; but owing to the inaction of the Government, and the difficulty they experienced in making up their minds, he had nothing to do. But for the personal weight and influence of the late Recorder of London, Mr. Russell Gurney, and the feeling of respect entertained for him, no Public Prosecutor would ever have been appointed, and up to the present time the Public Prosecutor had, practically, done nothing. He had nothing to say against the gentleman who held that office, personally. He was known to be a very able man indeed; but he wanted to know from the Government if it was intended to continue the office, and, if so, when they intended to give real and thorough effect to it? At present, there were a number of Societies which took upon themselves the duty of instituting prosecutions—a most improper principle, and one which he strongly doubted ought to be allowed to exist. They owed their existence to the absence of a Public Prosecutor; and now that there was a Public Prosecutor, they still existed, and were flourishing, while the office of Public Prosecutor was in practical abeyance. He asked the Government if they intended to continue the office to make it a reality, and not a sham.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, his hon. and learned Friend was under a misapprehension in regard to one fact, and that was in supposing that the staff of the office was less than it was intended to be when the Act of 1879 was passed. The Act of 1879 was passed at the instance of the right hon. Gentleman the late Home Secretary (Sir R. Assheton Cross), and the staff which now existed was the staff appointed by the right hon. Gentleman, which he considered, at the outset, to be sufficient, and which he appointed in that belief. Therefore, if anyone was to blame for there not being a larger staff, it was the right hon. Gentleman who dealt with the matter when the office was created, and whose Bill it was that created it. He (the Solicitor

Lord Frederick Cavendish

General) was prepared to say at once that he did not consider that this office of Public Prosecutor was in a satisfactory condition. He did not think it did all the good it might do, although it could not be denied that it had done some good. He would at once say that he thought it not only needed looking into and being thoroughly investigated in order to render it efficient, but, he might add, that it was the intention of the Government to make such an investigation. The matter had not escaped notice, and was seriously engaging the attention of the Government. As regarded the appointment of a Public Prosecutor, it was a matter upon which considerable difference of opinion had existed, and there were many people who considered that it was desirable to have a person filling that office who, nevertheless, did not believe that it was desirable that the whole of the prosecutions of the country should be taken from the hands in which they now were, and be turned over to a single department which should have entire control over the whole of them. That was a scheme which had often been advocated; but it was a scheme which would lead to very great expense without largely increasing the efficiency of the work. It was found impracticable to deal with the large number of persons who had a vested interest in opposing such a scheme, and he was not prepared to say that it would be of very much use if it were carried out. But it was found, under the old system of prosecutions, that in many cases which were brought into Court, there was a grievous failure of justice, because it was the business of no one to see that the prosecution was instituted, or, when instituted, that it was fully carried out. Many cases were dropped or compromised, and it was to remedy that evil that the Act of 1879 was passed, and the office of Public Prosecutor created. It was to provide that prosecutions should be prosecuted with, and not compromised. In that respect, he believed the creation of the office had unquestionably been of some use. He admitted that it had not been as much use as was originally anticipated; but he believed that it might be rendered still more useful, and it should be the endeavour of the Government to see that it was made fully effective. It was essential that some officer of the kind should exist, whose duty it should be to see that offences did not go unpunished, and who should insist, as the Public Prosecutor had insisted, on a prosecution going on where it would otherwise have been abandoned by persons who cared only for their own interests, and who would willingly have dropped it for the sake of gain to themselves. He did not believe that the office had been as efficient as it might have been, or that it had done all the work that might have been expected from it; but he could assure the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) that the matter would not escape the attention of the Government.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. BROADHURST asked for a Return showing the number of prosecutions conducted by the office of Public Prosecutor. The office had been in existence for two years; and, so far as he was aware, no information whatever had been given as to the work performed there. If the office was to be retained, he thought it was not too much to ask for the Return he had alluded to.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, he was exceedingly obliged to the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) and the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst) for raising this question. There was a Public Prosecutor, but no public prosecutions; in other words, they were paying £4,000 and getting nothing for it. He did not wish to say that the office was a sinecure; but it was something very much like it. The Solicitor General having expressed great dissatisfaction at the present state of affairs, he trusted he would follow the matter up and institute a thorough reform.

MR. WARTON thought that the statement of the hon. and learned Solicitor General, as indicating the intention of the Government, was, to a great extent, satisfactory; but it did not in one respect quite meet the objection he had raised. He had pointed out that there was only one assistant at the office at the time it was started; and that, although two years had elapsed, there was no increase in this respect. That was one of those little things which showed how matters were going on. Hon. Members would see that the expenses this year had dwindled to one-third of the former amount, which was quite enough to show that the office itself was dwindling away. He thanked the hon. Member for Stoke for his very practical suggestion that a Return should be given of the number of prosecutions.

MR. COURTNEY wished to point out that, after all, something more had been done in the office than hon. Members supposed. Since it came into operation in January, 1879, to Midsummer last year, 436 cases had passed through it, and the number of prosecutions had been 101; while from Midsummer, 1880, to Midsummer, 1881, the Public Prosecutor was authorized to prosecute in 267 cases. Besides that, advice had been given in 464 cases. This showed a very considerable increase of work over the previous year. Of course, the charge brought by the hon. and learned Member for Bridport required his attention; but the answer was that so far the working of the office had been experimental, and assistants had only been appointed sufficient for the work required to be done.

MR. BIGGAR said, it was quite a matter of chance whether the Public Prosecutor would take any notice of cases laid before him, or rather, when he had examined into them, whether he would institute a prosecution. Considering the number of serious offences which were committed in England, it seemed very strange that so small a number of cases passed through the office. Of course, he did not know to what extent the office of Public Prosecutor was desirable; but it seemed to him that there must be some person, or class of persons, whose interest it was to do away with the office. He thought that the Law Officers of the Crown, with whom the matter appeared to rest rather than the Home Department, should give the office a fair chance. As it was, according to the Estimates, the whole thing had proved to be a fallacy.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was glad that the Solicitor General had expressed the feelings which he himself entertained with respect to this office. He did not wish to cast blame upon anyone; on the contrary, he was sure the Public Prosecutor had done his utmost in the cause of justice. But he felt the Government were under responsibility in this matter, and was quite sure that if his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary were present he would join in saying that it was their duty to endeavour to obtain a more certain administration of criminal justice in the country than they had at the present time; and he could assure the Committee that everything that lay in his power should be done to attain that end.

Vote agreed to.

(19.) £116,022, to complete the sum for Criminal Prosecutions.

MR. GREGORY said, before this Vote was put to the Committee, he should like to have some explanation as to the position of the Clerks of Assize. He understood that this office was to be gradually discontinued, and he believed it would be generally recognized that the duties might be performed by other officials. There was a Clerk of Assize, a Clerk of Indictments, and an Associate; and, according to his experience, all those offices were not necessary for the purpose of Circuit work. He remembered raising the question some years ago as to the discontinuance of the office of Clerks of Assize, when there was a general agreement with his opinion that these officers were ornamental rather than useful; and it was then understood that, as the offices became vacant, they should not again be filled up. Under these circumstances, he should like to know whether that understanding would be carried out, and what was the present position of the officers in question?

MR. WARTON asked whether, seeing that the Home Circuit had been altered, one Associate was not quite sufficient to do what was really one's work?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH pointed out that in 1868 a Committee had been appointed to consider the duties and salaries of the officers referred to by hon. Members opposite, and they had recommended that, as vacancies occurred, the salaries should be reconsidered, and, if possible, reduced. In accordance with that recommendation, many new arrangements had been made.

MR. WARTON said, the noble Lord had advanced a good general argument; but it did not meet the point of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory). With regard to the question he himself had raised, he had pointed out that as there was practically but one Circuit, two sets of officers were no longer necessary, and his object was to ascertain whether it was contemplated that there should be but one officer when either of the offices became vacant?

Mr. GREGORY said, he wished to explain that his question related rather to the continuance of the offices than to the amount of salaries. Was it necessary to continue them, having regard to the requirements of the Circuit, or was it intended to consolidate them and put the work into the hands of one person?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, the subject had been carefully inquired into by a Committee appointed by the late Lord Chancellor, presided over by the Master of the Rolls, and of which Lord Justice Lush, Mr. Pemberton, himself, and other gentlemen were members. His own idea had been that the work might be done at considerably less expense than it was at the time, and many other members of the Committee took the same view. But the result of the investigation had been to satisfy the Committee that it was not possible to effect much saving, having regard to the number of Courts sitting at the same time, each of which required the attendance of an officer. He believed that the Report of the Committee had suggested all that could usefully be done; but the subject was one which he had no doubt would receive full consideration.

Mr. GOURLEY thought that the question ought to be considered as to whether the office of Sheriff should not be abolished. He should be glad to know the meaning of the charge for Extraordinary Expenditure in furtherance of Justice which appeared in the Vote?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, the item referred to by the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Gourley) provided not only for lodging the Judges, but for fitting up the Court, summoning jurymen, and other matters. He believed that the suggestion of the hon. Member would result in a considerably increased charge.

Mr. WARTON begged to remind the Solicitor General that his question with regard to the necessity of retaining a double set of officers to do the work of the had not been replied to.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he was not aware that it was intended to make a change of the kind indicated by the hon. and learned Member for Bridport. When, however, the offices became vacant, he had no doubt that the question would be fully considered.

Mr. BIGGAR said, he did not regard the answer of the noble Lord as very satisfactory. He should not ask the Committee to divide against the Vote; but to his mind four clerks engaged upon one Circuit were rather too many, and it seemed strange that in some way or other the superfluous officers could not be dispensed with. The same remarks applied to the office of Judge's Registrar in Ireland. The Registrarship was in the patronage of the Judge for the time being, who appointed some friend or relation of his own, and this person, it might be said, did literally nothing. The office was a perfect sinecure, inasmuch as the Judge himself took notes of the proceedings, and the Registrar, during the whole time the Court was engaged, did not require to put pen to paper. But why a Judge should require two gentlemen on Circuit to assist in doing nothing really passed his comprehension.

Vote agreed to.

(20.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he must confess that he always looked upon this Vote with a certain amount of partiality, because he had last year made a representation to the effect that a charge of £1,500, now struck out of the Estimates, could not be needed, inasmuch as the officer for whom it was asked did not exist. The Government admitted the non-existence of the officer in question, but it took 25 minutes to convince them that it was unnecessary to take the £1,500. He succeeded in getting the amount struck out, and he was afterwards told by an old Member of the House that he had never before known a case in which the Government had submitted to the reduction of a Vote. For that reason he had a partiality towards the Vote before the Committee. On the present occasion he had to bring forward an important representation made by an officer specially appointed by the House to report upon these Estimates, with regard to a particular officer of the Court of Chancery. The Comptroller and Auditor General, in his Report upon the Accounts presented by the Paymaster General of the Court of Chancery, recently placed in the hands of hon. Members, drew attention to certain points of great consequence, and which, although they would take a few minutes to go through, he believed the Committee would agree ought not to be passed over without comment. He said in a letter addressed to the office of the Court of Chancery—

“(7.) My attention has been called to a practice which appears to me to be unsatisfactory and to involve some risk of misapplication of dividends. It not unfrequently happens that when an Order directs the transfer into Court of railway or other stock or shares, and when a certificate is given by a Secretary of a Company that the securities in question have been transferred to the account of the Paymaster General on certain days (which certificate is attached to the Paymaster's directions and sent to this Department as a voucher for the transaction), they nevertheless do not appear as brought to credit in the Paymaster's accounts until some months afterwards. In one case during the past year, five months elapsed between the date of the certificate and the date on which the security was brought to credit. I have thought it right to ask for some explanation of these delays, and also to inquire in the case specially adverted to, whether any dividend accrued in the interval, and whether, in that event, the amount should not have been paid into Court. The Chancery Paymaster has, however, stated in reply that the securities had been brought to account as soon as practicable after the receipt of the evidence of the completion of the transfers, and that he did not consider it any part of his duty to inquire into the matter of the dividends.”

The Committee would see from this that there were sums of money accruing as dividends on property, which the Chancery Paymaster chose to allow to go into some unknown regions, and which the owners had little chance of recovering.

“(8.) A question has arisen as to the obligation of the Paymaster under the General Order in Lunacy of the 7th November, 1853. The Order directs, in Section 16, that when money has been paid into Court and invested pursuant to the Master's certificates, the dividends in such investments shall, failing other direction, ‘be laid out by the Accountant General (Paymaster) in like manner without any request for the purpose.’ It is held by the Paymaster that if an order is made dealing with a portion of the securities, the obligation of investing dividends does not remain when the request from the Solicitor ceases. I think it my duty to point out that the probable result of this interpretation of the rules will be the accumulation of cash upon the accounts of lunatic suitors. As an instance in point, I may mention a case in which a balance of £896 17s. 7d. had accumulated on one account before the investment took place in August 1879.”

Hon. Members, he thought, would not allow their own private affairs to be conducted in this way. The Comptroller and Auditor General proceeded—

“(9.) It was discovered in the course of examination that a sum of £415 had been invested under the authority of an old order, while a later order had directed its distribution among five claimants. The mistake was admitted and the stock sold; but as the price of Consols had risen in the interval, there was a profit of £21 2s. 1d. on the transaction; and the question was raised by this Department in what manner this profit should be disposed of. The Lords of the Treasury decided that the sum of £21 2s. 1d. should be transferred to the Exchequer.”

He should like the noble Lord to give some explanation of the grounds on which the interest on funds lying in the Court of Chancery in this way were transferred to the Public Exchequer. Then there was another case detailed in the Report, which continued as follows:—

“(10.) A Report of Master Barlow, confirmed by fiat on the 21st August, 1876, a copy of which was sent to this Department, was found to contain a direction for the transfer into Court to the account of a person of unsound mind of £322 9s. 1d. New Three Per Cent Annuities, and also for the payment into Court by the Bank of England to the sum credit of any dividends which might accrue on such Annuities previously to the transfer thereof. The stock in question was not transferred into Court until the 16th November, 1876, and consequently a dividend accrued in the interval; but as no such dividend was paid into Court, a letter was addressed to the Bank of England, making inquiry upon the subject.”

The Comptroller and Auditor General concluded by saying—

“(12.) I regret to say that the representations which I have repeatedly addressed to the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury upon the incompleteness of the audit and the inadequacy of my staff for the work which is now undertaken, and which is constantly falling still more into arrear, have not yet elicited any response; and I have accordingly addressed a further communication to their Lordships, a copy of which will be found in the Appendix.”

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

The Committee would see what good reason the Comptroller and Auditor General had for complaining of the treatment he received from the Commissioners of the Treasury when it was stated that this letter was dated 31st December, 1880, and that the letters he had addressed to the Treasury on the 12th January and 7th of December, 1879—more than a year before—were yet unanswered. The letter referred to contained the following passage:—

“I am to add that while it is far from the desire of the Comptroller and Auditor General unduly to press the matter upon the consideration of their Lordships, he would submit that without an adequate staff to overtake the requisite duties, he cannot be held responsible for the possible consequences which might result from the insufficient supervision of pecuniary transactions of such exceptional magnitude.”

These were the first points he had to submit to the consideration of the noble Lord, and the next charge which struck him in this Vote was, on page 83, under the head of Master of the Rolls Office, for Preacher at the Rolls Church £180, and Preacher at the Rolls Chapel £45. He was quite unable to understand the necessity for continuing two such items as these, and if any grounds for their continuance did exist, he had not been able to ascertain them. Therefore, he would be glad if the noble Lord would state what was the reason for the continuance of these charges upon the Estimates. There was also a subject upon which he should be glad to hear some explanation from the Attorney General. Some years ago, when that hon. and learned Gentleman was in Opposition, he attacked this Vote, and moved its reduction by the sum charged for the Official Referees. Last year, having taken Office, he spoke in favour of retaining this item, which, when in Opposition, he most strenuously opposed; and on that occasion, although he advanced some rather weak arguments, they were sufficient for the time being. He said that the Official Referees had had a great increase of work thrown upon them; that complaints were not so strong as they had been, and that the work had been much better done. But a short time ago, when he (Mr. O'Connor) was at the office of a gentleman in Gray's Inn, the question of the Referees became the subject of conversation; and it was stated that the position of the Referees was simply indefensible; that they had nothing like an adequate amount of work to do for the money paid to them; that the suitors did not get satisfaction; that they did not go before the Referees willingly, and that when they did the almost invariable result was that the Official Referees, after hearing both sides of the case, proposed a compromise. These were the three points he wished to submit to the Government, and upon which he should be glad to receive some satisfactory explanation.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, he was perfectly sure the present Master of the Rolls did not require the services of a Preacher at the Rolls Chapel, and the charge under this head appeared altogether superfluous. He requested the Committee to compare the cost of the retinue of the Master of the Rolls with that of the Chancery Judges. The former had two Secretaries at £600 and £1,000 a-year respectively, a Gentleman of the Chamber at £400 a-year, and, besides other officials, a Train Bearer at £200, and a Clerk of the Chamber at £400 a-year; the whole charge being for the Master of the Rolls' establishment about £3,000 a-year, as against £3,700, the charge for the six Chancery Judges. He trusted the noble Lord would explain the necessity for retaining this excessive charge in the case of the Master of the Rolls.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, the salary of the Secretary to the Master of the Rolls was formerly £1,200; but it had since been reduced, and at the next vacancy it would be fixed at £500. The Secretary of Causes attended in Court every morning and took the directions of the Master of the Rolls, his chief work being to read petitions, which numbered about 4,000 in the course of the year. He believed that one Departmental Commission had recommended the abolition of this office; but another Commission had subsequently recommended its continuance for some time longer. When, however, a vacancy occurred the subject would, no doubt, receive further consideration. With respect to the Preacher at the Rolls Chapel, this gentleman performed Divine Service every Sunday, and his salary was one over which the Treasury had no control, inasmuch as it was fixed by Act of Parliament—Sec. 4, 3 Vict. c. 46. Although the present Master of the Rolls did not attend the chapel, he presumed that Divine Service was necessary there for the benefit of others. The hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) had called attention to a point in connection with the office of Paymaster General of the Court of Chancery, giving details upon which he would not enter. The hon. Member asked why the Treasury had paid into the Exchequer the profit on a certain transfer of stock. He presumed that the answer was that, inasmuch as it would not have been thought right to charge the suit with interest had a loss resulted from a fall in the funds, there was no reason why he should be credited with profit which resulted from a mistake of an unfortunate character. With regard to the Comptroller and Auditor General, the question was not at all free from difficulty; but he was happy to say that a Committee would shortly be appointed to consider the duties of that officer and the number of clerks required.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS said, that, having regard to the needs of the district in which the Rolls Chapel was situated, he was very glad to see that there was a preacher there.

MR. GREGORY said, he had not been originally favourable to the institution of the office of Official Referees and the appointments made. But he had since found that the duties of the office, which were more onerous than he at first supposed, were, on the whole, satisfactorily performed. There was this great advantage in connection with the office—that the Official Referees could go down to any place and investigate cases on the spot. For instance, they could inspect works which were the subject of a contract, see how things were going on, and form their own conclusions. With regard to the office of Paymaster of the Court of Chancery, he would wish to remind the Committee of the immense amount of work that was in hand; and looking at the complicated nature of the accounts, the orders that had to be worked out, and other things, it was a matter of surprise to him that more mistakes did not occur in that office. Those and several other matters required some attention.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) thought the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) was entitled to some sympathy, for he himself, when the Referees were appointed, took exception to the appointment, especially of one of them, for he thought a Referee should not be appointed who had not shown his fitness for the office. But after the lapse of five years, he had now nothing unfavourable to say as to that gentleman. He had nothing but favourable criticism to offer, for that gentleman had performed his duties with satisfaction, and with benefit to the public service. Subsequently to that, there was an extension of the duties thrown upon the Referees. For a time there was some doubt as to the desirability of submitting cases to the judgment of the Referees; but now, instead of few cases being submitted to them, there were very many, and their time was fully occupied.

MR. HOPWOOD thought it would be in the memory of some hon. Members that when the Official Referees were appointed, and for some time afterwards, there was an item for travelling expenses, and that in favour of the appointments it was argued that the Referees would be ambulatory, and so could decide questions at a much less cost to the parties. It was intended that the expenses should be paid from the public funds and not by the individuals; but he did not see this item in the Estimates, and he knew that the law was being disregarded in that respect. It seemed as if the Treasury were determined to override the Act of Parliament; and at present, when the Referees had to go from London, they had to apply to the parties for security for their travelling expenses.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) observed that the suitor, of course, must in one sense bear the expenses of a travelling Referee if he took the Referee a long distance from London; but, of course, the Treasury must allow some of the expenses.

MR. HOPWOOD said, that the complaint of the Referees was that they were obliged to enter into cash transactions with the parties, instead of receiving an advance from the Treasury.

MR. GREGORY said, he thought the Referees were placed in a humiliating position.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, he wished to draw attention to the case of the Registrars in the Courts of Chancery. He should be obliged to divide the Committee upon this item unless he received a satisfactory explanation. The Registrars were simply officers of the Courts to carry out the decrees of the Judges, and did not partake in a judicial character at all. The Chief Clerks of the Master of the Rolls and the Vice Chancellors discharged most important judicial duties, by which large sums of money were sometimes disposed of. A County Court Judge's maximum salary was £1,500, and that of the Chief Clerks of the Master of the Rolls and the Vice Chancellors was also £1,500; but the first of these gentlemen, who discharged the duties of Registrars, received £2,000; three received £1,800; four received £1,500; and four others received £1,250. Then there were two clerks at £800, four at £600, five at £400, four at £300, together with 12 assistant clerks, and two clerks of entry, making altogether 42 clerks to carry out the decisions of six Courts—four Vice Chancellors' Courts, the Rolls Court, and the Court of Appeal. It might surely be supposed that that staff was sufficient to deal with the most extensive operations of the Court; but, beyond these, there was a charge of £3,100 for copying, the 42 clerks being unable to do any copying at all. There was no Department which cost so much as this in proportion to the work done; and unless the Government could give some explanation of this, he should be obliged to take the sense of the Committee upon it.

MR. GREGORY said, that, having had long experience of the work of the Courts of Chancery, he could not agree with the hon. Member. The efficiency of those Courts largely depended on the Registrars, and he thought the hon. Member had altogether under-estimated their duties. They had to sit in Court, take notes of each judgment and of the order to be drawn up in consequence of the judgment, and to work out the details of the judgment, which was necessarily pronounced in short and concise terms. Then they had to advise the Judges on all points of practice, and were always ready with references upon any point that might arise. On leaving the Courts they had to draw up the decrees, which sometimes extended to 200 or 300 folios, and involved the most minute directions as to taking accounts, ascertaining the liabilities and charges on estates, administration of the estates, and realisation of the assets in order to meet the charges upon them. In addition to those duties they had to see that the orders were in accordance with the pleadings; and all these were a heavy responsibility, requiring great vigilance and knowledge of the practice of the Court. These gentlemen had been trained to this work, and they must be paid for such duties; and unless the Courts were furnished with such officers the administration of the Court would be very different from what it now was.

MR. HOPWOOD said, these appointments were the richest mine the Courts of Chancery possessed, and it was always considered desirable to put young men into them early, because they were sure to get to the top of the tree if they lived long enough. But the work of these officials could not be compared with that of the County Court Judges or the Chief Clerks in Chancery, and it could not be argued that they were paying ability according to its merits. The reckless profusion of emoluments went down from them to the care-taker and cleaner, who received £250 a-year, and there was also an item of £3 for washing towels. This was a matter that ought to be seriously considered.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) explained that although the sum paid was large, it had been settled by statute, and assured the Committee that the duties of the Registrars were most onerous and responsible duties. It was necessary to have men in that position in whom there was perfect confidence. If the same duties were performed by private agency the cost would probably be greater; and he did not think any further legislation on this matter was necessary.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, he must protest against the notion that the Registrars discharged duties of equal importance to those of the Chief Clerks. As a matter of fact, important decrees in the Court of Chancery were settled by the counsel, and the duty of the Registrar was mainly mechanical. He did not deny that the Registrars were men of great ability, and that men of great ability ought to be employed for this work; but if £1,500 was a sufficient salary for a County Court Judge or a Chief Clerk, it was enough for a Registrar; and as the Government had defended this Vote he should take the opinion of the Committee upon it. He would, however, not do so as to the salaries of the Registrars, as they were fixed by statute; but the country ought not to pay £3,100 for copying in the Registrars' offices, and he should move to reduce the Vote by £2,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. GREGORY said, he considered the duties of the Registrars as responsible as those of the Chief Clerks in their way; but he thought the Chief Clerks were underpaid.

MR. HEALY wished to take the opinion of the Committee with regard to the Chaplain of the Rolls Court. He thought it was time to teach the Master of the Rolls that there was no royal road to Paradise, and if he wanted prayers said for him he should pay for them himself. He was opposed to Votes for getting men to Heaven, and should move to reduce the Vote by £250, the salary of the Preacher in the Rolls Chapel.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he hoped the hon. Member (Mr. H. H. Fowler) would not insist on going to a division. There was some profit on the scrivener's work.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 32; Noes 76: Majority 44.—(Div. List, No. 356.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. HEALY said, he would move to reduce the Vote by £225, the salary and expenses of the Chaplain attached to the Rolls Chapel. He had already explained the reasons which induced him to take this step; and if the salaries and expenses of this gentleman were secured to him by an Act of Parliament the sooner it was repealed the better. They could hardly disturb the present chaplain; therefore, if the noble Lord (Lord Frederick Cavendish) would give an undertaking to bring in a Bill, as soon as the present chaplain's administrations ceased, to abolish the office,

Mr. H. H. Fowler

he would not press his Motion to a division. As long as these absurd charges for preaching and praying were put in the Votes he should protest against them.

Motion made, and Question put,

The Committee divided — Ayes 28; Noes 90: Majority 67. — (Div. List, No. 357.)

MR. RYLANDS asked the Secretary to the Treasury for some information as to the charge made for a stockbroker. Did the gentleman who acted in this capacity get any commission?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, the stockbroker received the sum mentioned in the Estimates instead of fees. The fees received in his Department amounted to £12,000 odd a-year.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR was at a loss to know how any charge at all was made for a stockbroker. The duty of this gentleman, as he understood it, was to dispose of stock belonging to suitors in Chancery. If that was so, surely the expense of employing the stockbroker should be paid out of the costs of the cases.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, the suitors were charged fees which were paid into the Exchequer, and the stockbroker who did the work received a salary.

MR. HEALY wished to have some explanation of the item of £330 for the bag-bearer. It seemed to him that the sum was more than enough for a stout colporteur, to say nothing of a mere bag-bearer. There was a sum of £1,820 for bag-bearers, some being called "petty bag-bearers." What were these offices?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, they were very ancient offices. The old names that they still retained did not at all describe the duties of those who held the appointments. The bag-bearers were really clerks.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(21.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. GREGORY said, he was not going to oppose the Vote; but there was a matter in connection with it on which he wished to make an observation—namely, the matter of expenses of Judges on Circuit. A certain allowance, he believed, was made to Judges of Appeal for expenses; but there was no allowance to the ordinary Judges on account of Circuit expenses. It seemed to him to be a hard and shabby thing to require the Judges on all occasions to pay their own expenses out of the salaries they received. The Judges' salaries were assessed 50 years ago, when money bore a very different value to that which attached to it now, and expenses were much less than at present. The system adopted long ago of making a reduction of £500 per annum in the Judges' salaries on account of Circuit expenses continued up to the present day. The result was that the Judges' salaries, instead of being £5,000 a-year, only amounted to £4,500. They could not expect to get good men to fulfil the functions of Judges in the Courts of First Instance now-a-days unless they paid them adequate salaries. The present system was unworthy of the country; and, in many instances, the best men for the Bench were prevented from accepting a seat upon it in consequence. He did not advocate extravagance in the administration of justice. He had never advocated it; he had always endeavoured to check it; but, in the interests of justice generally, and in the interests of the suitors, it was necessary that there should be strong Judges on the Bench. It could not be expected, however, that they would be obtained as long as they were subjected to this petty deduction. He sincerely hoped that this matter would receive some attention.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, there was an item for Registry of Deeds and Bills for Middlesex, for two Registrars, and Lord Truro, and the Queen's Remembrancer. An hon. and learned Member opposite some time ago had moved for a Return on this subject; and he (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) had almost expected the hon. and learned Gentleman to say something about it this evening. The Return, which was granted, was a very interesting one. It was for the year 1878-9, and it showed the fees received by the Registrars, the expenses of the office, and the net amount paid to the account of the Queen's Remembrancer. Moreover, it gave the names of the Registrars and the number of days each of them attended at the Registry. It was shown that the fees amounted to some £14,000, £15,000, or £16,000 a-year, and the expenses amounted to £4,000, or £5,000, or £6,000 a-year. There was a balance from year to year of about £10,000. Well, half of this—or £5,000—was paid, as the share of the Queen's Remembrancer, into the public account at Messrs. Hoare's and Co's. Bank; but all the rest went to Lord Truro—namely, £5,000 a-year. When they turned to that part of the Return which showed what it was that Lord Truro did for his £5,000 a-year—when they came to inquire the number of days on which the Registrars attended the Registry—they found that that portion of the inquiry of the hon. and learned Member was dishonoured. There was no answer given to the inquiry. The only thing they gathered was that Lord Truro superintended the office and staff, and attended "whenever his Lordship's services were required." No doubt, his Lordship would come down to the office to sign the Return, and that would be one of the few things he would have to do in the year. The Queen's Remembrancer never attended at all; but then he did not receive any emolument. Lord Truro received his £5,000 a-year for doing nothing. It certainly appeared to him (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) that instead of only half the whole of the £10,000 ought to be paid into Messrs. Hoare's and Co's. bank to the public account, or, at any rate, such portion of it as would leave Lord Truro a fair amount for the trouble and inconvenience he was put to in having occasionally to attend the Registry to sign such a Return as that he (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) had referred to. He would move that the Vote be reduced by £4,500, which would leave Lord Truro £500 a-year for his work. That would be handsome remuneration.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. COURTNEY said, the hon. Member was under a strong misapprehension on this matter. He (Mr. Arthur O’Connor) proposed to reduce the Vote by a sum which was not an expenditure, but a receipt. It was much to be regretted that the hon. Member was not present when the matter came under discussion early in the Session. The hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) had brought in a Bill to re-constitute the Office, and that was opposed by the Government for the reason that it was not intended to fill up the appointments again as vacancies occurred. There would be no successor to Lord Truro.

MR. ARTHUR O’CONNOR thought it rather a pity that the time of the Committee should be wasted by the hon. Member (Mr. Courtney), who evidently failed to apprehend what he (Mr. Arthur O’Connor) meant. He was as well aware as the hon. Member that the £10,000 was a receipt; but what he complained of was that half of it should be given to Lord Truro for nothing. The Queen’s Remembrancer did nothing, and received nothing for it; but Lord Truro did nothing, or next to nothing, and was paid £5,000 a-year for it. It was incumbent on the Committee to refuse to allow Lord Truro to be paid this £5,000 a-year, and it was perfectly competent for them to insist upon its being paid into the Public Exchequer. [“No, no!”] Hon. Members might say “No!” but he, evidently, had a clearer idea of the power of Parliament than they had. The House of Commons would have no difficulty in withholding this money from Lord Truro. He contended that if he moved to reduce the Vote by £4,500, and if Lord Truro was obliged to pay into the Exchequer the amount of the extra receipts, there would be the same sum available.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, he thought that the answer of the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) did not meet the question raised by the hon. Member for Queen’s County, which was perfectly clear.

MR. HOPWOOD pointed out that Lord Truro’s interest was guarded by Act of Parliament, and that the Treasury were, in consequence, powerless in the matter. Certain fees were leviable from the owners of property, upon whom the onus of registering a memorial was imposed. There had been originally three Registrars; but endeavours had been made to effect economy in this respect, and when the offices became vacant one had been discontinued, and one of the Masters of the Courts had been appointed to another as trustee to receive the fees on behalf of the Treasury.

MR. ARTHUR O’CONNOR said, his contention was that Lord Truro had not a right to the £5,000 he was receiving, but only to the share of the fees which he was entitled to when there were four Registrars.

MR. HEALY said, he protested against the charge for Judges’ Train Bearers on the ground of economy.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(22.) £57,124, to complete the sum for Probate, &c. Registries of the High Court of Justice.

(23.) £6,797, to complete the sum for the Admiralty Registry of the High Court of Justice.

(24.) £8,118, to complete the sum for the Wreck Commission.

MR. HEALY said, he thought that the number of folios paid for to the shorthand writers in this Department ought to be stated.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, it was impossible to ascertain the amount of work until the end of the year.

Vote agreed to.

(25.) £19,424, to complete the sum for the London Bankruptcy Court.

MR. ARTHUR O’CONNOR pointed out that whereas the amount of arrears in this Court were steadily increasing, there had been a decrease in the last three years of the number of hours of sitting by the Chief Judge and the Registrars. As this was hardly the way to get rid of arrears of work, he should be glad to receive an explanation on the subject before the money was voted.

Mr. Arthur O’Connor

MR. HINDE PALMER said, that as he had moved for the Return on which the hon. Member rested his statement, he would point out that the total represented the number of days on which the Registrar sat as representing the Chief Judge. It would be misleading to say that it represented the total number of days on which the Court was engaged.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he did not wish to draw any conclusion from the Return that was not warranted; but he dwelt most strongly on the fact that there had been a steady diminution in the number of days on which the Registrars sat, concurrently with an increase of arrears of work.

Vote agreed to.

(26.) £382,936, to complete the sum for the County Courts.

(27.) £2,442, to complete the sum for the Land Registry.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he was glad to see his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General in his place, because he had something to say with regard to this Vote. The Land Registry, he believed, was established in 1864, and was brought into existence for the purpose of carrying out the views of Lord Cairns and Lord Westbury with regard to the registration of titles. Since then a Committee had sat to inquire into the working of the office. Year by year promises had been made that something should be done to make the Court of use; and he remembered that when the present occupants of the Treasury Bench were in Opposition they made a strong onslaught upon this Vote. If he was not mistaken, the Home Secretary was a very strenuous opponent of the Vote, as he stated distinctly that nothing was done either by the Registrar or the Assistant Registrar. Both of these gentlemen were able and excellent men, and promises had been made that some work should be found for them to do; and he would, therefore, ask whether any arrangement had been made in that direction, and what steps had been taken, if any, to make the Land Registry an efficient Court for the transaction of business?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he agreed with the hon. and gallant Baronet in the observations which he had made. There was no doubt that one of two things ought to be done—either the office should be abolished or rendered effective. He admitted that the state of the office was not satisfactory, while it constituted a charge upon the Revenue which the amount of good done by it did not justify. But the Committee should bear in mind that upon the question of whether it was expedient to abolish this office hon. Members were not agreed. On the contrary, there were some who thought that an extension of the system was desirable. Under the circumstances, he did not think that the Government could deal with the matter until their minds had been made up as to whether the office should be abolished or continued, because hardly anything could be worse than to find, after abolishing it, that a new office must be created, and that the services of those persons who were the most effective instruments in administering it were no longer available. The present Registrar was a gentleman of great professional eminence, and who had resigned a lucrative practice in the Courts to take this office at a considerably less income than he formerly received. And he regretted nothing more than that he should be in the unsatisfactory position of occupying the post without being able to do more service to the public. It had been announced, last year, that the Government intended to deal with this matter without delay; but he thought the Committee would see that there had been exceptional circumstances, during the present Session, which prevented them carrying out their good intentions. The Government, however, were still anxious to see the matter placed upon a satisfactory footing. It would not be lost sight of, and he could assure the Committee that it would be dealt with at the earliest possible moment.

MR. RYLANDS said, he supposed the Committee would be obliged to accept the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman; but it was a twice-told tale. He had heard it when he sat opposite, and he had heard it again since he sat on that side of the House. Whenever the Vote was criticized, some occupant of the Treasury Bench gave promises, explanations, and justifications; but, notwithstanding these, the money continued to be charged on the public purse. For nearly 20 years the country had been paying for the office, and had expended upon it in that time something like £100,000, getting, in return, scarcely any advantage. He observed that the amount of fees paid during the year ending on the 31st December, 1880, was £818 15s.; and it was, therefore, clear that the officers, who received large salaries, had little or nothing to do. But he wished to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that the Chief Clerk of the office, who received £400 a-year for doing nothing, was allowed by the Attorney General to take another appointment in the Land Securities Company (Limited), from which Society he received £100 per annum. It seemed to him that this was not the kind of arrangement by which the office of the Land Registry could be made serviceable, and that it ought no longer to be allowed. For his own part, he should be content to see the whole thing swept away, in order that a start might be made de novo; and in view of the large amount that would have been saved in salaries it was to be regretted that this had not been done before. He was glad to receive the assurance of the Solicitor General that no new appointments were made, and trusted that next year the whole case would be dealt with in a more satisfactory manner than it had been hitherto.

Vote agreed to.

(28.) £18,690, to complete the sum for Revising Barristers, England.

(29.) £8,021, Police Courts, London and Sheerness.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he wished to know whether the Government had not had many urgent representations made to them as to the inconvenience experienced by the public, owing to the fact that the Police Court at Hammersmith closed at 2 o'clock in the afternoon?

MR. COURTNEY was understood to say that there were certain suburban courts, where the business was light, which only sat during what were called half-court days, and that Hammersmith was one of them.

Vote agreed to.

(30.) £250,402, to complete the sum for Metropolitan Police.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he had seen, from the Local Taxation Returns which had recently been issued to Members, that the town of Southampton had an allowance from Her Majesty's Treasury of £4,841 for police alone. But during the same period the cost of the police in Southampton was only £4,425; so that the allowance obtained from the Treasury towards the pay and clothing of the police of Southampton was actually more than the total cost of the police of the town. It struck him that there was something anomalous about this; but, possibly, the noble Lord the Financial Secretary to the Treasury would be able to explain it.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, the statement made by the hon. Gentleman had given him considerable surprise; but he would look into the matter. The allowance made from the Treasury for the county and borough police was founded upon the principle of giving one-half of the pay and allowances, not including other portions of the expenditure for the police. He could not understand the matter mentioned by the hon. Gentleman at present, but he would look into it.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he did not at all wonder at the noble Lord's being surprised, and the document he referred to was the Local Taxation Returns for the year 1878-9, pages 58 and 59, where the facts would be found fully set forth.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH could only assure the hon. Gentleman that if there had been any over-payment last year it should be rectified next Session.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, there was another point which he should like to mention, and which the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had made peculiarly his own—he referred to the superannuation allowances for police. He recollected that the right hon. and learned Gentleman attended a meeting of the police a short time ago, and addressed them; and he thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman gave them to understand in the course of that address that some arrangements had been made which would prove satisfactory with regard to superannuations. Whether those arrangements were to be confined to the Metropolitan Police, or whether they were to be extended to the police throughout the country, he was not very certain; but, unquestionably, the matter was one which excited a very great amount of interest in the Police Force, and a very large amount of sympathy throughout the great body of the people. Perhaps the right hon. and learned Gentleman would now say something on this point. He (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) had also noticed that this Vote was for the police of the counties and boroughs, not only of England, but of Scotland; and, that being so, this, perhaps, was the proper occasion for bringing under the notice of the House the very serious representations which were made in the 23rd Report of the Inspector of Constabulary for Scotland, with regard to the utter inefficiency of a large portion of the Police Force in that country. In the very first page the right hon. and learned Gentleman would find observations condemning the inefficiency of the police in the burghs of Wick and Banff, and other places. Then, with regard to another question of importance, the pay of the Superintendents of police in Scotland, the Inspector of Constabulary pointed out that while most of the counties and burghs, with some exceptions, paid the men liberally, the salary of the head officer was smaller than it ought to be, considering the onerous duties of his position; and in some places—more often in counties than in burghs—many additional duties had been placed upon the shoulders of the head of the police without any extra remuneration whatever. For instance, the Chief Constable in many counties had been made to undertake the duties of Procurator Fiscal to the Justices, and to perform those duties without salary, the county thus saving considerable expense; and in order to get men willing to perform double duty, the Government grant practically paid half the difference. The local people thus managed to get their local work done at the expense of the Police Vote. There was still another question which was worthy of the attention of the Government, and that was the custom which prevailed in many of the counties, and in some of the burghs of Scotland—a custom which, as the Inspector said, was of a very questionable character—of liberating persons taken up for being drunk and incapable, or drunk and disorderly, when sober. Such persons in the districts he referred to were never taken before a magistrate, but were liberated without bail on the sole responsibility of the constable, and were not called upon to appear anywhere to answer the charge. The Inspector added in his Report that the question whether this practice was legal or not could only be answered by legal authority, though many looked upon it as illegal, and would allow no liberation except on bail, or by going before a magistrate. It would surely be better to legalize some plan whereby the obligation to appear before a magistrate might be suspended, with some provision to enable a prisoner to bring his case before a magistrate should he think himself aggrieved. This was a matter that well deserved the attention of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. The last point to which he desired to refer was that the Police Force in Scotland had to go to great trouble and expense in circulating information which it was necessary to have circulated, but which could not be circulated as in this country, for the simple reason that in Scotland there was no Police Gazette. The advantage of the circulation of this information was to the public very great indeed, and it was unfair that the cost of it should fall upon the police.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Some of the points which the hon. Gentleman has referred to ought to fall to my share to reply to. In regard to the question of the superannuation of police, I am entirely conscious of its great and urgent importance; and the statement which I made some weeks ago in addressing the Metropolitan Police would not have been made unless the Government at that time had actually had a Bill prepared upon the subject, which Bill would have been presented to Parliament if the time and season of the Session had permitted. This, I hope, will satisfy the hon. Member that the subject is one which we have not neglected. I do not think it would be advisable now to enter into all the details of that measure, for it is clear that we cannot deal with it this Session; but we shall occupy a part of the Recess in endeavouring to collect the opinion of those persons who are best able to assist us by their advice as to the provisions of the Bill. I will only, therefore, state that the measure embraces, not only the Metropolitan Police, but all the police throughout the country; and I may say that it is generally founded upon the lines of the Select Committee which sat for the purpose of dealing with this subject. Another matter which the hon. Member has referred to has been that in some cases the inefficiency of the local police has been complained of. Now, I wish to state to the Committee my view of the relations in which the Central Government and the Home Office stand to this question. As the hon. Member is aware, the general government of the local police belongs to the local authorities, and I think it is very desirable that that principle should be strictly maintained, and that we should not attempt by centralization to take away the power of the local authorities over their own police. The borough police is even more completely under the authority of their own watch committee than is the county police. The Home Office has more power to interfere with the pay and regulation of the county police than it has under the Municipal Corporations Act to interfere with the borough police, which is really and entirely under the control of the watch committee; and I have found this difficulty arises—that constant complaint is made of any interference on the part of the Government with their police. But, as the Government contribute one-half of the expense, they must have some power of seeing that they get an equivalent for the money spent. But, subject to this principle, I am extremely averse to taking out of the hands of the local authorities their right to deal with their own police. I will not mention the name, but there is one of the largest counties in England concerning which the Inspector made a strong Report as to the inefficiency of the police, and their objection to any alteration. The authorities came before me, and I said—"Well, gentlemen, if you think your police are fit to protect the lives and property of the people in your own county, it is your affair, and I leave you to settle it as you like; but I call your attention to the fact that the Inspector reports your police as inefficient." I think they were satisfied with that answer, and a few weeks afterwards I received a Report that they had increased the strength of their force. I think it much better to deal with these cases in this way than to endeavour to bring them all under a central authority; and I think that if we are to expect local self-government we must be careful, and not assume too much control over what particular counties may consider necessary in regard to pay, &c. The hon. Gentleman has referred to the police in Scotland. Now, I must say that one of the pleasures which I have always found in Scotland is the gratifying absence of police. You never see one in Scotland. At one of the islands of the Outer Hebrides where I have visited—an island of considerable size—I found that the total police force on the island consists of one Inspector and two policemen. The habits there are regular, and everybody gets on extremely well. I do not think there is a doctor in the whole of the island; I believe disease is unknown, and crime is seldom heard of. This shows, then, that we cannot apply a strict rule as a general principle. We cannot do better than trust these local authorities, leaving the communities to look after their own interests, and to maintain what police they require. The other point which the hon. Gentleman has mentioned, as to the release of persons charged with drunkenness without bringing any charge against them, or taking them before a magistrate, is a serious one, which deserves consideration, and I can only say that it shall be carefully considered.

MR. MAGNIAC said, he was glad the right hon. and learned Gentleman had made this statement, and hoped that before long some legislative measure would be introduced, for among the many questions of local interest which were pressing for consideration this was one of the most important. Another point worthy of consideration, as bearing on the finances of the country, was the unnecessary number and duplication of police staffs in the boroughs and counties of the country, and that might be remedied with very considerable advantage. In many small boroughs there were practically two staffs kept up to a point entirely out of proportion to the numbers of the community. It would be of great advantage for the repression of crime and the maintenance of order if those small boroughs could be amalgamated with the counties for police purposes. It would lead to a great saving of expense, and he hoped the point would be considered.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, he wished to remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary that he (Colonel Alexander) had had the first Notice on the Paper to-day for his Resolution in reference to police superannuation, and this was the fourth time that he had procured a favourable position for it upon the Paper this Session. However, in consequence of the great pressure under which the Government had been placed in regard to the taking of Supply, and his unwillingness to interfere with the Government in that work at this late period of the Session, and also on account of the absence, through illness, of his hon. Friend the Member for West Essex (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson), who presided over the Select Committee on Police Superannuation, and who was anxious to take part in any discussion that might be raised upon the subject, he (Colonel Alexander) had postponed his Resolution sine die. He had felt less reluctant to do so, because he had been extremely glad to read the remarks which the Home Secretary had made on a recent occasion in presenting prizes to the members of the Metropolitan Police Force; and now to-night they had obtained from the right hon. and learned Gentleman an undertaking that he would deal not only with the Metropolitan Force, but with all the rest of the police throughout the country. He was not certain whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman meant to include Scotland in his proposed measure; but he might point out that the need there was even greater than it was in England, for in Scotland they had no system of superannuation whatever. As matters stood now, a policeman in Scotland, on attaining the age of 60 years, and then not before being certified as incapable for the discharge of duty, might receive such a sum in gross as, in the circumstances, might to the Commissioners of Supply seem proper. The Select Committee which, in the year 1868, sat in the House of Lords, and was presided over by the Earl of Minto, examined several English witnesses upon the English system, and they reported that it was most desirable to introduce a system of superannuation into Scotland; but that the inquiries they had made of the English witnesses had brought out the fact that the English system was so imperfect that it would be well not to adopt any system at all until a more perfect one had been established in England. It was also shown that in consequence of the total absence of superannuation in Scotland a great number of the police were in the habit of crossing the Border and enlisting in the forces of Cumberland and Westmoreland. The Chief Constable of Westmoreland, who gave evidence before the Select Committee presided over by his hon. Friend the Member for West Essex, stated that he asked the men who came from Dumfriesshire, Wigtonshire, and Ayrshire what was their reason for leaving Scotland in order to join the Westmoreland force, and the answer almost invariably given was because there was no system of superannuation in Scotland. He (Colonel Alexander), therefore, hoped that in the measure which the Home Secretary promised to introduce Scotland would be included.

MR. COURTNEY said, the promised measure would extend to Scotland as well as to England and Wales; and he hoped it would be found to be drawn upon lines which would leave it free from the disfavour which was shown towards the present system of police superannuation.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR wished to refer to a matter in which he took a deep interest some time ago, and which had reference to the conduct of the Glasgow police in regard to the disturbances that took place in that city. He was himself in Glasgow some time after the disturbances took place, and he saw the wives and relatives of some of the persons who were placed in prison. He took the opportunity of investigating the case as far as he could; and no doubt the Lord Advocate, whom he saw upon the Treasury Bench, was familiar with all the facts of the case. Perhaps he ought to preface his remarks by saying that his friend Mr. Fergusson, of Glasgow, acting in accordance with the precedent set by his fellow-members of the Land League, had made up his mind not to have a procession this year, in order that there should be no reason to keep up bitter memories. There would, he believed, be an open air demonstration, but not a procession of the usual nature; for there was no desire whatever to give any excuse for fresh disturbances. However, what he wanted to call attention to was the fact that there was a strong feeling at the time that these processions had not been treated fairly by the police. The procession which led to the disturbance was attacked by a number of Orangemen, for he was sorry to say that Irishmen easily transferred to a neutral country some of the animosities and bitternesses of their own land; and the police in this instance, instead of understanding the nature of the procession, and that the people who took part in it were simply engaged in the exercise of their Constitutional rights, attacked the processionists, and a disturbance took place. But, whatever the cause of the disturbance, some of the processionists were taken before the magistrates, and, in some cases, were sentenced to six months' imprisonment. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) saw the wife of one of these unfortunate men, and he believed she was in rather a bad way, and would have suffered severely, had it not been for the assistance that was rendered to her. He believed that the impression produced on the minds of the Irishmen was that the fact of their nationality and the fact of their creed exercised some influence against them. He made no charge against anyone; but they certainly did believe that these considerations exercised some influence over the treatment which these men received. The Lord Advocate and the Home Secretary knew as well as he did that between the religious sentiments of the Irish people and the general religious sentiment of the Scotch people there was a strong feeling of antagonism; and it would be most lamentable if the Bench gave any instructions whatever which would tend to spread a feeling of bigotry and intolerance between different classes of the community. He trusted that in future no suspicion of anything of the sort would be allowed to arise.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

MR. BUXTON pointed out that there was an increase this year in the expenditure for the police; and he wished to know how that increase compared with the increases which exhibited a gradual growth in previous years?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply to the observations of the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) concerning the Glasgow disturbances, said, that in November last he took a great deal of pains to investigate the facts of the case, and had Reports from the magistrates, from the Procurator Fiscal, and from all the persons who were thought likely to be able to throw any light upon the matter. No doubt, it was very unfortunate when two rival creeds, differing in political as well as in religious opinion, came into conflict in this way, and in this case there was a great deal of disorder. The ringleaders and some others were taken up for assaulting the police, and he knew the charge had been made that the magistrates had acted with partiality, and that they were more severe upon the Catholics than they were upon the Protestants. He could only say that he would do all that lay in his power to prevent the exhibition of any partiality on the part of the police, or of anyone else; and he was bound to say that, after a careful investigation of the whole of the facts, he could not find any evidence of partiality established in the present case. In reply to the question put by another hon. Member, as to the increase in the expenditure for police, he might point out that that increase was very nearly in the proportion of 2 per cent, and rested upon the increase in the numbers of police due to the natural growth of population.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he did not intend to raise any question upon any of the items of this Vote; but he wished make an appeal to the Government. This Vote raised a question upon which the Irish Members felt very strongly, and that was the treatment of political prisoners, especially his friend, Mr. Michael Davitt. Upon this question he had the support, not only of his Irish Friends, but of one or two English Representatives; and it had been represented to him that the best course would be to appeal to the Home Secretary. As it was now midnight, he wished to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman to consent to postpone this Vote, and that would involve no waste of time, because there were other Votes which might be easily disposed of.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that he was always ready to meet any proposals which facilitated the transaction of Business, and if the proposal of the hon. Member would have that effect, he should be very glad to fall in with it; but he did not exactly understand what it was the hon. Member proposed to postpone.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Vote 24.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT expressed his willingness to accede to the suggestion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(32.) £298,759, to complete the sum for Prisons, England.

MR. RYLANDS reminded the Committee that the Home Secretary's Predecessor had induced the House to support the Prisons Bill, and that, in consequence, the management of the prisons was transferred from the local authorities to the State, with the expectation that there would be a great improvement in the administration and great economy in the expenses of the prisons. He himself had grave doubts at the time as to the wisdom of the course, and did what he could to oppose it; but, in consequence of the representations made by the late Home Secretary, which were, no doubt, made in good faith, the House was induced to assent to the measure, and the prisons were handed over to the central authorities. Amongst other arguments raised by the late Home Secretary was the expectation that, under good management, prison labour would produce £60,000 a-year. But in the Estimate now before the Committee there was no Return for prison labour, and experience had proved that the late Home Secretary was entirely misled in his anticipations on this point. The Prisons Commissioners, in their Report, stated that the Estimates of the produce of prison labour for 1878-9 and 1879-80 were worthless; and it was, in consequence, thought better not to make any Estimate for 1880-1. He had never anticipated that, under the management of the central authority, any advantage would be gained with respect to prison labour, or that the prisons would be more profitably employed than when under local authority. The average cost, under the old system, of Crown prisoners was £27 per head; but the new Prisons Act having been in operation for two years that average had only been reduced to £23 per head. That average was considerably higher than the average cost of prisons in Lancashire during the last year of local management. The average there was £17 per head. He was satisfied that the experience of the Act had not shown any very great advantage, and he regretted more and more every day that the Act should have been passed interfering with the local administration of prisons; but as the prisons were now under the control of the State, every effort should be made to reduce the cost of the prisons, and he would call attention to these facts with that object.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he had also opposed the Prisons Bill; but as it was now an Act of Parliament, the Committee had now the present state of things to deal with only. He wished at once to thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department for the courtesy and consideration he had shown to the Visiting Justices, and the wish he had expressed to support them in their anxious endeavours to discharge to the best of their ability the important duties that had been intrusted to them. He would not enter into the question of cost, because he thought it was hardly fair when things were in a transition state, to make any comparison; but he had always contended that it would be difficult for the Government to manage the prisons at a less cost than the local authorities. There were two points of a totally different character which he desired to mention, and which were of great importance to the ratepayers. The first was as to the conveyance of prisoners to prisons before trial. A test case, which was decided in favour of the county of Surrey, had been appealed against by the Government. He hoped the decision would not be set aside by the High Court, for this was one of those questions which would help local taxation, and in the interests of all the country it was important that the prisoners should be conveyed at the public expense. He hoped that, whatever might happen, the Home Secretary would take that into consideration, in order that the localities might be relieved of that item of expense. The next question was that of criminal lunatics. The Committee upon that subject had not yet reported; but he hoped that criminal lunatics would in future be confined in State prisons, and not sent to the county asylums. Such persons ought to be maintained by the State, and he hoped the Home Secretary would see his way to effect that.

MR. MAGNIAC said; he must also complain of the hardship of throwing the maintenance of criminal lunatics upon the ratepayers. That practice should be done away with, whatever the Committee might report. With regard to the conveyance of prisoners, the spirit of the Bill which the Committee were considering certainly was that the cost should be borne by the country. These were not contentious matters, and he hoped the Bill would pass through the House as a matter of course; and, at all events, the counties had a right to expect the Government to pay some attention to these matters during the next Session. The expectations held out by the late Home Secretary respecting economy had not been realized; but how far the Act had failed in that respect it was impossible to say, because the gentlemen appointed to examine the accounts of the prisons had given up the task as hopeless owing to the way in which the accounts were kept. No attempt was made to value prison labour on any intelligent principle, and it was most important that this should not be allowed to continue any longer.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: With reference to the cost of the prisons, that is a very difficult and complicated matter. I desired to have as careful a comparison between the former and present state of things as could be got; but the old system was carried on upon such a totally different system of accounts from any we now have in operation that we cannot compare like with like, and I do not think that with the greatest care and trouble it is possible to state exactly what is the difference in cost between the one state of things and the other. I have a table here which gives a general result, and I have the total cost for all the local prisons under the old system. From 1871 to the time when the prisons were given up the cost ranged between £600,000 and £560,000. The Estimate this year gives the total cost as £463,000. Therefore, although I do not by any means pledge myself for the accuracy of these results, still I believe it is not unfair to state that the cost of the prisons as they are now worked is about £100,000 a-year less than it was before the change. Although I confess I am not very hopeful on the subject of prison labour, still there is a great deal to be done to improve the present system by doing away with the small prisons, and so reducing the total staff. Of course, we were obliged to keep the old staff, and in that way I do not think much economy has been gained; and if my hon. and gallant Friend opposite (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) succeeds in throwing upon the State the whole cost for the conveyance of prisoners, I am afraid we shall look more unfavourable in the future than we do now. The Committee will observe that the Estimates for the present year are, to a certain extent, less than those of last year. I am very grateful to the hon. and gallant Member for the way in which he spoke of my efforts respecting the Visiting Justices. It would be too much not to expect at the first a little friction between the new Governors of the prisons and the old machinery; but I hope that has disappeared, and it is extremely agreeable to find that what efforts I may have made have been appreciated. The Reports from the Visiting Committees have been most favourable as to the working of the present system; and I can assure the hon. and gallant Member that anything I can do to still further improve the system shall be done.

MR. CALLAN complained that, whereas numerous details were given as to the salaries of Governors of some of the convict establishments, very slight details were given as to others where the total cost was greater.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT explained that an Appendix had been published giving all those details—No. 176, Parliamentary Papers.

MR. CALLAN said, that when he brought forward the case of Catholic chaplains last year the Home Secretary said the information which he had laid before him was as careful as it was new, and promised that the Government would endeavour to deal with the question in a satisfactory manner. In the absence of any information in the present Estimates upon that subject, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman for some explanation, and whether, if he moved for a Return in continuation of the Return moved for last year, it would be given?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: With regard to this matter, the Government gave a distinct pledge, and, in fulfilment of that pledge, a Departmental Committee was appointed to consider the matter, and that Committee reported on the 24th January this year. They gave a detailed statement with regard to Catholic chaplains, and only lately I saw a gentleman who is interested in the subject, and he assured me that he had been in communication with the Catholic bodies, and found that they were perfectly satisfied with what had been done in the direction of placing the salaries of the Catholic chaplains on a proper footing.

Vote agreed to.

(33.) £132,626, to complete the sum for Reformatory and Industrial Schools, Great Britain.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, the manner in which the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had received all the suggestions made to him that evening encouraged him (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) to remind him that early this Session he addressed a question to him as to reformatories, and the treatment of the children in those institutions. He had obtained from the right hon. and learned Gentleman an intimation that it was the intention of the Government to consider whether it would not be possible to do away with compulsory preliminary imprisonment of the children who were sent to reformatory schools. He (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) might be mistaken as to the terms of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's reply, but it was something very like that. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman could see his way to abolishing the compulsory imprisonment of children to be sent to reformatory schools, it would be a great benefit to the community. Children were sent to these schools much too young; and in his last Report one of the Inspectors complained that he had found a hardened criminal of the age of 8, who had been sent to prison for no other crime than having been in the company of his two elder brothers when they committed an offence.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I need hardly tell the hon. Gentleman that this is a subject which occupies my mind a great deal. I suppose we have all of us—all the Members of the Government—in our Departments had a great many disappointments this Session, and have seen the failure of measures we were anxious to pass. No one has felt disappointment more keenly than I have in not having been able to introduce a measure dealing with juvenile offenders. At the same time, I am very glad to think that, public attention having been called to the difficulties of this case, the evil has been diminished to a very great extent. It has not altogether removed it. I have had inquiries made into particular cases that were complained of, and I must say the result has been to lead me to think that the imprisonment ought not to be compulsory or preliminary to sending a child to a reformatory. There is some difference of opinion upon this subject; but I think there is a preponderance of opinion amongst those who are most experienced on these subjects against the compulsory imprisonment. The much larger subject of the footing of industrial and reformatory schools should be, or is, a very serious financial question. The proposals made would entail a heavy charge upon the public funds. We ought not merely to attempt to put the law on a better footing, but to consider and revise the whole system of industrial and reformatory schools.

MR. MAGNIAC said, he should like to remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman of the desirability of some charge being imposed on parents for the maintenance of their children in these reformatory and industrial schools. The present system was a premium upon vice—it was a premium to parents to induce their children to commit crimes in order that they might be sent to industrial institutions free of charge. He

(Mr. Magniac) thought this question was well worthy of the consideration of the Government.

Vote agreed to.

(34.) £18,019, to complete the sum for Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum.

MR. ONSLOW said, he should like to know whether, when criminal lunatics came from India and other places, as he happened to know they did sometimes, they were charged for in this Vote, or whether India contributed towards the expenses of their maintenance? He thought he was right in saying that wherever the criminal lunatics that were sent to Broadmoor Asylum came from they were charged to the revenues of this country.

MR. MAGNIAC said, there was a general feeling that Broadmoor Asylum was a most expensive establishment, and also that the discipline was singularly loose. A case occurred quite lately which was an indication of the unsatisfactory manner in which the establishment was carried on. Two persons whilst engaged in play nearly succeeded in making their escape. The whole of the establishment required reorganization. Its cost was enormous, the results were very unsatisfactory, and certainly the management of the establishment should be carefully considered by the Department over which the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt) presided.

MR. RYLANDS trusted that the Home Secretary would find time, in the midst of the various heavy duties that devolved upon him, to give some attention to this criminal lunatic asylum at Broadmoor. He (Mr. Rylands) had called attention to the enormous cost of the institution in 1877; and every year since, unless he was mistaken, he had had an opportunity of drawing the attention of the Government to the matter. He was glad to see that since 1876 there had been a little diminution in the charge per patient; but the average cost of the inmates in the present year was still excessive in comparison with various other institutions of the kind. The average cost during the present year, for each patient, would be £52. He found that in the Perth Asylum the average cost was £31, and at the Dundrum Asylum, £34. In the ordinary lunatic asylums throughout the country the average cost of the inmates per head was from £26 to £28. A convict prisoner cost on an average £33 per head; they, therefore, saw that the cost at Broadmoor was enormously above that at any other institution in the country. He trusted the Home Office would be able to bring their influence to bear upon the establishment to check the extravagant expenditure, and that in another year they would see a substantial reduction of this Vote. It ought to be reduced by several thousands of pounds.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT said, he did not wish to stand up for the management of the Broadmoor Asylum; but he was sorry the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) was not in his place, because he had always offered a strong defence of this institution. The hon. Member had always pointed out that in this asylum there were many dangerous criminal lunatics who required a great deal more attention than other insane people. He had pointed out that the managers of the institution had endeavoured to cut down the expenses as much as possible. One day he was asking the hon. Member whether the expenditure at the asylum could not be cut down to a still greater extent; and the reply was that it would be impossible, and that he (Mr. Walter), as a Visitor, would be unable to continue in the office any longer if it were cut down, as he would not answer for the consequences. It certainly would appear that the expenses were excessively high, but the reason which was always given for it was that these criminals were of the most dangerous character; and, therefore, it was necessary that more money should be spent for their safe custody.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I think it will be satisfactory to my hon. and gallant Friend, and to the Committee generally, to know that some progress is being made with the reforms at Broadmoor Asylum. According to some statistical information I have here, it appears that the expenditure in 1870 upon the criminal lunatics was £60 18s. per head; in 1875 it was £59 13s.; and in the year ended March 31, 1881, it was only £47 4s. per head. The expenditure has been brought down from £60 to £47, which is a very remarkable reduction. Whether or not it is possible to deal with 500 criminal lunatics at a less cost than £47 per head is a thing I am not prepared at present to go into. It is plain that we must have an expensive staff of doctors and warders and persons of that description; and I should be inclined to think that if you can keep your expenditure to less than £1 per week per head you are doing an extraordinary thing. With regard to criminal lunatics sent from India, the Indian authorities do contribute towards their maintenance.

MR. RYLANDS said, although, no doubt, the criminal lunatics at Broadmoor were dangerous, so also were the criminal lunatics in the Perth and Dundrum Asylums, and yet they did not cost anything like the same amount of money. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman would look at the number of attendants in the Broadmoor Asylum, he would find that there was one for every four lunatics. Not only was it a numerous, but it was a most expensive staff—more so than the staff of any other asylum.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, there was one item in this Vote which was not found in the corresponding Vote for Ireland—that was not found in the Vote the hon. Gentleman opposite had just mentioned, for the Dundrum Asylum. On page 223 they would find, under sub-heads N and O “New Buildings and Alterations, £667,” and “Alterations and Repairs to Buildings, Roads, &c. £1,800.” From that it would be seen that the authorities at Broadmoor Lunatic Asylum were receiving between £2,000 and £3,000 a-year for buildings and repairs. Surely that seemed a very large sum; and, doubtless, during a long course of years Broadmoor had received a great deal more money than it could possibly have spent upon reasonable buildings and repairs, whereas Dundrum had all along been begging at the doors of the Treasury for some miserable pittance to carry out the necessary works for the benefit of the inmates—to get a dining-room where the patients could sit comfortably, for instance. Would the noble Lord explain how that exceptional item had been placed on the Establishment Vote?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, it had been thought advisable to gather together all matters connected with this subject under one head.

Vote agreed to.

VOL. COLXIV. [THIRD SERIES.]

(35.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. BIGGAR said, that, with regard to this Vote, he wished to move to reduce the salary of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate of Scotland. The matter he wished to refer to arose out of a case about which some conversation had taken place a short time ago upon another Vote, and he would briefly state the facts on which he founded his Motion. It seemed that in August last year a procession of Irish Nationalists took place in Glasgow. The Irish Members had always contended that processions, whether of Orangemen or non-Orangemen, if the processions were peaceful, and did not annoy the residents of the localities, were legal; and they had always held that it was the duty of the civil authorities to protect such processions. On the occasion in question, a large procession went from Glasgow to some other district, and returned back to Glasgow. It became evident during the day that a large mob was collecting at a certain place for the purpose of making an attack upon the procession; but no effort was made, as far as he could gather, on the part of the police, to scatter that assemblage. The anticipated attack took place, and the result was a general fight. After the fight had commenced, the police seemed to have acted with pretty general impartiality, because they arrested members of both parties. In giving their evidence before the magistrates, the police also seemed to have acted with fairness, because they proved they had taken all these parties, red-handed, in the fight. The stipendiary magistrate happened to be absent from Glasgow at the time, and the case came before a Scotch bailie, named M'Onie, whose position in life he (Mr. Biggar) was not acquainted with. This Bailie M'Onie fined all the processionists very heavily; but allowed those who had attacked the procession to go free, though the case was proved principally on the evidence of the police who had taken all the prisoners into custody, red-handed. The prisoners, on both sides, attempted to show that they were entirely innocent, and it might be very reasonably supposed that there was not very much difference in the credibility of the witnesses in favour of the processionists, and those in favour of the parties who attacked the procession, and Bailie M'Onie gave the benefit of the doubt to some of the defendants. It was singular that he gave the benefit of the doubt to all the non-Catholic defendants, and punished heavily all the Catholic defendants. An appeal was made to the Lord Advocate to have the sentences remitted if possible; but it did not appear clear whether or not the Lord Advocate had recommended to the Home Secretary the remission of the imprisonment to which the prisoners were sentenced. The magistrate had acted in such a shamefully partial manner that he (Mr. Biggar) should have thought that the Home Secretary would have at once remitted the penalties if the facts had been brought before him. There was something very special in the case of one of the prisoners. His case was different to all the rest in this way—he had come to the police court to give evidence in favour of some of the prisoners, and whilst he was there someone said — “Oh! he was in the riot himself, and we will take him too.” That man was taken up, although there was no clear evidence that he was connected with the riot. Everyone who had seen a riot knew that everything was in confusion, and that it was a very different thing to keep an eye upon a person, and fix him in the mind as having been one of the rioters, and to take a person red-handed on the spot. It was afterwards proved that the prisoner could not have been guilty of that which was attributed to him, because another man distinctly stated that he was the person who had committed the act which the other was accused of. So that in this case there was a clear miscarriage of justice. On all these grounds, he thought that some censure should be passed on the Lord Advocate, for not having given the benefit of the doubt to the Catholic defendants, when Bailie M'Onie had distinctly given the benefit of the doubt to the non-Catholics. He would move that half the Lord Advocate's salary be taken off.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

(Mr. Biggar.)

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. M'LAREN) said, this had been considered a reasonable subject for inquiry; and it had been already explained by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary that action had been taken by the Home Office, with his (the Lord Advocate's) assistance, for the purpose of investigating the matter. The prisoners were not prosecuted by the Procurator Fiscal, who was under his Department, but by the burgh magistrates of Glasgow. No record was kept of the proceedings in such cases; but he had obtained a Report on the subject from the legal gentleman who examined the witnesses, and the result of his perusal of that Report was to satisfy him that there was no partiality. A second appeal was made to the Home Secretary, and a further inquiry instituted, and in regard to the case of the man who set up an alibi, a very full and careful examination of the witnesses was instituted. The Report was submitted to his right hon. and learned Friend, and the subject received from him the most careful consideration.

MR. ANDERSON said, that, as far as he could make out, the charge against the Lord Advocate was that he had failed to find out that Bailie M'Onie had acted in an extremely partial manner. He (Mr. Anderson) happened to know Mr. Bailie M'Onie very well, and he knew him to be a man of high position in Glasgow, and a man of the highest character, utterly incapable of acting in the manner the hon. Member for Cavan had described. He (Mr. Anderson) felt bound to stand up for Bailie M'Onie and defend him when he was attacked in this way. As a magistrate he might have made a mistake, and not have judged the matter so well as the stipendiary would have done; but there could be no doubt that Bailie M'Onie was quite incapable of acting in the partial manner which had been attributed to him by the hon. Member. He (Mr. Anderson) did not suppose the hon. Member for Cavan seriously meant to take a division on this Vote; therefore, he did not think it was necessary to say anything further.

MR. BIGGAR said, he did not happen to know Bailie M'Onie personally, and he was not even aware of his profession or position in life, nor anything at all about him; but he did know what he had read. He had read a report of the evidence in a Glasgow newspaper, and he must say that this person had acted either in the most stupid or in the most dishonest way imaginable. He had acted in perfect contradiction to the evidence in one set of cases. Having taken the evidence of the police, he let one set go scot free, while on similar statements he sent another set to prison. If the Lord Advocate had recommended the Home Office not to allow any commutation of the sentence, he should ask the Committee to divide upon his Motion; but, on the other hand, if the Lord Advocate had recommended a commutation of the sentence, and the Home Secretary had not acted on that advice, it was clear that the Home Secretary's salary ought to be reduced, and not the Lord Advocate's.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The hon. Member is quite right; it is my salary that ought to be reduced. The responsibility in this matter is entirely mine. The Lord Advocate was good enough to give me his advice, and thereby threw all the responsibility upon my shoulders; consequently, if any wrong has been done it has been done by me, and if anyone is to blame it is myself and not the Lord Advocate. All that I can say is that I thoroughly investigated the case, and came to the conclusion that there had been no partiality whatever exhibited by the magistrate. Mr. Ferguson, as has been already stated this evening, said most distinctly, in his second application, he would withdraw the charge of partiality. The question was whether or not the sentences ought to be interfered with, and upon a full view of the case I came to the conclusion that there ought to be no interference.

MR. BIGGAR said, the Lord Advocate had stated that he would not entertain the idea of bringing about a remission of the sentence unless the charge of partiality which had been brought against Bailie M'Onie was withdrawn. The withdrawal was made, but it was couched in such ambiguous terms that it was doubtful whether it was a withdrawal or not. He (Mr. Biggar) having read the evidence, really did believe that the conduct of Bailie M'Onie was thoroughly partial and thoroughly dishonest; but, seeing that no practical good could result from coming to a division on the question of reducing the Lord Advocate's salary, he begged leave to withdraw the proposal.

MR. ANDERSON said, the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) had an extraordinary method of defending his friends, because he said Mr. Ferguson made an ambiguous withdrawal for the purpose of gaining certain ends of his own, not because he thought it was just and right to do so.

MR. PARNELL said, the case looked very suspicious against the police, if not against the magistrate. There appeared to be every ground for the impression, which had spread very widely amongst the Irish people of Glasgow, that the Irishmen who formed the procession were treated with great harshness, and that the persons who attacked the processionists were defended by the police in an improper manner. The procession was arranged by the Irish people of Glasgow, and it was walking peacefully through the streets of the town when it was attacked. No fewer than 25 of the processionists were arrested and punished severely, whilst only five of those who attacked the procession were arrested, and they were all let off. They were all aware it was the duty of the police to interfere with processions that were prohibited by law; but he was not aware that this procession had been an illegal one. It had always been the practice to arrange beforehand with the police as to the route the procession should take; and that course, he believed, was adopted on this occasion. It certainly seemed to him very unfair that those who commenced the affray should be allowed to get off scot free; whereas 25 of the people who were set upon, and defended themselves whilst executing their rights as citizens, were sentenced to lengthy periods of imprisonment.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that if he were inclined to move the reduction of the salary of the Lord Advocate—which, indeed, he was not inclined to do—he should do it on very different grounds to those advanced by the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr.

Biggar). He should do it on the ground which had been declared by a Gentleman who was very popular in Scotland, the late Member for Edinburgh, Mr. M'Laren. That Gentleman declared that all the evils that existed in Scotland came from the fact that the country was ruled by a Lord Advocate; and he had expressed the hope that at some time or other they might have a Home Secretary for Scotland. These words were spoken in this House only two years ago; and, no doubt, the statement was one with which the right hon. and learned Member (the Lord Advocate) would not agree. He (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) thought his hon. Friend (Mr. Biggar) had done wisely in withdrawing his Motion, because the Lord Advocate was to be acquitted from all blame, though he (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) shared the feeling of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), that justice was not altogether done in this particular case to his fellow-countrymen in Glasgow. In page 235 there was an item for four clerks to Advocates Depute, the salaries being £80, and the total £320. He (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) did not believe these four clerks existed. There were not four clerks; there were four clerkships, but they were at present held by two persons, who divided the spoil between them. Whether all four appointments were held by one person or not at present he was not able to say; and he was obliged to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman how it was that these four clerkships were kept up, and whether there was not room here for the exercise of a little economy? Then, again, on another page there was the item for four Principal Clerks of Session, at £1,000 a-year each; but the amount only came to £2,000. There seemed to be a miscalculation of £2,000, and perhaps the right hon. and learned Gentleman would explain it.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. M'LAREN) said, that the salaries last referred to came under another Vote. As to the four clerks, he could assure the hon. Member, whatever might have been the custom in past times, that Vote represented the salaries of four separate and distinct clerks. There were four Advocates Depute, and it was necessary that each should have a clerk in order to prepare indictments. As an illustration of the amount of work that had to be done, he might mention that all the indictments in Scotland were prepared by these persons under the direction of the Advocates Depute.

MR. J. A. CAMPBELL said, that before the Motion of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) was formally withdrawn, he wished to say he had the pleasure of knowing Bailie M'Onie, and he was sure he was incapable of the conduct alleged against him. Moreover, it should be remembered that the magistrate had the assistance of a legal assessor, so that he did not act entirely without legal assistance. Even supposing a mistake had been made, which he did not admit was the case, it was out of the question to propose that the Lord Advocate should be punished for it.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he had here an extract from the last Report of the Comptroller and Auditor General with regard to the Clerks to the Advocates Depute. This official said that between 1879 and 1880, the last completed financial year, the four clerkships were held by two clerks, each of whom received £160 a-year. The salary of £80 was fixed on in lieu of fees. He thought that the Lord Advocate would see that he (Mr. O'Connor) had had some ground for putting his question.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(36.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. FINDLATER said, he wished to move to reduce the Vote by £650, for the purpose of calling attention to the case of Mr. Johnstone, Sheriff Clerk of Cupar, in the Eastern District of Fife. Mr. Johnstone was the sheriff clerk at Cupar, and he also had a large business as an ordinary solicitor; but he had taken in a young practitioner, a man of two years' standing in the law in Edinburgh, and had given him a partnership, nominally excluding himself from all share in the ordinary profits of the business of solicitor. Mr. Johnstone was to act as sheriff's clerk, and all the other business was to be attended to by his partner. By the law of Scotland, a sheriff's clerk was precluded from practising as a solicitor. Well, the practitioners in the district felt very strongly on that case, and they sent a Memorial to the Lord Advocate; and the Lord Advocate, in his answer, admitted that the conduct of Mr. Johnstone was a violation of the spirit, if not of the letter, of the law, and offered the concurrence of his Office in having the question brought before the Court of Session. The Memorialists were not wealthy men, and they felt it was a great scandal affecting very largely the administration of justice; and they were of opinion that the Lord Advocate should have taken the case up himself, and not have left it to private individuals to take proceedings. There was a rule in the County Court Law of England, which placed the initiative in these matters in the hands of an official; and he (Mr. Findlater) did not see why the same rule should not apply to Scotland. The position of Mr. Johnstone was one of great importance, and it was a great scandal that he should be able to tax the costs of his own partner.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. ANDERSON said, he thought the case indicated a wrong practice—it was a practice discreditable to a man who occupied a judicial capacity as sheriff clerk in a Sheriff's Court, and, at the same time, was, through his partner, a practitioner entitled to practice in that Court. It might become a settled conviction throughout the country that those who employed the sheriff's clerks partner would get a larger share of justice than those who did not. Such proceedings as that ought to be put a stop to. If it was permitted now under the sanction of the Lord Advocate and the authorities, the practice would spread all through Scotland. Already, he believed, there were two or three other cases of the same kind—cases where sheriff's clerks were enjoying a share of the remuneration obtained by their partners practising in their Courts. It was pretended that their partnership arrangements were such that they (the sheriff's clerks) had no share in the profits of the practising part of the businesses; but that was hardly a contention to which any weight was to be attached, because, when the partnership was arranged, the fact that the new partner was to get all the profit on the contentious business would be considered in the terms of the agreement. It was, therefore, a mere evasion of the spirit of the law to allow the thing to be done in any way whatever, and he did hope the Lord Advocate would put a stop to the practice.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. M'LAREN) said, he agreed with the hon. Members who had spoken as to the inexpediency of the practice of allowing the partners of sheriffs' clerks to practise in the Sheriff Courts. The sheriff clerk had no judicial duties to perform, however, and was merely an executive officer of the sheriff. By a rule of the Court no sheriff's clerk was allowed to practice in the Court to which he was attached, directly or indirectly; but it was a question whether that rule prevented his partner from practising in his own name. He thought the Committee would agree with him that the practice by which partners of sheriff's clerks undertook business in the Sheriff Courts was contrary to the spirit of the regulations; but whether a case of this kind could be made the subject of a public prosecution he would not undertake to affirm. The solicitors of the county of Fife had taken up this matter warmly, and had shown some animus towards their colleague, because they complained of his practising as a conveyancer, which was perfectly legal. If sheriffs' clerks were not allowed to practise as conveyancers, the Government would be unable to obtain the services of sheriffs' clerks for the salaries which were now paid. It seemed to him that the solicitors of Fife, having taken up the matter, were the proper persons to prosecute. He was willing to give his fiat for that prosecution when necessary, and the matter was now under the consideration of the solicitors. As to the question which had been put to him concerning the four Principal Clerks of Session, the explanation was that according to the statute there ought to be four of these Clerks, but for many years there had only been two; therefore, only two appeared on the Estimate.

Mr. ANDERSON said, he did not think the explanation of the Lord Advocate went quite far enough. The Lord Advocate was at the head of public justice in Scotland, and, therefore, was bound to take care that the law was obeyed. The right hon. and learned Gentleman ought not to leave it to private prosecutors to take up the case, but should himself see that the law was carried out.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 20; Noes 52: Majority 32.—(Div. List, No. 358.)

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. M'LAREN) said, that, in consequence of the expression of opinion in the Committee, he proposed that representations should be made to Mr. Johnstone on the subject.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, that, seeing the Committee would resume work again at mid-day, it was only reasonable that Progress should now be reported.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he was extremely obliged to the Committee for the amount of work got through, and he hoped it was not too much to ask them to make a good job of it and finish the Class, for there were only two Votes remaining.

(37.) £25,422, to complete the sum for Register House Departments, Edinburgh.

Mr. DICK-PEDDIE asked what determination had been arrived at in regard to the Memorial from the "Third-Class Clerks," and the re-arrangement of the Office?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, it had been made the subject of inquiry, and the Memorial was being carefully considered.

Mr. DICK-PEDDIE said, this was not the opportunity to bring the subject forward, and it would not be just to the claims of the clerks to do so; but he would take an early opportunity of referring to it next Session.

Vote agreed to.

The Lord Advocate

(38.) £87,340, to complete the sum for Prisons (Scotland).

Mr. DICK-PEDDIE said, on page 255 in the statement of the officers of the prisons he found that there were 41 chaplains, and out of the whole sum for the expenses of these, the Roman Catholic priests only received £100; and considering that a third of the prisoners in Scotch prisons were Roman Catholics, it was rather an unfair proportion. But he did not wish to do more than refer to it just now.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked whether the assurance the Home Secretary had given to the hon. Member for Louth as to the proportion of chaplains in prisons might be taken as embracing Scotland?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, there was greater difficulty in dealing with the subject, because the prisons were smaller than those of England; but he would undertake to make it the subject of further examination.

Vote agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

REGULATION OF THE FORCES BILL.

(Mr. Secretary Childers, The Judge Advocate General, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman.)

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Mr. CHILDERS said, he wished to put a question to the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), who had a Notice down which blocked the Bill. There was, he believed, no other opposition to the Bill, and it was a great object that the Bill should pass as soon as possible, so that the Consolidation Bill should pass in the interest of prisoners under courts martial. Would the hon. Member take off his opposition to this Bill, in order to leave the way clear for the Consolidation Bill?

Mr. BIGGAR said, his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) who, as the House would recollect, took a great interest in the Army Regulation Bill of a few Sessions ago, had expressed a wish to suggest Amendments, and until he had had an opportunity of conferring with his hon. Friend he would rather not promise; but he would be prepared to decide by Monday.

Consideration, as amended, deferred till Monday next.

CORRUPT PRACTICES (SUSPENSION OF ELECTIONS) BILL.—[BILL 238.]

(Mr. Attorney General, Secretary Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Solicitor General.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Preamble be postponed."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

MR. WARTON desired to know why should the Preamble be postponed?

THE CHAIRMAN: It is the ordinary practice, and it is in order that the Preamble may be made to correspond with the Bill, should the Bill be amended.

MR. WARTON said, it occurred to him that in this case there was much more in the Preamble than in the remainder of the Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Member will have an opportunity of proposing Amendments to the Preamble, if he desires to do so.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Schedule.

MR. WARTON said, in deference to the ruling of the Chairman, he had not challenged the postponement of the Preamble; still, he did not quite understand why it should be postponed.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is the Schedule upon which the Committee is now engaged.

MR. WARTON said, he was aware of that; and he had an Amendment to propose to the Schedule. But he wished to explain, in order that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General might understand his object. In this particular Bill there was much more in the Preamble than in the Schedule, and he had to show how the one re-acted on the other. It would have been much better to have taken the Preamble first, and the usual practice was absurd in this case. The exact Amendment he had now to propose was to omit the second column of the Schedule. He could not see that there was any necessity to provide an abstract of the cases against each particular borough. He did not wish to challenge the accuracy of the abstract; but on another occasion it might be the opportunity for statements unfair or unjust towards a constituency. In suspending elections for a time, it was not necessary to give an account of the delinquencies in each particular borough which might be complete or uncomplete. Fair or unfair, he could not see the reason for it; and the Amendment he had to propose, taken in connection with the Preamble, would involve the amendment of the latter, so that the second and third paragraphs would read—

"Whereas the said Commissioners have reported in each and all of the said cities and boroughs corrupt practices have prevailed in one or more elections."

And then, again—

"Whereas it is expedient, with a view to future consideration, to provide for the temporary suspension of elections therein."

There was no occasion, as a matter of principle, for saying what this or that borough had done, and how far corrupt practices had prevailed. If the hon. and learned Attorney General could give a precise reason for it, and say it was founded on precedent, then, as a Conservative and a lawyer, he would acquiesce.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, it seemed to him that in taking away the Constitutional right of a constituency to representation, the Act should set forth why this course was taken. Of course, if it were taken generally to the effect that in one or more elections corrupt practices have prevailed, then the whole might be unfairly classified as equally delinquent. But the hon. and learned Member was willing to be guided by precedent, and he would find such a precedent in Section 12 of the Representation of the People Act of 1867. That precedent had been followed, and therefore the Schedule had been provided. If there was anything that could be shown to be unfair in it, that unfairness could be remedied.

Preamble.

MR. WARTON said, in consequence of the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General he had not pressed his objection; but he must take exception to the verbal construction of the third paragraph. In the 13th line were the words, "the cases by Parliament." That seemed but a poor weak way of expressing it. "The cases" did not indicate what cases, and did not even say the cases of the said cities and boroughs. He supposed the words emanated from the great Sir Henry Thring; but still he ventured to say his Amendment would improve the reading. His Amendment would be, first to strike out the words "of the cases," and then the words "by Parliament" would stand, and following these he proposed to add "in the cases of the said cities and boroughs," so that the whole should read—

"Whereas it is expedient, with a view to the future consideration by Parliament of the cases of the said cities and boroughs, to provide temporarily for the suspension of elections therein," and that, he thought, would be a much better reading.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "of the cases" in line 13.—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Preamble."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the Amendment was really a question of the reversal of words, whether they should read "by Parliament of the cases" or "of the cases by Parliament;" and he really thought the hon. and learned Member would not think it worth while to press it.

MR. WARTON said, that was not so; it was much more than the mere reversal of words. True, he proposed to strike out the words "of the cases;" but, as he had explained, it was for the purpose of afterwards inserting after the word "Parliament," "of the cases of the said cities and boroughs," certainly a clearer and more elegant form of expression.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. WARTON said, that after "cases" he proposed to put in the words "of the said cities and boroughs," for really the words "of the cases" did not make sense of the paragraph.

Amendment proposed, in line 13, after the word "cases" to insert "of the said cities and boroughs."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he thought the paragraph was properly drawn, and in grammatical English. It was hypercritical on the part of the hon. and learned Member to raise the objection, and to wish to send the Bill back to the Queen's printer for the sake of the alteration. He hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

MR. WARTON said, he must press the Amendment; and he would ask anybody to say, in reading the paragraph, what "the cases" could possibly mean. He would send the Bill back to the printer and to the draftsman too.

Question put, and negatived.

Preamble agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported, without Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would return good for evil, and not object to the Motion he (the Attorney General) was now about to make—namely, that the Bill be read the third time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

MR. WARTON said, he was quite ready to let the bad English go with all the sanction of the Attorney General.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed, without Amendment.

WHITEBOY ACTS REPEAL BILL.

[BILL 134.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Second Reading of the Bill be deferred till Saturday."—(Mr. T. P. O'Connor.)

MR. WARTON said, he must object to the Motion, for a solemn pledge had been given by the Prime Minister that nothing but Supply would be taken at the Saturday Sitting.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, this was a private Member's Bill; but he was quite willing to agree to its being postponed to a later day, if the Government would take charge of it. He did not hear the Prime Minister's pledge given, and, of course, he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) was not bound by it. He was quite willing to put off the Bill to a later day if the Government would withdraw their opposition. He was aware that he would be unable to proceed with the Bill this Session, but he only wanted to bring it to discussion; but that he was prevented from doing by the Notice of the hon. Baronet the Member for Bath (Sir Arthur Hayter), why put down he did not know. He had no wish to encumber the Saturday's Notice Paper if the Government would afford him another opportunity.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, Her Majesty's Government could not afford the hon. Member any such opportunity.

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked Mr. Speaker if it was not open to a Member to move to amend the Motion for postponement by substituting Monday for Saturday?

MR. SPEAKER: Such a course has never been taken to my knowledge without Notice; but if the hon. Member thinks proper to move an Amendment the House will deal with it.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, that he would beg to move that the Bill be postponed to Monday.

MR. WARTON said, he would second that Motion, which, though it might be unusual, was justified by the unusual circumstances. The Prime Minister had given a solemn pledge that nothing but Supply should be taken on the Saturday; and if any Bill were put down for that day he (Mr. Warton) should give it his decided opposition.

Amendment proposed, to leave out "Saturday" and insert "Monday" in proposed Question.—(Mr. R. N. Fowler.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'Saturday' stand part of the Question."

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he would not put the House to the trouble of a division, but would assent to the Bill being put down for Monday.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Second Reading deferred till Monday.

CONVEYANCING AND LAW OF PROPERTY (re-committed) BILL—[Lords.]
(Mr. H. H. Fowler.)

[BILL 231.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

Clauses 1 to 30, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 31 (Appointment of new trustees, vesting of property, &c.).

MR. WARTON said, this clause was a very important alteration of the law with regard to trustees appointing themselves sometimes. He objected to the principle of preserving the right to trustees to appoint a new trustee in the event of a trustee being discharged or dying; and he proposed to insert, in line 29, after "in writing," the words "with the consent of the cestuique trustee."

Amendment proposed, in line 29, after "in writing," to insert "with the consent of the cestuique trustee."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, the Bill had been referred to a Select Committee, by whom it was approved. The point raised by the hon. and learned Member was fully discussed by the Committee, and to guard against the possibility of doubt, sub-section 7 was introduced, which, in the opinion of the eminent counsel who drew the Bill, fully carried out, in legal phraseology, the provision as to trusts. He hoped the hon. and learned Member would not press the Amendment.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time upon Monday next.

EAST INDIAN RAILWAY [REDEMPTION OF ANNUITIES].

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient that the Secretary of State in Council of India be authorised to create and issue such Capital Stock bearing interest at the rate of three and a-half per centum per annum, or at any other rate not higher than four per centum per annum, as may be required for the purpose of purchasing the Annuities issued under "The East Indian Railway Company (Purchase) Act, 1879," or for the purpose of reducing other liabilities charged on the Revenues of India, and bearing interest at a rate not lower than the Stock so to be created.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next.

QUESTIONS.

PARLIAMENT—RULES AND ORDERS— PETITIONS—THE BRADLAUGH PETITIONS.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, he wished to ask a Question of the Chairman of the Committee on Petitions (Sir Charles Forster). On the 23rd of June the hon. Member for Greenwich (Baron Henry de Worms) asked a Question of his hon. Friend whether a Petition presented in this form was one which could be accepted by the House. The Petition referred to the Bradlaugh case, and it was worded thus:—

"Your Petitioners therefore pray that your honourable House will cause the law to be obeyed and justice to be done, and forthwith allow Mr. Bradlaugh to take his seat on making a solemn Affirmation."

His hon. Friend replied that it was true that a Petition in which those words were contained had been submitted to the Committee on Petitions, and that the majority of the Committee had determined that those words were not disrespectful to the House. And in answer to a Question which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) put to the Speaker in the same discussion, the Speaker said—

"That with regard to whether it would be right that Petitions of that character should be in future received by the House, it was a question for the decision of the House rather than for him to decide."

Two or three days ago he (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) was asked to present a number of Petitions with regard to the Bradlaugh case, and the following were the words of those Petitions:—

"That no one of the Estates of the Realm can, or may, by itself alter or override the statute law of the Realm; that the Resolution of your honourable House of the 27th of April and 10th of May last are respectively in direct conflict with the statute law; and your Petitioners therefore pray that your honourable House will immediately rescind the said illegal Resolutions."

He presented those Petitions, and he subsequently received this intimation from the Clerk of the Committee on Petitions:—

"The accompanying Petitions presented by you are informal, as they contain language disrespectful to the House of Commons. They will not, therefore, be submitted to the Select Committee on Public Petitions."

Now, the question he wished to ask his hon. Friend was this—that, as the House had certainly not taken any cognizance of those Petitions, whether the Committee on Petitions had had Petitions of that nature before them, and had decided upon them in the same way as they decided the Petitions referred to by the hon. Member for Greenwich when he asked his Question?

SIR CHARLES FORSTER, in reply, said, he was very glad that the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle had asked this Question, because he found that many Petitions of a similar character had been sent back to hon. Members. His hon. Friend had correctly stated the answer which he gave in reference to the Question put to him by the hon. Member for Greenwich (Baron Henry de Worms). He then stated that the Committee, in considering Petitions, were anxious to place the most liberal construction upon their language, and to give whatever doubt there might be in favour of the Petitioners. Therefore, with regard to the Petitions then alluded to, the Committee thought that in asking the House to do what was just and right, if it were disrespectful to the House, it was merely an implied disrespect, and the majority of the Committee passed these Petitions. But the Petitions to which his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle now referred went a step further, and, in direct and distinct terms, stated that the Resolutions of the House were illegal, and the Committee, as the delegates of the House, decided that they could not receive Petitions of the kind; and he might say, as bearing on the question of the conduct of the Clerk of the Committee, that they determined that after that no Petitions couched in similar terms could be brought before them. With the objectionable words erased the Committee would not be unwilling to receive the Petition.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS asked the Chairman of the Committee on Public Petitions whether the decision of the Committee was based on the absurdity of the word "illegal" in relation to the action of the House, or of its being a distinct affront to the House? He said absurdity, because it was quite clear that no act of the House could be illegal. He should also like to ask whether it was permissible for the phrase "unconstitutional" to be applied in relation to the action of the House on the 10th of May. The question involved was not one of mere words, but one of very considerable significance. [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is now entering into debate.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS said, he begged pardon, he only wished to know what were the reasons which induced the Committee to reject these Petitions?

SIR CHARLES FORSTER, in reply, said, that it was quite sufficient for the Committee to determine each case as it came before them, and they were clearly of opinion that the use of the word "illegal" was decidedly disrespectful to the House.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

NAVY—PROMOTION—LIEUTENANTS.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he had given Notice that he would call attention to the want of a sufficient number of Iron-clads for the National defence and of cruising vessels for training seamen. He would not, however, occupy the time of the House then, as the discussion of the subject might be taken on the Building Vote. But with regard to Vote 15, he desired to say—and it was more convenient to say it with the Speaker in the Chair—that he looked with great alarm and regret on the stagnation of promotion in the Royal Navy. The arrangements could give content to comparatively but a small number of officers on the war list; and he was quite sure that the numbers of captains and commanders required re-adjustment in order to give lieutenants a fair chance of rising according to merit, and not by seniority. He could give names familiar enough in the Service as instances. One officer of considerable distinction and standing, who had been mentioned in despatches for distinguished services, he could name, who, in consequence of the limited number of commanders, had never obtained that position which throughout the Service he was known to deserve. There was really no inducement, no stimulus to men, except so far as to perform their duty, to exert themselves, where promotion, which, of all things the naval officer most desired, was barred by the limited numbers on the upper list. He would not trespass further upon the time of the House; but he thought it right, on behalf of the Navy, to place on record his opinion in regard to the subject, and to request the Secretary to the Admiralty to bring this matter to the notice of the Board of Admiralty during the Recess, and the strong desire that existed in the Navy with regard to the re-adjustment of the lists of captains and commanders, so as to give more encouragement and more rapid promotion through that list.

to lieutenants, who, after all, were the backbone of the Navy.

STATE OF IRELAND—THE MAGISTRACY—MR. CLIFFORD LLOYD, R.M.
RESOLUTION.

MR. HEALY, in rising to move—

“That this House condemns the refusal of the Government to grant an investigation into the conduct of Mr. Clifford Lloyd, R.M., and their refusal to notice the threats alleged to have been used by him in dispersing without proclamation a peaceful meeting in Drogheda on the 1st day of January,”

said, he was obliged to draw attention to the conduct of Mr. Clifford Lloyd owing to the unsatisfactory answer he had received on the subject on Thursday from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. A Correspondence had taken place on the subject, and was published in the Irish papers, and two witnesses had stated that Mr. Clifford Lloyd had threatened to shoot down the people assembled at public meetings. Mr. Clifford Lloyd then came forward with a denial of the language attributed to him; and the Question he (Mr. Healy) asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland on Thursday was whether, in consequence of the rumours concerning the conduct of this gentleman, the Government thought it desirable, for the purpose of maintaining something like confidence in the administration of justice, to grant an inquiry into the matter, and he got a very curt answer from the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman said the Government did not think it necessary to grant an inquiry into the facts of the case. He at once rose and gave Notice that on going into Committee of Supply to-day he would call attention to the subject; and, therefore, he was somewhat astonished that the Chief Secretary had not thought it desirable to be in his place. Briefly, the circumstances were as follows:—A Land League meeting had been fixed to be held in Drogheda on the 2nd of January; and the Government, with an acuteness that did them not too much credit, proclaimed the meeting, on the plea that it was likely to lead to a breach of the peace, and there were always bailiffs and others ever ready to give the required information. It happened that the 2nd of January was a Sunday, and on the Saturday preceding a meeting was appointed to be held at Dundalk. Travelling by rail to the latter place, he (Mr. Healy) was met at Drogheda station by a number of people, who suggested that as the meeting for Sunday at Drogheda was prohibited for that day, it would be a good thing to hold on Saturday. He acceded to this, and an impromptu meeting was held, therefore, in the Drogheda Market Place. It was market day; it was also a Catholic holiday, and thousands of people assembled. The Government, however, were not to be balked. Telegrams were despatched to Dublin for a troop of dragoons, and to Dundalk for the 200 police who had been sent there to safeguard law and order during the expected meeting. Lo and behold, then, a special train was got out from Dublin at the expense of the taxpayers, into this the police were crammed, and in the middle of his address to the people at Drogheda these 200 police were seen advancing at the double. So great was the haste of these gallant defenders of law and order that great coats, knapsacks, and blankets—what the latter were carried for it was difficult to say—were flung in the mud outside the railway station, and, with bayonets fixed, the force came on at the double, a picturesque military sight. Not the slightest word had been said at the meeting likely to provoke a breach of law and order; the whole proceedings were conducted with that calmness and dignity which usually accompanied Irish meetings. The meeting was presided over by the parish priest, and other Catholic clergymen were in the break that served for a platform. There were at least half a-score of the clergy, and these at all times had been the best preservers of law and order and peace in Ireland. Thus engaged at this harmless meeting, the 200 police appeared, headed by Mr. Clifford Lloyd, and whatever presence of mind a man addressing a meeting might have, the sudden advance of 200 men with swords drawn must have a disquieting effect upon a meeting. Dividing into two bodies, the armed force hemmed in the crowd, and there was nothing to do but surrender. Mr. Clifford Lloyd, then addressing the conveners of the meeting, said the gathering was illegal, and he hoped the chairman would not put him to the necessity of dispersing it; but, at the same time, he refused to show any authority for doing so. Of course, with the fixed bayonets around, the meeting dispersed. Let those who enjoyed the right of public meeting in Trafalgar Square or elsewhere, and had to do with Inspector Denning and the peaceful bâtons of the London police, realize the position—the dispersal of a perfectly legal meeting by an armed force, headed by a gentleman not in uniform, who refused to show his authority. The meeting dispersed quietly; they had no weapons, but if they had, he would certainly not have been opposed to trying conclusions with the police, for the people had as good a right there as the police. He was not a believer in the “not a single drop of blood” doctrine; if the people had rights they should be prepared to enforce them. But the people, being unarmed, dispersed, and the break with the chairman and others passed on through the files of police who enfiladed the streets—it was necessary to use military terms in dealing with the operations of the Irish police—and Mr. Clifford Lloyd, for about the tenth time, declared that if they assembled again, he would disperse the meeting by force, and then he read the Riot Act. This was done when there was no more necessity for it than for the Speaker to get up and read the Riot Act in the House; and then Mr. Clifford Lloyd, in the hearing of Father Anderson, of himself, and others in the break, said—“If you assemble again I will fire on you.” It was this particular allegation that he asked the Government to make the subject of inquiry. It was first brought forward in a question by the hon. Member for Drogheda, an English Gentleman, whose name was well known, with that of his brother (Mr. Whitworth), who formerly sat as Member for Newry. Mr. Clifford Lloyd had been transferred to Kilmallock—perhaps because of the vigour he had displayed at Drogheda, and his conduct at Kilmallock had been very much called in question; and the hon. Member for Drogheda warned the Government that if he was not withdrawn there might be murder. He supposed the people of Kilmallock knew that Mr. Clifford Lloyd wore chain armour, and always walked about with a body guard of over a dozen police. A Scotch gentleman, a former Member of the House, Mr. Boyd Kinnear, wrote to The Daily News respecting the conduct of Mr. Clifford Lloyd, and then the whole affair of Drogheda was brought up again, and Mr. Clifford Lloyd's régime was described as equally bad as that of the Russian “Third Section.” In consequence of Mr. Clifford Lloyd's conduct in Kilmallock, he (Mr. Healy) put a question as to whether he was the same gentleman whose conduct at Drogheda he had described, and, in doing so, he stated what was within his personal knowledge, that Mr. Lloyd had threatened that if the meeting re-assembled he would fire on the people. This statement Mr. Lloyd denied in a letter which appeared in The Freeman's Journal, and this letter was followed by testimony in support of the allegation that he did use the threat in the shape of successive letters from the Rev. Mr. Kearney, the Rev. Mr. McKee, and Mr. Francis Vallery, a town councillor, who all heard the language used. Mr. Lloyd met these with another denial, and asserted that, addressing Mr. Dillon and Mr. Healy, he had said—“If you address another meeting here, I shall be forced to arrest you.” It should be mentioned that at the time Mr. Lloyd so acted he was not a magistrate of the town, though The Gazette gave an ex post facto legalization of his conduct, and he was actually overriding the authority of the mayor and other magistrates of Drogheda, who had passed a resolution that there was no necessity to interfere with the meeting. This foreign Orangeman came from Monaghan, or wherever he carried on his functions, with his 200 armed men, to disperse a legal meeting by force. The Government wanted to get out of the matter and to hush it up, and that was the reason why they refused to grant the sworn inquiry asked for. There could be no doubt as to the language used by Mr. Lloyd, who had spoken as loudly and as distinctly as though he had been an Egyptian or a Turkish Pasha. He should have thought that the Government would have been only too anxious to have granted this inquiry in order to clear the character of this Governmental paragon, who was one of the Chief Secretary's pets. If Mr. Lloyd was satisfied that he was in the right in the matter, he would look upon such an inquiry as a boon. The Government, however, shrank from any investigation of the facts of the case, cast round Mr. Lloyd the veil of Governmental silence and mystery, and refused to permit any inquiry to be held into the brutal conduct of this man. He would have supposed that in the disturbed state of Ireland the Government would have been glad to probe to the bottom every particular source of grievance; but by their refusal they had virtually admitted the entire case of the dissentients. The Government could not expect the people of Kilmallock to submit to the coercion régime, or to have much respect for Mr. Clifford Lloyd, after refusing this inquiry, or that the people of Ireland would expect justice would ever be done until a magistrate was appointed who would act impartially before all classes, and whose conduct, when impugned, could be inquired into. In the circumstances, no other course was left open to the Irish Representatives than to come to that House and ask it to condemn the course which Her Majesty's Government had pursued in this matter. In conclusion, he begged to move the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House condemns the refusal of the Government to grant an investigation into the conduct of Mr. Clifford Lloyd, R.M., and their refusal to notice the threats alleged to have been used by him in dispersing without proclamation a peaceful meeting at Drogheda on the 1st day of January,"—(Mr. Healy,) —instead thereof.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, he should not have risen so early in the debate but for the natural observation of the hon. Member for Wexford that he had expected the Chief Secretary for Ireland would have been present. He (the Solicitor General for Ireland) had been requested to offer an apology to the House for the Chief Secretary's absence, the right hon. Gentleman being obliged to attend a Cabinet meeting, and, therefore, unable to put before the House his own views on the matter. No one could blame the hon. Member for Wexford for bringing forward this Motion with the object of clearing up what had become a point of newspaper controversy—a controversy, he was sorry to say, which had kept alive matters, but which had better have been allowed to die out of mind. The question was not as to Mr. Lloyd's conduct in Kilmallock, but as to a transaction which occurred seven months ago, and the principal allegation was that the magistrate lost his temper on that occasion, and used language of a violent character. Already the question had been dealt with in that House. So far back as the 24th of January a Question was asked by one of the hon. Members for Louth, and since then the matter had been closed, until it was now revived. It was a gentleman named Boyd Kinnear who revived the controversy, and there had been a general rush into the newspapers. Everybody who was familiar with the practical events of life knew that nothing was so difficult as to remember with perfect accuracy, even on the moment, the substance, much less the particulars, of what occurred, or to identify the exact words used, or even the persons who used them. A remarkable instance of this occurred in the House of Commons only yesterday. The hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. R. N. Fowler) possessed a voice and a mode of expression that would be recognized by anybody who ever heard him. Yet the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh), who was not now in the House, but who sat in it for a considerable time, and must have been familiar with the voice of the hon. Member for the City of London, wrote a letter to his Colleague in the representation of Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) stating distinctly that he heard the hon. Member for the City of London use the words "Kick him out," which he considered so much a breach of Privilege as to ask the intervention of the House concerning it, and he added that if the House did not take the matter up he would proceed by summons against the Member for the City of London for inciting to a breach of the peace. What was the reply of the hon. Member for the City? He said—"I did not use the language at all." This was a case in which the hon. Member for Northampton, who did not sit in the House, but whose word would be trusted equally as much as that of any other hon. Member, stated what he believed to be the fact, that certain words were used by a person whose voice it was hardly possible for anyone to mistake; yet here they had an illustration of the difficulty which sometimes arose of determining what actually had taken place when different persons came to give their versions of a particular occurrence. The controversy, therefore, resolved itself into this—Mr. Lloyd stated distinctly that he did not use the language imputed to him, and highly respectable Catholic clergymen said that he did use it. There the controversy remained at present. There was no one in Ireland, much less a magistrate, who was above the law. The law was open to everybody to appeal to. ["Oh!"]. Of course, he did not expect hon. Gentlemen opposite to agree with him, especially in a matter of this kind. Nevertheless, he would repeat it was his opinion, at all events, that nobody was above the law. It was open to anybody, when a magistrate acted illegally—and Mr. Clifford Lloyd would have acted illegally if what the hon. Member for Wexford had stated were true—of challenging that conduct through the ordinary channels of the law. The hon. Member stated—though he (the Solicitor General for Ireland) did not think he meant the House to follow him out to the full—that if the Government did not grant this inquiry no remedy was open to anybody who was illegally treated. He took issue at once on that. No one knew better than the hon. Member that the law was open to all. Therefore, the hon. Member was not correct when he said that if this inquiry was not granted no investigation could take place. To grant the inquiry asked for would be unusual and exceptional, and that was a proceeding to be discouraged. He had no hesitation in avowing that he disliked anything outside the ordinary course of the law. [Ironical cheers.] There was one and only one tribunal before which controversies of law or fact could be properly adjudicated upon, and that was a Court of Law, presided over by a Judge, who was acquainted with the law and who was unswayed by prejudice. He did not mistake the good-natured cheer from below the Gangway. But they would have been hiding their heads in the sand if they had not recognized, as the House had recognized, that exceptional legislation, to which that cheer referred, was necessary to meet exceptional circumstances. That, however, made it more necessary to depart as little as possible from the ordinary law in ordinary cases. But what had occurred?—and about this there was no controversy. Sworn information was laid before his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland that the meeting to which the hon. Member for Wexford had referred, and which was contemplated to be held on the 2nd of January, had been convened for the purpose of denouncing an individual whose life would not have been safe if that meeting were allowed to take place. Such was the evidence upon which the Government acted. He (the Solicitor General for Ireland) would ask hon. Members, when evidence of that kind was laid before the Government, affirmed by competent persons, and when careful inquiries showed there was reason to apprehend these anticipations were well founded, could the Government have acted otherwise than they had done? Suppose an information of that kind was laid before the Government, and that the Government came to the conclusion that the probability was well founded, but did not interfere; and let it further be supposed that violent scenes took place, would anyone venture to exculpate the Government from the charge that they had disregarded the peace of the country? When large bodies of men assembled, even for the most lawful purposes, it was sometimes difficult, nay, even impossible, to keep them within the bounds of peace and order.

MR. HEALY: Has there ever been a riot in Ireland after a public meeting?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON): There had not, for this reason—that the Government had never interfered—[Ironical cheers].—he would feel obliged if hon. Members would allow him to finish his sentence—the Government had not interfered except in those cases where such information as that which he had mentioned had been laid before them. The Government did not interfere with meetings unless they had evidence before them that the meeting would be attended with disturbance. On this particular occasion, as he had said, sworn information was laid before the Lord Lieutenant as to the nature and object of the meeting. Upon that sworn evidence the Lord Lieutenant issued his Proclamation, upon the face of which was shown the reason of the Government interference, and the effect of which was not to make the meeting legal or illegal, but to caution the people that if they took part in a meeting of that kind they would render themselves subject to the consequences of the law. That Proclamation was accordingly widely published. He thought, as well as he could recollect, that it was torn down in many places in Drogheda; but that was beside the matter. Representations were made by those supposed to have influence in Drogheda, to the magistrates, that the meeting would not take place. Another meeting was about to take place near Dundalk, which was only a few miles distance, to which the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) was going, and which was not proclaimed at all. That was an instance of how carefully the Government drew the line of distinction with regard to such meetings. In consequence of the representations to which he had referred, that nothing would take place at Drogheda of a disturbing character, he believed nearly all the police and magistrates were removed from the town. The hon. Member was going down on Saturday, and the meeting was to have taken place in Drogheda on Sunday. Saturday was market day in Drogheda. The town was full with people; there were no police there, and suddenly a large meeting was convened in the very town and in the very place in which the meeting was announced to be held on the following day. It was not going too far to say that anybody would reasonably suppose that that was the meeting of the following day called by anticipation. It was not a casual meeting at all of a fortuitous concourse of people. It was convened by posters sent out, and by bellmen sent round to announce it. In that state of things a large number of people were convened on the spot where the meeting which was to have been held the following day had been prohibited, in the very neighbourhood where danger was apprehended, and under circumstances precisely similar to those under which the meeting to be held on the following day had been prohibited. Now, it must be remembered that the position of a magistrate in Ireland at all times, and especially in these times, was a most peculiar and a most responsible one. A man filling that office must possess great courage combined with tact, judgment, and temper—he must act not as though he was the master of the people, which he was not, but as the servant of the law, which he was, and he must have nerve enough and knowledge enough to act upon the spur of the moment and upon his own responsibility. In the present case, it was fortunate, as it appeared, that the hon. Member who had brought this matter under the notice of the House was present at the meeting in question, because he had advised the people to disperse quietly, and they had followed his advice. He had heard with regret the hon. Member say that if the people had had weapons in their hands he should have advised them to use them. He thought, however, that the hon. Member did himself an injustice in making that statement, and that he misjudged his own disposition, because he was satisfied that the hon. Member would have thought twice before he gave the people such disastrous advice. The hon. Member was, perhaps, a little over-anxious to show that he had the courage of his opinions; but he did not believe that he would really have incited the people to bloodshed. It happened, however, fortunately, that no collision occurred between the people and the police, and that everything passed off quietly, while the legitimate object of the meeting was attained when it was adjourned to the hotel, where no ill consequences could result from holding it. It was a very different thing to hold a meeting in a building and to hold one out-of-doors, where no control could be exercised over the passions of the multitude. Mr. Lloyd, believing that this out-of-door meeting was a mere anticipation of that which had been prohibited, and that its objects were the same, and were calculated to endanger personal safety, had taken upon himself the responsibility of putting an end to it; and he must confess that, had he been in Mr. Lloyd's place on the occasion, acting on his responsibility as a conservator of the public safety, he should have felt it to be his duty to have required that meeting to disperse. Everything had, fortunately, terminated peaceably, and nothing more would have been heard of it had it not become a subject of newspaper controversy. The witty Canon (Sidney Smith had said that there were three things which every man thought he could do—farm a small quantity of land, drive a gig, and write a letter to a newspaper. Unfortunately, Mr. Lloyd had thought that he could do the last, and he accordingly addressed a letter to a newspaper, which he had much better have put into the fire, as it had immediately challenged controversy. It was said that Mr. Lloyd's statement was contradicted by the statements of highly respectable Catholic clergymen. Everyone who knew anything about the matter or had any knowledge of Ireland must admit the immense and important influence which the Catholic clergy in Ireland exercised—and often exercised—in the interests of peace and order; and most certainly it would have been very wrong, on the part of Mr. Lloyd or of anybody else, to have said to a Catholic clergyman, or to any other of Her Majesty's subjects—"If you do not disperse I will shoot you down." He was glad to be able to state that Mr. Lloyd most emphatically denied that he had used such language. The hon. Member said that he had heard Mr. Lloyd use language to that effect; but even he could not bind himself to remember the exact words, while two Catholic clergymen undertook to give what they stated to be the identical words. Clergymen, however, were not more infallible in point of memory than anybody else, and it must be remembered that all parties were speaking of what occurred seven months ago, at a moment when great excitement prevailed on all sides. Under all these circumstances, he would ask the hon. Member not to press his Motion; and he asked the House not to weaken the action of justice and the arm of the law in Ireland under trying circumstances of extreme difficulty by unnecessarily casting censure upon those who were called upon to administer justice there. If any wrong had been done to individuals, the ordinary remedies which the law afforded to everyone were open to them.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN said, that for more reasons than one he supported the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Wexford. He agreed with the Solicitor General for Ireland that nearly seven months had elapsed since the affair occurred in Drogheda; but how many times since had Mr. Clifford Lloyd attempted to tyrannize over the people of Limerick County?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) rose to Order. He wished to know if the hon. Member should not confine himself to the terms of the Motion before the House, which had only relation to the occurrence at Drogheda.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is in Order.

MR. O'SULLIVAN, continuing, thought he was quite right in alluding to the conduct of Mr. Lloyd, as this was a Motion asking for an investigation into the conduct of Mr. Lloyd as a Government official. Was it not a fact that this gentleman attempted to tyrannize over the people of the County Limerick on several occasions? Anyone who was acquainted with the history of 1798 must be aware that it was the action of such men as Mr. Lloyd that drove the people into revolt; and he had no doubt that if there were ten or a dozen such men scattered over Ireland they would be able to drive the people into revolt and desperation. In Kilmallock he had given both offence and annoyance to the people of that district. On one occasion he had directed the police to summon four respectable ladies who were standing in the street waiting for a lady friend, because, as he said, they had used impertinent language to the police; and the policeman who prosecuted stated that the only impertinent language they had used was that they called him "Lloyd's Pet." Of course, the summons was dismissed. Very shortly after that, Mr. Lloyd summoned a delicate old woman about 70 years of age, and sentenced her to six months' imprisonment, or to give substantial bail, for abusing another woman. When two respectable and substantial bailsmen came before him he refused to accept them; but he accepted them afterwards, after keeping that unfortunate woman a fortnight in gaol. Again, when he saw three or four respectable farmers or shopkeepers standing together in the street he sent his police to disperse them, or to take down their names, as though he were lord and master of the place for the time being. He asked the Government were they going to withhold an inquiry into the conduct of a gentleman guilty of such conduct as that? He (Mr. O'Sullivan) had seen on one occasion prisoners taken to the private residence of Mr. Lloyd, and sent to prison after the investigation made there. Though anyone might be mistaken as to words used, he could hardly be mistaken as to an actual fact like that. Why, then, had Mr. Lloyd put the Chief Secretary for Ireland in a false position by allowing him to deny that he had ever convicted men at his private residence? Again, in the case of the poor woman Coleman, it was at first said that she was only one night in prison; but it was afterwards admitted that she was in gaol for 16 nights. In point of fact, he (Mr. O'Sullivan) knew that three of the replies that had been made in that House on behalf of, and on the information of, Mr. Lloyd, by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, were not in accordance with the facts. He also knew, as a matter of fact, that he used the Coercion Act for the purpose of personal vindictiveness. He challenged the Solicitor General to show any charge against two men arrested in Kilfinane under the Coercion Act named Daniel Reardon and Francis Allen, except simply and solely that they had refused to supply cars to Mr. Lloyd and the police. He challenged him to show any charge against Andrew Mortel and Edward O'Neill, who had also been arrested, except that they collected money to pay a fine of £3 and costs which Mr. Lloyd had imposed upon two men and a married woman in his private residence. O'Neill and Mortel collected money for the purpose from the shopkeepers of the town, and went to the barracks and paid the fine and costs; and in three days afterwards a warrant was down from the Lord Lieutenant for the arrest of these two men. It was alleged that they had coerced people to subscribe the money; but he (Mr. O'Sullivan) was prepared to prove by the statement of the shopkeepers who subscribed the money that they had given their subscriptions voluntarily. He got a declaration to that effect from all the subscribers, which he sent to the Chief Secretary for Ireland to show that the subscribers were not coerced in any sense of the word. He said that the tyrannical action of Mr. Lloyd was indulged in to gratify his own private vindictiveness, and not to defend or uphold the law. He thought it a very false position for a Liberal Government to occupy if they withheld an inquiry into the conduct of a man who had brought such discredit upon the administration of justice in Ireland.

MR. J. COWEN said, he was not aware that the conduct of Mr. Clifford Lloyd was to be called in question that day, or he would have provided himself with information respecting the proceedings of that gentleman, which might have helped the House to a decision on the subject. But let them look at the matter as it was put before them by the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy). What was the pith of the charge? Here was a legal meeting being held in a peaceable town for a peaceable purpose, and in quite a constitutional way. The gentleman was not a magistrate of the town, nor, he believed, of the county; but he dispersed the gathering by a body of armed men, and in dispersing it used language that was calculated to rouse angry passions, if not to excite to a breach of the peace. There was no question as to the facts. The Solicitor General for Ireland, in his very temperate statement, had substantially admitted the accusation, and he had given it as his opinion that the language used was objectionable. Now, he (Mr. J. Cowen) wished to ask hon. Gentlemen near him how they would have acted and what they would have said if a meeting held for a like purpose under like conditions had been forcibly dispersed in any English town? He knew it was useless appealing to the Representatives of the Irish Executive in that House; and he knew, too, that appeals to the ordinary followers of the Ministry would be equally futile. But there still must be—and he knew there were—some who had not altogether forgotten the Radical principles they professed, and upon which they had been returned to that House. He asked them to make the case their own and conceive—if in any of their constituencies such action had been taken by a magistrate—what would have been their attitude to the governing authorities. He had an instinctive dislike of personal quarrels, and he regretted that this question should have to hinge in any way upon the character of an official. He dared say that Mr. Clifford Lloyd was a very honourable man, that according to his lights he was conscientious, and, like the most of them, well-meaning. But he had been a soldier, and he carried the practices of the barrack-yard into politics. He was a strict and unbending martinet. He ordered the people about in even sharper terms than he would have spoken to soldiers upon parade. And when they failed to comply with his orders he did not hesitate to strain the law to punish them. The Solicitor General for Ireland had said that men in authority should use their powers with tact and judgment. He quite agreed with that statement; and it was because Mr. Lloyd did not use his powers with tact and judgment that such incessant complaints were made against him. Ireland was in a disturbed and excited state. The Government had never ceased to proclaim this all the Session. The veriest tyro in administration knew that in ruling a people in such a temper reasonable allowance should be made. The law, it was true, had to be enforced. If there was no law there would be tyranny. But there were different means of enforcing the law. Sometimes it was enforced in such a way as to bring it into contempt. At other times its enforcement earned for the law and the lawmakers respect. In the North of England, during a period of excitement quite as great as now existed in Ireland, Sir Charles Napier was in command of the military forces, and he had under him, as his chief officer, the late Lord Clyde. Notwithstanding the disturbed condition of the populace, there was—through the wisdom and consideration of these judicious commanders—no collision with the authorities. This was set out with great minuteness in the lives of these two distinguished officers, and might be studied with advantage by those charged with the government of Ireland at this moment. The tact and judgment of the two men he had mentioned saved England from bloodshed and serious disorder. There were three qualities required in dealing with the Irish people. These were firmness, justice, and sympathy. The law should be firmly asserted, justice should be impartially administered, and there should be, on the part of its administrators, reasonable regard for the troubles and distress of the people. Mr. Clifford Lloyd had not shown these qualities, and other magistrates in Ireland had been equally deficient. Hence the state of chronic irritation that was kept up. He had a strong objection to make anyone a victim—even so unattractive a person as Mr. Lloyd—and he knew it was easy to make a set at a man when popular feeling was against him. But he was bound to say this—that he had been in Ireland sundry times recently, and had had some opportunity of learning the opinion entertained of Mr. Lloyd's administration. He was stating the simple fact when he said that men of all classes in the districts over which that magistrate ruled regarded him as a source of dislike and an incitement to discontent. The hon. Member for Drogheda (Mr. Whitworth)—who certainly had little in common with Gentlemen opposite—knew Mr. Lloyd, and declared that he was nothing short of a firebrand. And yet he was not only now in office, but he was held up as a pattern by the Irish Secretary. It was just this sort of administration that created Irish troubles. Measures devised in that House with the best intentions and conceived with the most beneficent purpose were intrusted for their execution to unsympathetic officials. And these officials fought against them and defeated them. The designs of Parliament were thus rendered inoperative. It was well to recognize the fact that in England there were political and social opinions that permeated all classes—the aristocratic, the trading, and the industrial. If you cut a line through English society you would find opinions mingling freely amongst all these social layers. In Ireland it was different. The ruling caste which constituted the upper strata held certain political, social, or religious opinions. The ordinary people held entirely opposite views. There was no intermingling of classes, and it ought to be the duty of a wise Government to bring the two sections into harmony. It was men like Mr. Clifford Lloyd who prevented that end being attained. He did not wish to do Mr. Lloyd or anyone else any injury; but if the Ministry could give him another office under more congenial conditions, he felt sure the wheels of Irish administration would revolve more smoothly.

MR. LEAMY said, the Solicitor General for Ireland had admitted that if Mr. Lloyd had used the language attributed to him at Drogheda he would have acted in a most illegal and improper manner, and that the parties aggrieved could have gone to the ordinary tribunals for a remedy. But if the Government were not satisfied with ordinary tribunals, why should the people have to go to ordinary tribunals when the ordinary law was suspended, when the liberties of the people were taken away by informers, and the affairs of the people were put into the hands of magistrates in whom they had no confidence? Now, Mr. Lloyd was not above suspicion. On the contrary, there was a direct charge against him that he had used language which, as the Solicitor General for Ireland had said, no person should have used. Why, then, did not the Government institute an inquiry whether that language had been used? If Mr. Lloyd did use that language he was unfit to be a magistrate. He was lately sent into a district where he could have no sympathy with the people, and it was manifest that he had created the feeling of irritation which prevailed in that locality at present. His hon. Friend the Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Sullivan) properly observed that a dozen Clifford Lloyds would produce a revolt in Ireland. He should have no objection to see a dozen Clifford Lloyds in Ireland, because it would open the eyes of the Irish people to the character of the men placed over them, and show them that the worst enemy to Irish freedom was a Whig Government which pretended to be Liberal.

MR. WARTON said, he hoped the debate would not be continued, as the House had met on an unusual day for the purpose of making progress with the Estimates. He did not think that anyone could have given a more conciliatory answer than that given by the Solicitor General for Ireland, and he thought it would have been a very graceful act on the part of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) if he had said he did not wish to press the matter further. The debate would be duly reported in the Irish papers, and that was one reason why the Home Rule Members wished to continue it. The Solicitor General for Ireland a short time ago took objection to the Amendment on a point of Order; but the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair ruled that the hon. Member for Wexford was not technically out of Order. At first sight, the Amendment appeared to be directed only to what took place on the 1st of January; but a careful reading of the Amendment would show that it asked for an inquiry into the general conduct of Mr. Lloyd. With regard to what had been said by the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen) about firmness, justice, and sympathy, he would only say, while agreeing in the necessity for firmness and justice, how on earth could Mr. Lloyd have sympathy with a people who were excited against him as the people of his district seemed to have been?

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, he thought it was unfair to insinuate that Irish Members brought forward this question solely to get their speeches reported in the newspapers. [Mr. WARTON: I did not say solely.] It was a fundamental rule in that House that Grievance should come before Supply. As long as they had their Irish Friends in the House, it was natural that they should bring forward the grievances of Ireland. He thought in this instance what was at least a very strong case for inquiry had been made out. They had, first of all, had the statements of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) and the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Sullivan). In addition to them, they had the corroborative and independent testimony of the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen). It was a serious thing that these charges should be brought against a man in a responsible position, and it seemed to him that they ought to be inquired into. They had spent a great part of the Session in the endeavour to send a message of peace to Ireland; but there could be no message of peace that was not one of justice—that was the only foundation of peace in any community—and there were, in his opinion, good grounds for asking whether or not justice had been done in this case. He should be glad to see the discussion brought to a close, so that the House might get into Committee; but, at the same time, he hoped the Government would agree, even at the last moment, to order an inquiry into the subject now before the House. There could be no harm in inquiry.

MR. CALLAN said, he happened to be connected with the district referred to in the Amendment, and he was sorry to say that the observation of the Solicitor General for Ireland that any statement made seven months after the date referred to could not be very reliable was more disingenuous than usual. The hon. and learned Gentleman did not mention that the letter of the Catholic clergyman was written the next day, when there could be no such defect of memory as he suggested. He (Mr. Callan) had interviewed the magistrates, and he was assured by them that the description of the hon. Member for Drogheda (Mr. Whitworth) of Mr. Clifford Lloyd was correct—that he was “a political firebrand.” It was, therefore, a great mistake to send this firebrand further South among inflammable material. It was said that Mr. Lloyd denied using the language but several magistrates and two Catholic clergymen affirmed that he had used the words. Why should there not be a sworn inquiry? If Mr. Lloyd escaped, the clergymen and magistrates would be covered with confusion. He thought the question would be best raised on the Vote for the Chief Secretary's salary, and he hoped the Motion would not now be pressed.

MR. REDMOND said, they had no reason to regret the absence of the Chief Secretary, because nothing could be in better taste than the speech of the Solicitor General for Ireland, which was in marked contrast with that they usually experienced from the Chief Secretary; but, at the same time, he did not concur in the hon. and learned Gentleman's arguments. He thought, however, if speeches were delivered in a similar tone on Irish questions, there would be fewer scenes in that House. He must also express his gratification at seeing the Motion receive the support of the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) and the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen). As to Mr. Clifford Lloyd, he asked English Members simply to look at the performances of that person in Kilmallock and decide whether or not he was a firebrand. He believed the Coercion Act had been passed under false pretences.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is travelling beyond the Question before the House.

MR. REDMOND said, he desired to allude to the Coercion Act because Mr. Clifford Lloyd was engaged in administering it, and he thought he was entitled to refer to the exceptional state of things which existed in Ireland under the Act.

Hon. Members opposite, he was of opinion, were induced to support the Government in passing the Coercion Act by the belief that it would be worked in a careful, impartial, and just spirit. If Mr. Clifford Lloyd was allowed to administer that Act, there was no question that injustice would be perpetrated in Ireland such as hon. Gentlemen who voted in favour of the Act never anticipated. The Radical Members who brought into existence this state of affairs by the support they gave to the Government were responsible for the administration of the Act, and therefore they should insist upon the Government seeing that the reins of power were not placed in the hands of men against whom the people had, rightly or wrongly, formed the opinion that they were partial and unjust. If the Government believed the men they had appointed to work the Act were impartial and honest, let them go into the charges which had been made, and prove them to be baseless. With regard to the message of peace to Ireland, he thought it was utterly absurd for hon. Members to talk and delude the Government by making them believe that the Land Bill would be a message of peace to Ireland so long as conduct of this kind was allowed to proceed. If this conduct continued, it must be by men like Mr. Clifford Lloyd, who created disturbances instead of quelling them. The first thing the Government ought to do was to establish the principle of justice in Ireland, and re-establish the principle of liberty; and until that was done, it was entirely absurd to think that anything in the shape of a message of peace would be seen in the Land Bill, or any other measure the House might pass.

MR. O'KELLY remarked, that the Solicitor General for Ireland recommended the people to appeal to the law if they felt aggrieved. He had some experience of appealing to the law in a case similar to this. But he found that, instead of having to deal with a magistrate upon a plain and simple issue, he had to face the British Government. He had in his hand the defence filed in the action he instituted against Mr. Harvey, R.M., for assault, and he found it was prepared by Mr. Anderson, the Crown Solicitor, and printed at the expense of the British taxpayer. Instead of replying to the simple question his action raised, the document contained a long political indictment, which, in fact, was substantially the same as that preferred against the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) and others at the State trials in Dublin. It was, therefore, absurd to talk of appealing to the law when they had to fight the British Government. The hon. Member was proceeding to refer to a meeting at which some Orangemen appeared, when——

MR. SPEAKER: I fail to see the connection between the matter now being discussed and the conduct of Mr. Lloyd, which is the subject of the Amendment before the House.

MR. O'KELLY said, he thought he was within his right and within Order in replying to the statement of the Solicitor General for Ireland that the Government never interfered with these meetings except upon sworn information. Of course, if he was passing beyond his right——

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member is replying to some observations of the Solicitor General for Ireland, I have no wish to interfere.

MR. O'KELLY said, it was, no doubt, true that the Government never interfered with a meeting except on sworn information; but that statement, if accepted literally, would convey a very wrong impression to the House. The great point was, what steps would the Government take to examine into the validity of the sworn informations? There was a meeting to have been held in County Fermanagh a short time since, and, upon its becoming known, the magistrates of the district in which the meeting was to be held, who were also landlords and land agents, got two or three of their understrappers to get a bill printed to the Orangemen of the county, and the meeting was consequently stopped. The Orangemen had no intention of interfering with the meeting at the time of the issuing of the bill by the men who appealed to Dublin Castle to suppress the meeting. The magistrates who appealed to Dublin Castle to suppress the meeting he had referred to were aware of the origin of the placard issued to the Orangemen. They knew the men who had caused this placard to be posted, and they were perfectly well aware that there was not the slightest intention on the part of the Orangemen to come into collision with the people who attended the meeting; yet they walked down and absolutely dispersed the meeting by force, without the slightest justification. There was not the slightest cause to apprehend any disturbance. Now, that was one of the difficulties they had to deal with in Ireland. If the House did not interfere to prevent the Government acting upon these sworn informations until they had ascertained the accuracy of them, the right of public meeting in Ireland would be gone. He hoped the House would assent to the reasonable Motion of the hon. Member for Wexford, for he could not imagine a doubt existing in the mind of anyone that Mr. Lloyd was a dangerous, violent, and excitable man, whose presence in the South was certain to lead to mischief. As to Mr. Harvey, he was, perhaps, worse than Mr. Lloyd.

Mr. O'Kelly

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) wished to mention that Mr. Harvey was defending himself in an action for assault by the hon. Member at his own expense and through his own solicitors.

MR. BYRNE was of opinion that, inasmuch as these charges against Mr. Lloyd had been made and supported, the Government, if they were jealous of their reputation and the honour of their officials, should be fair and straightforward, and allow the investigation asked for by his hon. Friend the Member for Wexford to take place. The hon. Member's proposal was a very reasonable one. This was not a small matter, but a very serious affair, for Mr. Lloyd had the lives and liberties of a large number of people under his control.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked if the Solicitor General for Ireland really meant to refuse the assurance desired by the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) and other hon. Gentlemen?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, it was not in his power to give such an assurance; but he had distinctly pointed out the course open to hon. Gentlemen.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 75; Noes 18: Majority 57.—(Div. List, No. 359.)

NAVY—NAVY AND DOCKYARD OFFICERS.—OBSERVATIONS.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, that, though he did not wish to detain the House, he was unfortunately compelled to bring some grievances connected with the Navy before the House in that manner in consequence of the extraordinary conduct of the First Lord of the Admiralty. That noble Lord had had the unlimited pretension to refuse to receive Members of Parliament on matters connected with their constituencies. When a body of Members connected with Dockyard constituencies had wished to see him he had refused to receive them, and had therefore thrust upon them the necessity of appealing to their Constitutional privileges. He had no wish, nor had the Dockyard officials any wish, to obstruct the proceedings of the House by bringing forward their grievances, and he should not have done so but for the attitude taken by Lord Northbrook towards Members of Parliament. It might do very well in India, but it was not at all consistent with the duties of a Cabinet Minister towards the Representatives of the people. The case he wished to bring before the House was that of the old navigating officers. The old officers now found themselves completely eclipsed by a younger class of men, so that their position was becoming almost untenable, and many a good appointment to which they had hitherto looked had been taken away from them. Navigating lieutenants and staff commanders were constantly placed under the orders of officers junior to themselves, while their pay and pension were inferior to those of the newer class. Now, a commander of the new class and a lieutenant detailed for navigating duties, after 21 years' service, were entitled to a pension of £400 per annum, while staff commanders and navigating lieutenants were only entitled to £290. It was perfectly plain that if they had the power of addressing the Minister privately at his residence on these questions the House would be saved the trouble of listening to details which could be much better discussed in private than in public; and when Ministers were open to that mode of access it conducted very greatly to the quicker discharge of the Business of the House. He mentioned the matter now to call the attention of his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty, whose courtesy he was glad to say none of them could complain of, to it. He would also ask his hon. Friend a question with regard to the warrant officers. They suffered under a grievance which had been recognized, he thought, but not remedied. There was a clause in the Admiralty Regulations called the "other ships" clause, the effect of which was that while other officers in the Navy received the same pay whether they were at sea or on shore, the warrant officers were mulcted of £27 a-year when they were in harbour. Those officers had assured him that it was quite as expensive to live in places like Portsmouth and Plymouth as when they were at sea. He thought that matter ought to be brought before the House and the Secretary to the Admiralty in a manner as detailed as possible, because he believed that the increase that would be involved in the Estimates if those officers received the same treatment as others in Her Majesty's Service would be very small indeed, and it would render a very deserving set of men much more contented than they at present were. He should have said something with regard to the Royal Naval Engineers; but his hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth had applied his mind to that question, and was about to bring it forward in Supply, when, perhaps, he might have the opportunity of saying a few words. He had no wish to detain the House, and had brought forward that question very reluctantly, only because of the manner in which he had been received by the First Lord of the Admiralty.

MR. PILESTON thought this was hardly the occasion to discuss this subject, because it seemed to him it could be better brought forward when the Naval Estimates were under discussion. He joined with the last speaker in deprecating in the strongest manner the unusual course taken by Lord Northbrook in refusing to receive a deputation of Members representing Dockyard constituencies. A number of Members united together, and his hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth (Mr. MacIver), who happened to be the spokesman on that occasion, respectfully asked for an interview with the First Lord of the Admiralty, in order to lay before him what they considered to be matters very material to the public interest, and desirable that he should know. He, however, received a reply couched in the most curt language. The Predecessor of the present Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), replying to a request of some officials and others employed in the Dockyards, said he could not entertain any statement of the grievances of the officers at the Admiralty, but that a fair and full opportunity would be given to all parties employed in the Dockyards to ventilate their grievances on the occasion of the annual visit of the Lords of the Admiralty. This was perfectly satisfactory to all; but when the Lords' annual visitation came round these promises were set aside at once with a very curt reply, and the officials were not allowed to go near them, or to represent to them in any way their grievances, except through their superior officers. That course was naturally attended with extreme inconvenience, and must result in the discontent of men who should be encouraged in every proper and reasonable way.

MR. MACLIVER said, he was very unwilling to say anything which would seem discourteous to the First Lord of the Admiralty; but he must join in the expressions employed as to the refusal of the noble Lord to receive the deputation. The Members who composed that deputation had substantial grounds for applying for an interview, and he thought the refusal to receive them was exceedingly unwise and exceedingly discourteous to the House. He hoped at any future time, when a similar application was made to the First Lord of the Admiralty, it would be met in a different spirit. At all events, they would not be deterred by such a refusal in again pressing the grievances and complaints of men in the Service who were entitled to be heard, and whose case called for a remedy.

MR. TREVELYAN said, his hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) had not given him Notice of his intention to bring this matter forward, and he could not answer the points raised in such detail as he would like. He could quite understand exception being taken to Lord Northbrook's ship-building policy, and the manner in which he distributed ships among the squadrons, for those squadrons were all over the world; but he was extremely surprised to hear his personal courtesy called in question. He should have said that there was no First Lord who, at greater personal inconvenience to himself, had, in the discharge of his duties, given greater satisfaction to hon. Members. He wished in some respects there were a larger House present, for he was sure that many more hon. Members would bear testimony to what he said. He should have liked to hear Lord Northbrook's account of the circumstances to which the hon. Members had referred; but he thought, so far as he could gather from the conversation, that there was an explanation to be made. He believed that the hon. Members referred to a deputation that proposed to wait upon the First Lord to represent the grievances of the Naval Engineers. He thought there was a very great deal to be said as to whether the grievances of the Engineers were a proper subject for a deputation of Members of Parliament. As the matter had appeared in some newspapers, it was a more serious thing. It was there called a deputation of the Royal Naval Engineers. Hon. Members must remember what these Engineers were, and what they claimed to be. They were commissioned officers of the Navy like post captains and commanders, and they claimed that they were not sufficiently treated as commissioned officers. As long as he was at the Admiralty, he would take care that that claim should diminish until it ceased to exist. He would ask hon. Members what they would think if deputations of lieutenants and captains in the Navy came up to London to interview Members of Parliament, and if, upon hearing them, the Members went straight to the First Lord of the Admiralty? If the same system was carried on in the Army, he would like to ask hon. Members what effect it would produce on the discipline of the Army? He was quite sure that when the naval officers began to appreciate the difference in their treatment now from what it had been they would almost be surprised that so late as 1881 they took such a course as to lay their grievances before the Admiralty. As to the warrant officers, the hon. Member must remember that the grievances of this class of officers was a recent one, and was caused by the removal of pre-vions grievances. The old grievance was that these officers got no more money by going to sea than by remaining on shore. On account of that they were divided into two classes, one being sent to sea while the other remained on shore, and the consequence was that those on shore became dissatisfied. It was, however, a matter which affected the public purse, and that must be taken into consideration in dealing with it. As to the navigating officers, he sympathized with them very much, because they were a class rapidly becoming extinct; but he did not believe practical grievances existed among them. The percentage of navigating officers who were employed now was very decidedly larger than that employed in recent years. As to their being put under the orders of junior officers, the hon. Member was, no doubt, well aware that it was always so. Masters were always in a different position, on shore especially and elsewhere, to what were called the executive officers of the Navy; but these grievances had appeared owing to the absorption of a number of officers of the navigating branch in the executive branch. It was, however, extremely important as far as possible that these senior officers should be kept to their own line, and should not find themselves placed behind their juniors. The conclusion at which the Admiralty had arrived on the whole was, that it was impossible to deal with this question otherwise than by dealing with each case separately. Beyond that which he had mentioned, he did not believe the navigating officers had any grievance which they had 10 or 15 years ago, except that grievance of the disappearance of their special line.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR wished to call attention to the objectionable system adopted by the Admiralty with reference to the pensions given to widows of naval officers. In order to check the amount of the private incomes of those ladies they were required to make a declaration, and the facts so stated were made the subject of offensive inquiries. The Comptroller and Auditor General, no doubt, had pointed out that widows in one case had an income of £550, and in two or three other cases of £200 or £250 a-year of their own. But these were very rare cases, and it seemed unbecoming that the Comptroller and Auditor General should busy himself about such matters. He would, therefore, ask whether the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty could not cause a discontinuance of this inquisitorial system, which was felt to be a peculiarly painful thing to many persons?

Mr. TREVELYAN stated that he would answer the hon. Member when the House was in Committee.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(1.) £877,890, Half-Pay, Reserved Half-Pay, and Retired Pay to Officers of the Navy and Marines.

Mr. PULESTON said, it would be convenient if the Secretary to the Admiralty would redeem the pledge he had given that he would lay before the Committee a statement as to the changes to be made in the Marine Corps. He did not know whether the scheme had been prepared; but the promise to which he referred was made in July last.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked if anything had been done with regard to pensions to the widows of seamen and marines? The question was one of vital importance, and it had been more than once promised that it should be looked into. Admiral Gambier had several times submitted to the Admiralty schemes for creating these pensions, and had pointed out that there were several sources out of which they could be granted without adding to the burdens of the country—for instance, the proceeds of seamen's effects, unclaimed pay, and prize money, and other matters. Under these heads, without doubt, money could be obtained from which the unhappy widows might be granted annuities. When anything happened like the accidents to the Atalanta and Eurydice the public came forward as soon as its attention was drawn to the circumstance, and did a great deal to support the widows of the men who were lost; but nothing was ever done by the State for the widows of men who died in the fulfilment of their duty. He had been told of a case at Portsmouth, in which the widows of two men who were drowned in rendering assistance to a vessel that was lost got nothing whatever, while the widows of the men belonging to that ship, owing to the amount of public sympathy that was excited, obtained by subscription a considerable amount of money.

MR. MACLIVER said, he wished to call attention to the position of the Naval Engineers, whose pay, instead of being raised in accordance with the representations made to the Admiralty, had, in some cases, been reduced.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the subject upon which the hon. Member was speaking was not relevant to the Vote before the Committee, which related to half-pay and retired pay to officers of the Navy and Marines.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he thought the pay of Naval Engineers entered into the question before the Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member for Plymouth (Mr. MacIver) could, of course, speak upon the question of half-pay to these officers, but not upon the full pay.

MR. PULESTON suggested that the hon. Member should defer his remarks until the Vote for Pay of the Navy was reached, when there would be an opportunity of fully raising the question.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF hoped the question would not be postponed.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member for Plymouth would be perfectly right in raising the question upon the regular Vote; but to do so now was entirely out of Order.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £847,035, Military Pensions and Allowances.

MR. TREVELYAN said, perhaps he might be allowed to say a few words in reply to his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) on the subject of pensions to the widows of seamen and marines. In the first place, there were different methods in almost every Department of the State of dealing with the widows of public servants. In the Civil Service no pensions whatever were given; there were certain pensions in the Military Service, but none in the Naval Service. In that respect the Navy was so far worse off than the Army; but it was immeasurably better off than the great mass of Civil servants. The hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) had brought forward the question of pensions to the widows of seamen and marines. With regard to that question, he begged to point out that the Admiralty would have been most willing to move in the direction indicated had they felt justified in calling upon the House of Commons to provide the enormous sum which would be necessary to provide the pensions in question. But they had not felt so justified, particularly as the seamen were the best paid class of all the fighting Services of the country. The Admiralty, however, would have been glad to establish a provident fund for the relief of the widows of seamen; but when the men were questioned on the subject, it turned out that only about 3 per cent of them were willing to contribute the amount out of their pay which would have been necessary to provide that fund.

MR. MACFARLANE asked whether it was 3 per cent of the married men who objected?

MR. TREVELYAN said, it was not; but 3 per cent of all the men who had been canvassed. With regard to the widows of officers, if it was found that a very small number of them gave up their pensions, it would be a matter for consideration whether the inquiry into their private means should not be given up. But if a considerable number did give up their pensions, or did not come forward to claim them at all because their incomes were large, then he thought the Admiralty would not be justified in making any change.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he believed that this inquisition into the means of the widows of naval officers did not save very much money to the State. He was rather surprised at the statement made by the Secretary to the Admiralty with regard to the 3 per cent only of seamen of the Navy who had expressed their willingness to contribute from their pay the sum necessary to establish a provident fund. Having read the Return moved for by Mr. Egerton Hubbard (late Member for Buckingham), he thought the percentage must refer only to the number of men who were willing to contribute a proportion of their pay very much in excess of what was supposed to be necessary, having regard to the various sources indicated by the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff). Of course, if a large sum of money was proposed to be deducted from their pay, both married and unmarried men were very likely to object; but he believed that a contribution was promised by a majority of those classes, which, taken with the money derivable from the sources named by his hon. Friend, would have produced the desired pensions for their widows, without any addition to the taxation of the country. Without refreshing his memory from the Return of the late hon. Member for Buckingham, he should be sorry to state categorically his opinion as to that subject; but he thought the Secretary to the Admiralty would find that the percentage to which he had alluded did not apply to what he would call the more reasonable proposals made in behalf of the widows of the seamen of the Navy.

MR. PULESTON said, that the small percentage of the men alluded to by the Secretary to the Admiralty was probably due to the fact that no matured scheme had been laid before them on the part of the Admiralty. The general impression of the Service had been that if the Admiralty matured a scheme sufficient money would be available from the sources mentioned by Admiral Gambier to provide pensions, without calling upon the men to make any contribution at all, though an approved scheme would, he believed, have the support of all in the Service. One very strong reason for doing justice to the Navy in this respect was that it would contribute more than anything else to make the Service attractive, while, at the same time, dismissal would be regarded as the greatest possible punishment. It would also contribute to putting a stop to desertion. Therefore, it was his opinion that from a purely selfish national standpoint alone the Admiralty could well afford to make this concession, and that it would be money well invested. In reference to the marines, he would ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he would let hon. Members see the scheme promised on a former occasion, before the Committee met again upon the Naval Estimates. In adopting that course he believed the convenience of the Committee would be very much consulted.

MR. H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he believed that no clear scheme with regard to pensions for the widows of seamen and marines had ever been drawn up by the Navy. An attempt was made to do this at one time, but it was dropped, owing to difficulties which were found to exist. But, as he had already pointed out, Admiral Gambier had stated that the different stoppages and savings would be sufficient for the purpose of founding annuities, without further contribution. He, therefore, hoped the hon. Gentleman would look into this matter, and see whether upon thorough re-examination something could not be done. It was perfectly plain that seamen were not in the same position as civilians or soldiers, because they were constantly exposed to danger. With regard to the question of pensions to the widows of officers, he thought the present practice of calling upon these ladies to make a return of their private means was not fair. He did not see why a distinction should be drawn between the poorer widows and those who were better off; and if the practice were discontinued he believed that a very unpleasant grievance would be removed.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he hoped this practice would be discontinued. His attention had been drawn to the case of a widow of a naval officer in very difficult circumstances, and one of her great troubles was the battle she had with herself every year as to how she should bring herself to sign the declaration required of her. This lady had dependent upon her two female relatives, and she stinted herself very much in order to enable them to live, and she would not be able to do this but for the pension she received on account of her husband's services. It was clear from this that the practice of requiring a declaration pressed very heavily on the minds of deserving ladies, although there might be some whose consciences were not so tender as that of the lady to whom he had alluded. Then, he had been informed of the case of another lady, whose pension had been discontinued simply because, after some years, she had had an increase in her means. It was perfectly inconceivable to him that the widow of a naval officer should be dealt with in such a manner. He trusted that this system of confidential investigation, which pressed very heavily upon the ladies in question, and was by no means useful to the Service, would be done away with.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £337,991, Civil Pensions and Allowances, agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICES.

CLASS V.—FOREIGN AND COLONIAL SERVICES.

(4.) £93,570, to complete the sum for the Diplomatic Services.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR wished for some explanation with regard to the item of £10,000 on account of Her Majesty's Mission to Persia. There was nothing estimated for last year, and the amount on the earlier Estimates was £12,000.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, that nothing was included in the Estimates of last year, because there had been a long-pending dispute as to the quota to be paid by India in respect of this Mission.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he could not understand why the rent of the Minister's house at Brussels did not appear on the Estimates.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, that this matter was in the hands of the Board of Works.

MR. LEE said, there appeared to be a great want of regularity in regard to the appointments of chaplains. For his own part, he did not think they were required at all.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that during the last Parliament a Committee sat to consider this question, and reported in favour of the re-creation of these Consular chaplaincies.

MR. LABOUCHERE pointed out that a Committee had also recommended that at the age of 70, Ministers should be called upon to retire. He believed the object of this was to increase the chances of promotion; but it seemed to him a foolish suggestion, and he was sorry that the Foreign Office had acted upon it. It seemed to proceed on the assumption that at the age of 70 a man must necessarily have broken down, while it was perfectly well known that at the age in question our Ministers had shown themselves able to do excellent service. The result of this hard-and-fast line being drawn would very likely be that persons would be put into positions in which they would not do the work as well as their predecessors.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs might, if he chose, disregard the rule in exceptional cases.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked what had been done under the rule instituted by Earl Granville with regard to the changing of Ministers at the end of five years? He remembered that Baron Beust was removed because his Government said he had resided so long in England that he had become more English than German, and he also knew of cases where British subjects abroad could get nothing done for them, because the Minister wished to make himself acceptable to the Power to which he was accredited rather than to his own Government. He hoped that something would be done in the matter of changing Ministers who had been a long time at their posts.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that changes had been more frequent since Earl Granville came into Office. The principle was, no doubt, a good one, though the long and valuable services of Lord Lyons at Paris and Lord Ampthill at Berlin formed important exceptions to the general rule.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked why India was called upon to pay £15,000 a-year towards the expenses of the Embassy in China? He could not see that India had any direct concern with our relations with China, which were important only to the general interest of the Empire. Surely the taxpayers of England were far better able to pay for this Embassy than the poor people of India, who, as far as he could understand, were in no way benefited by it. In looking over the list of Embassies he was astonished to find the magnitude of the salaries paid to Ministers abroad—for instance, to the Ambassador at Constantinople, £8,000; St. Petersburg, £7,800; Brussels, £4,000; Paris, £10,000; Japan, £4,000; Spain, £5,000; and Sweden, £3,000. He might live to see the day when the hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) was Leader of that House, and he felt sure he would then make a regular crusade against this portion of the Estimates. He could not but feel that the salaries paid to Ministers abroad were far beyond the resources of the country to afford. Moreover, in many cases, there had never been much advantage in having the offices at all, except, perhaps, when the doctrine of Civis Romanus sum gave to the Englishman abroad the privilege of making himself a nuisance wherever he went. He thought that we had now arrived at a much healthier position in respect to foreign affairs, and that we ought, in consequence of the change that had taken place, to get rid of some of the salaries and charges which were created at a time when our foreign policy was quite different.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he thought that the contribution of India to the cost of the Legation in China was justified by the circumstances. The reason why the charge appeared in its present form was because India had very important and delicate interests in Persia, while the amount paid by India in connection with the Legation in China was estimated in relation to the share of Indian commerce with that country. With regard to the salaries of Ambassadors, he feared he could not hold out any hope of their being reduced. The best way of arriving at a conclusion as to whether they were too high was to compare them with the salaries paid to the Representatives of other great Powers. It had been supposed that the salaries paid to English Ministers were greater than those paid by other Powers; but subsequent examination had shown that this was not the case. His hon. Friend the Member for Galway had instanced St. Petersburg, Paris, and Constantinople, as places at which the salaries were unnecessarily large; but he could assure the Committee that it was impossible for the Ambassadors in those cities to save any money on their present allowances. He was, however, not in a position to say that our Ministers at places of less importance would not be able to do so; but, as a rule, he believed that our Ambassadors were generally out of pocket. Under the circumstances, he was not able to hold out any expectation of reduction under this head.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, as a matter of fact, Constantinople was the only city in which our Ambassadors could save any money, because he believed that there everything was paid for them. But the objection was not to the salaries at the large cities, but to those at places of minor importance—to small Courts like that of Darmstadt, where the gentleman who resided there had absolutely nothing to do, except to give a dinner occasionally to the few English living there. Economy was not to be secured by reducing the salaries at the large places; but by doing away with them at these small Courts, where a Minister was unnecessary.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE pointed out that since 1870 several Missions had been altogether suppressed.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY remarked, that anyone looking at the Estimates would observe that we were represented at Dresden by a Legation, at £750 a-year; whereas at Darmstadt, a place of less importance, we paid £1,050 a-year. He was quite aware that at one time there were reasons why we should be specially represented at the latter place; but they existed no longer. He thought this was one of those little irregularities which might be corrected when a vacancy occurred at the post.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he wished for information from the hon. Baronet with regard to the ransom of Colonel Synge in Turkey. That gentleman, whilst travelling on his own account, had very foolishly placed himself in a position in which he ought never to have been. He was seized by brigands, and the Foreign Office were saddled with a charge of £12,000 to get him set free. Consul Blunt had been obliged to go in an undignified way to make terms with the brigands—purchasing rifles and watches for them, and handing them a draft on the bank at Salonica. The Foreign Office had demurred to this payment; but it was finally charged upon the Estimates, and it was proposed to treat it as an advance. He believed the amount was still outstanding. The Turkish Government were presumed to be liable to pay this money back, but it was doubtful whether they could do so; and he should, therefore, be glad to know what steps it was proposed to take in this matter. Did the Government intend to allow Colonel Synge to get off without paying anything; did they intend to press the claim on the Turkish Government, or did they mean to wipe off the amount as irrecoverable?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that in the last resort they held the Turkish Government responsible for the repayment of the money; and he failed to see any reason why a part of the money in hand belonging to the Turkish Government should not be kept back until the ransom was paid.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR suggested, in that case, that steps should be taken to make the Foreign Office secure.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he wished to move to reduce the Vote by £1,600, the amount paid to Mr. Lascelles, as Consul and Diplomatic Agent—our Representative—in Bulgaria. He did not wish to enter into a long discussion on the question, on a side issue like this; but he must say one word as to our position in Bulgaria, because one of the grounds of his objecting to the Vote was the conduct of the Prince of Bulgaria, and the opinion that was entertained in many quarters that it was improper for us to hold any diplomatic relations with him.

After the war between Turkey and Russia there had been a persistent effort made by the English Government then in power to get the province of Bulgaria divided between Bulgaria East and Roumania. That division did take place, and Bulgaria was left, to all intents and purposes, not the large Bulgaria that was hoped for by the present Prime Minister, but consisting of the Northern part of the original Province. By the Treaty of Berlin it was laid down that a Constitution should be elaborated for Bulgaria. That Constitution he had seen reflected on in the newspapers as a bad Constitution. He had made himself familiar with that Constitution, and he must say he regretted that, in almost every instance, the Constitution of this country was not the same as that of Bulgaria. He had never heard of or seen a more sound and excellent Democratic Constitution than that which was given to Bulgaria.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member cannot discuss the question of the Constitution of Bulgaria on this Vote. He can only discuss any transaction in which Mr. Lascelles took part.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he should approach the conduct of Mr. Lascelles directly; but it was necessary for him to describe the circumstances in which the conduct he complained of took place. The Prince of Bulgaria was elected under this Constitution. There was a Chamber, and the Prince was under it—the sound principle adopted in the Constitution being that the Prince reigned and did not rule. One Ministry after another was formed, and the Prince became surrounded by foreign adventurers. The Prince was anxious that the Government should fall into the hands of these adventurers. At the commencement of the summer the Prince resolved to make a coup d'état. He announced that a plébiscite would be taken, by which autocratic power was to be given to him for five years. He went through the form of gathering together a Grand National Assembly, which was to vote him this supreme power. It was one of the grossest farces ever perpetrated.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is still discussing the question of the Constitution of Bulgaria. I must again inform him that he is bound to confine himself to the question of the conduct of Mr. Lascelles.

MR. LABOUCHERE: You will see how I come to it.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member must come to it, and not go into the whole question of the Government of Bulgaria.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he was just coming to Mr. Lascelles. This Grand National Assembly was called together—"Order!" He thought he was strictly in Order, as he was introducing the speech delivered by the German Consul General, as doyen of the Corps Diplomatique, of whom Mr. Lascelles was one. It would be seen directly that he had been obliged to make these preliminary remarks. The Grand National Assembly was called together at Sistova. It was surrounded by troops, in order to prevent the outraged people from turning the Prince out. The Corps Diplomatique met together for the purpose of addressing the Prince, and, under these circumstances, the doyen, or the gentleman who had been longest in the Corps Diplomatique, was in the habit of speaking in the name of all the members of the Diplomatic Body. He (Mr. Labouchere) might presume that the doyen's Address had been read over to Mr. Lascelles, and that his opinion was taken on the subject. At any rate, as Mr. Lascelles was at the meeting, he was responsible for what took place. What did take place was this. The doyen, speaking in the name of Mr. Lascelles and the others, said—

"The Corps Diplomatique is happy to greet your Highness, through me as intermediary, on your arrival in this town.

"The Representatives of Europe, on the eve of the meeting of the Great National Assembly, form the sincerest wish that the union between your Highness and the country may be indissolubly maintained. Your Highness, by the high destinies which have devolved upon you, constitutes, in the eyes of Europe, a guarantee of order and tranquillity, and the pledge of a happy development of Bulgaria in the path of progress."

It must be remembered that this language was addressed to the Prince, after what he should be prepared to show—had he the opportunity of making his speech in the House instead of the Committee—was one of the most outrageous and nefarious attacks upon public liberty ever perpetrated. The Prince replied to the Corps Diplomatique as follows:—

"Messieurs les Agents,

"I am happy to see you in this town under the grave circumstances which have brought me here.

"As you say, M. l'Agent, on the part of your colleagues, being in the eyes of Europe the representative and depositary of the destinies of the nation"

—why he said so, he (Mr. Labouchere) did not know; but the Corps Diplomatique, Mr. Lascelles amongst the number, listened to it—

"which has been confided to me, I do not doubt for an instant that my country, marching in the paths of progress opened to it, will always be able to justify the sympathies of the world, and the confidence which Europe evinces in us.

"I am also happy that you, MM. les Agents, being in the country, have already been able yourselves to realize what is the will of the people, guided by Divine Providence, in the accomplishment of its destinies.

"I am also happy that you, MM. les Agents, for the lively interest of which you have given me proof during this crisis, so vital for the future of the Bulgarian nation."

So that the Prince accepted the words of the doyen as a statement of the opinion, not only of the Corps Diplomatique, but of the Powers of Europe, England included. The Prince, in reply to an Address presented to him by the Representative of England, said he would be able to justify the sympathies of the world, and the confidence which England evinced in him. Then the Prince said the Corps Diplomatique had been able to realize what was the will of the people "guided by Divine Providence." Why, that was rank blasphemy. Then, with Mr. Lascelles standing by, the Prince thanked him for the lively interest he had taken in him during what he (the Prince) was pleased to call "this crisis so vital for the future of the Bulgarian nation." The Prime Minister of England had, when this took place, already received the telegram from the three Ministers who had been ejected from the country—one of whom, he had read the other day, was sent to prison, released, and again incarcerated—and the President of the Ordinary National Assembly. He would call attention to the words of the telegram. They were as follows:—

"In the hardest times for our nation we find ourselves obliged to have recourse to the generosity of the English nation, and personally to you, and most humbly to pray you to deliver the order by legality [i.e., legal order] and liberty (for which every Englishman has always been the true guardian) of our country from a foreign unrestrained and imposed militarism.

"You know, Sir, better than everybody else, that elections for the just and true expression of the national will, when taking place under the pressure of whips, bayonets, and guns—as is the case with us at present—are simple mockery of the national will, and a most flagrant violation of liberty.

"(Signed) Ex-Minister KARAVELOFF.

Ex-Minister ZANCOFF.

Ex-Minister SLAVELIKOFF.

President of the Ordinary National Assembly, SOUENAROFF."

The opinion he had expressed, therefore, was not only his own opinion derived from the correspondence, but it was the clear and distinct statement of the gentlemen who, up to the time of the coup d'état took place were supposed, and, he presumed, supposed rightly, to represent the views of the Bulgarian nation. A vote was taken in the Great National Assembly—and a unanimous vote, under the guns of the soldiery was, he believed, given in favour of the Prince. The doyen of the Corps Diplomatique, subsequently, in the presence of his colleagues, congratulated the Prince of Bulgaria upon the vote of the Assembly. He said—

"The Corps Diplomatique hastens by my voice to present to your Highness their respectful congratulations on the occasion of the solemn vote of the Great National Assembly.

"My colleagues and I are glad to note that the Bulgarian nation, under the present circumstances, has pronounced its opinion with the same unanimity as when it made choice of your Highness as the depository of its destinies. This fresh expression of the will of the Bulgarian people is a striking proof of their feelings of confidence in and fidelity towards your Highness, and of their resolution to follow you in the path in which you will lead them to ensure the progress, welfare, and prosperity of Bulgaria."

In his reply, his Highness thanked the Corps Diplomatique for their congratulations, and requested them to convey to their respective Governments the expression of his gratitude for the sympathy which had been shown him during the crisis. The other day, when the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was asked whether any communication had been received from Foreign Governments, asking that a united action should be taken to endorse, on the part of all Signatories of the Berlin Treaty, the action of the Prince of Bulgaria, the hon. Baronet had replied that such a communication had been received, but that Her Majesty's Government had declined to do so. He understood that Her Majesty's Government were not prepared to adopt the course of armed intervention. It was desirable that Her Majesty's Government should maintain, as far as possible, the European Concert; but it must be remembered that Russia had never lost an opportunity of supporting the Prince. ["Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is discussing the question of the present condition of Bulgaria in a Committee devoted entirely to Supply. He would have been in Order in doing so before the Speaker left the Chair, but he is not in Order now.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, the Committee would see the difficulty he was in. He was endeavouring, in every way he could, to avoid an infringement of the Rules. However, he would merely say this, that Mr. Lascelles had thoroughly misconducted himself. There was no reason why we should have any Representative in Bulgaria; but, at any rate, if we were to have one, it should not be a gentleman who had recognized an outrageous and nefarious attack upon public liberty, and pledged Her Majesty's Government to support it.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

Mr. Labouchere

the Consular Establishments Abroad, and for other Expenditure chargeable on the Consular Vote."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, his hon. Friend had concluded his remarks by saying that we ought not to have any Representative in Bulgaria at all. But a Representative in a country was not intended entirely, or even chiefly, to do honour to the country to which he was sent; but he was sent principally for the protection of our own people and our own trade, and in order to give us information as to what was passing in a certain portion of the world. But he did not suppose that his hon. Friend seriously intended to leave us without a Representative in Bulgaria. Departing from that ground, it was difficult to discuss this matter, because the House was not yet in possession of the Papers which he himself had only received within the last few hours. He had laid them on the Table last night, and they would be shortly in the hands of hon. Members. He had only just received the assents of the Governments interested in the publication of the documents, and therefore the Papers were only presented yesterday. They were, technically, before the House; therefore, he could refer to them. It appeared that Mr. Lascelles had succeeded in considerably modifying the form of the Declaration which was made to the Prince of Bulgaria by the Corps Diplomatique. Mr. Lascelles wrote to Earl Granville on the 15th July—having telegraphed the substance of the despatch—as follows:—

"A proposal had been originally made that the Corps Diplomatique should express the hope that the Great National Assembly would ratify the choice of the nation, which had been clearly expressed by the recent plébiscite; but I objected strongly to this, on the ground that I could not join in what appeared to me to be a direct interference in the internal affairs of the country, and an attempt on the part of the foreign Representatives to influence the vote of the Great National Assembly. My opinion was shared by the French and Italian Agents, and it was finally decided that the sentence to which I objected should be omitted from the speech."

The speech was considerably modified at Mr. Lascelles' suggestion, and the most objectionable matter was taken from it. With regard to what did appear in the speech, Mr. Lascelles wrote at considerable length. He said, writing from Sistova—

"On my arrival here on the 10th instant, I found your Lordship's telegram of the 8th instant on the subject of the Declaration which it was proposed that the Representatives of the Great Powers in Bulgaria should make on the occasion of the meeting of the Great National Assembly, and instructing me only to join in this Declaration if it should be worded as was at first proposed.

"The German Agent, who has been to Varna for the purpose of consulting his Russian and Austrian colleagues as to the best means of carrying out their instructions, has informed me that, as it seems certain that the Great National Assembly will accept the Prince's conditions without opposition, they have decided not to make the Declaration unless a change in the disposition of the Deputies should indicate a possibility of the Prince's conditions being rejected, in which case they would address a strong Declaration to the Assembly. They thought, however, that at the reception which the Prince of Bulgaria was about to hold of the Corps Diplomatique on his arrival at Sistova, it would be advisable for M. de Thielau, as doyen of the Corps, to make a speech, which would, to a certain extent, replace the declaration.

"M. de Thielau read to me the draft of the speech which he had drawn up with the approval of M. Hitrovo and M. de Burian, in which the hope was expressed that the Great National Assembly would ratify the decision of the nation as expressed by the recent plébiscite. The speech continued by assuring His Highness that the foreign Representatives, on the eve of the meeting of the Great National Assembly, formed the most sincere wishes for the maintenance of the Union between His Highness and the country, and that His Highness constituted in the eyes of Europe a guarantee of order and tranquillity, and a pledge of the development of Bulgaria in the path of progress.

"I told M. de Thielau that it appeared to me that the first part of the speech was a direct interference in the internal affairs of the Principality, in which I could not join. Your Lordship's instructions were precise upon that point, and although there was, no doubt, some difference between a formal declaration and a speech addressed to the Prince by the doyen of the Corps Diplomatique, the speech would evidently be published, and would be looked upon as an attempt on the part of the Agents to influence the vote of the Assembly. I had no objections to make to the concluding portions of the speech, although I should have preferred to omit all mention of the Great National Assembly.

"At a meeting of the Agents and Consuls-General, at which all the Representatives of the Great Powers were present, with the exception of the Russian Agent, M. de Thielau pointed out that, as he and his Russian and Austro-Hungarian colleagues had received instructions to give a very strong support to the Prince, they had thought that it would be advisable to take advantage of the reception of the Corps Diplomatique to give His Highness a proof of that support. He added that the speech had been prepared with the consent of M. Hitrovo, and had been approved by the Prince, and that, as His Highness intended to receive us immediately after his arrival, there would be no time to submit to him any alterations in it. He suggested that he might make those portions of the speech to which I had no objection in the name of all his colleagues, and then add that the Representatives of the three Empires had been instructed to express the hope that the Great National Assembly would accept His Highness's conditions.

"My French and Italian colleagues joined me in objecting to this course, which would have the effect of proving that a difference of opinion existed among the Great Powers. It was most undesirable from every point of view that this should be done, and great encouragement would be given to the Prince's opponents if it became known that the Great Powers were not agreed upon the Bulgarian Question.

"M. de Thielau then proposed that he and M. Hitrovo and M. de Burian, after the reception of the Corps Diplomatique, should ask for an interview with the Prince, in order to communicate their instructions to His Highness.

"I observed that this course would equally indicate a difference of opinion among the Powers, and it was finally decided that M. de Thielau should consult the Prince and M. de Hitrovo on their arrival, and, if they should agree to the omission of the paragraph to which I had objected, he should make a speech in the name of all the Powers."

He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) need only quote two other despatches. In a further despatch, on the 18th July, from Varna, Mr. Lascelles said—

"I told M. Hitrovo that I was sorry to have been obliged to object to the speech. Your Lordship's instructions were, however, so precise that it would have been impossible for me to have done otherwise. Even as it was, there were parts of the speech which had actually been delivered which I would gladly have seen altered; but, as all direct interference in the internal affairs of the country had been avoided, I thought myself justified in not separating myself from my colleagues, as it appeared to me most important that we should act together, and thus avoid all appearance of any divergence of opinion among the Great Powers on the Bulgarian Question, and I recognized the difficulty of making any further change in a speech which had been already submitted to the Prince, and to which His Highness had prepared a reply."

Lord Granville, in his reply to this despatch, used the following words—and with these he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) would conclude:—

"As regards the speech of congratulation made by the doyen on behalf of the Diplomatic Body to the Prince of Bulgaria, after the vote of the Assembly, of which a copy is enclosed in your further Despatch, No. 114 of the 13th inst. (which has likewise been laid before Her Majesty), I have to state to you that this speech goes further in some of its expressions than Her Majesty's Government would themselves have desired: but they can understand the difficulty you would have had in separating yourself from your colleagues on such an occasion, and the more so as the Assembly had already pronounced itself in favour of the Prince's proposals, and the address could not, therefore, be considered as designed to influence their vote, or as having the same political importance as the one delivered before the meeting of the Assembly."

MR. J. COWEN said, it was the misfortune of Members that they had had no opportunity this Session of discussing in a regular way such subjects as the one raised by his hon. Friend the Member for Northampton. The matter would have been much more appropriately considered on going into Supply rather than in Committee; but the complete control that the Government had taken of all the time of the House had driven Members to resort to Committee discussions, as it was the only chance they had of raising points of public interest. They were hampered by the Rules, and hence matters in dispute could not be fairly stated. They laboured under a further disadvantage, inasmuch as the Papers the Government had promised them had not yet been published, and they had to argue the subject, if not blindfold, certainly with very insufficient data. He would try to keep within the narrow line that the Orders of the House prescribed. But it was impossible, even faintly, to state the case without some reference to the general position of Eastern affairs. These were the facts—The people in Bulgaria complained, and with justice, that they had no direct influence on the government of their State—that the Turkish Pashas treated them unjustly, sometimes cruelly. They demanded their freedom from that domination. As a consequence of the War between Russia and Turkey this desire was in a sense gratified. The European States settled a Constitution for the Bulgarians, and a Prince was appointed to give effect to it. The idea was that the Bulgars—within the lines of this Constitution and under the rule of this Prince—were to govern themselves. That was the intention of the Great Powers. Certainly it was the intention of this country; for, whatever differences of opinion there might have been amongst them at the preliminary stage of the dispute, they were all agreed as to the sort of government that was to obtain as the result of the conflict. What had been the issue? The Prince had from the first conspired against the Constitution that had been put in operation at the commands of Europe. He had now overturned it, and established a despotism. The Bulgarian people had discovered that they did not get independence. Instead of being governed by a Turkish Pasha they were now ruled by a Russian satrap. The Prince was not only a foreigner and an adventurer himself, but his Ministers were foreigners and adventurers like him. The English Representative, by the part he took, had sanctioned this violation of the Constitution and this breaking of his oath by the Prince. This he held was a distinct interference with the internal affairs of another State, and was contrary to the settled policy of this country. It was quite true that Mr. Lascelles could not prevent the Prince's usurpation, and he was not suggesting that the Government should have taken steps to reverse it. But what he did complain of was that our Ministry should have been in such haste to endorse those high-handed proceedings, and thereby give countenance to them. Distinguished men had suffered for their precipitancy under like circumstances. Lord Russell went so far as to advise the dismissal of Lord Palmerston, who was then Foreign Minister, because he had—first in a conversation with a French Ambassador, and next in a despatch to Lord Normanby—expressed his approval of the usurpation effected by the coup d'état of Louis Bonaparte. If such strong measures could be taken with a man like Lord Palmerston, they were not to be prevented from censuring the course that Mr. Lascelles had taken under like conditions. The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had said it was not customary to withdraw Ministers. There had been instances, however, where that was done. It would be within the remembrance of some present that our Minister at Naples was withdrawn at the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) himself when the Neapolitan Government was acting in a despotic and indefensible way. There was the occasion of our withholding Ambassadorial connection with Spain, and there were numerous instances in South America—amongst them the cases of Rosas, of Mexico, and of Buenos Ayres. There was precedent enough for withdrawing a Minister from a usurping Government when we disapproved of its course. It was said, further, that our Minister had succeeded in getting the Address of the Consuls modified. But, even admitting this, the modified Address was objectionable. What he wished to know from the Government was—did they, or did they not, approve of the modified Address? Did they, or did they not, sanction the course that Mr. Lascelles had taken? He was astounded at the indifference with which the unconstitutional proceedings of Prince Alexander had been viewed in this country. A few years ago the warmest possible interest was manifested in Bulgarian affairs. The cry on all hands was that the Bulgarians should be permitted to assert and establish their independence and nationality. And yet here was a Prince who, having been charged by Europe to maintain that independence and uphold that nationality, had overturned the one and trampled upon the other, and established in his own name, and, he (Mr. Cowen) regretted to say, with the approval of our Minister, what was little less than a Russian Governorship in this new State.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF deprecated the discussion which had taken place, and declared that this attack upon Mr. Lascelles was most unfair. Whatever this gentleman had done had been condoned by Her Majesty's Government. They had acquiesced in his action, and if it had been necessary to censure anyone, it would have been much more pertinent to censure Her Majesty's Government. Between the 8th of May and the time the speech of the doyen was delivered, Mr. Lascelles secured an important alteration in it; and there could be no doubt, whatever might be said about his withdrawal, that it would be difficult to find a better man to fill the post he occupied. Things were in a dangerous state in Bulgaria, and Mr. Lascelles was most acceptable, not only to the Prince, but also to the people of the country. It was all very well for the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) to read despatches, and telegrams, and letters from ex-Ministers whom he (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) believed were at the time conspiring against the Prince of Bulgaria, and who, since they had had the administration of the affairs of the country, had done an incalculable amount of injury.

MR. LABOUCHERE rose to Order. He wished to point out to the Committee that he had not been allowed to go into questions of this kind, and that he would not be allowed to reply to the hon. Gentleman.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must say I think the hon. Member for Portsmouth is travelling a little wide of the Question.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he would not pursue the question. He must say that Mr. Lascelles, instead of being reprimanded for the course he had taken, ought to be congratulated. He had done that which was advantageous to all parties concerned; and if anybody's salary ought to be stopped it would be that of some Member of the Government, and not that of Mr. Lascelles.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, that unless hon. Members had something on their minds which they were prevented from bringing before the Committee he was afraid they had not much case. What he understood the hon. Baronet to say was this—that the leading principle on which Mr. Lascelles was required to act was as little interference as possible with the internal affairs of Bulgaria. Well, in spite of that, he abandoned the principle of non-interference—but it was only for the purpose of obtaining a modification of the original Address to the Prince. He interfered in the draft of the Address, and that was an abandonment of the principle of non-interference altogether. As he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) understood it, Mr. Lascelles would have interfered further if he had thought he could have done any good. What was Mr. Lascelles' position? He had a choice of two things, either to signify his disapproval of the action of the Prince and his colleagues, by having nothing to do with the Address, or to make the best of a bad bargain, and not separate himself from the rest of his colleagues. What was the logical conclusion of the remarks of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) with reference to Mr. Lascelles? Why this, that he would have wished him to go to the Prince, saying—"I protest against your whole proceedings, and I am going out of Bulgaria." The hon. Member would have had Mr. Lascelles go to the Prince, and say—"I so highly disapprove of your proceedings that I leave you and yours." Well, if he had done that, the Prince of Bulgaria might have replied—"If you want to leave my country, you are at perfect liberty to do so—it is your affair and not mine; but I object that you, as the Representative of England, should separate your self from the Diplomatic Body." Suppose Mr. Lascelles had gone; would anybody have taken his place? But suppose Mr. Lascelles had said to the Prince—"You have suspended the Constitution of Bulgaria." The Prince would have replied—"Not at all; I have only brought in a Peace Preservation Act." Mr. Lascelles would have said—"You have arrested a certain number of honourable gentlemen." But the reply would have been—"Not at all; I have only arrested a certain number of dissolute ruffians and village tyrants." If Mr. Lascelles had adopted the opinions of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), the Prince would have been perfectly justified in saying—"Those who live in glass houses should not throw stones."

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he should not divide the Committee on the question. They had had an opportunity of discussing the conduct of Mr. Lascelles, and of listening to the very mild defence of the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. He thought they might gather from the hon. Baronet's remarks that he agreed very much with their protest. If the Government would not go so far as to withdraw altogether our Representative from Bulgaria, he trusted they would consider the desirability of withdrawing Mr. Lascelles, and of sending someone to replace him who had not compromised himself in this extraordinary way. The hon. Baronet had said that the Address could not be altered when Mr. Lascelles counselled an alteration of it, because the Prince would not have an opportunity of saying whether he permitted it. If that was a specimen of the freedom of speech in Bulgaria, he could only say—"Heaven help Bulgaria."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked what would have been the effect of adopting the policy recommended by the hon. Member? It was not certain what would have been the attitude of France; but it was probable that at least Austria, Germany, and Russia would have agreed to a strong unmodified declaration. As it was, Mr. Lascelles detached France and Italy from their colleagues, the Representatives of Germany, Austria, and Russia, and in this way obtained a modification of the speech. The change in the speech seemed to him (Sir Charles W. Dilke) to have been a very important one. He would not go into the question touched upon by the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen) as to the total withdrawal of our Representative from Bulgaria. He could only say he did not think it would be to the interests of England to withdraw our Representative from such a country as Bulgaria. The hon. Member had mentioned some cases where it had been necessary to withdraw the British Representatives; but he could not say that much good was done by those withdrawals. It was desirable in our own interests to keep our Representative in Bulgaria to look after the interests of our own people. In the case referred to, Lord Palmerston had ceased to hold Office because he had taken important action in the internal affairs of a foreign State without consulting his Colleagues. The hon. Member had asked what the Government thought of the action of Mr. Lascelles; and he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) could only repeat that the opinion of Lord Granville would be found in the last despatch in the Papers—the despatch from which he had quoted the most important paragraph. He would repeat some lines from that despatch. Lord Granville said—

"This speech goes further in some of its expressions than Her Majesty's Government would themselves have desired; but they can understand the difficulty you would have had in separating yourself from your colleagues on such an occasion, and the more so as the Assembly had already pronounced itself in favour of the Prince's proposals; and the Address could not, therefore, be considered as designed to influence their vote, or as having the same political importance as the one delivered before the meeting of the Assembly."

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked whether it would not be a good thing to appoint local merchants to the post of Vice Consul in small unimportant places? These men would have something to live on already, and their appointment might lead to economy.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR wished to know whether there was, practically, any limit to the legal absence allowed to Consuls? The reason he asked this was, because he had heard many comments passed as to the absence from his post of a Consul in Egypt for 18 months or two years.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Why was he absent?

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR did not know why this gentleman had been absent so long. This, he knew, was only a solitary case; but it was an instance of an over-generous allowance of leave. It seemed to him that if this gentleman could be spared away from his post for so long, there was good ground for reducing his salary.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE did not know who the hon. Member referred to; but if he would give him (Sir Charles W. Dilke) private information on the point, he would look into the matter. The Vice Consuls in Egypt did not hold important offices. With regard to the question put to him by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) as to the small Vice Consulates, there was no absolute rule in the Foreign Office as to whether the persons selected should be persons sent out from England or persons on the spot. The Department encouraged the appointments of persons on the spot, and a great many of the less important Consulships were held by local merchants. There were cases where foreign complications had arisen, or were likely to arise, in which it was as well to send out Consuls from England.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that in some instances the Established Church chaplains attached to the Consulates were paid by the State. There was no reason why this should be, and he thought it would be much more satisfactory if the chaplains were paid by the subscriptions of persons living in the localities. He was told that it was the rule for the State to pay the chaplains a sum equal to that subscribed; and if that system existed, he hoped his hon. Friend (Sir Charles W. Dilke) would take means to put an end to it. He should let it be known at the Consulates that if they wanted chaplains they should pay for them.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the practice of appointing paid chaplains was being put an end to as vacancies occurred. It was, however, difficult to abolish paid chaplaincies that had existed in the past.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he proposed to move the reduction of this Vote by the amount of the Muscat Subsidy, which he considered a totally unnecessary charge. The necessity for it had passed. Years ago it was considered only temporary, and yet from time to time it was proposed, and yet no ground in the world was adduced in support of it. In, however, last year, one of the Lords of the Treasury, in a letter written by him, said—

"I take this opportunity of recommending you to remind Lord Granville that no payment should be made of the Muscat Subsidy for 1880-1 without the express sanction of Her Majesty's Treasury."

It seemed to him that the view the Treasury took of the matter was correct, and that this subsidy should be no longer granted. It amounted to £1,800 per annum.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. CROPPER wished to know whether any part of the Muscat Subsidy was charged to the revenues of India?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, the payment of this subsidy had been brought about by a series of complicated circumstances. Some years ago the Indian Government agreed to the subsidy; and, subsequently, when Sir Bartle Frere went on his mission with the object of suppressing the Slave Trade, it was agreed that the subsidy should be continued to the Sultan of Muscat—being made jointly by India and England. So long as the Sultan of Muscat, as well as the Sultan of Zanzibar, continued to fulfil the obligations he had undertaken, it would be incumbent on the Government to pay half the subsidy. The subject was not lost sight of by the Government, and when the first opportunity to reduce the charge occurred they would avail themselves of it.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, the statement of the noble Lord on this subject was distinguished by the accuracy which always characterized his answers. He (Mr. Arthur O'Connor), however, was sorry he had not been able to gather from the noble Lord anything to explain the departure of the Treasury from the attitude they took up in November, 1880. If this letter he had quoted from was well grounded—and it appeared to have been—the answer of the noble Lord was entirely out of accord with it, and required some explanation. He was prepared to withdraw his Motion on the understanding that the Government were considering the matter.

MR. HEALY said, that before the Motion was withdrawn, he wished to deprecate the zeal with which Her Majesty's Government devoted their attention to putting down the Slave Trade in other countries, without turning their attention to the slave trade in Ireland.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(7.) £7,047, to complete the sum for Tonnage Bounties, &c. and Liberated African Department.

(8.) £870, to complete the sum for the Suez Canal (British Directors).

MR. MONK asked the Government if they thought it desirable to continue paying £1,400 a-year to keep Directors of the Suez Canal Company in Paris, in order to attend an occasional meeting, and to communicate occasionally with M. de Lesseps. He was aware that the late Government had fixed the remuneration; but it appeared to him that the duties of these gentlemen were such as appertained to the Embassy at Paris. He wished to know whether the matter had been considered by the present Government, and whether they thought it desirable that three Directors should be maintained at a cost of £1,400 a-year?

Lord Frederick Cavendish

He wished to know, also, what the item in the Estimates "extra receipts," which was set down at £800, really meant?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, the extra receipts were, firstly, fees paid to the Directors of the Suez Canal Company; and, secondly, the interest on the shares that might be called "qualifying shares," bought by this country to enable the Directors to sit on the Board. This matter had not been now for the first time brought under his notice; and he believed that some Correspondence furnished last year showed the duties of the Directors to be important, and such as occupied a great deal of time.

MR. MONK wished to know whether the noble Lord would give an assurance to bring this subject of the permanent resident Directors, who were not connected with the Embassy, before the Government?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he should be most happy to consider the matter, and bring it under the notice of the Government.

Vote agreed to.

(9.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he objected to an item in this Vote for the Falkland Islands. Last year there was a Vote for £1,200 for Gambia in aid of the Mail Service; but that was cut out because the income exceeded the expenditure; but now a precisely similar charge, amounting to £1,000, was made in aid of the Mail Service to the Falkland Islands. Those Islands did not, however, require this aid, and it was purely a gratuity. They were progressing very remarkably, and the population, which in 1861 was 566, was now 1,600. The Revenue in 1867 was £6,900; in 1876, £9,150; in 1878, £11,576. The imports had risen from £15,000, in 1865, to £38,000, in 1879; and the exports from £17,000, in 1865, to £71,340, in 1879. He doubted if there was any place in the world which could show the same increase in population, exports, imports, and revenue. Every year there was a surplus; and if for the same reason the grant to the Gambia was withdrawn, a fortiori this grant ought also to be withdrawn. He, therefore, begged to move the reduction of the Vote by £1,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, that, owing to certain circumstances, the charges for this Mail Service had been increased, and the whole cost would be a very heavy burden upon these Islands.

MR. COURTNEY explained that the breakdown of a schooner, which had carried on part of the service, had necessitated arrangements which increased the cost from £800 to £1,800, and of this the Islands would pay £800.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR could not regard the explanations as sufficient. He had shown, from official statistics, that there was no necessity whatever for this grant, seeing that the Islands had no debts and had an annually recurring surplus. The surplus this year would be considerably more than the proposed grant in aid. However, it was pretty plain that the Committee hardly cared to divide, and he would not divide upon the point.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he wished to draw attention to the item for Heligoland. He complained of the Vote not being limited to the Governor's salary, as had been decided by the Colonial Office and the Treasury. He also wished to ask some questions respecting Natal and the Transvaal. There was an over-draft made by the British authorities in the Transvaal, some time ago, on the Standard Bank to the extent of £111,000. That, he believed, had not been repaid, and he did not know whether any steps had been taken to repay it. But when an officer of the Treasury was asked about it by a Select Committee, he said that, in the event of the Bank calling that sum in, he supposed it would be necessary to apply immediately to Parliament for a Vote in aid. Another answer would, he thought, cause the Boers to be rather glad of the Convention. The officer said it was hoped that it might be possible to impose taxation to the extent of £50,000 or £60,000 on the Natives, and that might prevent the necessity of applying to Parliament. The Boers had, by their heroic stand, not only saved their independence, but secured themselves from a deliberate plan by the British Treasury to tax them in order to repay the expenses which the British had chosen to incur, including this over-draft. He was glad that that expectation had been disappointed. The money would have to be paid some time or other, and he presumed it would be necessary to ask Parliament for a Vote. He wished to know what steps had been taken with regard to that matter?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH replied, that, with respect to the Heligoland Vote, Heligoland was not in the same position as the Falkland Islands, for it had no surplus. With regard to the other matter, in consequence of the Convention with Boers, it would be necessary for the Government, this Session, to propose a Vote in aid, and then the subject of this over-draft could be discussed.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(10.) £1,105, to complete the sum for the Orange River Territory and St. Helena (Non-Effective Charges).

(11.) £17,300, to complete the sum for Subsidies to Telegraph Companies.

CLASS VI.—NON-EFFECTIVE AND CHARITABLE SERVICES.

(12.) £209,980, to complete the sum for Superannuations and Retired Allowances.

(14.) £17,900, to complete the sum for the Relief of Distressed British Seamen Abroad.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, some extraordinary charges upon this Vote had been allowed by the Treasury. There was a case in which a black seaman on board the Daisy committed an assault on a white seaman. The man was put in irons and ordered home. Before the arrival of the ship at New York, however, he was brought up on a writ of habeas corpus and discharged, and the expenses of those proceedings were charged to the public funds in this Vote. The case could not, however, under any circumstances, come under the head of "Distressed Seamen Abroad."

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY said, that was an exceptional case, and would not occur again.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR was afraid that the case was not exceptional, for there were two other cases mentioned on the same page. Some seaman on board the Ocean Express at Rio Janeiro went on shore and got drunk. He was locked up, and the captain of the vessel made an allegation before the Vice Consul that the man had deserted, and so got an endorsement on the man's articles, and then proceeded to weigh anchor. But before he got away the Vice Consul learned that the man was locked up, and notified that to the captain. The captain, however, went away, and the seaman's wages now appeared on this Vote. The authorities ought to have looked after the captain, and obtained the man's wages from him. Then there was a third case, in which a seaman was described as a deserter, but whose wages were charged on this Vote.

Vote agreed to.

(15.) £423,000, to complete the sum for Pauper Lunatics, England.

(16.) £39,588, to complete the sum for Pauper Lunatics, Scotland.

(18.) £2,021, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Charitable and other Allowances, Great Britain.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked why a sum of £680 was paid to Polish refugees; and also why £1,300, under the head "Her Majesty's Charities and Bounties (Scotland)," should be voted? There was, he added, nothing so demoralizing as these charitable doles, and he did not understand their appearing in a Liberal Government's Estimates.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH replied, that the grants to Polish refugees were diminishing; and the charitable doles in Scotland were fixed by Act of Parliament. Therefore, although he agreed that they were worthy of consideration, they could not be dealt with.

MR. HEALY asked whether the Polish refugees were persons who had been in rebellion against their Sovereign?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he was unable to inform the hon. Member; but the grants were fixed in 1864.

MR. O'KELLY inquired whether these people were connected with the Polish Committee in London?

MR. O'DONNELL said, he could assure his hon. Friend that these people were not connected with the Polish Committee. They were the historical representatives of the Polish cause in this country, and had nothing to do with the Nihilists. Russia had no more right in Poland than England had in Ireland, and he should support the grants to these refugees.

CLASS VII.—MISCELLANEOUS.

(19.) £19,883, to complete the sum for Temporary Commissions.

(20.) £3,927, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Expenses.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he wished to refer to an item of £10 in this Vote for the Duchy of Lancaster. He was sorry the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright) was not present, as he would have repeated his question which he put a few days ago with regard to the property of the Duchy in the Savoy, as to which there was some unfinished arrangement between the Duchy of Lancaster and the Woods and Forests Office. Perhaps the noble Lord could answer the question.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he did not think the point could possibly arise upon this Vote.

Vote agreed to.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, it appeared a little unreasonable to proceed with the Votes of the Revenue Department—the heaviest Votes in the whole Estimates—at this hour (5.30), and when the House was weary with their week's labours. It was hardly fair to expect Members to enter into a discussion on such large and important Votes now; and, therefore, he hoped the noble Lord would consent to report Progress.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH pointed out that due notice had been given of these Votes. It must be borne in mind that after all they had only been at work with the Estimates two hours.

MR. PULESTON reminded the Committee that many Members had met at great inconvenience for the purpose of transacting Business; and he hoped, therefore, that good progress would be made with the Estimates.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR admitted that there was good reason for pressing Supply forward; but it must be remembered that the very men who were now in attendance were the very men whose labours in Parliament had been the most heavy, and the very men who were most in need of the Saturday break. Important questions were involved in the Votes of the Revenue Department; for instance, there were the questions of the out-door officers of the Customs, the grievances of the telegraph clerks, and, no doubt, much discussion would be excited upon the Post Office administration.

MR. CHILDERS suggested that they should take the Customs and Inland Revenue Votes, and report Progress when they came to the Post Office Votes.

REVENUE DEPARTMENTS.

(21.) £757,737, to complete the sum for the Customs.

(22.) £1,553,471, to complete the sum for the Inland Revenue.

(23.) £407,767, to complete the sum for the Post Office Packet Service.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.

(The Lord Privy Seal.)

(Nos. 187, 204.) REPORT.

Amendments reported (according to order).

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, the noble Lord (Lord Dunsany), who was not then present, had an Amendment on the Paper to the effect that—

“The tenant shall not on his holding, without the consent of his landlord, break up any ancient pasture or meadow land.”

He wished to know if the Government had any objection to accept that Amendment, because, if not, he would move it?

LORD CARLINGFORD said, the Amendment was quite unnecessary, as the case of waste committed by a tenant was fully dealt with by the existing law.

THE EARL OF COURTOWN said, he thought the subject a very important one, and he could not see what possible objection the Government had to accepting the Amendment.

LORD O'HAGAN said, the existing law was sufficient to meet the case. There could not be the slightest doubt that an injunction would be adequate protection against waste being committed by a tenant.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that as this was not a question which would be decided by the Commissioners he would not press the Amendment.

LORD HARLECH could not see why the Government should object to the Amendment.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the objection of the Government was to putting in the Bill particular exceptions when general words answered equally well.

THE EARL OF COURTOWN said, that he had drawn up an Amendment to the clause, for the purpose of enabling the landlord to exercise his rights with regard to wreck and seaweed, &c., on the seashore. The Government had an Amendment on the Paper dealing with the same subject; but he thought the Government proposal did not go far enough. His Amendment was to insert the words "exercising rights to wrecks and royalties," as one of the incidents of tenancy reserved to the landlord.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, that he was going to add words to his Amendment which he hoped would satisfy the noble Earl.

THE EARL OF COURTOWN asked what these words were. He did not like to compromise his position by giving up what he had got for what he did not know.

LORD CARLINGFORD read his Amendment, which reserved to the landlord the right of—

"Passing and re-passing to and from the seashore with or without horses and carriages for exercising any royal franchise belonging to the landlord."

The point, he said, had been carefully considered by the Government, and he thought his words were better than those of the noble Earl. He also intended to improve them by adding the words "right of property or."

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, he thought the words of the Lord Privy Seal would best answer the purpose in view. This Amendment was very necessary, as much drift timber had already been lost through the ill-will of the tenants.

THE EARL OF COURTOWN said, that he would not press his Amendment.

Amendment (Lord Carlingford) agreed to.

Clause 5 (Incidents of tenancy subject to statutory conditions).

THE EARL OF LIMERICK moved, in page 7, line 21, to leave out the words "was lawfully entitled to out," and substitute the words "may be entitled to out."

LORD CARLINGFORD considered the Amendment unnecessary; but, at the same time, saw no great objection to it.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 8 (Determination by court of rent of present tenancies).

THE EARL OF PEMBROKE moved, in page 11, line 17, to leave out ("made payable,") in order to insert the word ("increased.") He said he had moved this Amendment in Committee, perhaps upon very short notice, and he had been asked to bring it up on the Report. The object of the Amendment was to prevent the tenant from being misled by the words in the Bill as to his position and rights under it. All who had property knew the great likelihood of a man misleading himself as to the value of the improvements he had made by way of set-off against rent or arrears.

LORD CARLINGFORD opposed the Amendment. He said it was conceivable, in some future condition of things, that though the rent might not have been increased it might be inequitable. That might be the case if, quite independent of landlord or tenant, there were a change in the value of property.

THE EARL OF PEMBROKE said, he was at a loss to conceive how the Amendment would oblige the Commissioners to maintain an inequitable rent.

Amendment negatived.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL asked the Lord Privy Seal whether under the clause it was possible to make an agreement such as that which he quoted the other night, by which the proprietor of landed property in the West of Ireland might make an improvement lease in which the rent was increased a few shillings every year, so that the rent per acre would eventually increase from 1s. an acre to 14s. an acre? He did not know whether it was the intention of the Government to prevent such leases; but he was quite sure that that was the effect of the Bill.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he was not able to answer the noble Duke's question off-hand. He could not, however, himself see that the question applied to the clause at all.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he was afraid that the clause would prevent any increase of rent being made upon a tenant in respect of any improvement made during the 15 years' term. In the case he quoted the other day, a few shillings increase was made by agreement in five or six years. Such cases as this were universally recognized in Ireland, and were extremely beneficial to both parties. Under this Bill it would be impossible to make such agreements.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE, agreeing with the noble Duke, said that the landlord might desire to let at a low rent during the first few years in consideration of the tenant making certain improvements, and then to raise the rent to a sum more nearly approximating to the value of the land—would such an arrangement be legal under the Bill or not?

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, surely noble Lords did not imagine that the Bill was for the improvement of Ireland, because if they did they were very much mistaken. Its result would certainly be to check improvement in the country.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL suggested to the Government that it would be wise, before the Bill returned to the House from the Commons, to insert some power to the Court to sanction such arrangement as he had mentioned.

EARL CAIRNS said, that such an arrangement could be made in a lease sanctioned by the Court for 31 years.

LORD CARLINGFORD agreed that there was no question at all that it could be done.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, it was no use suggesting that anything should be put into the Bill in "another place," because they could only deal with the Amendments made by this House; and if this clause was to be altered it must be done now.

THE DUKE OF ABERCORN, who had the following Amendment on the Paper:—Clause 8, at end of sub-section 8, page 11, insert—said, he intended to withdraw it. The noble Duke pointed out that a great deal of the prosperity of Ulster was due to the good feeling between landlords and tenants, which had been one of the results of the Ulster tenant right custom. He was sure the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury), in his Amendment the other night, did not intend to interfere with this custom; and if his Amendment could be shown to have any such tendency, he was convinced the noble Marquess would be ready to make whatever qualifications were necessary.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: The noble Duke has rightly interpreted my views with respect to this Amendment. I do not intend to interfere with any rights enjoyed under the Ulster Custom, and I before stated decidedly that my Amendment would have no such effect. It simply amounts to this—that it is a notice for the future to all persons purchasing a holding that the amount which they may give for the purchase of that holding will not be held to be a just cause for reducing the rent at the time payable in respect thereto. That cannot affect any past transaction. At the same time, if it should be thought that any modifications are desirable in order to obtain that end, I shall be most willing to accept them.

(Provision as to certain claims of pasturage and turbary.)

("Where the tenant of a holding by virtue of his tenancy exercises over uninclosed land a right of pasturing or turning out cattle or other animals in common with other persons, or exercises a right of cutting and taking turf in common with other persons (which right is in this section referred to as a common right, and which other persons, together with the tenant, are in this section referred to as commoners), then if such holding becomes subject to a statutory term the Court may, during the continuance of such term, on the application of the landlord, or of any commoner, by order restrain the tenant from exercising his right of pasture or cutting or taking turf in any manner other than that in which it may be proved to the Court that he is, under the circumstances and according to the ordinary usage which has prevailed amongst the commoners, reasonably entitled to exercise the same.")

He moved also to amend the proposed clause by inserting after the word ("commoner") the words ("with the consent of the landlord.")

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 21 (Provision as to existing leases).

THE EARL OF PEMBROKE moved, in page 17, line 42, to leave out the words ("valued under the Act relating to the valuation of rateable property in Ireland at an annual value of,") and substitute the words ("held at a rent or rents,") the object being to substitute actual rent for rateable value. He remarked that one effect of the change he proposed would undoubtedly be to lower the figure at which tenants were to be allowed to contract themselves out of the Act. Most of their Lordships, he believed, would agree with him in thinking that such a change would be an advantage.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he was unable to agree to the Amendment. A line drawn by public authority was, for such a purpose as this, much better than one drawn by private individuals in the case of a particular farm. The Government were of opinion that £150 valuation was the lowest figure at which the parties ought to be permitted to contract themselves out of the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he thought they were not demanding a great deal if they asked that the greatest facilities should be given to the parties to arrange between themselves, in respect to future tenancies, the terms on which farms should be held. The Government were actually jealous of free contract—they loved servitude, and they objected to give the slightest portion of enfranchisement to the Irish landlord and tenant. They seemed to think that the Irish tenant should be treated as a child under paternal Government; but surely it was reasonable to suppose that a man who had risen in the social scale was able to protect himself.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, that if the noble Marquess consulted the Irish farmers he would find that their ideas of what constituted liberty were very different from his. What he called liberty they would call servitude. The Government felt that, in the circumstances of Ireland, the tenant could not safely be left to arrange these matters with his landlord, and that, consequently, it was necessary to protect him.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY pointed out that the question of liberty could arise only in regard to future tenancies. He did not think the Irish farmers, if they rightly understood the case, would accept the noble Lord's strange and re-actionary definition of liberty.

The Earl of Pembroke

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he understood that the effect of this clause was general, and that in every case where the valuation was over £150 the parties might contract themselves out of the Act.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he had no doubt that the clause as it stood applied to present as well as to future tenancies. It appeared to him that the reasons urged against the Amendment moved in "another place" by a Relative of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) were equally applicable to the present proposal.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, the Amendment did not deal with the same case as that dealt with by the Amendment referred to by the noble and learned Lord, and moved in "another place" by Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice. That Amendment was intended to prevent any tenant above the £100 limit from applying to the Court for a judicial rent. If it had been carried every tenant in Ireland above that limit would have been precluded from going to the Court, whether he wished to do so or not. The clause now before the House dealt only with purely voluntary arrangements made with the full consent of both parties. These could, no doubt, as the noble and learned Lord had stated, be made either with present as well as with future tenants; but it was quite clear that in the case of the former, the tenant, unless it were to his advantage, would decline to contract himself out of the Act, and would remain under the protection of the Court. The clause would, therefore, operate to the tenant's disadvantage only in the case of a new letting; and as to this, there was no reason why a free contract should not be made by a farmer rented at over £150. In any case, the Amendment was not in pari materia with that mentioned by the noble and learned Lord.

Clause 31 (Emigration).

THE EARL OF CARNARVON moved, in page 26, lines 2 and 3, to substitute the words "family or families" for the words "a sufficient number." The Amendment, if agreed to, would enable the Land Commission, on being satisfied that a family or families in any district desired to emigrate, to take the necessary measures for enabling them to do so. He objected strongly to the limitations which had been introduced into the Emigration Clause in "another place;" but this was the only Amendment which he should submit to their Lordships. It would, he explained, enable the Land Commission to make the family the unit of their system of emigration.

VISCOUNT MONCK regretted that the clause had ever been introduced, as a grant of £200,000 was so absurdly small that it might as well be struck out altogether. At the same time, he hoped the Government would accede to the very reasonable request of the noble Earl, and allow the Commissioners to deal not only with any State or Colony, or public Company, but also with individuals who could give reasonable security.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that the Amendment of the noble Earl could not be accepted by the Government, for it would be inconsistent with the policy of the clause. It was not intended that the Court should go about Ireland and pick up one family here, and another family there, but to relieve the congestion in some particular districts. It seemed to him that if they were merely to relieve individual families, they would be simply putting money into the pockets of these families. With regard to the regrets that had been expressed at the smallness of the sum to be applied to emigration, he had to say that the whole scheme partook of the nature of an experiment; but if it should be found to work well and usefully, it would, no doubt, be made the basis of further experiment and expenditure.

LORD WAVENEY read a communication from Mr. Wilson, saying that there might be difficulty in dealing with immigrant families in Australia; but that individual immigrants of either sex could easily obtain employment. New South Wales had contributed £2,500,000 to the furtherance of emigration, and New Zealand £1,000,000. Those two countries and Canada were careful of the welfare of the emigrants on their arrival. The immigration which they encouraged was, in fact, such as would relieve the existing pressure on the labour market of this country.

LORD EMLY said, he was of opinion that the system of emigration which the noble Lord had sketched was likely to allure away the very men who might be called the bone and sinew of the land. The sort of emigration that was required was the emigration of families, and that would not be secured to the necessary extent by the Amendment of the noble Earl, which would only lead to a family here and a family there being selected. He regretted that the experiment was not to be tried on a larger scale than was proposed by the Bill, so as to remove from the West Coast of Ireland, from Mayo round to Cork, a large population which were now living in misery and discomfort.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, there was a general feeling in all parts of the House that a great deal of the chance of the successful working of the Bill in the direction of relieving congested districts in Ireland had been frustrated by the unfortunate concessions made by the Government in the other House. The futility of the clause in respect to emigration was deeply to be regretted. Every person who had commented on this subject outside of the mere political and Party fight of the day had recognized in the most earnest terms that nothing but a free and efficient system of emigration could be of any real service for Ireland in the long run. He asked whether the clause as now drawn would not be construed as a Parliamentary engagement not to go further in the promotion of emigration at another time—whether the words would not be held by persons with whom the Government had engaged, and with whom they dealt as power with power, that a promise had been made from which they could not recede? He suggested that after the Limitation Clause the words, ("unless Parliament shall otherwise order") should be inserted.

LORD CARLINGFORD pointed out that if the experiment proved successful, and that it was found desirable to go farther, Parliament would not be prevented by anything in the Bill from so doing.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that that being so he did not see what objection could be offered to the words he had suggested. His object was to prevent it being said, with any force in future years, that the Government and Parliament had by the Bill pledged itself not to go further.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that this subject had been considered carefully in the other House. The noble Marquess knew the jealousy it had excited. He (the Earl of Kimberley) did not share that jealousy, and would, personally, have been glad to have seen a larger limit; but the proposal was in the nature of an experiment, and if it failed it would come to nothing, while, if it succeeded, there would be the strongest motive to go further.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the words in question were—“Provided always, that there shall not be expended by virtue of the authority hereby given a greater sum than two hundred thousand pounds.”

Those words did not prevent Parliament sanctioning a larger scheme hereafter if it thought proper to do so.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL remarked, that he had looked at this clause as simply the beginning of an experiment. He was perfectly satisfied his noble Friend knew there were a great number of the 600,000 families that had been referred to who, for their own good and the good of the country, could be removed. His noble Friend must know that this experiment ought to be tried on a larger scale; but the Government had sacrificed their own opinions on this matter to the state of Parties in the other House. Still, there was this to be said for it, that it gave room for an experiment on a small scale, and, if it succeeded, it might, with the consent of Parliament, be extended. He could not avoid this opportunity of expressing his belief, having some personal knowledge of a similar state of things in the Highlands of Scotland, that with regard to the class of tenants holding farms under £10 valuation, they could not hold their own under the economic conditions of the country, and any measure which gave them a permanent interest in the land was a pure delusion.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Clause 56 (Definitions).

LORD CARLINGFORD moved, in page 40, line 4, to leave out from (“which”) to the end of the paragraph, and insert—

(“The Land Commission may by order declare fit to be purchased as a separate estate for the purposes of this Act.”)

That would enable the Commission to deal with any portion of an estate as an estate.

LORD EMLY said, that this Amendment would meet some of the greatest difficulties of the case, for the Commission would be able to deal with one or two, or three townlands, as they thought fit. The Amendment would make the clause far more operative than before.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 57 (Tenancies to which the Act does not apply).

LORD INCHQUIN moved, in subsection 7, the omission from the words (“Any holding let by written contract of tenancy and therein expressed to be so let to the tenant”) of the words from (“by written contract”) to (“expressed to be so let”)—the effect of which would be to exempt such tenancies from the operation of the Bill.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, the clause was a copy of one in the Act of 1870, which had never been complained of.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, the Act of 1870 was a very different measure. It was desirable that in future contracts should be in writing. If the Amendment were agreed to he would propose to add at the end of the subsection—(“Provided that any such letting after the passing of this Act shall be in writing.”)

Amendments agreed to.

Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 207.)

Order of the Day for suspending Standing Order No. XXXV. read.

Moved, “That the said Standing Order be suspended.”—(The Lord Privy Seal.)

On question, resolved in the affirmative; Standing Order suspended accordingly.

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 3^d.”—(The Lord Privy Seal.)

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: In rising now at the last stage of this very important measure I wish to trouble your Lordships with a few observations, although I do not wish to renew the discussion that has taken place on the clauses; for the Bill has been brought up to this House so late in the Session that it has been absolutely impossible to give it that full and careful consideration which such an exceptional, and, I may almost say, a revolutionary measure deserves. The first point which I wish to note is what has fallen from Her Majesty's Ministers. We have had a clear admission from them that this Bill does contain distinctly the principle of the "three F's." Secondly, we have learnt in no doubtful manner the value of pledges, promises, and assurances, given in other places, which almost constituted a bond on the faith of Parliament. Lastly, I hope I may say, without giving offence, I never remember since I have been in the House any great question on which such a feeble defence was offered by Her Majesty's Ministers for such a very sweeping measure. I never remember such an absence of argument in defence of a particular measure. On the other hand, I think the changes that have been made in the Bill constitute, in many respects, great improvements; but I should be wrong if I said that the structure of the Bill has been materially altered; the vicious principles which were in it originally it still contains. This House has been attacked by irresponsible speakers and writers for the alterations which it has ventured to make in a measure which is assumed to be far more popular than it is; but I believe it would have been truer and fairer to say that the moderation of this House, taking the question as a whole, has been singularly illustrated in what it has done. The effect of the changes made has been to make this very reactionary and sweeping legislation somewhat more experimental and tentative than it originally was; and, therefore, I look on the changes made with great satisfaction. The vicious principles to which such great objections have been taken, as much on the other side of the House as on this, remain in the Bill without much alteration. The Bill gives durability of tenure; it appoints a judicial tribunal to settle questions of rent between landlord and tenant; it takes away the landlord's rights without giving him compensation for improvements; and for the first time almost it divorces landlords from their duties and rights in connection with the soil. By the Bill we go as far as we can to establish a pauper-peasant proprietary in Ireland. I might add that it is a triumph for the Land League, while Ireland is left in the same distracted, convulsed, discreditable condition that it has been in for the last year. If it be so, it is surely not amiss to ask—what is all this for? I should say, judging from the discussions which have taken place, that there are three reasons. The first is some vague idea of preventing landlords in the future from committing any injustice to their tenants; secondly, there is a still more vague and fantastic notion of remedying some of the old injustice perpetrated in ancient times in Ireland; and, thirdly, the main argument and the staple of the eloquent speech of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack was that it was hoped to pacify and to content Ireland. I will say a few words upon each of these. In the first place, the hope of preventing landlords from committing injustice on their tenants. My answer to that is that, practically speaking, there is no injustice at present prevailing. By the Prime Minister and by noble Lords, his Colleagues in this House, testimony has been borne to the conduct of Irish landlords on the whole, and the fairness and humanity with which they deal with their tenants. A recent Return, embracing 22 counties, shows that the proportion of evictions which could be fairly brought home to the conduct of the landlords was reduced to something considerably less than 1 per cent. But if you are by legislation to guard against the possible abuse by landlords of their rights or powers, why and how can you limit that legislation to them? I defy you to draw the line between the owners of land and the owners of other property. Or if, indeed, you are prepared to make any such distinction, you will find it very dangerous. I need not tell the House that when you make laws regulating the profits of property, you place yourselves and the Constitution on a very slippery incline; and, more than that, you distinctly prepare Ireland for a very different form of Government from that which it has hitherto enjoyed. If it be true that you think freedom of contract is impossible in Ireland, then you mean that the Irish people are not fit for free institutions, and are not a free people. But when you come to the argument that you propose by legislation in 1881 to remedy the ancient misgovernment and misrule of Ireland, I wonder if anyone can seriously entertain such a notion. I am perfectly willing to admit that there has been in the past the greatest misgovernment, oppression, and cruelty displayed by England towards Ireland; but, granting that, what does it prove now? For the last 50 or 60 years England has by her Governments and Parliament loyally striven to efface the memory and trace of these ancient wrongs. She has given absolutely equal legislation to Ireland. She has never stinted money, sympathy, help in every way; and I am bound to say, during the last 12 months, Ireland has unhappily repaid her by, to use the words of the Prime Minister, "disabling, dishonouring, and degrading" the House of Commons. Ireland has disabled and dishonoured the House of Commons, and she has paralyzed the action of the Government, when she induced Her Majesty's Ministers to lay such legislation as this on the Table of the House. There is not, therefore, very much value to be attached to that argument. But then comes a contention, and a more important one, which was dwelt upon the other night with much effect and eloquence by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, when he told us that by this legislation you may hope to pacify and content the people of Ireland. What is really the chance of this? When I look back to the history of Ireland I see three influences at work there very plainly. In the first place, in all historical times Ireland has been the greatest difficulty of this country. Spenser, the poet and statesman of the Elizabethan age, opened his view of the state of Ireland by wondering how a country endowed with such gifts of nature and soil should be in such a state of desperate and hopeless disorder. So, too, the late Sir George Cornwall Lewis dwelt on the fact that if there were only 20 bad persons in a barony of Ireland it would be enough to set on fire the whole county, so inflammable are the people. Secondly, I know that just in proportion as the government of Ireland has been according to Irish ideas, so has been the misgovernment and misery of society. And just in proportion as there has been a firm and kindly Government, so has prosperity returned. Every one of those outrages which have been happening in Ireland, which, if they did not justify, yet caused, in a great measure, this legislation, are, down to their minutest details, of ancient date.

The Earl of Carnarvon

They have been occurring for generations past. The only difference has been that in former times you had a strong and effective Government that gave no countenance to this notion of governing Ireland by Irish ideas. And this, with one exception, has been the invariable case in Ireland. That exception was the period when Tyrconnel was in power. Now, unfortunately, a different method has been adopted, and I have very great doubt of the result. When Tyrconnel governed the country according to Irish ideas I need not tell your Lordships that of all the miserable and disgraceful pages of English and Irish history, the page recording his Administration was, perhaps, the worst and most discreditable. But I am free to admit that when you have a very exceptional state of things your remedy must sometimes be exceptional. Great advantages are purchased by great sacrifices; and it is an extravagant price that Her Majesty's Government ask Parliament to pay. My Lords, nature has bound together these two Islands in an unhappy and ill-assorted union. It would have been better had Ireland been 1,000 miles away from the English coast. But this has not been so; and the great qualities which exist on either side of the Channel—qualities which might enrich and make happy both peoples—have been, by unhappy misrule and the malice of demagogues, perverted from a blessing into a curse. If, indeed, this Bill could set straight all the difficulties in the relations between England and Ireland, great as the price we are called on to pay, I should not think it too great. But, so far as I can understand it, the Bill will only aggravate every one of the difficulties and dangers with which we have to deal. I will mention one of these to which little allusion has been made in this House. For the last 40 or 50 years no one point has been more agreed to by men of all opinions than that a great source of mischief and danger to Ireland arises out of what has been called absenteeism. But this Bill makes absenteeism, hitherto occasional, permanent. You cannot expect that any landlord who is henceforward subject to the provisions of this measure will care to retain either his residence or his property in that country if he can avoid it. Who can hope that any improvements will be made by landlords which can possibly be avoided? If you expropriate the landlords, you at the same time expel capital from Ireland; but there is much more; remember that in all times the landlords have been the mainstay of the English connection. And when you have practically expropriated them, with their improvements, their better machinery, their better cultivation, I ask the House to consider what will be the means of maintaining the connection between England and Ireland, except what Mr. Burke calls "that tristis et luctuosa successio—a miserable series of Coercion Bills and English bayonets?" What better illustration of that than the course adopted by Mr. Parnell and other Members of his Party? You have already got, not to a revaluation or a reduction of rents, but to a cry for no rents at all; and instead of a message of peace you have incendiary proclamations and the shipment of infernal machines. Is there any reason then to hope that when this Bill becomes law it will fulfil the sanguine anticipations of its promoters? I believe there is scarcely a person outside this House—I am sure there is no one inside its walls if I except the occupants of the Treasury Bench—who expects that this Bill will produce the least improvement in Ireland. I ask, therefore, again, how is the Queen's Government to be carried on? I am sure this Bill will do nothing to maintain it; it is a terrible problem, one sufficient to tax the strength of the strongest and the wisdom of the wisest. I venture to think that this House, though it has been called "the House of Landlords," has dealt with this measure with the ability and knowledge which a House composed, in a great measure, of landlords must possess. I believe that this House has had this question long before its mind, and that it has endeavoured to look at it in the broadest and largest point of view. But I am persuaded that the question involved is not merely a change in the relations of landlord and tenant, but the far larger question how, in future, Ireland is to be dealt with. I will not pursue that subject; but I will only say this—that if we turn to the temper of the people, the result is, to my mind, very little more encouraging. We see a forgetfulness of all authority, and the belief that if men will not obey the law, the law must be altered for them. Never since society began did any good proceed from such a combination as this. But we are in a great difficulty, a difficulty which no man can overlook, and which no sober person can under-estimate. We are on the verge of civil war; and though I deplore the madness of the people and the weakness of the Government, still I think this House has acted wisely in accepting this measure, and in now sending it down to the House of Commons. We accept it as an experiment—a very great experiment. If that experiment should issue in prosperity and peace, in better relations between England and Ireland, and the happiness which flows from a united and contented people, then there will not be one individual in this House who will not rejoice in such a result, whatever his own prophecies and convictions may have been. But, on the other hand, if this Bill becomes with the Irish people the ground for fresh demands, further agitation, and greater friction between Ireland and England; if affairs grow worse instead of better, more irritating, dangerous, serious, then the people of this country, and not this House alone, will have to face the alternative—either a total severance of their relations with England, or a return to the older and more severe method of government.

EARL GRANVILLE: I wish, with the permission of the House, to make a few observations on the speech we have just heard. The noble Earl opposite began his remarks by asking, with an air of innocent wonderment, what this Bill was for. I cannot help thinking that your Lordships, who unanimously passed the second reading of the Bill, have some greater idea of its purpose and contents than the noble Earl. There is another question that I should like to ask. I should like to know what this speech of the noble Earl at this stage of our proceedings is for? I own I am at a loss to understand this, except what I may gather towards my enlightenment from my own personal experience. I lately had a smart attack of gout—which your Lordships kindly took a sympathetic interest in. That attack came out, I am grateful to say. What might have happened if it had been driven in I do not know; but it did come out, however, and now I am here more or less able to stand on my legs. I can only explain my noble Friend's speech by this. If I have any remark to offer upon my noble Friend's political career, it is that he has generally been in too great a hurry and too impulsive in what he was about. But in this case, whether under compulsion or not, he has evidently delayed a carefully elaborated and prepared speech for the second reading until this, the last stage. What the result would have been if this speech had been entirely driven in, and had not come out at all, I leave your Lordships to imagine. The noble Earl having had the advantage of hearing everything that has been said on the subject in your Lordships' House—an advantage which it has been my misfortune not to have had, though I have carefully read the report of all that has been said—made a great point, indeed, of this—that it was now admitted by Her Majesty's Government that this Bill gave the "three F's." I am not aware that anyone made an admission to that effect. I certainly consider the speech of my noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal, notwithstanding the contemptuous allusion which the noble Earl thought fit to make in regard to every speech in favour of the Bill, was a very admirable statement of the objects and arguments in favour of this Bill. In the course of that speech, my noble Friend said that he himself was not very greatly afraid of the "three F's;" but he particularly stated that the two first F's were in this Bill, and that, although great security was obtained for the tenant, fixity of tenure was not in it. I do not think it would be right to weary your Lordships with a discussion of all the details of the measure. Your Lordships are aware that nearly all the ablest Members of this House have spoken on this subject, and unlike the noble Earl, who is so condemnatory of those who have opposed him, it appears to me that most of those speeches were even above the average ability of the speakers who made them. Some of these speeches were made, I consider, with great severity; others, I think, were made with very great and marked moderation, though in opposition to the Bill. Indeed, it is perfectly obvious that to the great majority of your Lordships the Bill, abstractedly considered, is displeasing; but, influenced by the large, liberal, and statesmanlike views put forward by the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury), your Lordships thought right not to do that which the speech of the noble Earl really went to, if it went to anything at all—the complete rejection of what he termed an inefficient and revolutionary measure. Your Lordships thought it better to give a second reading to a Bill which I have not the slightest doubt you are going to read a third time. It is not for me to criticize the number and the importance of some of the Amendments which your Lordships have introduced into it. Very weighty advice was given to your Lordships not to increase the number of these Amendments; but your Lordships have taken a course which you thought it was your duty and your right to take. The Bill will go down to "another place." It will be carefully considered by Her Majesty's Government what proposals they will have to make to the other House of Parliament on the subject. There will be no feeling of hostility to your Lordships. But your Lordships will feel that when they are told that this is a measure which your Lordships pass somewhat unwillingly, but which, for large and liberal reasons, your Lordships think ought to be passed, leaving the whole responsibility to Her Majesty's Government to carry out the measure; that, in the interests of Ireland, it is of the greatest possible importance that Her Majesty's Government should carefully consider and weigh those Amendments that have been made.

THE EARL OF PORTARLINGTON said, that the country was looking with the greatest hope for the passing of the measure then under the consideration of their Lordships, which, he believed, would do incalculable good. The priests of Ireland had, in many instances, joined the Land League because their people had done so, and that, therefore, they—the priests—feared they would lose their hold over them if they did not also join it. It would be bad, and a hard thing, if the priests lost their hold over the people. The moment the Bill passed the priests would say to their flocks that it was a large, a wise, and a generous measure, and they would make the farmers understand its value and induce them to abandon the Land League. But the Land League was receiving some £90,000 a-year. That was at present a financial success which the League would not like to give up; but that success would eventually wither. He expected that there would be great contentment, and that the Bill would cut to the very centre and tend to destroy that spirit of unquiet which had so much troubled Ireland during the last few years. While approving of the Emigration Clause, he would suggest to the Government that, in preference to it, they should, by means of a grant, endeavour to more fully develop the fisheries of Ireland, thereby affording employment to a large number of persons; and then there would be no need for emigration.

LORD HOUGHTON and Lord BRABOURNE rose together, and there were loud calls for both. Neither giving way,

THE DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND moved that Lord Brabourne be heard.

Motion agreed to.

LORD BRABOURNE said, that as no one in that part of the House had spoken in this debate, and as he had endeavoured to form an independent judgment on the Bill, he was anxious to address a few remarks to their Lordships. He regretted the speech which they had heard from the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon), for as they had agreed to pass the Bill the less they inveighed against it the better. As he understood it, the principle of the measure was the formation of a new Court in Ireland—a Triumvirate—that was to manage the distribution of the property of the country. All he could say was that he hoped that the difficulties which would beset that tribunal would not approximate to the difficulties with which the Triumvirate of Ministers who took care of the Bill in its passage through their Lordships' House had had to contend. Of course, he did not say that the Lord Privy Seal, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack had shown no ability in argument; but they were placed in a position of difficulty. Assailed in front by the noble Marquess the Leader of the Opposition, and the noble and learned Earl (Earl Cairns), taken in the rear at the same time by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) and the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll), their late Colleagues; and oppressed throughout with the incomprehensibility which seemed inherent to the very nature of this Bill, they had, indeed, deserved the pity of the House. But, in truth, these noble Lords had an impossible task to perform. They had to show, not only that the same property could at the same time belong to two different persons, but that, without diminishing the total value of that property, it was possible to increase the value of the portion which belonged to one person without any diminution of the value of the portion which belonged to the other. Their difficulty was indeed great, and the chief fear he had was that two years would not elapse before the difficulty of working the Bill would turn out to be so great that it would become absolutely necessary to introduce another measure to explain and amend it. He did not wish to say anything more against the Bill. His principal reason for rising was to state what, as it appeared to him, their Lordships had really done. In five sentences he thought he could tell their Lordships what they had done, and why what they had done ought to be accepted and embodied in the Bill. In the first place, they had determined that property legally purchased and duly paid for should not, to the loss of the purchaser, be handed back to the seller as a free gift by the Legislature. Secondly, they had determined that contracts entered into in strict compliance with the law should not be broken upon the application of one of the parties to such contracts. Thirdly, having constituted a new Court, they had provided that the parties who were to make use of it—namely, the landlords and tenants—should come before it upon something like an equal footing, and that the landlord should not be obliged to increase his rent as a preliminary step to applying to the Court. Fourthly, they had given to the Court some indication—although no express direction—as to the principles upon which it was to proceed, and they had struck out words which had a tendency to confuse. Fifthly, their Lordships had given an appeal from the decisions of this new Court; and, considering that some of the questions which would come before it were questions which had never come before a Court before, upon which there was no strict rule of law to direct and no previous decisions to guide the Court, the refusal of such an appeal would have been nothing but an injustice. He had already seen hard words used against their Lordships generally, and against the noble Marquess the Leader of the Opposition in particular. He had formed an entirely opposite opinion with regard to the action of the noble Marquess. [Ironical laughter from the Ministerial Benches.] He was sorry that noble Lords were incapable of appreciating nobility of action on the part of an opponent. But the moderation which the noble Marquess had shown in deferring his own opinion to the opinion of the large majority of the House of Commons and of the Irish Representatives, the discretion he had shown in only attempting to eliminate from the Bill those provisions which most flagrantly offended against the principles of law, justice, and equity, and the clearness with which he placed the real issues involved in the Bill before the House, entitled him to the thanks of their Lordships and the gratitude of his countrymen. One more thing he (Lord Brabourne) desired to say. His noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies (the Earl of Kimberley) had recently taunted them with being a House of landowners. He (Lord Brabourne) had sometimes read such taunts in the columns of second-rate newspapers, or in the speeches of irresponsible orators upon Provincial platforms. He supposed it was his inexperience of their Lordships' House which caused him to feel great surprise when such a taunt was uttered by a Minister of the Crown. For what did it really mean, if it meant anything at all? A tailor was not held to be disqualified from judging of clothes because he was a tailor—the noble and learned Lord upon the Woolsack was not disqualified for making laws because he was a lawyer; and when it was said or insinuated that because their Lordships were landlords, and consequently knew a great deal about land and its management, they were disqualified for this kind of legislation, what was really meant was that their minds were too much warped and prejudiced to enable them to deal honestly with the question, and this he (Lord Brabourne) believed to be an utterly unjust charge, and one which they would all repudiate. He had only to add that he believed that if Her Majesty's Government fairly considered the Amendments made in the Bill they would find that they greatly improved the measure, and that if they were adopted, and the Bill suffered to pass into law as it left their Lordships'

Lord Brabourne

House, it would be a measure, not, indeed, conspicuous for its fair dealing with all parties concerned, but one which had been brought by their Lordships to bear at least some distant resemblance to an equitable settlement of a difficult question.

LORD HOUGHTON said, that there had been strong representations to them from the Government, showing the painful position in which they were placed during the last few months; and he defied them to say that, in any part of any country of the world, the landlords could have exhibited so much moderation and good humour as the Irish landlords had done in Committee of that House. He did not, like his noble Friend who had just sat down, hold in any special admiration the conduct of the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury). But it had been characterized by a total absence of anything like violent speeches or altercations. He could not but think that their Lordships had been considerably influenced in their decisions by the circumstance that this Bill had come from the House of Commons almost with universal consent. Why had it been so? It was because the House of Commons contained a very large number of most important Irish landlords, and the bulk of them had been generous and appreciative towards the Bill. The measure would go to Ireland as a message of peace and conciliation from the landed proprietors to the Irish tenantry, and he did not concur with his noble Friend (Lord Brabourne) that within two years it would fail. It was the duty of everyone to give the measure a fair trial; and the Bill, in his opinion, would commend itself to the political feeling of all classes.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH wished to say that he trusted the Bill would not in the future be regarded as a precedent. Having, with a vast number of Peers on his side of the House, foregone his better judgment in consenting to this measure, he regretted that there should be indications that the hope upon which his conduct had been based might not be fulfilled. The hope was that the Bill would produce tranquillity in Ireland; but it had been rendered fainter during the last few days by the remarks that had been made by the agitators who were responsible for the disorder reigning in Ireland.

LORD DENMAN would say "Not Content," to enable him to enter a protest on the Journals of the House against this defective measure. He complained that the constitution of the Court was very limited without the co-operation of Boards of Guardians, and contained no provisions for retiring pensions for the Commissioners, except for the chief, who was made a Judge of the High Court of Justice. At the same time, he sincerely hoped that Ireland would before long enjoy greater happiness than any which ever could be expected from the effects alone of the measure now before their Lordships.

On question, resolved in the affirmative; Bill read 3^d accordingly, with the Amendments, and passed and sent to the Commons.

QUESTIONS.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PRO-PERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MESSRS.
MURPHY AND CAMPION, PRISONERS
UNDER THE ACT.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he will state what are the grounds on which Messrs. Murphy and Campion of Rathdowney, in the Queen's County, have been sent to Naas Gaol?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the grounds on which the persons named in the Question were arrested were that they had incited other persons to intimidate tenants not to fulfil their lawful contracts by paying their rents.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he was aware that both these men emphatically denied having directly or indirectly ever sanctioned, or otherwise assisted in, any proceedings of this nature?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that he had not exactly that statement before him.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that Mrs. O'Halleron, wife of Mr. Martin O'Halleron, a "suspect" under the Coercion Act, of Ketullo, Athenry, county Galway, who has a large family to support, has received no relief since the arrest of her husband in March last, except ten shillings that was granted her about three weeks ago; and, whether the Loughrea Board of Guardians was prevented from receiving the grant by the refusal of the chairman to put a motion on the subject to the meeting?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, it was true that Mrs. O'Halleron had received 10s., and no more than 10s., out-door relief, which was granted on the 9th ultimo. On the 23rd ultimo the presiding Chairman refused to allow the question of further relief to the family to be put to a meeting of the Guardians. The case was, however, investigated, and it was decided at a subsequent meeting to refuse relief to Mrs. O'Halleron, on the ground that she possessed six acres well cropped, a cow, and a heifer. He would also refer the hon. Member to the 3rd section of the Relief of Distress Act, 1880, under which statute, as the hon. Member was doubtless aware, matters of this kind were left to the decision of the Guardians.

MR. HEALY asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would cause inquiry to be made into this matter, as to whether there was no prejudice against this woman on account of her husband's act; and if he would send down an order that relief should be granted?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he thought there was nothing to warrant any further inquiry. The Chairman of the Guardians had at first refused to authorize a discussion through a misapprehension of the law. At the next meeting a majority of the Guardians decided against giving the relief, and, for all he knew, it might have been a unanimous decision. There could have been no animus in the matter.

SPAIN—THE ZAMORA WATERWORKS.

MR. J. R. YORKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If Her Majesty's Government have received any communication from the Spanish Government as to the persistent refusal of the local authorities to carry out the repeated sentences of the Spanish Courts on the subject of the Zamora Waterworks; and, what steps Her Majesty's Government propose to take in face of this continued denial of justice?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, this matter has, from time to time, been urgently pressed upon the Spanish Government by Her Majesty's Representative at Madrid; and on the receipt in April last of a letter from the agents of the Company in England, from which it appeared that their client's claim was still unsettled, Mr. West was again instructed to press the Spanish Government to take immediate measures for its settlement. The result of this representation was that on the 13th of June last Mr. West received a Note from the Spanish Minister for Foreign Affairs stating that positive orders had been sent to the Civil Governor of Zamora to carry out the Royal order for compelling the Municipality to pay the sum due to the Company, and that unless this order were complied with the severest measures would be adopted against the Corporation.

ARMY—PENSIONERS OF THE ROYAL MARINES.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether pensioners from the Royal Marines serving on the Militia Staff will be placed on the same footing at their final retirement from the Service as Pensioners from the Regular Army?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to the hon. Gentleman, I have to state that the Question which he has raised was considered and decided in the negative by my Predecessor on an application by the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton) in 1879. I will communicate with the Admiralty on the subject; but I cannot hold out much hope of so recent a decision being altered.

PARKS (METROPOLIS)—PADDINGTON PARK.

SIR THOMAS CHAMBERS asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, Whether, looking at the great importance of preserving the land forming part of the Paddington Estate, and at present unbuilt on, as a Park for the people, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners will for a reasonable time withhold their consent to any operations which may lead to the erection of buildings on the land and thus to the prevention of any possibility of its preservation as an open space; and give such other facilities for the carrying out of the project in the way of the price of the land and otherwise as may be in their power?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Sir, everybody must approve the object which the Committee over which the hon. and learned Gentleman the Recorder presides has in view—namely, securing a public park for Paddington; and although I have been unable, owing to their dispersion for the Recess, to communicate with my Colleagues since this Question appeared on the Paper, I feel sure, from my knowledge of their sentiments, that, assuming the pecuniary interests of which they are guardians to be duly protected, they would be most desirous to give all proper facilities for attaining it. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners have already informed the Paddington Park Committee of their readiness to part with their interest in the land on certain named terms per acre; and I feel sure that if an agreement, whether conditional on the money being raised within a specified time or otherwise, be come to on behalf of the Paddington Park Committee, the Commissioners would be quite ready to afford a reasonable time for carrying out any proposed arrangement.

Mr. Healy

UNITED STATES—CONSULAR CONVENTION.

Mr. GOURLEY asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, What progress he has made towards completing a Consular Convention with the United States?

Mr. EVELYN ASHLEY, in reply, said, his hon. Friend was doubtless aware that this question had been for the last seven or eight years sleeping; but Her Majesty's Government were, at the present moment, engaged in waking it. They had taken the initial step of asking the Foreign Office to do something in the matter. He was sanguine that during the Recess they would be able to report a successful issue.

Mr. GOURLEY: Will my hon. Friend place the Correspondence on the Table of the House so far as it has gone?

Mr. EVELYN ASHLEY: There is no Correspondence with the Foreign Office on the subject.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—MILITIA UNIFORMS.

Mr. ROUND asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether Field Officers of Rifle Regiments of Militia, who have retired with permission to wear their uniform, may continue to wear such uniform, although their Regiment is to be changed into an ordinary Regiment?

Mr. CHILDERS: Yes, Sir.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—TECHNICAL EDUCATION—THE REPORT.

Mr. ANDERSON asked the Vice President of the Council, If Professor Leone Levi has sent in a Report on Technical Education in Italy and elsewhere, and what course is to be taken with it?

Mr. MUNDELLA: Yes, Sir; Professor Leone Levi has made a very elaborate Report upon the state of technical education in Italy and elsewhere. He has spent three months of this year abroad, and I purpose to refer the Report to the Royal Commission which is about to be appointed.

LAW AND JUSTICE—THE MAGISTRACY—MR. R. P. LAURIE.

Mr. PEMBERTON asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of the Correspondence between the Lord Chancellor and R. P. Laurie, Esq. late Member of this House for the City of Canterbury, with reference to the removal of that gentleman from the Commission of the Peace for the county of Kent?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, he understood that the Lord Chancellor had no objection to the production of the documents referred to in the Question; but he put it to the hon. Member whether it would be justifiable to incur the large expense that would be incurred in the publication of them as a Parliamentary Paper.

FIRES (METROPOLIS).

Mr. FIRTH asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that on July 21st a fire broke out in Ladbroke Grove Road, Notting Hill, but that no water could be obtained from the Water Company's main; whether it is the fact that in case of a London fire it is necessary to invoke five separate authorities having no unity of action:—1. The Police, controlled by the Home Secretary; 2. The Water Companies; 3. The Salvage Corps, controlled by the Insurance Companies; 4. The Fire Brigade, controlled by the Metropolitan Board of Works; and 5. The Streets, controlled by the Vestries; and, if he will consider whether these authorities might not be amalgamated for the purpose of fire extinction?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he had seen a report on the subject, from which it appeared, not that there was a scarcity of water, but that it was not at high pressure, owing to an accident to the main. With reference to the second part of the Question, he had to say that the police were not directly concerned in extinguishing fires, having merely to keep order; that the Salvage Corps was employed in the private interest of the Insurance Companies; while the Vestries were not concerned at all. When the question came to be determined on whom the duty of supplying water to the Metropolis should devolve, it would certainly become necessary to consider whether the Fire Brigade should not also be placed under the same control as the water service.

METROPOLITAN VESTRY ACCOUNTS—THE PADDINGTON VESTRY.

MR. FIRTH asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he is aware that the Auditors of Paddington Vestry have entered on the account books of such vestry a statement to the effect that, having in view the statement made by the President of the Local Government Board to the effect that no method exists for enforcing a surcharge of Metropolitan Vestry Accounts, they regard the examination of the parochial accounts of the parish of Paddington as useless; whether he is aware that such accounts contain heavy charges for refreshments which ought to be surcharged; and, whether it is proposed to leave the London Vestries to expend ratepayers' money in any manner and for any purpose they think fit, or what remedy he intends to apply to this state of things?

MR. DODSON: Sir, I have received a communication from the auditors of the Paddington Vestry that they have appended to the accounts of the Vestry a statement that, under the existing condition of the law, the examination by them of the parochial accounts is practically of no effect, as the Act gives them no power to enforce payment of the surcharges. I have, however, no information from the auditors whether or not such accounts contain charges for refreshments; but I perceive from a newspaper extract that in the accounts for the year ended the 25th of March, 1880, the auditors disallowed £57 15s. 6d. for refreshment, of which £26 appears to have been for the erection of a tent in which a dinner was given at the opening of a slop tank. If such expenditure had appeared in the accounts which are audited by the auditor of the Local Government Board, he would have had power, not only to surcharge these illegal payments, but to recover the amount summarily from the persons by whom they were authorized. Unfortunately for the ratepayers, the auditors, under the Metropolis Management Act, have no such power; but the question as to how the present defect in the law should be remedied is rather for the consideration of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, as I have no jurisdiction under the Metropolis Management Act.

POST OFFICE—TELEGRAPH CLERKS.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY (for Mr. PARNELL) asked the Postmaster General, Whether his attention has been drawn to a meeting of the Cork telegraph clerks, held on Saturday the 2nd July, the object of which was to act in conjunction with the clerks at the various offices throughout the United Kingdom; whether the postmaster of the Cork office, upon seeing a report of the proceedings of the meeting in the Cork papers on Monday the 4th instant, gave instructions that any clerk who had taken a prominent part in the meeting should not be engaged in the performance of special or relief duties, which involve extra pay; and, whether it is with his sanction that these instructions have been issued?

MR. FAWCETT, in reply, said, his attention had not been called to this matter previously; but he had made careful inquiry, and was convinced that no such instructions as those mentioned in the Question were issued or acted upon.

STATE OF IRELAND—THE MAGISTRACY
—MR. A. E. HERBERT, J.P.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the language of Mr. A. E. Herbert, J.P. in the following Report from the "Kerry Sentinel," of 28th July, in the case of persons charged at Brosna Petty Sessions with attacking a bailiff. Constable Carroll deposed:—

"That, on account of the attitude of the people, they went back to one of the houses, escorted by the police, and took down one of the writs which he had posted.

"Mr. Herbert—And no stones thrown?

"Witness—No stones thrown.

"Mr. Herbert—I may tell you if I was there I'd know what to do.

"One of the defendants cross-examined Constable Carroll, who admitted that he and men were supplied with plenty of new milk by the people on whom the writs were served.

"Mr. Herbert—I think the police on that day were like a flock without a shepherd; I think they were all the time drinking milk from this riotous and terrible mob. I always speak for myself, and that is my opinion of the Royal Irish Constabulary on that day. Drinking new milk from this riotous and disorderly mob;"

Sir William Harcourt

whether, in a cross case against the police, Mary Cahill and Ellen Cahill were examined, and deposed that, when the police fixed swords protecting the bailiff, Constable Carroll stabbed the complainant in the thigh; whether Mr. Herbert dismissed the case with the remark that "He was sorry the police acted with so much forbearance. If he himself was there he would order the mob to be 'skivered,' and he would have buckshot used on them. There would be no peace in the Country until such people were 'skivered;'" whether such language was used; and, if so, whether he has made any representations to the Lord Chancellor on the subject, or has taken any action in regard to it?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I have seen the report in the newspaper to which the hon. Member refers; but I have no means of verifying it. The whole of the cases in which Irish magistrates are concerned are under the consideration of the Lord Chancellor, and I have communicated with my noble and learned Friend upon the matter.

MR. HEALY wished to know if there was any proper authority in the House to which hon. Members could appeal in reference to the conduct of magistrates?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The Lord Chancellor is the official whose business it is to consider these questions; and if, after allowing sufficient time to elapse, the hon. Member will ask me what the Lord Chancellor has done in this case, I will tell him.

MR. HEALY said, he would ask the Question on Friday. He also wished to know if this same magistrate was arrested some time since for drunkenness and disorderly conduct at Farranfore?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: It is only justice to Mr. Herbert to state that I never heard of that charge being brought against him.

WATER SUPPLY (METROPOLIS)— THE GRAND JUNCTION WATER COMPANY.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND asked the President of the Local Government Board, If he has received Colonel Bolton's Report on the Grand Junction Water Company; and, whether he will lay a Copy of it upon the Table?

MR. DODSON, in reply, said, that he had only just received the Report referred to, and had not had time to examine it. As far as he was aware, there was no objection to laying a copy of it upon the Table; but he must consider the matter before he gave any undertaking on the subject.

SMALL-POX (METROPOLIS)—HOSPITAL SHIPS ON THE RIVER THAMES.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether it is a fact that the smallpox hospital ships now moored off Greenwich are so close to the shore that there is great danger of their causing the epidemic to spread to the adjoining districts; that before they were placed in their present positions, thereby greatly impeding the free use and value of the wharves in front of which they are moored, no notice was given to the owners of those wharves; and that, owing to the serious inconvenience caused by the presence of these ships to the free navigation of the River Thames, the Thames Conservancy Board and the Metropolitan District Asylum Board of Managers were and are in favour of their being moored lower down the river; if so, whether any steps are to be taken to remove these vessels from their present positions, and thus to obviate the danger of the epidemic spreading among the numerous workmen employed in the various shipbuilding and other yards abutting on the shore?

MR. DODSON: Sir, I cannot admit that it is a fact that these ships are so close to the shore that there is great danger of their spreading small-pox to the adjoining districts; in fact, I was distinctly advised by one of the Medical Inspectors, who has had great experience in these epidemics, that no such danger need be apprehended. No direct notice was given to the owners of the wharves in front of which the ships were moored; but the preparations for their removal were publicly known for some time before the ships were placed there, and no objections were made against the course proposed. I am not aware of any serious inconvenience to the navigation; and, so far from the Thames Conservancy Board objecting to the position, the spot was adopted on their suggestion. The Metropolitan Asylum Managers did propose to place the ships much lower down the river, but not for the reason suggested. I was, however, advised that acute cases could not without serious risk and danger be removed to such a distance; and, therefore, the ships were moored off Greenwich, close by the spot where the Dreadnought hospital ship lay on a previous occasion, and, as far as we are aware, without any ill effect. With respect to the removal of the vessels, it is only intended that they shall remain there during the pressure of the present epidemic.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would state the distance which the ships were from the shore, and whether he was aware that the sewage passed into the river there?

MR. DODSON: Not having measured it, I should not like to say what the distance is; but I have been on board the ships myself.

MALTA—PETITION FOR REFORMS.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If the Colonial Office has had before it the Petition presented by him to this House, from the Committee of Inhabitants of Malta; and, whether Her Majesty's Government means to grant its prayer, or to concede to the Maltese any of those reforms recommended by Mr. Rowsell and Sir Penrose Julyan, and some of which were about to be conceded by the late Government?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, a copy of the Petition has been obtained and is under consideration, as well as a Memorial transmitted to the Secretary of State; but it is not possible to state at present the answer which will be returned. The administrative changes recommended by Sir Penrose Julyan have been in considerable part already carried out.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) ACT, 1870—THE ROYAL COMMISSION —THE REPORT AND EVIDENCE.

SIR WILLIAM PALLISER asked the First Lord of the Treasury, By whose authority and direction it was that the dates were expunged from all the rebutting statements which were sent in writing by the Irish Landlords to the Bessborough Commission, and which had been inadvertently stated and incorrectly supposed to have been printed in Appendix C when the Report was signed, and what was the object sought to be attained by expunging the dates in question?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have no means of giving an answer officially to the Question of the hon. Gentleman, nor do I think it very desirable that the Government should institute an examination into the matter. I would rather recommend the hon. Member to communicate with the officers of the Commission, who, I have no doubt, will give him the most accurate account of the matter. At the same time, if the hon. Member wishes, the Government will ask for the information he requires.

ARMY—VOTE OF THANKS—SIR EVELYN WOOD.

MR. BROADHURST asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, having regard to the fact that Parliament have from time to time passed Votes of Thanks to Generals of the Army for successful triumphs in War, he will propose a Vote of Thanks to General Sir Evelyn Wood for the distinguished services which he has recently rendered to this Country in South Africa by peaceful means?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, in answer to this Question, I must say that General Sir Evelyn Wood is not the only person who has rendered service, and excellent service, to the Crown and the country in South Africa; but the time has not yet arrived when we can regard the important transactions in which they have been engaged as being altogether concluded; and, therefore, the time has not yet arrived for considering any such matter as that indicated by the hon. Member's Question. I ought also to say, as my hon. Friend probably knows, that the Votes of this House, although not absolutely limited to military services, yet are by precedent in every case limited to military service or to auxiliary services in connection with military service. But, as the hon. Member has referred to the name of Sir Evelyn Wood in particular, I think that it is only right that I should state that Her Majesty's Government have the highest sense of the zeal, the ability, the judgment, and the tact, as well as right feeling with which Sir Evelyn Wood has conducted the matters intrusted to his control in circumstances of very great difficulty indeed.

Baron Henry De Worms

STATE OF IRELAND—RELEASE OF
MR. JOHN DILLON, M.P.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the announcement made in the morning papers that Mr. John Dillon had been released from Kilmainham Gaol was correct?

MR. PULESTON said, that before the right hon. Gentleman answered the Question, he wished to ask him whether Mr. Dillon had been released unconditionally, or whether he had been obliged to sign some conditions?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Yes, Sir; it is true that Mr. Dillon has been released from Kilmainham, and I suppose the House would wish me to give the grounds of that release. A letter was sent yesterday to the Governor of Kilmainham, in the following terms:—

"I am directed by the Lord Lieutenant to inform you that a representation having been made to his Excellency that Mr. John Dillon's life would be endangered by further confinement, his Excellency has been pleased to order his release. Therefore, upon the receipt of this letter, discharge Mr. Dillon, and give him a copy of this letter."

That letter was written for this reason—On Thursday last I received a Report from Dr. Carte, the medical officer of the prison, stating that he believed Mr. Dillon's life would be endangered by further confinement. I was surprised to get that letter, because, although the health of Mr. Dillon is not strong, the last information I received was from the Inspector of the prison, Mr. Barlow, who, on the 8th of July, reported that he had seen Mr. Dillon, who told him that he was well, and that he did not think his health had suffered since he entered the prison. Mr. Barlow said that Mr. Dillon seemed to him to be very delicate, but did not appear to be more so than when he first saw him in prison three months ago. In receiving that Report, I telegraphed at once to two independent medical gentlemen, of undoubted standing, to go down to Kilmainham and, after consultation with Dr. Carte, to make a Report. They saw Mr. Dillon; but he politely, but firmly, refused to allow himself to be examined. After consulting with Dr. Carte, and after seeing his Report and obtaining all the information they could, they saw the Report of Dr. Carte, Mr. Dillon's private medical officer, which entirely confirmed Dr. Carte's statement that life would be endangered by further confinement. That being the case, I thought, and my Colleagues agreed with me, that our duty was to do what we should have done with any other prisoner under the circumstances—order his immediate discharge. We did not think it a case in which we ought to make that discharge dependent on the signing of any conditions.

MR. HEALY: Does the doctor say that his life has been endangered through the confinement he has undergone?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I have given the exact statement I received, and it was the first intimation I had. The doctors would have been failing in their duty if they had not informed us of the facts.

LAW AND POLICE—DEATHS FROM DROWNING.

MR. GOURLEY asked the President of the Board of Trade, If he has seen the Return of Loss of Life issued at the instance of the honourable Member for Manchester, showing the number of deaths from drowning in mercantile and non-mercantile waters of the United Kingdom to have been in 1879, 3,690 lives; if this includes the loss of life from sea-coast bathing, if not, if he can state what this was for the same year; and, if he can state what measures he intends adopting for the purpose of compelling local inland and sea-coast authorities at all public bathing places to provide boats, life-buoys, and watchmen during the bathing season?

MR. DOBSON: Sir, the Return does not, as I believe, include the loss of life from sea-coast bathing; and there is not, as far I can ascertain, any information collected to show the extent of loss for the year to which the Return refers. At present there is no power to compel local inland and sea-coast authorities to provide boats, life-buoys, and watchmen during the bathing or any other season. These authorities can make bye-laws, subject to the approval of the Local Government Board, with respect to public bathing and the regulation of bathing machines; but they are not authorized to make any provision of this kind from the local rates, or to require that the proprietors of the bathing machines shall do so. This defect has been brought under the notice of the Board, who contemplate dealing with the matter whenever a suitable opportunity offers for amending the law.

AFGHANISTAN—CANDAHAR.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether he had seen the telegram from Lahore in The Times of the 6th instant, in which the Correspondent of that journal, after stating that the Ameer's Envoy passed through Lahore on his way to Simla, went on to say—

"I am assured that he comes at the suggestion of the Viceroy, and bears a message in which the Ameer reminds the Viceroy that he had earnestly and repeatedly begged the Government to hold Candahar for one year, in order to enable the Ameer to make his position secure. It is clear from the Envoy's account that the Ameer began to lose heart at hearing of the news of the evacuation of Candahar;"

and whether he was in a position to contradict the truth of these assertions?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I have not received from the Government of India any information respecting the position of the Envoy from Cabul to Simla. I am, therefore, unable to say what message he may have been charged to deliver, or what statement he may have made. But I have referred to the Correspondence which has passed between the Ameer and the Government of India, and it certainly is not the case that the Ameer had earnestly and repeatedly asked the Government to hold Candahar for one year, in order to enable him to make his position secure.

SIR HENRY TYLER: Was a request ever made to that effect?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: No, Sir; nothing of the kind.

PARLIAMENTARY OATH (MR. BRADLAUGH.)

MR. LABOUCHERE wished to ask the Prime Minister a Question with regard to the position of Mr. Bradlaugh. For himself, he might explain that he had a Resolution on going into Committee of Supply, which practically was to rescind the Resolution come to in April last. He believed that that Resolution precluded Mr. Bradlaugh from taking the Oath, together with a subsequent Resolution passed precluding Mr. Bradlaugh from coming within this House, were both Sessional Orders, and that they would lapse at the end of this Session. The result, of course, would be that at the commencement of next Session Mr. Bradlaugh would present himself at the Table of the House and endeavour to take the Oath and his seat, as he believed he had a right to do. Now, what he would ask was this—whether, when Mr. Bradlaugh took that course, he might hope that he would be supported by the Government, in what he believed, and some in this House believed, to be his Constitutional rights? In that case, as it was near the close of the Session, and he had no wish to inconvenience hon. Gentlemen opposite—for it was quite possible his Motion might inconvenience them, as they did not know when it might be brought on—he would withdraw his Motion and leave the matter in the hands of Her Majesty's Government for next Session.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I understand from my hon. Friend two things—that he has investigated the matter, and ascertained that the Resolution which forbids Mr. Bradlaugh taking the Oath at the Table—I do not mean the Resolution debarring him from access—is a Sessional Resolution which expires with the Session. I understand, that being so, it is possible, according to my hon. Friend's view, that Mr. Bradlaugh may again present himself and claim to take the Oath at the commencement of next Session. I take these two propositions simply as given by my hon. Friend, and I assume them to be correct. If he should so present himself, and so claim to take the Oath, and should opposition thereupon arise, undoubtedly Her Majesty's Government would deem it their duty to consider the question with a view to the termination of the controversy.

MR. GIBSON asked the Speaker whether it was the fact that the Order forbidding Mr. Bradlaugh to take the Oath did expire at the end of the Session, and would require to be renewed at the beginning of the next?

MR. SPEAKER: I understand the right hon. and learned Member to refer to the Resolution of 10th May. That is not a Standing Order, and would terminate at the end of the Session.

MR. MACFARLANE asked the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair whether the Resolution of the 20th of April, which precluded Mr. Bradlaugh from taking the Oath, would lapse at the end of the Session?

MR. SPEAKER: The Resolution to which the hon. Gentleman refers was not made a Standing Order, and therefore would expire with the Session.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the Prime Minister, in reference to the answer he had given to the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), whether, when he brought in a measure dealing with Mr. Bradlaugh, he would take means to secure the attendance and the vote in its favour of the Liberal Members of the Liberal majority by whose defection Mr. Bradlaugh had been excluded?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I do not know if I have gone too far in answering the Question of my hon. Friend (Mr. Labouchere); but I did it simply on the ground that everyone must feel desirous, at a time when we are beginning to suppose we may very soon disperse, to know whether they are likely to be called upon again to vote on a subject which Mr. Bradlaugh during the present Session. But as the Question of the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) has a reference to a future Session, and a contingency only supposed to arise then, I hope he will patiently exercise his patience until the next Session arrives.

MR. PULESTON asked the hon. Member for Northampton whether, after the statement of the Prime Minister, he would go on with his Resolution?

MR. LABOUCHERE: Certainly not,

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked the Prime Minister if he could give the House any information respecting the course of the Business, and specially the Navy Estimates?

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked whether it was intended to take the Irish Votes in Class IV. to-night?

MR. FREDERICK CAVENDISH: It is our intention to take the whole of Class IV., including the Irish Votes.

MR. GLADSTONE: I think it is already understood—and what has happened since I last spoke on the subject would rather sustain and confirm the impression—that the proceedings in the House of Lords may terminate to-night with respect to the Irish Land Bill, and, therefore, that we shall be in a position to consider the question of the Lords' Amendments to-morrow as the first and principal Business for Tuesday evening. How long they will take I do not know; but we shall propose to proceed with the Navy Estimates immediately after the conclusion of the question of the Lords' Amendments.

MR. HEALY asked if it was impossible to get the Lords' Amendments that night, so as to give time to consider them prior to the meeting of the House on Tuesday? He presumed there would be no Morning Sitting.

MR. GLADSTONE: The Lords' Amendments, I understand, will be in the hands of Members to-morrow morning. There will be no Morning Sitting. I do not entertain any doubt that any Member can, as a matter of courtesy, obtain a copy of the Lords' last print of the Bill; but we have no power to make an order requiring copies of that print to be furnished to Members of the House of Commons generally.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE REVISED CODE.

DEPARTMENTAL STATEMENT.

MR. MUNDELLA rose to make his Statement on the Education Vote.

MR. J. COWEN rose to Order. He wished to know whether, after the right hon. Gentleman had made his Statement on going into Committee of Supply, any other hon. Member could speak on the Motion on going into Committee of Supply?

MR. SPEAKER: It will be open for any hon. Member to speak on the Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair.

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, I beg to thank the House for allowing me to make my Statement with the Speaker in the Chair. My reason for asking this favour of the House is two-fold. Not for the sake of the Estimates which I am able to submit to the House, and which I should be quite prepared to submit in the usual way. But it will be in the recollection of the House that in the other House of Parliament, when the Code under which the conditions of the grant for education are made was carried, a distinct pledge was given to both this and the other House of Parliament that before the close of this Session we would submit proposals for the reform of the Code, and it is upon that ground, before going into Committee of Supply, that I shall make a double Statement—the one relating to the ordinary business of the past year, and the proposed financial statement for the coming year, and the principles on which we propose to revise the Code. All that relates to the expenditure of the past year I shall endeavour to condense into as short a space as possible, in order not to trespass upon the time of the House. The expenditure in 1880 was as follows:—The sum granted was £2,535,967, and the expenditure £2,525,769, the result being a saving of £10,308 upon the Estimates. The charge for annual grants, which was estimated at £2,217,348, reached £2,213,673, an increase of £120,231 on the previous year, the details of which are as follows:—The estimate of average attendance was 2,800,480 children, and the actual average was 2,814,000; the estimated grant was 15s. 8d., and the grant really made was 15s. 7½d. The estimate for the evening schools for the average attendance was 52,530 children and an estimate of 9s., and the result was 41,500 at 8s. 6½d., a falling off in numbers of 11,000, and in the grant of 5d. in the year. Now, Sir, I come to the Estimates that the House will be asked to vote to-night for the current year 1881-2. The sum required this year is £2,683,958, as compared with £2,535,967 granted in 1880-1. This is an increase of £147,991, and it produces a difference of £93,000 increase on the Estimates of 1880-1. Although at first sight this difference will appear to be considerable, it will be understood that the increase in the expenditure was really an over-estimated expenditure in the year 1879-80. The increase on the Vote for 1880-1 would have stood £140,000, instead of £55,000 on the Estimates; therefore, the increase on the Estimates 1881-2 is £144,794, and it is a little more than an increase in the last year, which was really £140,000. The increase on the coming year 1881-2 occurs almost entirely under the head of annual grants. The amount of the Vote is £2,862,142, an increase of £144,794 for the grant. It will be necessary that I shall show the House the expenditure for annual grants, and the comparison of this special head for the past three years shows that the increase asked for is not an extensive one. The annual grant made to the elementary schools in 1878-9 was £1,961,000, or an increase of £267,000 on the preceding year. In 1879-80 it was £2,093,000, or an increase of £132,000; in 1880-1, £2,213,000, an increase of £120,000; and in 1881-2 it is £2,362,000, or an increase of £144,794. It will be noticed by the figures set forth that there is a very large increase in 1878-9, and that was occasioned by the passing of the Act of 1876, which only came into practical operation in 1878-9. Amongst the other items, there is an increase of £7,670 for expenditure this year, caused by the addition of six Inspectors and nine Inspectors' Assistants, and by an unusual number of Inspectors being entitled to the increment. The Inspectors were appointed after the details of the Estimates had been made for last year, and they come into the present year. There is only one more item in reference to the expenditure that I ought to trouble the House with, and that is the building grant on the Act of 1870 of £670, and it is the last year of the grant. I now invite the House to consider the real educational progress of the past year. I may say, before going into that part of the question, that there is no new or striking feature in the course of the year. There have been no new forces brought into operation during the year; we have been working steadily and quietly under the Acts of 1870 and 1876, and, as the Act of 1870 as to general compulsion did not come into operation until the 1st of January this year, the statement of progress that I have to make is the more gratifying because the same steady, continuous and unbroken progress of education has been going on since the passing of the Act of 1870. The principal features which I have to mention are as follows:—Accommodation is now afforded 4,240,000 children, showing an increase of 28,000 school places during the year; the scholars on the register, 3,895,000, showing a remarkable increase of 185,000 scholars in average attendance, 2,751,000, being an increase in attendance of 156,000 for the previous year; the scholars individually examined, 1,904,000, being an increase of 144,000 in one year. The percentage of passing in the three R.'s, which is one of the real tests of the work done, is 81·2 as against 80·4 last year. They have now touched the highest point they have ever reached in the history of the Department. The proportion of scholars examined in Standard IV. and upwards, which is very interesting to several Members, and my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), who, I am glad to see in his usual place, is 24·61 as against 22·1 of last year—a very large amount indeed. We do not bring the children up to the higher standard; we are doing very little in the arrears of thorough education. I am as dissatisfied as any man in this House about them; but still it is gratifying to find this year that the proportion of scholars examined is increasing. Well, we have 41,426 masters, being nearly 3,000 more than heretofore, and we have 33,733 pupil teachers, and that gives an increase of 538. The cost of maintenance for scholars in Board schools is £2 1s. 11½d., being a decrease of 1d. per head; and voluntary schools, £1 14s. 7½d., or an increase of 1½d. per head. The rate of the grant earned is, for Board schools, 15s. 7½d. per head, an increase of 4½d. on the previous year; and for voluntary schools, 15s. 5d., or an increase of 1½d. per head. It is the first time since the passing of the Act of 1870 that the Board schools have shown any substantial increase over the voluntary schools. Now, in these figures there are two or three points we have of interest, and the first is the number of scholars on the registers. Although these have gone on increasing year by year from 1,693,000 in 1870 to 1,895,000 in the past year, it shows a substantial increase of 185,000 during the past year. Now, the normal increase according to the growth of the population will be about 70,000 in the year; but we continue to receive into our schools nearly three times that increase every year, and, at this moment that I am addressing the House, the probability is that there are over 2,000,000 of children on the registers of the schools, and we have every reason to expect that within the next 10 years, when the Act of last year comes into full operation, the numbers will not be far short of 5,000,000 children. The next question to which I must call attention is that we have gone from 1,793,000 to above 4,000,000; and we are calculating on something like, after this year, a continual increase of 200,000 children a-year. The average attendance has now reached 70·6, and this includes infants—the vast number of children who only attend half-time, and who are permitted by the School Board when they pass the Standard to be employed half-time. If they were full time they would not detract very much from the average of the whole, and it must make a difference in the average of the year. Considering that every year we are passing in more of the children of their regular class, and that the compulsion reaches the more neglected of the lower classes, it is more satisfactory to find that the average attendance is higher to-day than it has ever reached before. That is an indication of real and substantial progress. We have not reached, by any means, what we hope to, and may, attain, and the best proof of that is what Scotland has already done. Scotland has already reached 76 per cent average attendance, including half-time; and there is this to be said about Scotland, that the Scotch children go to school later, but stay later than the English children. That is owing to climate, and that infant schools are not so general as in England; and it is a most satisfactory result in the School Board in Scotland that they have already brought up the average attendance to 76 per cent. Now, compulsion has done this. It has succeeded in bringing a larger number of children to attend schools for at least a portion of their time, and has improved the average attendance to the point to which I have stated. I have a table here which shows that it has had the effect of causing a very considerable increase of the number of scholars who attend sufficiently regular to bring the grant to the schools. Out of every 100 scholars on the register in England and Wales there were 62 per cent, and they were qualified by attendance in the proportion of 40·2. In 1880, at the same stage, 68·3 on the register, and they were qualified by attendance to the extent of 52·2. This shows a number of children who get the grant in Scotland. I am bound to say the result is much better. They had been in 1874

64·9, and, at the present moment, they have reached 73·6, who make full school attendance. I am approaching that which I regard as the most satisfactory feature of the year, and that is the result of last year's examinations, and it is to this point I invite my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton. The children examined did better in the three R's than in the previous year, the percentage of passes having risen from 80·4 to 81·2; whilst the proportion of scholars examined in Standards IV. to VI., compared with the total number of scholars individually examined, rose from 22·1 per cent to 24·61 per cent. Now, in order to show the change which was gradually coming over our educational experience, I will ask the attention of the House to this fact—that the percentage of passes to the number of children examined fell steadily during the first six years after the passing of the Act of 1870. The number of ignorant and neglected children brought in, and the number of elder children who were unable to pass the Standard, was so large that there was a steady fall in the percentage of passes through England and Wales. In 1872 the following were the percentages:—Passes in 1872, 81·1; in 1873, 80·8; in 1874, 80; in 1875, 79·7; in 1876, 78·8; and here in 1877 we ended the trouble. There had been a steady fall; then came the rise, and the recovery was due to this, that more attention was paid to the teaching of the infant children. The interest taken in the schools had begun to effect a great change in the children's passing in the upper Standards, and the number of backward children grew less and less. In 1878 the number rose to 79·5; in 1879 to 80·4; in 1880, 81·2. This is the highest point at which the number has ever stood in Standards IV. to VI. Now, the test is, what do you pass in the upper schools? There are bye-laws and Factory Acts which affect these. The bye-laws and the Factory Acts take half our children in the Fourth Standard out of schools every year. That is to say, that 50 per cent of the children who pass the Fourth Standard in any year pass at once out of school. That is one reason why we cannot pass our children to the higher Standards, because the Standard of the Factory Act is the Fourth Standard, and the Standards throughout the country, especially the rural districts, are from II. to IV., or III. to V., for half-time and full time respectively. The progress which had been made in the higher Standards was one of the features in the year the most gratifying. I have made out statements which show the number of children presented in the higher Standards since the passing of the Act of 1870. In 1870 the number who passed under the Old Code was 191,663 to all schools. Practically, it was 102,630, taking it as compared with the Code, as we have since that time raised the Standards. In 1871 we have no record because the Code changed. Then in 1872, 118,000; in 1873, 131,000, being an increase of 13,000; in 1874, 155,000, being an increase of 24,000; in 1875, 194,000, an increase of 39,000; in 1876, 234,000, an increase of 40,000; in 1877, 270,000, an increase of 36,000; in 1878, 324,000, an increase of 54,000; in 1879, 388,000, an increase of 64,000; and last year 468,000, an increase of 80,000 children in the upper Standards. The increased number passed through the upper Standards IV. to VI. since 1870 was more than 400 per cent. That is the best test of the work that is really being done. However well we may be doing with the English schools, the Scotch are doing better; and in Scotland this is much more remarkable than among ourselves. The numbers for Scotland—where they have had the compulsory system in full operation since 1872, while ours has just come into full operation—shows that in 1872 they passed 35,502 children, and they finished in 1880 by passing 102,259 in the upper Standards—that is to say, out of 304,000, the average attendance was one-third of the whole, or 33 per cent in Scotland, as against 24 per cent in England. I should like to give a single illustration of the way the Scotchmen manage their schools, showing the wonderful results that are accomplished. I was struck with the case of a school which was placed in my hands some few months ago, and it gives an illustration of what could be done under the most adverse circumstances. It was a school in the village of Easdale, in the Island of Seil, in the county of Argyll. The chief industry of the place is slate quarries. Well, in 1874 the Report was exceedingly unfavourable. In 1875 the School Board began a new school, and they appointed a new teacher, and this is the sort of progress which has been made since. In the first year only six out of 134 could be presented in the higher Standards. In 1876 the school had an admirable Report; in 1879, when the Inspector came, he said—

“This is one of the best schools I know. There is no failure in reading and writing, and only two out of 116 failed in arithmetic, and when I visited the place some years ago the education of the children was in a lamentable state. Thanks to the wise policy of the Board and the ability of the teacher, it is now the best school in Argyll.”

Out of 134, only seven failed, and the Inspector said it was, in all respects, a model school. I think that a school and school board making such marvellous progress as that shows ought to be brought under the notice of the House. Now, Sir, I have given the statistics for England and Wales as to the number who have passed the upper Standards. The grants earned in 1879-80 had risen from 15*s.* 3½*d.* to 15*s.* 7½*d.*, an increase of 4½*d.*, and the voluntary schools to 15*s.* 5*d.*, an increase of 1½*d.* I said that this is the first time that the board schools show an advantage over the voluntary schools; but the grant is not always the measure of success, and I say this irrespective of this circumstance in reference to board schools and voluntary schools. It depends upon the number of infants in the respective schools on the list, for the infants bring down the average, and the real test is the children in the upper Standards and the upper ages. Now, the average cost in the London School Board schools was £2 17*s.* 7½*d.* per head, and in the voluntary schools £2 0*s.* 10½*d.* The board schools in the Provinces are only £1 17*s.* 5½*d.* I am bound to say that the heavy cost of the London Board schools raises the average of the board schools throughout the country. The London Board school average was £2 17*s.* 7½*d.*, and the London voluntary school £2 0*s.* 10½*d.*, against £1 14*s.* 2*d.* in the country. I am not going to be the apologist for the London School Board; there is no need for me to take up the defence of the London School Board, as it possesses able Representatives in this House. I am bound to say that I was very much struck with that, and I made it my business to institute inquiries as to the cost of the London Board schools as compared with other schools. Now, it is only fair, whatever may be said in favour of voluntary schools or Board schools, that it should be fairly and honestly stated. I find that the London Board schools are increasing at the rate of 23,000 a-year for the last 10 years; that for every year they have to furnish schools and charge that upon the current year's account. Then, again, unlike any other board schools in the country, they have to bear the expense without the grant for this 23,000; so that really, to take the proper average, we believe that it would be impossible to get the cost of the London Board schools until the London Board schools have supplied all this deficiency of education and the children are in average attendance. Then the grant for salaries is very considerable. Then, taking the average of the country schools, no allowance is made in the salaries, but a residence is provided for the masters; whereas, in London, the residence of the masters is to be paid out of their salaries. That is only fair to be borne in mind; but to show the vast work which the London School Board has yet to do—for it is a vast work, for the deficiency is not nearly supplied, and the new Census has shown us that Lambeth alone has increased nearly 250,000 during the last 10 years—there is the population of one of our great towns, and the London School Board have to keep up with the growth of the population, and this growth represents something like 1,100 persons a-week; and, in order to make provision for the population, they must open one school a month. That is the only way in which the population of London can be provided for. The only wonder is that, looking at the vast work already done, and yet remains to be done, how we could have remained content with such a state of things as must have existed. The total expenditure on education for last year amounts to £5,078,259; to this sum the endowment has contributed £143,000, the voluntary contributions about £731,000; the rates £726,000. Though it is fair to notice that the contributions are still in excess of the rates, it is a most creditable feature. The children's pence contributed £1,431,000, and the Government grant £1,982,000, and the receipts from other sources were £55,000. I am bound to quote these figures to consider what would be the grant, and what must be the rate to make up the enormous deficiencies which would result from these two sources—the Exchequer and the ratepayers. I have now stated everything which relates to the educational work of the past year, and I hope that the House will be satisfied that we are really making progress. I may say that the highest grant, taking the schools in their denominations, was made by the Wesleyan schools. There are one or two points with respect to the working of the Act that I should like to say a few words upon. I believe that those great results which I have been able to lay before the House, and which I hope will be still greater, have been the result of compulsion; without it we could never have achieved such results. I am sorry to say that there are still serious obstacles to the future working of that Act. Only this day I had a letter from a School Attendance Committee that less than half the children in the district were not in attendance, and the reason of only half the children being at school was that when the cases were brought before the magistrates the magistrates had resolved not to convict, and these people set the law at defiance. In many instances—and this was most surprising in London—the magistrates seem to think that they were almost above the law, and they do absolutely set the law at defiance in hundreds of cases. It is remarkable when we consider with what general assent both Houses of Parliament passed the Act last year. Both Houses of the Legislature had allowed the Act to make compulsion general throughout the land to pass without the slightest sign of amendment or opposition, and I think it was a very good omen, and it showed the general assent of the Legislature to the compulsory working of the Education Acts. At the time of passing the Act there were about 16,500,000 in England and Wales under the bye-laws, and by the 1st January it was required that every Union and every local authority should make an application for bye-laws. I am glad to report that on the 31st December last the whole of the Unions and local authorities throughout England and Wales, except a small remnant numbering only about 260,000 inhabitants, had applied for bye-laws, and now there was no district throughout the land where those bye-laws have not come fairly into operation. But still there are some things that must be amended if the compulsory system is to be efficiently worked. One is the cost and difficulty of proceeding under the Summary Jurisdiction Act. The cost to the locality of taking out summonses, and the difficulties which have been unexpectedly imposed, have raised very serious obstacles to the working of compulsory education. I do think that parents who are so neglectful of their duty as those who will not take the trouble to send their children to school, and, worse still, those who have come under the operation of the Industrial Schools Act, should be punished. There were cases recently where the man has neglected his own family and allowed them to run in the streets till they were sent to an industrial school, and was, at the same time, getting good wages and keeping another family, and not contributing a farthing. They set the law at defiance, because they had no goods to distrain upon. I do trust that something will be done in order to overcome this difficulty. A great deal has been said about taking out summonses. I am bound to say, from the cases which have come under my notice in the Education Department, that the school boards make very few mistakes. I have had particulars furnished me of the amount of summonses taken out by the London School Board with a view to enforcing compulsory attendance. There is a periodical published which makes it a subject of censure, and says that the London School Board is very harsh with parents. Under the bye-laws, the well-known “B” notice, where the parents are admonished for not sending their children to school, there were 79,715 notices sent out last year, and out of that number only 7,722 were summoned, and the number of cases dismissed was only four. Under Section 11—that is, to meet the case of habitual neglect—there were 3,871 summonses, and the cases dismissed were only 11. The employers summoned were 22, and only one case was dismissed. I think that is a fair illustration of the working of compulsion, and this disproves the constant allegations of the hardships undergone by parents at the hands of the school boards. We are asked what are the moral results of the education on which the country is spending £5,000,000 a-year. We hear a good deal of declamation against our present system as being irreligious. I am quite sure that neither the noble Lord the Member for Liverpool (Viscount Sandon) nor the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton), who have presided in the Department, will say that they are irreligious. I know in the town of Liverpool, which the noble Lord (Viscount Sandon) represents, that both the school board and the voluntary schools work heartily together, and prizes are given in religious instruction in that town, and the results have astonished some of the opponents of the school boards when they come to see the answers of the children. The same thing was told me in Manchester of the papers submitted to the school board, and one who is well known for his opposition to school boards admits he was taken quite aback by the examination papers, and had no conception of the amount of Biblical knowledge which had been attained by the children in school board schools. If I wanted to disprove the statement about the decline of religious teaching, I could bring a few facts to the notice of the House. The total number of children in voluntary schools in 1870 was 1,449,000, the total in 1880 was 2,759,000, showing that the numbers receiving very distinct religious instruction in voluntary schools had increased by 811,000 children. Of these there was an increase in the Church schools of 627,000; in the Roman Catholic schools of 79,000; in the British and Wesleyan schools of 127,000; and in the Board schools of 1,085,000, showing a total of 1,900,000, or a total increase of nearly 2,000,000 of children in the schools of the country, and a very large proportion in voluntary schools of the country, are, except a small number, receiving religious teaching. Then in Scotland the school boards adhere to the old system. After that statement, who can say that there is no religious teaching given to the children? On the contrary, I think that there never was so much religious teaching given to the children of the country as at this moment, and that it was never so well taught and so well understood as since the Act of 1870 was passed. As to the moral results of the Act, we have abundant evidence of them. I have heard from the Chief Inspector of London Police the wonderful change that he believes to be brought about by the vast number of wretched children taken from the streets. In the town of Birmingham Major Bond says that the effect has been to get rid of the young ruffians who used to stand at the street corners, and whose coarse language and coarse manners caused a scandal in all our large towns. There was a great diminution in that respect and in juvenile crime, and the same thing was reported from all parts of the country. We have been going on during the last 10 years making progress towards civilizing and humanizing those who have been neglected in the past. I should like to say a few words as to the devotion of hundreds and thousands of noble men and women who have taken part in the cause of education. It is extraordinary, and the noble Lord opposite (Viscount Sandon) will bear me out, that in towns like Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, and elsewhere, when they take up this work they become absorbed in it, and they devote their lives and their energies and a great deal of their money to it. The voluntary effort brought into the school board system has astonished me. In Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, and elsewhere, we find men and women who are doing honour to themselves and sacrificing their time and means to the educational interests of the rising generation. Having concluded what I have to say in that respect, I proceed now to that part of the Statement which refers more immediately to the Papers which I have laid on the Table. The House will be aware that a year ago, when I made my Annual Statement, we were somewhat under the censure of the Upper House. The subject had scarcely been a month before the country before Resolutions were made in the other branch of the Legislature denouncing the Code as ambitious and entirely uncalled for. My noble Friend the Lord President of the Council (Earl Spencer) promised the other House of Parliament, and I promised this in my Statement, that during the coming year we would make full inquiry into the operations of the Code; and if we found that it was not for the advantage of education, and not calculated to bring out the best possible results for the expenditure and the devotion given to it, that we would come down to the House and frankly state what was the result of our inquiry, and I have now here fulfilled that pledge. I may say that we have had complaints as to the Code from, I think, everybody who takes an interest in education. The teachers complain that it gives too little freedom to teaching, that it gives unnecessary clerical labour, and that it does not distinguish between good and bad teaching and good and bad schools, that schools that display no skill get as much as those where the work is thoroughly well done. From that time to this we have been receiving suggestions from all quarters, and obtaining evidence to enable us to arrive at a wise solution. I cannot enter upon this subject without speaking of the great assistance we have received, and the ability and zeal shown by the officials in the permanent branch of my Department. Personally, I cannot but express my obligation for what they have done in this matter, and the way in which they have set themselves to accomplish this reform. I should have been unable to make such a statement, or to have laid it on the Table in the shape I now place it, had it not been for the intelligence and ability of the permanent staff with which I have been associated. It is due to them that I should acknowledge the assistance they have rendered in getting out the scheme which I have laid on the Table. In the first place, we had Memorials from school boards and from persons connected with education who made suggestions for the improvement of the Code. We found ourselves able to agree upon certain principles, and then papers were prepared by 20 or 30 of our principal Inspectors, and we elicited from them the freest possible criticism, and asked them to give suggestions as to the best system which their long experience enabled them to give. Having received those Reports, we were enabled to make a draft Report, and we agreed further that the matter should be thoroughly sifted and the detail worked out by a Committee. The House would like to know the process by which we arrived at that. Sir Francis Sandford, Mr. Sykes, and Mr. Cumin represented the three chiefs of the Education Department; Mr. Warburton, Mr. Sharpe, and Mr. Fitch, the three Inspectors representing the great Training Colleges—

Mr. Mundella

Mr. Warburton for his experience in smaller schools, and Mr. Sharpe for the larger schools. I presided over this Committee myself, and Mr. Hodgson acted as Secretary, and we had many a long and laborious day's work in arriving at the scheme which we have now submitted to the House. When we had accomplished that, we felt that we must put our work through a finer sieve and must call in additional critics, and we added to the Committee Mr. Matthew Arnold, Mr. Moncrieff, Mr. Oakeley, and Mr. Blakiston, and Lord Spencer himself presided over that Committee, and the result is that which I have laid on the Table. I must say, in laying it upon the Table of the House, that I do so with great hope and great confidence. But we do not ask, and we shall not ask the House to assent to it as it stands. We simply submit it as the proposals to form the basis of the future Education Code of the country. We ask that it shall receive, not only the fullest criticism, but we hope that it will receive fair consideration. It is not to be made a Party question. But we must all assist in the good work. It is not a Party question with us. We will take good care that we deal with all schools on an equality, treating them all alike, whether voluntary or board schools, and they will come under the same regulations and receive the same grant if they have the same capacity. What we wish to arrive at is sound educational principles, and if we arrive at sound educational principles we can deal with the money payment afterwards. We do not want to go into the question of whether we pay 3*d.* too much for this or 6*d.* too much for the other; but what we want to know is what will present the best results and the most thoroughly sound education. I can only say that I trust that during the Recess I shall receive suggestions from all parts of the House, and I can promise, on behalf of the Department, that they shall receive our candid and careful attention. Now I shall submit a few heads of the scheme. Under the first head we deal with the attendance. It is proposed to adopt the average attendance in each school as the basis of the grants which have hitherto been made on account of individual scholars, whether infants under seven years of age presented to Her Majesty's Inspectors for collective examination, or children above seven presented for examination in reading, writing, and arithmetic. The next is that—

“Two hundred and fifty attendances will be no longer required as a condition of examination; but all scholars who have been on the register for six months will, unless there is a reasonable excuse for their absence, have to be presented to the Inspector.”

Now, with reference to that, I have to say that this is the fairest measure of the work of the school. The grant now depends too much upon chance circumstances and accident over which teachers and managers have no control. For instance, a wet day for inspection, or a snowy day, or the absence of some of the principal children, immediately affects the grant, and the school suffers for one year in consequence of these circumstances. Another reason is that it will keep the work of the school equal. The failure in any part will affect the whole school; and it will tend to make the teachers take an interest in the good and bad scholars alike, and will lead them to take as much interest in the proficient and non-proficient, and in the quick and the dull scholars. The change is in the interest of the children generally. There are constantly cases coming before me of loss to teachers from the causes I have indicated. There was an event which came before me the other day of a loss arising from the removal of a battery of artillery. These are hardships which are constantly arising; but there is something more serious. We shall remove the temptation to tremendous fraud. It was the most painful part of my duty to have to sit in judgment on teachers who had been tempted to make one or two strokes of the pen which had brought them under the charge of fraud, and the inevitable consequences following, that their certificates are suspended and their characters blasted, and their careers blighted or ruined. I had a case on Saturday last where it only required one single stroke of the pen to complete the number of attendances of one boy. He attended 249 times, and the schoolmaster made that one stroke. What was the difference in that school? That single stroke made £16 difference to that school, because it just brought that boy into the list of boys to be presented. It brought them within the 20 per cent, and it made just £16 difference. We have had cases where two strokes have made £10 and £20, and even £30 and £40 difference to the school; and when the master has done all he can, and the boys fail him at the last moment, I must say that the temptation is very strong to bring up the attendance of the school, and I think that that temptation ought to be removed. Abolishing those 250 attendances will remove the strain on the teacher's mind; and it will be the fairest way to obtain payment by results, and I am quite satisfied that it will give great elasticity of teaching and improve the whole system. Now we say, under the 3rd clause, that grants will be so assessed that the present average rate of aid will, as far as possible, be maintained. The fair school will receive nearly the same grant, the bad school will receive a little less, and the good school a little more; and thus we discriminate between the various schools. Then there will be grants common to all schools. As to music, we propose that the full grant will be paid if the singing is satisfactorily taught from notes, or according to the Tonic Sol-fa system. Only one-half will be paid if the singing is taught by ear. Then there is a sewing schedule, which we felt we might make a little lighter for the younger scholars. We felt that it was too much for the younger scholars, and the fancy sewing was not exactly what we wanted. Clause 6 is also common to all schools; and this is called the Special Merit Clause. This is a clause which will do more, perhaps, to lift the tide of education than any other in the scheme.

“The Inspector shall have regard to (a) the organization and discipline; (b) the employment of intelligent methods of instruction; and (c) the general quality of the work in each school, especially in the standard examination; and shall have power to recommend an additional grant on the average attendance, varying in amount according as the school is, in these respects, fair, good, or excellent.”

There will be a special merit grant on these three heads. Now, I think the House will say—“You are placing great powers in the hands of the Inspectors.”

Well, I will show how that is proposed to be done when we complete the organization for inspection; and by it we hope to insure greater economy, and greater efficiency, and much greater uniformity than hitherto. I now come to infant schools; these also have an average attendance, and where the infants in a school amount to 40 a separate adult teacher will be required for their instruction. For more than 60 infants a certificated teacher will be required. We cannot have infants committed to the charge of monitors or young pupil teachers. We must insist upon better infant school teaching—the foundation of all teaching—and we propose also that part of the grants will be made to depend upon the infants being taught by special methods, something akin to the Kindergarten, giving appropriate and varied occupations; suitable instruction in the rudiments of reading, writing, and arithmetic; and a systematic course of simple lessons on objects—and we want that carried right through the school—and on the phenomena of nature and of common life. Then infants between six and seven may, at the discretion of the Inspector, be examined individually according to Standard I. of the Code of 1870; and if any scholars in an infant school are taught in Standard I., they will be examined and paid for as in schools for older children. Then we come to boys' and girls' schools. Payments on the passes of individual scholars will be abolished, and 250 attendances will be no longer required as a condition of examination. Then we stipulate that—

“All scholars on the register shall be present at the inspection, unless there is a reasonable excuse for absence; and all such children who have been six months and upwards on the registers are to be presented for examination.”

Then, as to the mode of assessing the grant—

“The grant will be calculated on the results of the examination of these scholars. It will be based upon the proportion of passes actually made to those that might have been made by the scholars examined.”

I cannot claim credit for this invention; it is one of the simplest, and it saves an immense amount of labour. Let me explain it. It states the proportion of passes actually made to those that might have been made. Now, supposing you had 100 children; the maximum they might make would be 300 passes. Supposing they make 270 passes, that is 90 per cent; and supposing they make 240 passes, that is 80 per cent, they will be paid for thus—10*s.* when they make 100 passes per cent; then 9*s.* and 8*s.* when they made 90 and 80 passes per cent. But the House will see that there will be no longer that temptation to push forward children who can make a certain percentage; it will be based upon the work of the school, and upon the special merits of the school; and I believe in that respect we may expect a vast improvement, and get better results out of the teaching. In Standards I. and II. we propose, unless either of them is a Standard for half-time labour, that instead of examining every child—and there are 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 children scheduled in the Education Department—instead of examining them individually, the Inspectors will examine such a number of scholars as will enable them to estimate the quality of the instruction in each of the three elementary subjects. The Inspector may take 10, 20, or 30 children, just as he pleases. When you get to Standard III., where the passes are important, and where the parents like to know how their children are getting on, then, for the present at least, all scholars presented in Standard III. and upwards will be examined. More than 1,250,000 of the children are examined in Standards I. and II., and the examination of those little children under seven years of age in the very simplest elements imposes upon the Inspectors an amount of labour perfectly unnecessary, and this amount of drudgery we propose to relieve the Inspectors of. Well, then, we propose to add a Seventh Standard. We had six Standards; but what was the result? In many a rural school, when a boy has passed the Sixth Standard and wants to stay a little longer, the teachers are anxious to get rid of him. I have complaints saying—“My boy has passed the Sixth Standard, and I want to keep him at school, and they say that they cannot keep him unless they double his fee, because he does not earn a grant.” We believe now that we must have seven Standards. We say that if any scholar, over 10 years of age, is, after the 1st April, 1883, presented in the First or Second Standard, the passes made by such scholar will not be reckoned in calculating the percentage of passes for the purpose of a grant. Then I come to a very difficult question—the question of class subjects. I have satisfied myself that specific subjects in the Fourth Standard lead almost entirely to cram. They are simply used for the purpose of getting a grant, and we have little physiologists and little geologists of nine or ten years of age who get up some technical words which they do not understand, and that has done very much to the neglect of thoroughness in other subjects. Now, there are some things that children should know, some common facts that children ought to be made acquainted with. I want the House to bear in mind we have to work and take the condition of the labour market into consideration, and the state of the Acts, and the fact that the majority of our passes are in the Fourth Standard, and the children who pass the Fourth Standard we want to learn something more. There are some things that they ought to learn, and they ought to have some standard work, and acquire a knowledge of certain specific subjects in addition. I think it is better to remove the specific subjects to the Fifth Standard. The school will be regarded as made up of two divisions—in the lower division, Standards I. to IV.; and in the upper, Standard V. and upwards. Two class subjects may be taken in each division. English will be taken as a class subject—that is to say, grammar and recitation. A boy ought to know something of his own language, and something of the poetry and literature of his own language, and we insist that it shall not be the commonplace stuff that is to be found in the school books; but we propose that they shall learn good English, and get them to learn 100 lines of Milton or 100 lines of Shakespeare; and instead of taking a fourth or fifth-rate obscure poet, we intend them to read Milton and Shakespeare in the Fifth, Sixth, and Seventh Standards. We say that geography, including physical geography—in fact, the two subjects must be taught together. Mr. Fearon, who represents the physical geography, has a proposition. He proposes that in the First Standard they shall know the meaning and use of the map. A plan of the school and the playground will be given, and he desires that they shall know the four cardinal points. Then they shall go on to the size and shape of the world; geographical terms will be explained and illustrated by reference to the map of England; and physical geography, with reference to rivers, and so on. What they do learn they shall learn not merely from books. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin said that he never meant that they should be taught merely from reading books, but that they should have illustrations. We propose that they shall have illustrations. Then we pass on to what we call elementary science. English—grammar and recitation; geography—including physical geography—and elementary science will alone be recognized as class subjects in the lower division, and if only one class subject is taken in the lower division, it shall be English; if two are taken, the second shall be geography or elementary science. The upper division may take as class subjects any of the three subjects to which the lower division is restricted, or history, or a specific subject, treated and examined in as a class subject. The grant for class subjects will be made, as now, on the average attendance, and an increased grant will be paid if 20 per cent of the scholars examined are presented in Standard IV. and upwards. We propose that one of the reading books in each Standard must be an historical reading book, adapted to the ages of the scholars in the Standard. Now, I do not know why children who read something should not have historical reading books, so that a child may know something of the history of his own country. Then there are specific subjects. We say that no scholars shall be examined in specific subjects if the percentage of actual to possible passes in the elementary subjects of the previous inspection was less than 75—that is, unless 75 per cent of them pass in Standards; we say that they shall not take up specific subjects until they have done this. I now pass on to the night schools. They are thoroughly on the decrease. Their decline is something like from 70,000 or 80,000 to 40,000 in this year. The teaching of merely the three R's in the night school has ceased to be attractive. Children are taught them in the day school, and then the condition of boys who have been presented in a higher Standard in the day school has gone a long way to ruin the night schools, and I think our night schools may be said to be in a most miserably declining condition. Now, we propose to do this. We are anxious that a boy whose short school life in the Fourth Standard ended at 10 or 11 years of age may have some chance of carrying on his education during the evening.

We do not propose to make his attendance compulsory; a boy who has worked eight or ten hours cannot be compelled, he must be attracted. We have laid down three simple clauses for the night schools.

“Grants will be no longer confined to reading, writing, and arithmetic, but will be made also for proficiency in class subjects.”

As something more than reading and writing will be taught hereafter in the night schools, grants will be paid in respect of those children only who, having passed the Standard fixed by the bye-laws of their district for total exemption, are under no obligation to attend school, and are not day scholars. That is to say, a boy who has passed his full time Standard, and leaves the day school before he can receive the grant, may attend a night school. There is another clause which I hope the House will agree to—it is that a teacher in a night school need not be a layman. I know that the Nonconformist ministers may help the teachers of the night schools, whose burden is heavy enough. Often in the rural districts the only intelligent person who can assist the schoolmaster might be the Nonconformist minister, and I ask that he shall be allowed to assist the schoolmaster. At present we allow none but laymen to teach in the day schools; and I see no reason why a Christian brother, or a local preacher, should not assist at a night school. I see no reason why a clergyman who wishes to be useful cannot be allowed to assist in a night school. But if there is any blame or any merit due to that suggestion it is due to me. I am prepared to take the full share of discredit, if any, for that suggestion. I know from my experience in my earlier youth that all the knowledge of natural history I obtained was at a night school taught by a clergyman, who, at the same time, taught a friend of mine, now one of the greatest naturalists living, and the Secretary of the Royal Geographical Society, Dr. Bates. At the last meeting of the British Association at Sheffield there were several clergymen who desired to teach botany to children; and those men found that they were excluded from the schools, and they had to take the children to their own houses to give them lessons. I think that the House will not misinterpret my desire to utilise all those forces. Special grants to pupil teachers will be continued. Not more than three pupil teachers will be allowed in any school or department, whatever number of certificated teachers may be employed. The number of pupil teachers to be employed as teachers are now in excess considerably, and there will be some 76,000 school teachers without hope of employment when they have finished their apprenticeship. We also abolish the stipendiary monitors. They have not been a success. Candidates for apprenticeship as pupil teachers will be required to pass Standards V. and VI. Then, as to the staff in the school, an assistant teacher will count as sufficient for 60 scholars instead of 80, as heretofore; and no teacher examined at or after Christmas, 1882, will be allowed to have pupil teachers who has not passed in papers of the second year. We wish to raise the status and qualification of the teacher. We are closing a side-door by which incompetent persons enter the profession, and I shall tell you how we intend to open another door. By Clause 38 we make a fair and right concession to the schoolmaster. The annual entries made by Inspectors on teachers' certificates will be discontinued after they have been raised to the first class. We often have complaints that a young Inspector will endorse the certificate of an old teacher in a way very disheartening to the teacher in his work. If a man has once attained his first class, he can always get from the Department a record of his services, and he will be entitled to claim from the managers of his school a certified copy of the Inspector's yearly Report when it is entered in the log book. We propose to open another avenue to the teaching profession. In my experience in the Education Department I have applications by the dozen—almost by the hundred—from University men who want some occupation. We are multiplying very largely the number of men who attend the University. All our grammar schools have scholarships. That bridges the gulf between elementary schools and the Universities. In the town of Birmingham the system is so complete that you have a perfect network of elementary schools. Then you have the higher schools for those who have to pass out in the 14th or 15th year; and, further, you have your middle-class scholarships founded by King Edward's foundation.

Mr. Mundella

The same thing takes place in Manchester, Liverpool, and Nottingham, and if we can only get the endowments of the country applicable to their proper objects, if we can only get the endowments dealt with with any degree of rapidity, we shall have a complete system of middle-class education which will meet the wants of, and gives a stimulus to, the elementary schools. This brings, moreover, more men to the Universities. A man going to the University in Scotland carried his University teaching into business; but in England a man who had been at the University thought he must be a professional man, or a servant of the Government, or have some employment that is not in the ordinary line of common employment. We propose to open the doors to those who come from the University, and to make them teachers. We say that graduates of any University in the United Kingdom, and women who have passed certain of the higher examinations held by the Universities, may be recognized as assistant teachers, and will be admissible to examination for certificates after serving as assistants for one year in a school under inspection if the Inspector reports favourably of their skill in teaching and reading, and, in the case of women, of needlework. We require them to come to work for a year, and offer them a fair field, and it will be a field through which they will pass to the schools. It will bring up the whole profession, and raise the tone of the teachers of the elementary schools by the qualifications which these teachers will possess. I am now about to conclude. Certificates will be no longer granted without examination; and no certificate will be cancelled, suspended, or reduced until the Department has informed the teacher of the charges against him, and has given him an opportunity of explanation. Now, I have two questions about which my noble Friend the Member for Liverpool (Viscount Sandon) has some difficulty, and as to which I know that whatever merit there is in them is due to my noble Friend; but I believe they were made to meet a state of things that is now passing away. The payment of honour certificates will be discontinued. The noble Lord thought the honour system stimulated the attendance of children, and that it was one of the means of indirect compulsion. He expected that it would be largely availed of, and it was thought there would be a payment of £50,000 a-year; instead of which, owing to the objection that it was always to be a reward in the future, and that it was prospective and not retrospective, the honour certificate has caused a great deal of heartburning and a great deal of difficulty, and I know of nothing that has caused so much trouble to the Department. A person feels that the child at the end of the year, if he does not receive his payment back, is in some little difficulty, and that it is a wrong done to the children. Now, there is no need of this stimulus any longer, and I think it can be better employed in bringing them into the night school than in spending £50,000 a-year, which goes mainly to the children of the lower middle-class. Then there is another question. The production of a Child's School Book will no longer be required as a condition of the payment of annual grants. Now, the school book was meant to keep a record of the age and attainments of the child, so that it might be a record for all purposes, whether as a record for labour, or on passing from school to school. I was very sanguine myself, and I know I spoke very strongly on this, and I am bound to say that nearly all over the country it is a complete failure. In a town like Birmingham not 2 per cent of the school books have been used. Some of the children have three and four, and as many as 11 school books, and I find a statement here where a child has been found with three school books with a different age in each school book, that each of the ages was a wrong one, and the Factory Inspectors refused to accept the school book as the real proof of the child's age. Therefore The Child's School Book must go, and we no longer make the production of the school book necessary. I am almost ashamed to look at the clock. I have only one more topic to speak upon, and I have no doubt I will be asked what are we going to do with the system of inspection, for if we are going to give special money grants to schools, how are you going to deal with individual Inspectors who make grants on mere caprice? Well, now, our system of inspection is somewhat overgrown. The whole Department has grown up so rapidly, and inspection of every individual student has been considered so important, that we have a large number of Inspectors—120 or 130—and an equal number of Inspectors' assistants, and if we continue to examine them we must increase this staff every year. We have complaints from various parts of the country as to the laxity in some cases and the want of indulgence in others, and these complaints cause a great deal of trouble and anxiety. What we propose to do is to divide England and Wales into districts. We shall take from amongst our very best and most trusted Inspectors a certain number of men to be Inspectors of those districts, and we shall place them at the head of those districts. Under those Inspectors there will be other Inspectors who will be subordinate in the district, and with that Inspector they will have to communicate, and he will be held responsible for their work. We propose by that to diminish the higher grade of Inspectors, and to call into existence another class of Inspectors. We have no freedom. Some of our ablest and best Inspectors' assistants, who have taken University degrees, men of high character and ability, who have spent a dozen years in the service of the Department, cannot earn any considerable addition to their salary, and, after doing good service, perhaps only receive £175 per annum. We propose to get an Inspector between the Inspector and the Inspector's assistant, and we propose to have sub-Inspectors recruited from the ranks of the Inspectors' assistants and from the ranks of the schoolmasters. The salaries of those sub-Inspectors would have to be fixed by the Treasury; but they would only be called into existence as sort of supernumeraries, when others retire or drop off; but we propose that the Chief Inspectors of the Department—and there are 12 or 15 of them—shall once a year meet at Whitehall, and lay down a regular system of examination for their respective districts. They shall agree upon a plan and upon their tests as to good, fair, and excellent, and shall then enforce that uniformity upon the Inspectors below them. We hope by this means to achieve much more uniformity throughout the country. I do not intend that any Inspector shall be employed who has not had ample preparation and experience in the schools; but we do intend that there shall be some test exacted from Inspectors as to their capacity to inspect, and as to their ability to descend to child-life. I must apologize to the House; and although my Statement must be rather dry, and have no charm about it, yet I do feel that the Department with which I am connected is as much associated with the honour and the greatness of England as our Army and Navy.

ART AND INDUSTRIAL MUSEUMS.

RESOLUTION.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS, in moving the following Resolution:—

“That, in the opinion of this House, grants in aid of Art and Industrial Museums should not be confined to London, Edinburgh, and Dublin,” said, he congratulated his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council on the real and substantial progress in education he had shown in the able Statement which he had just made. They must, however, moderate their satisfaction by the fact that, after all, with all their machinery, only 24 per cent of the children examined had passed in the Fourth Standard and upwards. He wished to urge on the House the necessity of declaring that grants in aid of Art and Industrial Museums should not be confined to London, Edinburgh, and Dublin. The subject involved in this Resolution was one of great and increasing importance. It was one which concerned every constituency in the Kingdom. It was occupying in a larger and larger degree the minds of those in the Provinces who were interested in the question of industrial and other art, and of their bearing on the prosperity of their great national industries, and, therefore, on the prosperity of the country generally. A Conference of representatives of Municipal Corporations was held in Birmingham in 1877, to consider the claims of the Provinces. This Conference met again in London later in the same year. About 60 Municipal Bodies were represented, and deputations were appointed to wait on the Commissioners of the 1851 Exhibition, the Trustees of the National Gallery and of the British Museum. It was understood that the Commissioners of the 1851 Exhibition had nearly £1,000,000 of surplus at their disposal; but the result of the interview was an impression on the deputation that nearly the whole amount would go to the benefit of Len-don, and very little to the Provinces. From the Trustees of the British Museum and of the National Gallery unsatisfactory official replies were received. The matter contained in the Resolution was now ripe for discussion, and would come up again and again with renewed force till it was settled. A similar Resolution was moved in the House in 1878. On that occasion the noble Lord (Viscount Sandon), who then occupied the position of Vice President of the Council, made a speech in which he fully recognized the importance of the question, spoke of the advantages that would come from Museums of Science and Art in the Provinces, and said that he hoped during the following Session to make some statement on the subject. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman the present Vice President of the Council would give some equally satisfactory assurance that the matter would receive the attention of the present Government, and that some steps would be taken next Session in the direction indicated by the Resolution. He did not wish to complain of the aid given to the Provinces as far as art and science teaching was concerned. He wished that the grant for that purpose was much larger than it was; but of the amount granted the Provinces received a considerable share. He did not, however, regard this as any accession to the Provinces, but simply as receiving that to which they were fairly entitled. The question involved in his Resolution was one referring to Art and Industrial Museums. The Motion was not made in antagonism to the grants made for these purposes to London, Dublin, and Edinburgh. Those who were acquainted with the unrivalled collection to be found at South Kensington would not begrudge the money spent there. They would rather regret that the funds placed at the disposal of the managers of South Kensington had been of late years decreased rather than increased. In making such collections it was now or never. The field for the purchase of original specimens was getting narrower and narrower, while the collectors from all countries were more and more alert. What might be bought to-day for £1 would, in a year or two, cost £20, or, what was more likely, be absolutely unattainable. What they wanted was to establish in their prominent centres those appliances which were admitted to be absolutely necessary if they were to maintain their manufacturing supremacy. To illustrate the position, let him refer to the town of Birmingham, which was the centre of the great manufacturing district in the Midlands. He referred to that town simply because, being for many years Chairman of the Free Library and Art Gallery Committee, and also intimately connected with the manufactures of the district, he was, in a measure, familiar with its position and needs. But that which applied to Birmingham applied in the same degree to other towns, such as Manchester, Liverpool, Leeds, Nottingham, Sheffield, Bradford, Leicester, and others. There were writers and lecturers on art, rectors of Colleges, and superior persons who, while disagreeing among themselves in many things, seemed to unite in lecturing, and sometimes in libelling, the English workman. They were evidently unacquainted with the workshop, or with the difficulties and disadvantages under which the workman and manufacturer lay. Some time ago an important branch of industry in the Midlands, giving employment to many thousands of workmen, was threatened with serious injury by competition on the part of the Americans. An American manufacturer called on him, and he was enabled to place before him samples of the English and American work side by side, and on examination the American gentleman frankly admitted that he could not compete. The English work was produced by men, some of them scarcely able to read and write, with no aid except from their natural skill, industry, and perseverance. The conclusion of the American manufacturer was, that if they—the Americans—had workmen with equal natural powers and perseverance they could, with the addition of the teaching and help they could give them, beat the world in these manufactures. The fact was, that the English workman, for natural capacity and perseverance, was the best in the world. But they did little for him. The Midlands was the seat of the iron and metal industries, giving occupation to thousands. Yet Birmingham had no collection of iron and metal work, no illustrations of what was done in olden times, or what was now being done in other countries competing with us. Birmingham was the seat of the jewellery trade. Most of what was called, and sold as London jewellery, was made in that much-abused town. Yet there were no illustrations to speak of, no examples of the manufacture for educational purposes. It was true that in a quiet room, in a secluded part of the British Museum, there existed some splendid specimens of the goldsmith's art in the shape of the Cartellani jewels. The last time he visited them there were six persons present, two ladies, two gentlemen, a child, and the policeman or keeper. He was glad that the nation possessed them under any circumstances; but were these specimens subject to the view and to the study of the jewellers in Birmingham, it was probable that improved taste in manufacture would be the result. He might go on and speak of the position of the glass, japan, ornamental, and other manufactures; but the illustrations he had given were sufficient. Now, they were familiar with the argument which the upholders of centralization were fond of using—namely, that railway communication was now so complete that anyone could run up to London and see splendid examples of ironwork at South Kensington, jewellery at the British Museum, and so forth. But the utmost working men could expect was to go by a day trip to London once or twice a-year. The great majority did not do that. Besides, it was an argument which cut both ways. Suppose, for example, that the finest collection of cutlery existed at Sheffield, and the finest collection of lace at Nottingham. The railway arrangements were the same and the distance the same in going from London to Nottingham as from Nottingham to London. With regard to loans, the authorities at South Kensington were showing a wisdom and liberality in that direction which could not be too much commended. They were, by this means, showing their willingness to extend the advantages of these collections to the nation at large, to whom these collections belonged. But loans, while of great use, were not sufficient. There must be permanent collections. There were fresh workmen coming of age and coming forward every day. It was necessary that a workman should examine again and again a piece of work of high excellence in order to catch the spirit of it, and the trick of the hand by which it was produced. They were not asked for large sums of money to be sent down to the industrial centres to be spent in making a formless collection of articles and curiosities. Nor were they asked that localities should receive assistance which had shown no disposition to help themselves. But they asked for grants to assist local efforts in the formation of Art and Industrial Museums; in the formation of special collections, illustrating certain branches of industry, and meeting the special requirements of the locality. For instance, pottery from Staffordshire, lace from Nottingham, iron, metal, glass, jewellery from Birmingham, textile fabrics from Manchester, Leeds, &c. This could be best done with the co-operation or through the agency of the authorities of South Kensington, whose means of collecting and general experience gave them far greater facilities than local bodies could possess. He would like to quote a few words of a gentleman of the highest authority on this question, Mr. J. C. Robinson, formerly Art Superintendent of South Kensington Museum. He wrote last year as follows:—

“The pecuniary resources of the State must, then, in some shape or other, be brought in aid of local resources; in other words, it is for the State to concern itself with the nature and constitution of the typical Provincial Museum, and to assist in shaping such collections as already exist in forms of practical, yet, at the same time, elevating influence.”

Mr. Robinson further remarked—

“They (Provincial Museums) have a great and special work to do, very complex and difficult in itself, and which nothing but liberal and far-reaching assistance on the part of the State will enable them sufficiently to carry out.”

He was glad to find in the Estimates for the year a small sum of £2,000 for casts, electrotypes, and reproductions of treasures existing in foreign countries, the originals of which could never be seen by the mass of the people. He congratulated his right hon. Friend on this movement in the right direction. The sum was very small; but he hoped another year that it would be largely increased, and that these reproductions of works of art might form part of the grant demanded for the Provinces. He contended that it was a mistake to suppose that it was only necessary for workmen to study industrial art. The men who had opportunities of seeing and studying paintings, drawings, and other examples of what was called "high art" would be likely to have their tastes so cultivated and their ideas of beauty so developed as to be the better able to produce shapely and beautiful things in the branch of industry in which they happened to be engaged. The right hon. Gentleman would, perhaps, say that the towns should do all that was necessary by themselves out of the rates. But he must remember that these localities were, and had been, rating themselves to the utmost of their powers. Further, that they were supplementing their rates by individual efforts and sacrifices of the most liberal character. It was not sufficiently known to what a large extent the various towns were taxing themselves and what efforts they were making for the purpose in question. Only a week or two ago, in the borough he had the honour to represent, he assisted at the opening of a museum which had cost about £10,000, and this in addition to the maintenance of free libraries and other work in the same direction. They would take Birmingham simply as an example of what Provincial towns were doing. In that borough they were raising above £6,000 per annum from the rates; but this was barely sufficient for the free libraries and left nothing for art purposes. On the security of this rate they had spent since 1868 above £80,000 in building, furnishing, and maintaining their libraries. They had provided a small art gallery at a cost of £15,000 by private subscription. In 1878 they raised nearly £16,000 by subscriptions. They had just laid the foundation stone of a new art gallery, at an estimated cost of £50,000. Towards furnishing this gallery they had raised subscriptions to above £17,000. The Midland Institute stood on land now worth £30,000, given by the town. The Council of the Institute had purchased additional land, and were enlarging their buildings at a cost of £45,000, for which they had to rely on private subscriptions. While the people of Birmingham were making these earnest but insufficient efforts to supply their own needs, they were actually taxed to the extent of above £4,000 per annum for the support of parks, museums, and other institutions in London, towards which the people of London were paying nothing whatever from their rates. As an example of how these art galleries and museums were prized and used in the Provincial towns, he would state that in the year 1877, the year before the fire which destroyed the building, there were 394,645 visitors to the Birmingham Art Gallery and Museum. The number of visitors to the general departments—excluding reading-room—of the British Museum in the same year was but 539,281. Adding the libraries and reading-rooms in both cases the number of visitors to the Birmingham Institution was 538,135. To the British Museum 699,511. The right hon. Gentleman might ask them to go for powers to increase the rates for these purposes. But it was useless in the present depression to attempt this, nor was it fair to do so. It was overriding the willing horse. So long as the present method of rating and taxation existed he thought it would be impossible to get all they needed without liberal grants from the Imperial taxes. The rates bore heavily on shopkeepers and others, who at these times found it often difficult to make ends meet, while many who were far more wealthy got off comparatively easy. Besides, in the great centres of industry there were often more people outside in the districts around than inside the boroughs. These all used the institutions of the borough, and it was well that they should do so; but they paid nothing to the rates, and could not, therefore, contribute to the support of the institutions which they enjoyed except through the general taxation. He found from the Estimates of 1880-1 that the total amount given from the taxes to support institutions in Dublin was £34,174, in Edinburgh £22,648. For London the total amount was £369,329. Of this sum above £100,000 was for the support of London parks, £254,757 for the museums. Not a farthing from the London rates went in support of these institutions. If the right hon. Gentleman disputed the claims of the Provinces, how would he defend this expenditure in London? What defence could he make, for example, of the £7,000 per annum granted for the Bethnal Green Museum, a purely local institution? The growth of population in and around such towns as Liverpool, Manchester, Leeds, and Glasgow was so enormous that it seemed to him absurd to apply the term national exclusively to institutions maintained in London, Edinburgh, and Dublin. This question was not a local one, but one involving a principle of great public policy, one affecting the trade of the country generally, a matter in which the whole nation benefited, and towards which the whole nation should pay. Hon. Gentlemen opposite and on this side who represented counties and country interests were as much interested in it as were the Representatives of towns. If the trade of the towns was lost or diminished then the country must suffer in consequence. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not be satisfied by saying that they could get examples, casts, &c., from South Kensington at a great reduction on the cost price. He did not deny those advantages, and was grateful for small mercies. But they were considering a far larger question than that, and they could not remain contented with the crumbs which fell from the rich tables of London. He thought that when millions could be found for other purposes—often for very doubtful purposes—there should be no difficulty in granting, say, £200,000 or £300,000, for a work on which the happiness and prosperity of the country so largely depended. He would not detain the House by referring to the social advantages of these institutions, and to the extent to which they added to the happiness of the people. He believed that it was to institutions like these that they must rely in a large degree for the solution of many of these serious problems which affected and injured the social life of the people. He had only one thing more to allude to before sitting down, and it was this. This subject had occupied his mind very closely; but he had been always met with a great difficulty in the fact that the management of their National Institutions was in such a confused and unsatisfactory state. The British Museum was under one management, the National Gallery under another, the South Kensington Museum under a third. In the first two Institutions were many treasures stowed away which would give great pleasure and be of much educational value in the Provincial towns. This confusion of management was such a difficulty that early in the Session he drew up a Resolution affirming the necessity of placing these and similar National Institutions under one responsible Parliamentary management. But this would not be sufficient. All their educational institutions were, or ought to be, connected and co-operating, and he believed that nothing would meet the case but the placing of all educational work under one management. The Vice President of the Council had under his care elementary education, the importation of cattle, endowed schools, South Kensington Museum, the foot-and-mouth disease, and 50 other matters. In next Session, if the House would permit, he would venture to propose that in this country, where the subject of education in all its branches was taking a position of more and more importance, there should be a "Department of Public Instruction" receiving the whole attention of a "Minister of Education." The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. SLAGG, in seconding the Resolution, said, the present was a very opportune moment for discussing the important question which had been brought forward by the hon. Member for Ipswich. When foreign countries were running us so closely in the industrial race; at a time when such nostrums as Reciprocity and Protection were dragged from their graves and presented in their ghastly ceremonies to the living generation as cures for the evils under which the country was now suffering, the time of the House might be very well occupied in considering how best to provide a remedy to meet the competition which British industries had now to face. There was no doubt that foreign nations were paying a great deal of attention to the promotion of those arts and sciences which related to industry, while we in this country were doing very little that was practical in the same direction. He did not for a moment wish to minimize the efforts that were being made in education, art, and science; but the question which had been so very ably spoken to that night by his hon. Friend (Mr. Jesse Collings) was one which he thought had not hitherto received the due consideration of the Government. He would not underrate the efforts made by the South Kensington Museum, and would, with the permission of the House, confine himself to a section of the subject which, he thought, might have the practical attention of the Education Department.

Mr. Jesse Collings

He referred principally to the reproduction and distribution of articles in our large museums. Those who visited South Kensington would, he was sure, be immensely gratified with the collection of reproductions not only of English, but also of Continental objects of art workmanship from the studios of Elkington and Franchi of Paris. These objects had been reproduced by the electrotype process in a manner so authentic and artistic as to be for all purposes, except those of connoisseurs, quite as good as the originals. At any rate, for art purposes they were so. He wished that the idea he threw out last Session that it was possible to reproduce these and distribute them among the museums of the country without cost, or, at all events, at the smallest possible cost, should now be carried out. He was aware that at present the art schools obtained reproductions at a reduction on net price of 50 per cent; but that was not enough. The art schools which were teaching drawing were doing comparatively little towards teaching industrial art. He believed it was within the scheme of the Vice President of the Council to put the art museums of the Provinces on the same footing as the art schools; and he observed in the Estimates a sum of £1,500 which appeared to be intended towards this purpose. He believed the Education Department had done a great deal during the Recess in reproducing several important works of art, a large amount of the best college plate and the plate of foreign countries, especially of Russia, having been copied and added to our National Collection. But he must say that, although these articles were very beautiful and rare, they were more interesting as curiosities than as objects which could be usefully copied or advantageously applied to industrial art. All artists and authorities on this subject would agree that nothing was so useful for training the eye in the most perfect manner and for the guidance of taste as the antique model, and no country possessed such a splendid and abundant collection of antique models as existed in the British Museum. Not only did artists consider these objects to be the very best for training the eye and judgment in design, but on the Continent, and especially in France, it had long since been discovered in their industrial schools that when copied by casts they were the best and surest means of teaching the students in matters of design and form. There were also in the British Museum unique and magnificent collections of drawings and engravings of the old masters, of coins, and also of medals. Many of these coins and medals had been already copied in an admirable manner by the electrotype process. He had no hesitation in saying that for all practical and educational purposes these copies were quite equal to the originals. The copies of the antique models were even better than the originals for the practical purposes of the art student. The two museums of London were, he agreed, the fittest home for all the original works; but, at the same time, he was firmly convinced that it would be an inestimable benefit to the country if a systematic process of reproduction were entered upon, so that every institution and school and even every individual in the Kingdom should know where to apply successfully for a copy of each object of interest in our National Collection. He would not attempt to understate what had already been done at the British Museum; but many articles were, as yet, not reproduced. The magnificent old engravings had not been copied as far as he knew. As to having a Minister of Education, he was not in favour of multiplying the appointments of Ministers. He would rather define their existing appointments a little more and develop their functions. He did consider, however, that it would be a very great advantage to have a responsible and independent head of all Art Collections, who would be enabled to command, in an intelligible manner, objects which were now scattered in a most puzzling way. Such a gentleman should be responsible for the reproduction scheme, and in his functions he should be assisted by the best artistic power of the British Museum and the National Gallery, in order to guide his operations. This was not a dilettante scheme, or one that emanated from painters and sculptors, because he had no intention of facilitating the increase of indifferent sculptors and painters, of whom there were too many already. His idea was purely an industrial one, as he wished to give every possible assistance to the development of industrial arts and sciences. He would briefly allude, in conclusion, to another aspect of the case. In the large over-populated towns there were many quarters where men and women lived unlovely and squalid lives, apart altogether from all influences of beauty and refinement. While they complained that their lives were to some extent degraded, their tastes debased, and that they had little aptitude for the enjoyment of refined occupations, he thought they were apt to forget how few opportunities these people had of being brought into association with that which was elevating and refining. He spoke for those who lived in those slums, to whom such associations would be of inestimable value. They would appreciate them, and that they did appreciate them was shown by abundant evidence, for when these collections were sent down from the South Kensington Museum to the large towns people went in crowds to see them. His hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Jesse Collings) had pointed out what had been done in Birmingham to provide habitations for such collections. In his (Mr. Slagg's) own constituency a very handsome and commodious art museum had lately been acquired by the Municipality. It was impossible that they could fill it themselves. Original objects were daily becoming more difficult to acquire; and those not purchased already would, it seemed likely, very soon be bought up by the South Kensington Museum. They must, therefore, look to the reproductions of which he had spoken. They wanted systematic collections, and complete series of these objects issued in such a manner as to suit the especial trade or industry of the district. The House was aware that a Royal Commission had been appointed to investigate the art schools on the Continent. He had the honour to be placed on that Commission, and he looked forward with extreme interest to its proceedings. He believed it would put the House in possession of facts which they were not aware of in regard to the efforts of foreign nations. The subject before the House would grow in importance, and he hoped the Department of his right hon. Friend would take time by the forelock and bring forward some scheme for filling the museums in the Provinces, as the time was very near at hand when the Provincial people would demand such aids to their industry and manufactures.

Mr. Slagg

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, grants in aid of Art and Industrial Museums should not be confined to London, Edinburgh, and Dublin."—(Mr. Jesse Collings.)

—instead thereof.

MR. EBOYD said, he had great pleasure in supporting the proposition of the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Jesse Collings). He was strongly in favour of giving such instruction to our artisans, who were, at the present moment, unable to compete with their more highly educated competitors abroad. Very strict limits, however, must be placed upon the aid so given, as it was not possible to extend it beyond the great cities and the large towns, which were the real centres of our important industries. Such an education would have, he was convinced, a most important social and political bearing on the minds of the people. Whatever was done to encourage a knowledge of art in great cities and towns must be done at once, and would be perfectly justified; and he had no doubt that the results would more than repay the cost of the aid given. He quite agreed with the hon. Member for Ipswich as to the admirable intelligence and industry which the English workman threw into his work with such success, uneducated though he might be, in the technical sense of the word, as compared with those who had enjoyed greater advantages. He was glad that the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Slagg) had supported the Resolution, although he thought it was quite unnecessary that he should have dragged into the discussion this matter of Reciprocity. He must confess himself that he did not know what Reciprocity meant; but those who were high authorities upon great commercial questions and the conditions of manufacturing industry attached the greatest importance to Reciprocity, and Mr. Cobden himself held it out as an inducement to the country to adopt a Free Trade policy. The hon. Member for Manchester, however, appeared to have seen a great deal further than his master, Mr. Cobden, ever saw; but he did not think he would ever succeed in convincing the country that Reciprocity would be affected by the proposal before the House. In so far as such technical education could help them in their home trade, it would, he readily conceded, be productive of the greatest good. At the same time, it would never enable the hon. Member for Manchester to send calicoes to India in competition with Germany in face of duties of 50 per cent. He felt great interest in the statement the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council had made, and he hoped that these alterations in the Code would be productive of very great advantage to the country. As far as he could understand them, they seemed to be made in a right and reasonable spirit, and he had no doubt they would be carefully examined by all those interested in regard to education. He hoped that nothing would be done to injure voluntary schools. He had no doubt that the subscriptions in aid of the work of voluntary schools represented on the part of the givers a personal interest in education which could never be replaced by grants made by the State. He might allude very shortly to the question of compulsion.

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. Gentleman that the Question before the House is "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," and that the more convenient course would be for the House to dispose of the Amendment before the general subject of Education is discussed.

MR. ECROYD said, he recognized the right hon. Gentleman's ruling, and would only add, in conclusion, that he felt great interest in the Motion brought forward by the hon. Member for Ipswich, and he sincerely hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able to meet the desires of the great constituencies referred to.

MR. STORY-MASKELYNE said, he hoped the hon. Gentleman the Member for Ipswich would understand that in going counter to his proposition to expend public money to help Birmingham he was not without sympathy with the hon. Gentleman's objects. He did not in the smallest degree underrate the advantages of the institutions of which the hon. Member had spoken, whether from the point of view of technical education or from a higher aspect as civilizing agencies promoting the culture of the people. At the same time, he should like to know how the proposition he made was to be limited. How were they to select the towns to which it was to apply or to keep the expense within due bounds? Was the hon. Gentleman going to give to the House a schedule of those towns to which his benevolence would be applied? What would he do with regard to the question of free libraries? If it was right to spend the national funds on Provincial museums, simply because they were beneficial institutions, it would be equally right to assist in providing every small town in England with a free library out of the public funds for the same reason. His constituents lived round the head waters of the Thames. They had to contribute to the restraining and civilizing that river in places some way from their abodes; and because the dredging of the Thames helped to drain some of their lands they had to bear the cost. They did not ask the people of Birmingham to do this for them. Why were they then to pay for the civilization and higher education of Birmingham and its neighbourhood? Should not the same principle apply at Birmingham as in the Thames Valley? Why should not Birmingham provide a Museum for itself? Was Birmingham too poor to do what Manchester had done? A half-penny rate levied on the Black Country would yield all that Birmingham desired, and why did not the hon. Gentleman ask for powers to levy such a rate? On all the rest of the points he was at one with the hon. Gentleman. Indeed, he did not rise merely to oppose the Motion of the hon. Gentleman, but to show how, in his opinion, the great National Museums could aid those in the Provinces. They could aid them with very uncostly but very valuable reproductions, and they could aid them by training good men to look after their museums. Nearly every work of art in metal in the British Museum and South Kensington could be so reproduced that, for all educational purposes, the copy would be as good as the original; and those which could not be copied might, from time to time, be sent down to Provincial towns for exhibition. His own experience justified him in saying that a really good curator of a museum could not be made in a day; and in setting about establishing museums, they must remember that it was the man who made the collection, and not the collection which made the man. A collection was of no use whatever without a man who understood and arranged and catalogued it. When he was an officer of the British Museum he often wished there had existed some solidarity between the department of which he was keeper, and similar departments in local Museums. He could have kept them informed of opportunities as they arose for purchasing mineral specimens, and all the more economically because on a more considerable scale, when the purchases might be made for several institutions simultaneously. While the National Museums could thus put the authorities at Birmingham or elsewhere in the way of buying things for their museum economically and well, he thought that such great towns ought to spend their own money for purposes of that kind; and, therefore, if the hon. Member went to a division he should vote against him on that point.

MR. CAINE said, he had felt very strongly on this subject for many years, and he should have very great pleasure in supporting the Amendment of the hon. Member for Ipswich; and if anything were needed to prove that some intimate connection existed between the great National Museum in London and those minor galleries and kindred institutions in the Provinces, it had been supplied by the hon. Member for Cricklade. He had spoken of the difficulty in limiting these centres of population, and as to whether the grants should be given in money or in kind. For his own part, he thought more valuable articles could be given in kind. There seemed to him little difficulty about the limitation. The Government might support by such grants any town whose Town Council had already erected or acquired premises in which such collections could be suitably stored and exhibited, provided those authorities, whether Town Councils or otherwise, undertook the entire responsibility of their care and safe return, insuring them while there. He ventured to say a word in support of using the present collections for the purposes of the Provinces. He appealed to the Government for some assistance in the shape of loan exhibitions for the valuable institutions which the Earl of Derby, Mr. Mayer, and others had so munificently given to Liverpool. He had taken a close interest in everything connected with science and art education in Liverpool for many years, and he had noticed how all students in science and art, especially in art, were handicapped by the want of works of art by great masters which they could study. Duplicate etchings and engravings could be taken out of the collections in the British Museum without interfering with the efficiency of National Collections, and these might go on loan to the various art galleries throughout the country, to encourage and foster one of the most growing arts in the country. The hon. Member for Preston had drawn attention to the great amount of foreign competition interfering with their trade and commerce. He did not intend to enter upon the question; but there was one branch of reproductive art—that of etching—in which competition from France completely extinguished all native talent. He attributed this to the difficulty that art students had in getting full opportunities, even in the British Museum, of studying it. He had always held that it was the first duty of the British Museum to take suitable premises to display a series of educational engravings and etchings, showing the art from the very earliest date down to the present day. That could be easily done, he believed, and many artists in Manchester, Birmingham, and Liverpool, who were giving great attention to this reproductive art, found it impossible to study as they would wish to in consequence of the difficulty of getting access to subjects. Liverpool had made rapid strides within the last 10 years in this respect, and the Art Galleries there had been of very great service to young artists, entirely owing to the great energies of the members of the Corporation. In establishing a permanent Art Gallery in Liverpool, there had sprung up a School of Art that was known as the Liverpool School of Painting, especially of water-colours. He thought a selection might be made from the collection of etchings and engravings in the British Museum that might be framed in strong frames, and sent on circuit throughout the country. He did not say the British Museum should part with its treasures; they should always keep a hold of and constant watch over them. But they might spare them on loan, and do a great service to art and every artistic manufacture throughout the country. It was impossible for young Provincial artists to come up to London to go through their art education in the Metropolis on account of the expense it entailed. Throughout France there were local collections of art, which were of the greatest value technically; and if they were to maintain their supremacy in art manufacture, the Government must take the matter up and attempt to settle it on the lines of the Motion of the hon. Member for Ipswich. It was most important that the curators of all the departments of these great museums should have distinct instructions given them that when collections came into their hands at fixed prices, as they generally did, and for a given time, those offers should not be parted with until those in charge of Provincial museums and Art Galleries had been communicated with. Liverpool devoted £3,000 or £4,000 a-year to the purchase of works of art, and those in charge would be only too glad if the authorities in the British or South Kensington Museums would communicate with them when anything came into their hands. There was a general impression in artistic circles that in the National Gallery—in the cellars and garrets—there were hundreds, if not thousands, of etchings and water-colours by Turner, rolled up and never seen, simply because there was no room to exhibit them. He trusted if that were so, the authorities of the National Gallery would unearth these invaluable works of art and have them properly mounted, and lend, if not give them, to some of those great institutions spoken of in that discussion. The committee of the Liverpool Corporation would only be too thankful to have a loan of a number of Turner's works, and he was quite sure that artists would take large advantage of them.

Mr. Story-Maskelyne

MR. G. HOWARD said, he was sorry the hon. Member for Cricklade (Mr. Story-Maskelyne) found it necessary to oppose the Motion. He (Mr. G. Howard), however, rose to correct the erroneous statement made by the hon. Member for Scarborough (Mr. Caine), that there were great stores of Turner's drawings hidden in the cellars of the National Gallery. There was a large collection of such drawings, which had been mounted, and were exhibited in a room on the ground floor, the only place available for the purpose, but which was fairly lighted. The drawings were kept on shelves, from which they could be conveniently taken when anyone wanted to examine them. It was considered better to keep them in this way on shelves, as they would be liable to fade if exposed to the light; but a certain number of them were always open to public view. Three loan collections of Turner's drawings had been formed, and they were from time to time sent on loan to Provincial museums. The Trustees of the National Gallery were anxious to do all in their power to make their art treasures generally available for the public benefit. At the same time, he would recommend that the South Kensington Museum, which possessed a valuable collection of moulds made for the casts exhibited there, should distribute, as they might do, at a comparatively slight cost, a number of the best casts throughout the country.

MR. WIGGIN said, he should support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Ipswich. It was impossible for persons in the country to come up constantly to London to visit the Metropolitan museums, or attend the professorial art and scientific lectures. On this ground the Central Art Department ought not only to supply the Provinces with proper examples of art manufacture, but, further, ought to constitute the Professors at South Kensington peripatetic, in order that they might visit the large centres of industry in the country. The Government ought not to hesitate for a moment, considering the importance of the matter, to vote a large sum of money to the Education Department that these objects might be carried out.

MR. MAGNIAC said, that although a strong opinion had been expressed by his hon. Friend in favour of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Jesse Collings), he trusted that it would not be adopted, because he feared it would interfere with the question being dealt with in its entirety. The fact was that they had not got a really National Museum. They had instead a congeries of museums, each being more heterogeneous in its collections than the other. Their Governing Bodies were selected on the most extraordinary principles. The British Museum had 15 Trustees, nine of whom were elected on the ridiculous principle that they were the descendants of particular families, while the balance were selected because it was supposed they possessed a quasi- dilettante knowledge of art. Owing, however, to the system they had to administer, the institution was in a state of stagnation. It was not doing the work which it was intended to do, and, from its constitution, it could not do so. It was managed under an old Act of Parliament, which the Trustees had never sought to have altered. Only last week he asked one of the Trustees whether it was contrary to law that they should lend for exhibition some of the works of art which the museum contained? In reply to that question he was told that it would require an Act of Parliament to enable them to do so. But that was a matter which ought to have been remedied long ago. It was, he believed, the absolute duty of the Trustees to have had a Bill brought in to put an end to that state of things, and he could not doubt that the House would pass such a measure. Then they had the National Gallery, which he believed was even more conservative than the British Museum. What he meant was that there was even a greater absence of power to act in the Governing Body of the National Gallery than there was in that of the British Museum. The institution had six Trustees, one or two having been Trustees for many years. One was a Colonial Governor; and if he could manage the affairs of the National Gallery while in a distant Colony, it was evident that there could not be much to do, or else that everything was managed on the drifting principle. Another held an office in the Foreign Service, and he had been absent for a long time from England. The Curator, by some strange and anomalous arrangement, was almost invariably a past Royal Academician. Then they had the South Kensington Museum, where his hon. Friend could find an exemplification of the principle which he desired to have extended. But though the Governing Body were able, active, and zealous, they could not do all the good they might do, and which the country not unreasonably looked for from them. He was not able to give the figures for the last year, as the Report of the Museum for 1880 had not yet been presented; but he saw by the Report of 1879 that through the agency of the circulating department of the South Kensington Museum no fewer than 1,670,000 persons had been enabled to visit exhibitions of art objects sent from South Kensington to the large Provincial towns. That which was the case with South Kensington ought to be the case with the British Museum and the National Gallery. His hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich proposed by his Amendment to give grants of sums of money to Provincial museums to purchase works of art for themselves. But he should remember that every acquirer looked upon every other acquirer with feelings of hate and mistrust; and he feared that those feelings would not be absent from the minds of the conductors of the Provincial museums, who would thus be enabled to go into the market and bid against each other.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said, his suggestion was that the South Kensington authorities should make or sanction the purchases.

MR. MAGNIAO said, there was one real remedy which ought to be adopted—namely, the establishing of a central department to govern all those bodies. This was certain, that it was impossible things could be left much longer in their present state—some suffering from stagnation, some from incapacity, and others from uselessness. The first thing the Central Body should do would be to classify all the existing collections. At the British Museum, for example, there was a magnificent collection of etchings, engravings, and drawings by the great masters; while many of the originals were in the National Gallery. They ought to be together, for the object of all collectors was completeness; and the same observation applied to South Kensington, which had recently entered on the domain, one not its own, of classical antiquities. That very day he had seen in the National Gallery three of the most deplorable specimens of pictures that had ever been placed there. Probably they never would have been placed there at all if we had had a governing authority which was competent to put its foot down on purchases of this kind. The appointment of such an authority would also be a remedy for the state of chaos in which some of our museums were placed by bequests and gifts of objects of classical and mediæval antiquity, and objects of art and of natural science, which were left or presented on the condition that they should all be kept in one place. Probably the objection of testators to the unnecessary dispersal of their collections would be removed if they knew that the objects they bequeathed would be distributed in suitable quarters by a responsible central authority. In conclusion, he would express a hope that the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council would find time to deal with this question. No method of making grants in aid, however well meant, could effectually grapple with the subject, which ought to be dealt with in the manner he had indicated.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he was very sorry to interpose in the discussion, which, he admitted, had been productive of great advantage; but he would ask his hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Jesse Collings) to withdraw his Motion. He (Mr. Mundella) fully recognized the importance of the question, and entirely sympathized with the desire of his hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich that Municipal Museums should be established in the principal towns in England and should receive some assistance from the central authority. But assistance in the shape of lending valuable works of art could not be given by the Government to all the museums in England. To the existence of the South Kensington Museum was due the fact that every considerable Provincial town was desirous of having a similar institution of its own. Increase of appetite grew from what it fed upon. The question was, how the desired object was to be attained? Was it to be attained by means of grants from the Imperial Exchequer? He asserted that that would be impossible. Even if the thing were possible, it would be wrong to come to the Exchequer and say—"You must set up a museum in every great town in England." The thing was impossible owing to the rarity of the objects—even the duplicates—to be exhibited, and they were becoming more scarce and costly every day. It would be utterly impossible, for example, to collect another South Kensington Museum. His hon. Friend asked that grants for these works of art should not be confined to London, Dublin, and Edinburgh; and another hon. Member (Mr. Wiggin) said your Science Professors and your mining engineers should not be confined to London, but should be peripatetic. "They ought to go into the mining districts, and teach those engaged in mining and other industries their business." Now, what did the Mining

School in London exist for? There was no mining business in London; but the school was there because it was a great centre, and it existed solely for the Provinces and other districts in England. His hon. Friend seemed to think the South Kensington Museum existed exclusively for the benefit of London. He (Mr. Mundella) was only responsible for one portion of that Museum—the Science and Art Department. That Department existed infinitely more for the Provinces than for London. His hon. Friend (Mr. Jesse Collings) expressed surprise. Let him point out to him that, although he put a Notice on the Paper, asking the House to declare that these grants should not be confined to London, Dublin, and Edinburgh, but should be more equally distributed to the Provinces, that was exactly what was done in the case of those grants. Of the Science School and Science grant, £33,842, or 84 per cent, went to the schools in the Provinces, while £6,386, or 16 per cent only, went to the schools in London, Dublin, or Edinburgh. Again, of the aid grant to art schools, £22,510, or 78 per cent, went to the Provinces, and only £6,461, or 22 per cent, to London, Dublin, or Edinburgh. The sum of £8,594 was given to the School of Mines, practically for instruction entirely for the Provincial industries. He would now take the art training schools in London, Dublin and Edinburgh, which trained nearly all the teachers in the United Kingdom. Of 150 and odd art schools in the country, the teachers in about 130 schools had been trained at South Kensington Local Schools, also, had the privilege of purchasing works of art and necessaries at prime cost. Surely that was encouraging art in the Provinces. A special Report had been published of the circulation of art objects belonging to South Kensington Museum. Every Member of the House could ascertain what had been done. They had a large staff, working at its fullest strength, engaged in circulating the South Kensington works of art. He had no wish to reflect on the British Museum or the National Gallery; but he would say, if there was one institution which did its work effectually, and which had been worked to the very fullest stretch of its capacity, it was the South Kensington Museum. Indeed, his own friends were in the habit of complaining that whenever they went to that Museum to see some particular work of art the case was empty, and a label announced that it was lent, to Birmingham or some other Provincial town. The number of art objects, paintings, and drawings, estimated at five years' purchase, alone circulated in the Provincial towns in 1880 was 9,437; of scientific apparatus, 1,970. Examples were circulated in 55 institutions. The cost of circulation amounted to £4,659. He thoroughly agreed with the Mover and the Seconder of the Resolution in reference to our local industries. He believed the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Slagg), who was about to serve on a Technical Education Commission, would find that no country in Europe was doing as much for art, as applied to manufactures, as was being done in this country at this moment through the medium of the South Kensington Museum. How they could assist these museums was in the matter of reproduction. His hon. Friend seemed to overlook the fact that for the first time this year a Vote of £2,000 would be taken for reproduction of works of art, ancient and mediæval, and Votes of £1,500 under sub-head 4. Objects which would cost £3,000, and whose value would be more than double that amount, would be given for the small contribution of £1,500 from the localities. If the sum was not larger it was not his fault; he had done his best to make it larger. His hon. Friend hoped that he would not fall short of the promises made by the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) in 1877; but he thought he had gone a good deal beyond the noble Lord. The noble Lord said, on the occasion referred to, that the present was a time when the resources of the country were strained, and a strict economy was very properly exercised by those who had control of the public expenditure, so that the hands of Ministers in charge of the various Departments were much tied. The noble Lord added that the Government would not overlook the matter, which would receive careful consideration, and when it came under discussion next year he hoped the Government would be able to give an opinion one way or the other. That was what was said by the noble Lord; but this year the Government were prepared to give £3,000 for reproductions, which the Provincial towns might have for half the cost if they would only begin to help themselves. When he sat below the Gangway, for three years in succession he brought in a Bill to enable every locality to rate itself under the Free Libraries and Museums Act to the amount of 2d. in the pound. The Municipalities ought not to be fettered in the way they were at present. This House unduly exercised a controlling power when it said that for free libraries and museums only a rate of 1d. in the pound would be allowed. A second 1d. would pay for the museums; and, what was more, local liberality would be developed to an enormous extent. In Birmingham one person alone had subscribed £8,000, and a few others £7,000 more. That was only a beginning, and he was as sure as he was of his existence that in a few years Birmingham would have a fine museum. Such institutions were, of course, not built in a day. The collection at South Kensington was the laughing-stock of the country for a long time; but now the public had come to appreciate its value. It was rather discreditable to us that we had no gallery of the finest casts. At South Kensington they had resolved to have a gallery of casts. They were prepared to have Votes year after year for the purpose, and if those Votes went on increasing he should be the better pleased. His hon. Friend ought to be satisfied with what had been already achieved. It was due to the persistency and eloquence of the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Slagg) that they had a Vote on the Estimates this year. Let his friends in Manchester and Birmingham and elsewhere accept what the Government were doing this year, and next year he should be happy to see what the Treasury would do for those most useful institutions. The cultivation of the love of beauty and the feeling for art workmanship would be of the greatest benefit to the Provinces. If the matter was once set on foot, local liberality would come to the aid of local rates, and with such duplicates as the Department was prepared to give the towns would have splendid museums. He must remind the House that it was not by grants from the State that the great towns of Italy, Germany, and other countries created their museums; but it was by the spirit and local patriotism of their citizens which made people proud of their towns. He did not think that Liverpool, Manchester, or Birmingham was deficient in that local patriotism which characterized Florence and other cities which were distinguished on the Continent for their devotion to and cultivation of art.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, he begged the House to distinguish between what the Trustees of the British Museum could do legally and what they could not. Several things which had been alluded to on the present occasion were entirely beyond their powers. The hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Magniac) wished that the Trustees should hand over their prints to the National Gallery. The Trustees had no more power to hand over those prints than his hon. Friend. They were strictly tied down. He was sure he might say that the Trustees were ready to consider any suggestions which might be thrown out; but it was hardly fair to blame them for not doing what they had no power to do. Then his hon. Friend said that the Trustees might have brought in a Bill to enable them. He did not think it was for the Trustees to do so. In 1878, an Act passed through that House enabling the Trustees to give away duplicates, and from that moment they were endeavouring to carry out the object of the Act as faithfully as they could. They had in the British Museum, perhaps, the very finest collection in the world, of which the nation might well be proud. He hoped that his hon. Friend would for the present be contented with the discussion that had been raised, and would not go to a division. There was evidently so much to be said in favour of reconsidering the position of the National Museums, that the whole subject might, perhaps, be discussed with advantage another year.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, he was quite willing to bear testimony to the readiness with which the authorities of the South Kensington Museum had assisted the efforts which had recently been made to establish a local museum at Bradford. His right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) had cheerfully complied with the request which had been made to him. His hon. Friend the Member for East Cumberland (Mr. E. S. Howard), with equal readiness, when an application was made to the National Gallery, undertook, on behalf of that institution, to do all that he could, and the result was that a valuable collection had been lent to Bradford. It was not known or anticipated at Bradford that these liberal concessions would be made, and the grants had been received with the greatest gratification and surprise. He suggested to his right hon. Friend the importance of letting it be generally known that these collections at South Kensington and elsewhere were available for the use of localities even if it were only for a short period. But he confessed that he was not altogether satisfied with the position of his right hon. Friend. He had said that it was necessary to keep the great originals in London, where they would be sufficiently guarded. He thought that some of these great pictures and objects of art would be a great ornament to local museums, and it would be a relief in many instances to overcrowded galleries in London to send them away. He thought that, so far as educational results were concerned, the Provinces would receive as much benefit from these exhibitions as the people of London did. He might go further, and say that it was of the greatest importance, in regard to the industries of many parts of England, that there should be higher education in arts and science. He quite agreed that the National Exchequer should not be liable for the whole of the attendant expense; but wherever districts had shown a desire to have these collections, and to establish a course of art studies, such as Manchester, Liverpool, or Birmingham, he thought the Department should deal with these localities in a liberal way. His right hon. Friend had pointed out that a sum of £1,500 for this year had been set aside for the distribution of art objects, in addition to £2,000 for their reproduction; and he held out that as an earnest of better things to come. He must say that to him the sum appeared to be contemptible. An hon. Friend sitting near him had said the figure must be £150,000. He should have been satisfied, too, if that had been the figure. The sum of £1,500 was altogether inadequate, and almost an insult to the country. He must ask his right hon. Friend to bring greater pressure upon the Treasury; and he suggested that if economy were to be practised, as he argued was desirable, it should be carried out in the direction of saving the tons of gunpowder that were blown away in gunnery experiments and such like. It had been said that London was a convenient centre for these collections, and that the art objects there exhibited were accessible to persons from all parts of the country. But there were many struggling young men throughout the country who would be eager to avail themselves of these treasures if they were within a short distance of their homes; but the expense of a journey to London and of remaining there for such a time as to make their studies valuable was a very serious matter.

MR. ANDERSON wished, in the first place, to acknowledge in the strongest terms the manner in which the South Kensington Museum authorities assisted with loans and articles for exhibition those localities which desired such assistance. He had occasion recently to go with a deputation from Glasgow to the Department on this subject, and he could assure the House they were met more than half-way. The Department was now engaged in making a selection of most valuable articles of Oriental art to be sent down to an exhibition in Glasgow. He did not think, however, that the right hon. Gentleman had really met the question before the House. There was a want of management in connection with the great museums—the National Gallery and the British Museum—which was very much to be condemned. Only the other day, two pictures by David Roberts were bequeathed to the nation; but the National Gallery, having already pictures by that artist on its walls, refused to accept them. Why could not these pictures have been taken by the nation, put into a circulating department with others, and sent round the country? Simply because the National Gallery happened to be crowded, valuable pictures of this kind were declined as a bequest. The main point of his hon. Friend (Mr. Jesse Collings) was the treatment of the Provinces as compared with London, and that was a complaint which he (Mr. Anderson) had been making ever since he came into the House. London had everything done for it, and did nothing for itself; whereas Provincial cities did everything for them-selfes, and were left to do so. At present, grants were only given to London, Dublin, and Edinburgh. They were given, he believed, to Edinburgh and Dublin because they were considered as Metropolitan; but the industrial museums were misplaced. There was an industrial museum at Edinburgh supported by the State; but Edinburgh was not an industrial city. Glasgow and Dundee were the two chief industrial towns in Scotland, and they, if any, ought to receive such assistance from the State. Some hon. Members objected to anything being done for industrial towns; but urged that grants should only be given for the Metropolis. But they seemed to forget that the prosperity of the Metropolis depended upon the prosperity of the Provincial towns, and the prosperity of those towns was only to be kept up by doing everything we possibly could to promote the technical education of the people of those towns. It was from that point of view that he ventured to support the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich.

MR. MONTAGUE GUEST wished to point out that the British Museum had a valuable collection of engravings which no one hardly ever saw. Some time ago, when an exhibition of engravings was held at Burlington House, the British Museum did not come forward and contribute to that exhibition, so that the public had no opportunity of seeing what engravings the nation possessed.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK: The Trustees of the British Museum have no power to lend their collection of engravings.

MR. MONTAGUE GUEST thought if that was the case it would be a good thing to give the Trustees that power. Those engravings, if they could be seen by the public, would do much to improve the artistic taste of the people.

MR. WOODALL said, most of them who had experience in museums must know that what was wanted was not merely permanent collections with which people became familiar and in time very weary, but that which was continually fresh, suggesting new lines of thought; and it was because it accomplished that particular end that he wished to tender his strong acknowledgments of the very great value of the circulating department of South Kensington. That system of circulation where local museums were established had worked very well for a number of years with very contracted material, and it was only within comparatively recent times that works had been taken out of the museum proper and sent circulating round the country. With the encouragement of the House, and such pressure as the House could exercise upon the Government, strengthening them in that Resolution, he saw no reason why the whole of the South Kensington Museum should not be made available throughout the Provinces. It appeared to him that their aim should be to encourage, strengthen, and extend this system, rather than to ask for aid for the purchase of a permanent collection, to be kept in the local museums. He might mention that in his own borough there were three museums at that moment which were aided by grants from the circulation department. Recently, when they wanted a collection of Japanese examples a certain sum of money was subscribed in order to secure the 50 per cent aid given by the Department. The result was they obtained a very valuable collection; and while this could be done, it was unreasonable to ask the House to pass a Resolution to the effect that grants in aid of Industrial and Art Museums were not to be confined to London, Edinburgh and Dublin. He would only ask that in granting this aid the Department should abolish the distinction which had been a little embarrassing in limiting the aid to Museums in connection with Schools of Art.

Mr. MUNDELLA : That has already been done.

Mr. WOODALL said, he was glad of that. Where localities had provided free libraries and established museums, they gave the Department an assurance that objects sent to them would be cared for, and proper facilities afforded for the public seeing them. One other suggestion was that the value of these objects of art sent down from time to time would be largely increased if a system of lectures were organized for the purpose of giving an exposition of the objects themselves.

SCIENCE AND ART DEPARTMENT, SOUTH KENSINGTON — UNITED WESTMINSTER SCHOOLS OF ART—
CASE OF MR. GOFFIN, THE HEAD MASTER.—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, who had the following Resolution on the Paper :—

"That the retention by the Governors of the United Westminster Schools of Mr. Goffin as head master of that public institution, after he had, by a Select Committee of this House specially appointed in 1879 to inquire into his conduct at the request of the Governors of the Schools, been found guilty of a systematic course of fraud, falsehood, and subornation, is a public scandal, and as such demands the immediate attention of the Education Office and Charity Commissioners," said, it was with great regret that he was compelled, in the interest of public morality, to call the attention of the House to this case; but the issues involved were so grave, and so affected, not only the whole system of science instruction provided and paid for by the State, but so directly impugned the honour and authority of the House of Commons, that he had no alternative, even at this period of the Session, but to bring the matter before the House. He was afraid, however, that if he had been able to put his Resolution it would have been regarded as couched in strong language; and, therefore, unless he laid before the House the full details of the accusation it might appear so incomprehensible as not to be worthy of credit. It was necessary, in the first place, that the House should remember the principle on which these science and art examinations were conducted and the method of payment consequent thereon. All moneys paid through the Education Office or the Art and Science Department to managers of schools for the support of schools or classes were dependent upon the results of certain prescribed examinations. In elementary schools these examinations were conducted in person by the Education Inspectors and they ranged over the whole year. For art and science there was a different system. The examinations were conducted by printed papers issued at a certain given date to all the schools and classes in the Kingdom; the examinations were held simultaneously, and all the papers were then sent back to the Art and Science Department, were examined by the various Professors at South Kensington, and for every child or individual who passed a certain test in any one or more given subjects a payment of £1 per head for each subject so passed was paid to the school or class in which he had been taught. A certain interval must necessarily elapse between the date at which these examination papers were distributed by South Kensington and the day upon which the examination was held, and during that period the secretary or committee of the School of Arts were specially responsible for their safe custody. As an additional precaution against fraud, two members of the committee were requested to personally vouch by their signatures that the regulations and conditions of the Department had in every sense been complied with. Upon the faithful fulfilment of these duties depended the whole system of examination; if the committee thoroughly performed their self-imposed duties, nothing could be simpler and more satisfactory than its working; if they neglected them, the examination might become a fraud of the worst description, inculcating deceit and dishonesty into the minds of the children examined. The payments made for teaching science far exceeded those paid for elementary instruction. Few elementary schools obtained for all the subjects taught under the Code a payment of £1 per scholar, whereas every pass in science brings in £1, and many students take up several science subjects at a time. During the time he was at the Education Office, a good many instances of fraud in connection with these art and science examinations came before him; in almost every instance they were the result of negligence on the part of the committee or governing body of the school. Of the unhappy cases by far the worst were the frauds of Mr. Goffin, the present head master of the Westminster United Schools. These schools were established by a scheme of the Endowed Schools Commissioners, and were supported by funds previously administered by the Corporation of London. They were among the largest middle-class schools in the Metropolis, containing over 600 boys. Being secondary schools, they were not under the Education Department, and the only authorities having any indirect control over them were the Charity Commissioners. Mr. Goffin, an elementary certificated teacher, was in 1874, at a salary of £500 per annum, appointed head master of the schools by the Governing Body, of whom the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir Sydney Waterlow) was the chairman. Mr. Goffin proceeded to establish art and science classes in connection with South Kensington, and the payments made for such teaching through the Governors were, in 1875, £86 to Mr. Goffin, £8 to an assistant; in 1876, to Mr. Goffin £355 10s., to the assistant £41—total, £396 10s. In 1877, to Mr. Goffin £386, to the assistant £65—total, £451. These payments were all made upon the certificate of the Governors that all the precautions and regulations of the Department had been fulfilled to the letter. Very shortly after he (Lord George Hamilton) was appointed Vice President of the Council. In May, 1878, two days after the science examination, Colonel Donnelly, the head of the Science Department, was visited by a man, who said that, as a matter of duty, he felt compelled to inform him of what was going on in the Westminster Schools. Though not a master himself, he had a brother in that Institution, who told him he believed that by some means Mr. Goffin got hold of the papers before the examination, as the "tips," which was the term given to his lessons just previous to the examination, were undeniable answers to the questions set. His brother, to test the nature of these "tips," got the notes of a boy taken at a chemistry lesson just previous to the examination. These notes were given to a master of the name of Hall, who was going up for the same examination, but had not been present at this lesson, as soon as the chemistry examination was over. On comparing the notes with the examination paper, Colonel Donnelly's informant discovered that they were eight direct answers to eight of the questions set, the number of questions to be answered at this examination being limited to eight. The name of the boy who took the notes was unknown to him. Colonel Donnelly was much startled by this information. If the notes were authentic, Mr. Goffin's guilt was clear; and if one master had knowledge of the contents of the examination papers, it was not unlikely that others might have obtained similar information. Colonel Donnelly immediately took with him to the schools two experienced Inspectors, Mr. Iselin and Captain Abney, and they informed Mr. Goffin of the nature of the charge they had to make without mentioning the name of their informant. Mr. Goffin denied that he was guilty. An examination of the boys took place, characterized by much shuffling and prevarication on their part, and certain of their note-books with difficulty were secured. The evidence thus obtained was, in the unanimous opinion of the officers, conclusive proofs of the authenticity of the notes; for the note-books corroborated the notes in all particulars. Colonel Donnelly expressed himself in strong terms with regard to the shuffling answers of the boys, and sent the notes to him (Lord George Hamilton). When he said that he submitted this matter to experts at South Kensington, he hoped the House would recollect that there was a combination of talent there such as there was, perhaps, not to be found in any other Department, including Professors Huxley, Roscoe, and others, whose names were of European celebrity. Throughout the whole of this painful case complete and absolute unanimity prevailed among these gentlemen concerning the charge against Mr. Goffin; while, on the other hand, the opinion of men of immense practical experience in the Education Department at Whitehall had been equally clear. He (Lord George Hamilton) went through the case with the utmost care, and in his opinion the internal evidence was overwhelming; but before coming to any final decision, the Department communicated with the Governors, asking for their views; they, in turn, asked for a more detailed charge, which was given them, though he declined to part with the evidence and note-books of the boys; but, at the same time, suggested to the Governors a visit to South Kensington to enable them to see the nature of these documents. The Governors then held a perfunctory inquiry of their own, and, endorsing all Mr. Goffin's statements, they forwarded the result of their labours to South Kensington, threatening the Department with a legal action if the charges were not withdrawn. He went through the defence of the Governors, and he found that, so far from overthrowing, it most conclusively established Mr. Goffin's guilt. He declined in any way to withdraw the charges. A protracted correspondence ensued. Finding that the Governors were impervious to anything the Department could say, its decision was made absolute; and all Mr. Goffin's certificates were withdrawn. The threatened legal action was not brought. In the course of that year Mr. Goffin became one of the committee of the National Union of Elementary Teachers, and, in consequence, the whole power of that very influential body was used on his behalf. Petitions were sent to almost every Member of Parliament with an elaborate defence of Mr. Goffin, and when Parliament met in the ensuing year the hon. Member for Maidstone (Sir Sydney Waterlow) gave Notice of a Motion on behalf of the Governors for a Select Committee to investigate the case. In the meanwhile he received so many communications from persons whose opinions he respected, that he went with the utmost care into the whole case more than once, and the evidence began so to accumulate, both as regards Mr. Goffin's antecedents, as well as his conduct at these schools, as to induce the belief that for many years past he had carried on a system of wholesale fraud. In 1865 he was master at Exton, Oakham. Heavy payments were made to him for passing small children through a number of science subjects. Doubts were excited in the minds of the Examiners from a curious identity of mistakes in certain papers. The suspicion was indignantly repelled at first by the committee; but on the 16th of October, 1865, they admitted the charge in the following terms:—

"Inasmuch as you wrote to the committee, through me, questioning the fair dealing of the main examinations, though the points referred to were honourably carried out, yet they direct me to inform you a communication was made last week by the boys—viz., the questions contained in the working paper, and laid before them on the night of the examination, were all known to them, and learnt by heart. I have further to acquaint you that the teacher has resigned his post as schoolmaster here, and the class consequently has broken up."

Mr. Goffin next attracted attention at a school at Woking. Children of tender years were taught from six to 12 subjects of science at a time, and succeeded in passing in many of them. Again the suspicions of the Department were aroused. Seven separate Inspectors' Reports were made commenting on the complete ignorance of children under viva voce examination compared with their uniform mechanical answers at the written examinations. Constant cases of copying occurred. Mr. Goffin still contrived to baffle discovery by the adroitness of his replies, and in 1874, mainly on the recommendation of the managers of this school, he was appointed head master of the Westminster Schools. He had letters which he would not read from managers both of the Woking and Exton schools. Both were much to the same effect, pointing out how Mr. Goffin had deceived them, how thorough their confidence in him had been, and how he had concealed his faults by a most extraordinary power of lying. But that after he was gone his system of fraud had become the talk of the place. By a mere accident he (Lord George Hamilton) received information which induced the Department to believe that if an inquiry on oath were instituted such an exposure would ensue as would open the eyes of the blindest, and accordingly he moved for a Select Committee, as it was the only means by which he could institute such an inquiry. It was appointed in July, 1879, and Mr. Lowe (now Lord Sherbrooke) became its Chairman, and the hon. Member for Gravesend (Sir Sydney Waterlow) representing the Governors. The constitution of the Committee was perfectly impartial, and, with the exception of himself and the hon. Member for Gravesend, no one knew beforehand of the nature of the evidence to be brought before the Committee. They determined to examine witnesses on oath, because they believed that if either party were disposed they could raise the question in a Court of Law by bringing an action for perjury, for whereas the evidence given before a Select Committee was privileged so far as libel was concerned, yet the witness was subject to the same penalties for perjury as in a Court of Law. Mr. Goffin from the outset had always asserted that he was the victim of a conspiracy, into which teachers, pupils, inspectors, clergymen, and school managers seemed all to have entered. The Committee, therefore, determined to allow no one but the witness under examination to be in the room, and thus, by subjecting every witness to the most rigorous examination, prevent the possibility of the conspiracy, such as Mr. Goffin complained of, from accomplishing its purpose. The course of procedure thus adopted by the Committee was especially favourable to the special line of defence of Mr. Goffin, that he was the victim of conspiracy. He should, in the interest of the Department, have preferred an inquiry open to the public, at which the skilled experts of the Department could themselves have conducted their case. As it was he was placed at great disadvantage. The hostile attitude of the Governors precluded him from making the necessary preliminary inquiries by which he could before this Committee have ascertained what teachers and boys were willing to speak the truth concerning Mr. Goffin's practices. He, therefore, summoned such witnesses as he thought were likely to speak the truth, though several, he knew, were hostile witnesses. The oral evidence extracted from them was overwhelming; but the documentary evidence was even stronger. Teacher after teacher admitted that when unfit for examination they had been taught the answers to questions set to enable them to pass; document after document in Mr. Goffin's own handwriting was produced giving direct answers to questions set, and only to such questions; and letters in Mr. Goffin's handwriting even more criminating were produced. Boys came up who had passed from three to six subjects in science when under 12 years of age by being taught the answers by heart overnight to the questions set, while it was a matter of physical impossibility that they could have made the attendances necessary to qualify them for the subjects they passed in. But it was not merely the nature of the evidence, but the manner in which it was given, that carried conviction. Every witness was severely cross-examined, yet the information obtained from the reluctant fitted with a nicety and accuracy in unforeseen details that no premeditation could have insured. He had no hesitation in saying that if they could have gone at much greater length into the case they could have obtained revelations far more startling. But the evidence they obtained during the two or three days when they examined witnesses was deemed so conclusive and so far more than sufficient for the purpose in view, that they did not consider it necessary to take further evidence. The whole of the evidence was sent to Mr. Goffin, and he had a week to prepare his defence. On one point alone the evidence was slightly defective, for, although the authenticity of the notes given to Colonel Donnelly was distinctly proved by several witnesses, the Committee were unable to find the boy who took them. Mr. Goffin came up and was examined all day. They were reluctant to examine him on oath, but he insisted. With characteristic audacity, he selected what he believed to be the weakest point in the case against him, and upon it hinged his whole defence. He alleged that he was the victim of a conspiracy, and that the outcome of that conspiracy was the concoction of these notes by certain of the conspirators whom he mentioned by name, and it was because he could not by fair means have given the information which they contained that they were concocted to ruin him. These assertions were made on oath. He further said that inquiry ought to be made for the boy. If the boy was in the school why was he not forthcoming? If not, he was entitled to assert that the notes were not authentic. He made these and other statements; but he did not get any direct evidence to rebut the charges brought against him, though he gave us a long list of witnesses, the influence from whose evidence, he said, would, in his belief, disprove what had been said against him. It would have been the duty of the Committee to have examined all these witnesses so long as any doubt remained on their minds; but the next day, by the merest accident, the authors of these and other notes were discovered. In looking through the examination papers of the chemistry class, which had been in the hands of the Department since the examination, an officer belonging to South Kensington was so struck with the extraordinary similarity between the symbols, formulae, and writing of one paper and the notes in question as to make him think that the boy whose name was on the paper was the author of the notes. The boy was sent for, and he at once admitted that the notes were his, and taken at a lecture given by Mr. Goffin just previous to the examination. They compared his notes with his examination papers. It was absolutely impossible for these notes to be similar to the examination paper by accident, for the answer to every single question on the examination paper was in these notes. It was impossible for anyone to have concocted them who had not seen the boys' examination paper. He (Lord George Hamilton) was examining the boy, Jones by name, and he had a suspicion that the name of the boy was known to some of the masters who had taken these notes. So he said to this boy—

"(Question 2,046.) 'After you had given these notes to Mr. Hall did anybody ever talk to you about them? Did you ever hear anything more about them?'—(A.) 'I forget now.' (Q.) 'Try and think. Did anybody ever send to you about these notes?' (A.) 'I was in the class one day—in Mr. Kent's class—and he said to the boys—"Have any of you given any notes to anybody?" and I said "Yes, sir, I gave notes to Mr. Hall." He said, "That is nothing;" and that is all.'"

Another boy in the same way identified notes which were almost as remarkable as those he had just referred to. It might seem to the House a serious matter to convict a man upon the evidence of a small piece of paper; but the House must understand what these notes were. Of course, any practical teacher could anticipate with more or less confidence the class of questions which might be set; but no one could guess the exact terms of the questions. In arithmetic it would not be difficult to anticipate that a Rule of Three sum might be set; but no one could anticipate what the exact terms of the sum would be. In the examinations on chemistry anyone might fairly anticipate that a question relating to the active atomicity of certain substances might be asked; but the substances of which this question could be asked numbered many hundreds. The Examiner named five; and not only were the selected five hit off in the notes, but they were arranged in the identical order in which they occurred in the examination paper. On the theory of probabilities, the probability of such a feat being honestly performed was a thousand billions to one. Stating it in a material shape, it was about the same as hitting on a particular drop of water out of all the water that passed Teddington Weir in a month; or, to put it in sporting phrase, like "spotting" the winner of the Derby for the next 10 consecutive years by giving his number on the card, assuming that there were 30 starters each year. The authorship and authenticity of these notes having been established to the satisfaction of the entire Committee—who in this case were judge and jury combined—they were unanimously of opinion that the case was over, otherwise they would have heard every witness Mr. Goffin wished to call. Sir Sydney Waterlow, as representative of the Governors, acquiesced in this decision, and moved a Report expressing his conviction that Mr. Goffin was guilty; but the majority of the Committee were of opinion that it did not go far enough, and, after some discussion, the following Report was agreed to. If Sir Sydney, on the part of the Governors, had shown any reluctance or doubt as to Mr. Goffin's guilt, the Committee would have prolonged the case until he was convinced. The Report was as follows:—

“Your Committee are satisfied from evidence taken on oath and from documents laid before them—(a) that Mr. Goffin, the head master of the United Westminster Schools, did disclose to his pupils in certain science classes, just previous to the examinations, the answers to a large number of questions in the examination papers; (b) that the information which he thus gave was of such a nature that he must, before imparting it to his classes, have known the contents of the examination paper; (c) that the registers containing the attendance roll of the pupils of Mr. Goffin were, in certain cases, falsified by Mr. Goffin and his assistants to obtain payment of pupils who had not made the necessary number of attendances; (d) that the statements in the petitions signed by pupils and teachers on Mr. Goffin's behalf, and presented to the governors of the United Westminster Schools, were false, and were known by some of the signatories to be so. Previous to his appointment in 1874 as head master of the United Westminster Schools Mr. Goffin was master of St. John's School, Woking. Your Committee have taken evidence as to his system of teaching science there, and from that evidence it is clear—(a) that a large number of pupils, including mere children, were enabled to pass examinations in a great number of science subjects, of which they knew scarcely anything, by being systematically taught by heart on the day of, or the day previous to, the examination, answers to the questions set; (b) that fraudulent fabrication of the attendance registers was systematically practised in order to obtain payment upon the pupils, who, by another fraud, had been enabled to pass the examination. The investigations now held, have disclosed the fact that Mr. Goffin has carried on a course of fraud in a manner and to an extent which must have greatly lowered the tone of morality among a large body of scholars and teachers. Your Committee record their emphatic opinion that fraud thus reduced to a system and almost elevated to the dignity of an art, requires the immediate attention of the Education Department with a view to the adoption of such further precautions as will prevent a repetition of these disgraceful practices. Your Committee further express a hope that the Department will deal as leniently as their public duty will allow with the teachers who, in the course of this inquiry, have by their evidence exposed themselves to the charge of complicity with some of Mr. Goffin's proceedings.”

Lord George Hamilton

He should like to know whether a stronger Report could be made against anyone than the Report he had read? During the discussion of the Report, there was some difference of opinion amongst the Members of the Committee as to the punishment to be awarded, some Members being of opinion that Mr. Goffin should be committed for perjury, and that a recommendation to that effect should have been made to the Speaker; but, ultimately, another view prevailed, and it prevailed on this understanding alone—first, that the hon. Baronet the Member for Gravesend (Sir Sydney Waterlow) should dismiss Mr. Goffin as soon as he could assemble the Governors, and he (Lord George Hamilton) undertook to consult the Legal Advisers of the Government as to whether or not it would be possible to bring an action for fraud against Mr. Goffin. He accordingly consulted the Law Advisers of the Crown, and he found that there was an insuperable obstacle to such a course, as all the money ultimately received by Mr. Goffin had been paid to the Governors of the Schools, upon their certificate that all the regulations of the Department had been complied with, and he (Lord George Hamilton) was told that there was a technical plea which could be set up which would preclude Mr. Goffin being prosecuted for fraud. In October, to his amazement, he received a letter from the Governors, in which it was stated that at a meeting, with the hon. Member for Gravesend (Sir Sydney Waterlow) in the chair, they unanimously came to the conclusion not to abide by the Report of the Committee, but requested the prosecution of Mr. Goffin in a Court of Law. He (Lord George Hamilton) then pointed out that it was not possible for them to do it; but that if Mr. Goffin wanted to go to law he had only to bring an action for perjury against the witnesses whose veracity he impugned. But what did Mr. Goffin do? There was one course which he might adopt, which everybody knew would be futile except for the purpose of throwing dust into the eyes of the public. If he had brought an action for perjury against any of these witnesses, he would have been cross-examined, and the case would have been tried on its merits. He might have brought an action against Colonel Donnelly or the other officers for Reports which they had made to him (Lord George Hamilton) as Vice President of the Council. But he did not do that; he brought an action for libel against Colonel Donnelly, not for Reports made to him (Lord George Hamilton), but for the evidence which he gave before the Select Committee. The case was almost hushed out of Court; but it served Mr. Goffin's purpose. For 18 months he (Lord George Hamilton) was prevented from bringing his case before the public, and the Governors accepted the excuse and rehabilitated Mr. Goffin in his position. Then came the blackest part of the case, to which the House, he was sure, would pay very great attention. The Committee were very painfully impressed—and he hoped the Members of the House who were Governors of the School would excuse him—by the immense power which Mr. Goffin had. To use the words of a witness—"he was king of the school." A letter was put in, written by the secretary, in which he naively remarked—"The Governors will not do or order anything without first consulting Mr. Goffin." He could appoint whom he chose, dismiss whom he chose, and the rise of salaries was altogether dependent upon his opinion. The manner in which Mr. Goffin exercised his power was shown in the evidence. The Committee were very painfully struck by the terror these witnesses had of Mr. Goffin. One of them had a question put to him, and he said—"Must I speak the truth?" Another witness, who was a material witness, was asked to explain how he came to sign a petition which he knew to be false, and he replied—"I have a wife and two children dependent upon me. I did it under fear; I did it under protest." It would be recollected that all these witnesses were forced witnesses—reluctant witnesses. They had orders served upon them to attend the Committee Room; and he was sorry to say, in consequence of the Governors of the School allowing Mr. Goffin to remain as head master of the Westminster School, all the witnesses who had given evidence against him were under his thumb, and a very heavy thumb it was. There was a letter from one of these witnesses, named Thompson, and he wrote to Colonel Donnelly to the effect that, since the Select Committee, he had been subject to a great deal of annoyance, both in school and out, at the hands of Mr. Goffin, and he wanted to know how to stop "this intolerable persecution?" It seemed to him (Lord George Hamilton) that the House was bound in honour to redress these grievances. Another witness swore on oath that Mr. Goffin had told him that, if any master gave any evidence concerning the lessons given previous to examination, the Governors would at once dismiss him. He (Lord George Hamilton) did not know whether the hon. Baronet the Member for Gravesend (Sir Sydney Waterlow) would be able to repudiate that charge; but he was informed on good authority that the salary of almost every one of the masters who stood by Mr. Goffin had been raised since the inquiry. Thompson, the man who wrote to Colonel Donnelly for protection, was one of the best teachers in the school, and he had looked at the reports of various examinations, and he saw that the boys in his form had done better than a good many other boys. He had made more than one application for an increase of salary, had been referred to Mr. Goffin, and refused. He had also been threatened with the loss of his lodging, and lately Mr. Thompson had been relegated to the lowest form. It was the knowledge of these facts which had induced him to bring this case before the House. Lord Sherbrooke had urged him for some time to bring the matter forward, and to take the first opportunity he could. As soon as Lord Sherbrooke saw that there was a chance of doing so, his Lordship wrote to him to say "He was very glad that at last an opportunity had occurred of bringing forward the scandalous case of Mr. Goffin, and the scandalous conduct of the Managers of the School." The Governors of the Schools, he believed, relied very much upon the results of some examinations which had taken place since the Report of the Committee, and he had seen the Report of the Examiner upon these examinations; but if they took the results of those examinations, and compared them with the number of passes which his pupils obtained previously when the "tipping" system was in force, they would see that there was great difference between the two. He was very much obliged to the House for so patiently listening to him, and he could assure the House that a more unpleasant duty than that which he had performed it was impossible to conceive. If he could have induced the Governors to have co-operated, his task would have been very much easier, as it was with extreme regret that he had been compelled to deprecate their conduct, as some of the Governors were his personal friends. He had no doubt that they wished to discharge their duty; but it appeared to him that they had lamentably failed. They were entrusted by Parliament with the guardianship of a great public educational institution. How had they performed their functions? They had allowed a wholesale system of rascality and fraud to be carried on under their very noses by their head master. When he was detected they sided with him, and they allowed themselves to be made parties to an inquiry which almost amounted to a sham, which whitewashed this Mr. Goffin. When a Select Committee of the House of Commons, at their special request appointed to inquire into the case, report unanimously Mr. Goffin to be guilty, they rejected that decision; and when, later on, Mr. Goffin deliberately shirked his right of raising an action in a Court of Law, they deliberately supported him in his shuffling. Without one syllable of the sworn testimony of 14 witnesses being disproved, with documents, letters, and notes in his own handwriting conclusively proving his guilt, the Governors deliberately re-instated Mr. Goffin in his position as head master of the School, where, under the egis of their protection, he was able to bully those who gave evidence against him, and increase the salaries of those who stood by him, or were convicted with him. There were 700 boys in this school, and the great majority of them were intended for commercial pursuits. Could the Governors think that these boys would have any other fact impressed upon their minds than that if there was one policy in this world which it was not advantageous to pursue, it was that connected with honesty and truth? These were the facts, clear and uncontroverted, on which he asked the opinion of the House; and he hoped that in the discussion which ensued the speakers would make it clear that the House of Commons did not consider the fraud, falsehood, subornation, and perjury were the proper qualifications for the head master of a great middle-class school.

Lord George Hamilton

MR. WARTON said, he never addressed the House under circumstances more painful to himself. This subject was brought forward by one of the foremost of the Conservative Party, by one from whom he had received personal kindness; but the interests of what he believed to be truth and justice required him to take the line which he proposed to take, regardless altogether of the immense authority and departmental experience of the noble Lord, and of the very strong prejudice which must at this moment exist against Mr. Goffin. The noble Lord had not told the House who Mr. Goffin was. He was a man of pre-eminent ability, a man of most unusual scientific knowledge. When he said of pre-eminent ability and scientific knowledge, he meant he was a man who had taken the highest distinction in eight different sciences. Not only that, but he had unusual aptitude for teaching. There were many sound scholars in the world; but the gift of teaching was very rare. They all knew very well that if in their great public schools there was any man who stood out amongst the list of untrained head masters, distinguished by this gift, how his memory was cherished for many years. That capacity of teaching Mr. Goffin had, in addition to very great scientific knowledge, which he (Mr. Warton) believed no living man could equal; he had a rare faculty of impressing his pupils with a wonderful love of knowledge, which led them to prosecute their studies with great devotion and ardour. The House must bear in mind that this was a school which was distinguished for science, and therefore it was not unusual for a man of such ability, with such apparatus at his command—it was not at all surprising that these boys, taught by him, really succeeded in a way likely to astonish people who were accustomed to boys taught by more ordinary men. Let them take a specimen in other fields than the examination at Westminster. He would take the examination for the Oxford Local Examination; on one occasion there were only 31 boys sent up altogether from the different schools; of these 31 boys seven passed, and of these seven, six were pupils of Mr. Goffin, and that number was all he sent up. In 1880, again, in the January Oxford Examination, there were 40 boys sent up, and out of those 40, 11 boys passed, were pupils of Mr. Goffin, and that number was all he sent. They were told about the way in which this case ended before the Committee; he was not there to say one word against the Committee. He was not prepared to say that as the evidence was presented to them, so worked up by the Department that they could very well have come to any other conclusion, and the case looked black—very black indeed. They were told that there was a previous case at Woking, and they might trace the very same agency there. It was quite possible for men of pre-eminent ability to have enemies who, perhaps, did not scruple to take revenge. Mr. Goffin was a man of a highly delicate organization, and of a nervous temperament—a man on whom the advancing years had worked very great injury to his health and happiness; and when a man like Mr. Goffin was brought in contact with Lord Sherbrooke, they could imagine there would be very little sympathy for Mr. Goffin, who came before the Committee faint and ill, with this charge hanging over him. Those who had read the evidence would remember that Mr. Goffin was asked, in the tone of a Judge addressing a criminal, whether he desired to make any statement. He replied that he had been forbidden by his medical advisers to appear at all, and he wished to be excused. Lord Sherbrooke said—“We do not call upon you to give evidence; but I understand that you wish to make a statement.” Mr. Goffin replied in the affirmative. Mr. Goffin was tried not as an ordinary criminal would have been, in which case the prosecutors would first have to make out a case. He was called upon for a defence before the case of the prosecution was made out. Four or five times had this Motion been likely to come on, and on two of those occasions, if it had been brought forward, it would have been brought forward as a substantive Motion; and on those occasions he put down a Notice of the Previous Question, and he had a similar Notice down that night, although, of course, he could not move it. It was no part of the duty of the House to interfere with the wish of the Governors of the School. The evidence of the Committee had not turned away the love and affection of those who esteemed Mr. Goffin; it had not turned away that affection and that feeling on the part of the Governors of the School. What took place after the condemnation of the Committee? There was a meeting held in the school, at which some 600 or 700 boys were present, and 400 parents, and 14 of them addressed the meeting, and they all of them expressed their confidence in Mr. Goffin, and resolutions were passed in his favour. If that was the feeling of the parents and of the boys, if that was the feeling of the Governors of the School, it was not for the House to say whether or not they should continue to give their support to Mr. Goffin. It was not a question, he contended, for that House. The Governors of the School did not wish, and the parents of the boys did not wish, to have anything more to do with the Department; they were convinced of Mr. Goffin's innocence, and under Mr. Goffin the school had acquired a reputation for science. He held in his hand an examination of the boys in the upper sixth form in practical chemistry, not an examination which was seen before, and out of a class of 31 boys, 23 passed, getting the maximum marks, and the average of the 33, although reduced by one boy, who was backward, was 91. After such examination as that the school could afford to dispense with the Department. He did not ask the House to judge; but he said the parents were right and the Government were wrong. The House had nothing to do with it; and he asked the House not to give a vote, but to suspend its judgment until some proceedings were taken which would show what ought to be done.

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW said, that, with the permission of the House, he would, in the first place, say a word personal to himself. The noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) had stated that, as a Member of the Committee, he had, with others, assented to their Report. The noble Lord had also told the House that he had proposed a Report of a very different character. A division was taken on his Report, showing the effect which the evidence had on his mind. The Report prepared by him expressed the opinion that the evidence laid before the Committee justified the Department in suspending the certificate of Mr. Goffin. That was as different from the Report prepared by the Chairman of the Committee (Lord Sherbrooke) as light from darkness. Now, he was willing to admit, and he thought all the Governors admitted, that Mr. Goffin had been guilty of "cramming" to an extent which was an injury to the school, to the Department, and to the system under which money was paid for results, and that the Department was therefore justified in taking away his certificate. But the Governors were of opinion that Mr. Goffin had not been guilty of any worse practice, and that there was not a tittle of direct evidence that he had had in his possession a copy of the examination papers beforehand. No single witness was called to show that. The whole tenour of the evidence against him was to show that because the boys gave certain answers they must have been "coached" up by someone who had seen the questions. There were 30 witnesses outside the doors of the Committee Room waiting to be called at Mr. Goffin's request to show how men practised in "coaching"—a better word, he thought, than "cramming"—could prepare their pupils; and yet the Committee would not allow any one of those witnesses to be called in Mr. Goffin's defence. He felt it only right to say those few words in justification of the course pursued in relation to the Committee.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON (interrupting): May I ask—

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW said, he did not interrupt the noble Lord when he was proceeding with his argument, though he made statements with which he could not concur. He did not propose to follow the noble Lord over the course of the examination which took place before the Committee, because, if he did so, he should have to give question after question, and answer after answer; but he ventured to say that if the Committee itself was an unfair tribunal, it would be very difficult indeed, in a House like this, at this period of the Session, to bring evidence on the one side and evidence on the other, to enable the minds of Members of this House to be in a condition to judge which side was right and which side was wrong. The Board of Governors came to a resolution that the decision in Mr. Goffin's case by the Parliamentary Committee could not be regarded as final, owing to the fact that the inquiry was conducted with closed doors; that Mr. Goffin was not allowed to be present, except when giving evidence, nor to be heard by counsel, nor permitted to cross-examine the witnesses against him; and that while more than 20 witnesses were ready to give evidence on his behalf only one of them was allowed to be heard. They, therefore, requested the Department to give Mr. Goffin an opportunity, as he desired, of vindicating his character. The answer to that resolution, contained in a memorandum, said that if the Governors were dissatisfied with the unanimous decision of the tribunal to whom they appealed, it rested with them to carry Mr. Goffin's case to another Court. The charges had not been withdrawn; on the contrary, the suspension of Mr. Goffin's certificate had not been made absolute, and yet legal proceedings had not been taken. The noble Lord said Mr. Goffin had obtained nearly £400 as fees by fraud. Surely, if that was the case, the person who so obtained the money ought to be punished. The Governors were advised that the Department had had ample opportunity to prosecute Mr. Goffin in a Court of Law, where the examination would have taken place in public, and witnesses would have been called for and against the defendant, whose counsel would have been able to cross-examine the witnesses. He (Sir Sydney Waterlow) moved a distinct Resolution in the Committee that the proceedings should be open. The noble Lord had said that was a great public question. He admitted it. It would raise the very grave question whether the present system of payment by results, or practically offering almost a bribe to the masters of large schools, by the temptation of nearly doubling their salaries, to "coach" a small number of boys and to give them marked attention, to the prejudice of the great mass of the scholars, was justifiable. Since Mr. Goffin's certificate was taken away the Board had seen a marked improvement. Attention was more evenly distributed, and the condition of the mass was immensely improved. It would, he repeated, raise the question of the system of almost bribing the masters to do that which was undoubtedly to the prejudice of any large school. But he would proceed. The answer of the Council went on to say that if, with a view of justifying their conduct in retaining Mr. Goffin at the head of the institution, it should prove that he was guilty of the grave charges that were brought against him, it would be for the Board to take such steps as they considered advisable. The Governors of the School gave Mr. Goffin to understand that unless he should commence legal proceedings in order to have the charges that had been made against him properly investigated, he must expect to be dismissed. Mr. Goffin took the advice of a most learned counsel, and was advised to take action against his prosecutor, who, he might say, was his persecutor. What did the House think the Department said? They did not merely refuse to prosecute the man themselves, but when the man turned round to prosecute, with the assistance of his friends from one end of the country to the other, the Department turned round and pleaded privilege, so that all possibility of trying this question in the manner in which it ought to be tried was lost to Mr. Goffin. Therefore, the Governors felt they ought to throw back the onus on the Department of proceeding against him for obtaining public money by false pretences. The noble Lord had told the House that in the beginning he (Sir Sydney Waterlow) raised a discussion as to whether the Committee should be conducted with open doors. He put on the Paper of Business of this House a Notice of Motion, asking the House to believe that, from beginning to end, the Governors were anxious to have an open and fair trial of this man. The noble Lord (Lord George Hamilton) and Mr. Lowe (now Lord Sherbrooke), who were defending the Department, were virtually in the position of judges and prosecutors at the same time. Medical testimony was given that Mr. Goffin was lying on a sick-bed, and he (Sir Sydney Waterlow) appealed to the Committee to allow him to appear by counsel. They refused absolutely, and declared that he should not be represented by counsel, nor should he be in the room when the witnesses were called against him. He asked hon. Members would they like to be deprived of their power of defence and of cross-examination? He was sure they would not. They refused to hear from any one of the witnesses that were called to give evidence any statement on the particular fact on which everything turned—namely, whether it was possible for the boys to have given the answers they gave without having seen the papers. There was not a tittle of evidence that these papers had ever got out of the hands they belonged to. The noble Lord had discussed the question of payment by results. That was not the question before the House at all, though he hoped the time might soon come when they should have to discuss that question. The more the noble Lord insisted, as he did insist, that the case was so clear that it was quite impossible for anybody to have any doubt about it, the more willing he ought to be to allow the case to be tried in a Court of Law. The noble Lord also said that there was the strongest possible evidence that it was absolutely impossible that the master could have made the notes he did without having had supplied to him the printed examination paper. There were a score of men to be called—men of experience in these matters—not one of whom was called. Well, then it had been urged that Mr. Goffin should have appealed against the decision of the Court on the question of privilege. Let any hon. Gentleman present who knew anything as to the state of the law on the question give his opinion, and he thought he would agree with the learned counsel in the case that it would have been useless to have appealed against the decision of the Court on that point. He should not be wrong in reading a few lines from the judgment of Mr. Justice Field about the case. He said the Court was of opinion that the plea of privilege was a good one, and a perfect answer to the plaintiff's case. That was to say, it shut up the plaintiff entirely, and gave him no opportunity of going on. The plaintiff, no doubt, suffered from that which, on the face of it, was a serious libel upon him, and it was desirable he should have opportunity of investigation. Further on the Judge said it was a bad thing and a hard thing for individuals that anyone should be at liberty to say that a man was committing a crime, and that the law could not call upon him to prove what he said. Now, he (Sir Sydney Waterlow) should like to ask the noble Lord whether he proposed next Session to bring in an Act of Parliament to alter the Act relating to this school? If he did, then discussion would take a larger range than it could at present. The Governors took the greatest possible care before they appointed Mr. Goffin as head master. His testimonials were of the highest character, some of them being from Inspectors connected with the Education Department. The school rapidly filled, and, at the present moment, there were 690 boys in a school only built for 600. There were applicants far exceeding the number of vacancies that arose. No doubt, the school possessed many advantages for giving a sound education to boys intended for commercial life. The best way to judge of a school was to consider whether the boys were properly educated and were sought after; and he might say that there was scarcely a public company seeking clerks that was not asking for these boys. Mr. Goffin passed 92 per cent of the boys sent up for examination. In order to test the qualities of the school, the Governors last year appointed Examiners of the highest character, and of the greatest possible talent and ability, and they took care that the masters should have nothing to do with it. Let him read a few lines from the Report of the Examiners as regarded the written examination in chemistry. They found that 23 boys out of 31 had determined a difficult matter correctly. The whole Report was of an eminently favourable character. What he asked for, and what he asked of the Government, was that they should proceed with their accusation that Mr. Goffin had been guilty of obtaining nearly £400 of public money. He could not do more than ask the Government either to prosecute the man, or allow Mr. Goffin to go on with his action for libel and slander. He therefore asked the Government to bring up an action in such a way as might be best calculated to bring to light these charges.

MR. ERRINGTON said, that as he was the only Member of the Committee which inquired into the charges against Mr. Goffin who had not spoken, he wished in the strongest manner possible to corroborate the statement made by the noble Lord, who had done a great service in bringing the subject before the House. He had supported his hon. Friend who had just sat down (Sir Sydney Waterlow) in the Amendment he proposed to the Report of the Committee; and his hon. Friend now declared that that Amendment simply expressed an opinion that the evidence laid before the Committee justified the Department in suspending the certificate of Mr. Goffin. He (Mr. Errington) confessed that this was the first time he had ever heard a suggestion that that was the sense in which the words of the proposal of the hon. Gentleman were intended to be taken. He thought the interpretation hardly just, because the subsequent words of the Amendment were that the Committee desired to record also an emphatic opinion that the declaration made by the masters required the serious attention of the Education Department, with a view to the adoption of further precautions in order to prevent the examination papers from becoming known outside the Department before the examination took place. That meant that the papers had become known outside the Department before the examination. He (Mr. Errington) had supported that Amendment with the distinct understanding that it condemned the conduct of Mr. Goffin quite as strongly as the Report of the Committee did. The question really was whether a man of the skill and experience of Mr. Goffin, by mere experience, could have guessed and interpreted the questions in a fair and legitimate manner, and taught them to his pupils accordingly. The hon. Member for Gravesend said the Committee refused to listen to certain witnesses who were in waiting to prove that what Mr. Goffin had done might have been done, more or less, merely by skill and experience; but the Committee had got far beyond that. He agreed with the hon. Member that if that question had been opened the Committee ought to have listened to the evidence Mr. Goffin proposed to call. He (Mr. Goffin) had denied the authenticity of the notes which formed the accusation against him. He denied them categorically, and said they were a forgery, and the result of a conspiracy against him. The noble Lord the then Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Lord Francis Hervey) pinned him exactly to that declaration. He asked him if the notes were authentic, and whether he agreed with the conclusion of Professor Roscoe that it would be impossible to have framed the questions in a particular way without access had been had to the questions of the Examiners. Mr. Goffin said he thought so, and that he should have agreed with that. Therefore, Mr. Goffin's own admission was that the answers could not have been given through any mere experience and knowledge of tuition. It must be remembered that at that time there was no direct proof, although there was internal evidence, that the notes were authentic. That link in the evidence was still wanting. Therefore, Mr. Goffin thought himself perfectly safe in adhering to his old line of defence, and in saying that the notes were not authentic. If they were authentic, then the case against him would have been conceded. A remarkable point was that, having narrowed the issue down to that, the missing link was in the end obtained, and the Committee got evidence which convinced them that the notes were, beyond all question, taken at the lecture given immediately before the examination, and for the purpose of teaching the pupils the questions that were to be asked. They had obviously the assurance of Mr. Goffin that if the notes were authentic he could not have given the answers without having a copy of the Examiners' questions. That brought the question to a very narrow issue. The question, as far as the public out-of-doors were concerned, regarded the form of procedure. The noble Lord admitted that many of the Committee at first might be reluctant to accept the particular course of procedure proposed by the Chairman of the Committee; but the hon. Baronet who had just sat down, and who had condemned that course very strongly, ought to remember that strongly as he felt against it he was not inclined to divide the Committee against it. Although reluctant to assent to the form of procedure, which was not, perhaps, usual, but which was forced upon the Committee by the necessities of the case, the hon. Baronet, like all of the Members of the Committee, had on consideration agreed that it was the most expedient course to adopt. He (Mr. Errington) was sure the Committee adopted it with regret; but they felt on consideration that it was the best and most satisfactory course they could take. He agreed with the noble Lord that that course had a most satisfactory result. It enabled the Committee to come to a conclusion which they could not have come to as certainly, or without the greatest difficulty, if they had adopted any other course. The hon. Baronet had repeated the charge against the Education Department, that they had not brought an action against Mr. Goffin for having obtained by fraud a large sum of money. No doubt, the Committee were of opinion that the money was obtained by fraud; but it was paid over to the trustees, and, therefore, an action for fraud would not lie. If these were the only grounds that could be urged in defence of Mr. Goffin, he thought the case of that gentleman was a very weak one indeed. No doubt they must all feel pained in joining in a vote of censure against a body which was so much respected as the Governors of Westminster School; but he must say that he thought that every word contained in the proposal which the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex had placed on the Paper was fully justified. It certainly appeared to him to be a scandal that, when an inquiry of this kind was asked for, and after it had been concluded in the way it had, the Governors of Westminster School should think themselves justified in absolutely ignoring the decision of the Committee, and in maintaining Mr. Goffin in the important place he occupied, notwithstanding the gravity of the charges against him. At any rate, they ought to have suspended Mr. Goffin, or have insisted upon some practical course being taken by that gentleman for the vindication of his character. The Governors called upon the Department to prosecute Mr. Goffin; but the last decision having been against Mr. Goffin, that gentleman was bound to take action against the Department. It was quite true that Mr. Goffin did commence an action; but it was of such a nature that everybody knew beforehand it would be ridiculed when it came into Court. He thought it was a great pity that, owing to the Forms of the House, they had not now an opportunity of affirming, by their decision—

“That the retention by the Governors of the United Westminster Schools of Mr. Goffin as head master of that public institution, after he had, by a Select Committee of this House specially appointed in 1879 to inquire into his conduct at the request of the Governors of the Schools, been found guilty of a systematic course of fraud, falsehood, and subornation, is a public scandal, and as such demands the immediate attention of the Education Office and Charity Commissioners.”

SIR JAMES LAWRENCE said, he had yet to learn that it was the duty of honourable men placed in such a position as the Governors of Westminster School to act contrary to their consciences, whatever decision a Committee of that House, acting in a different manner from that upon which other Committees usually acted, and ending in the examination and condemnation of a man with closed doors, after forbidding him to be present during the whole of the inquiry, and not allowing him to call the witnesses who were in attendance to speak in his favour—might have arrived at. He had heard with surprise some of the language which had fallen from the noble Lord (Lord George Hamilton) in regard to the Governors of the School. Perhaps the House would scarcely believe that the man who proposed the resolution read by the hon. Member for Gravesend (Sir Sydney Waterlow) that day, who had gone through all the evidence, who was not prejudiced in favour of Mr. Goffin, but rather prejudiced against him—that the very man who moved that Resolution, after hearing and considering all the evidence, was that eminent scholar and Divine, Canon Farrar. It was after becoming acquainted with all the facts that Canon Farrar, at the first meeting of the Governors, called to consider the question, proposed the resolution which had been read by the hon. Member for Gravesend, and it was passed unanimously by the Governors. The statement made by the noble Lord would have conveyed an impression which he thought, upon reflection, was not the impression the noble Lord desired to convey; but, undoubtedly, the impression produced on the mind of any stranger who heard the subject now for the first time would be that Mr. Goffin was a kind of charlatan, who, by means of fraud and underhand practices, had obtained a position he was not entitled to, and that therefore the Department, for a long series of years, had been endeavouring to entrap him. Now, reference had been made by the hon. Member for Gravesend to the position Mr. Goffin had occupied for many years. It was well-known to anyone who knew anything about teaching that Mr. Goffin was the first teacher of technical science in the country. That was admitted by every person connected with education in the country. It was difficult to find a man who held a different opinion, and they had evidence adduced in the course of the debate that when all the privileges previously enjoyed by Mr. Goffin were taken away from, and when the greatest care was taken by the Governors that no special examination should be held in the school, the boys educated in the school still continued to take the very highest position. He was not there to defend either the action of Mr. Goffin or the course of his life; he was there simply as one of the Governors of the School to defend the action of the Governors; and he declared in the most positive terms that, as honourable and conscientious men, they dared not dismiss a man to ruin and degradation until they were satisfied in their own minds of the truth of the charges made against him. The Governors were not in any degree partial to Mr. Goffin; but they were animated by one feeling—namely, that they ought not to absolutely ruin a man until they arrived at a satisfactory conclusion that there was no doubt as to the truth of the case preferred against him. He was anxious to trace the early part of the case. The noble lord had told him himself that he had made up his mind that Mr. Goffin was guilty.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON begged the hon. Gentleman's pardon. He had never said anything of the kind. He might have told the hon. Gentleman that he was satisfied of Mr. Goffin's guilt after the proofs had been produced. He had certainly never said that he had made up his mind before the proofs were produced.

SIR JAMES LAWRENCE said, that what the noble Lord had said had certainly conveyed that impression to his mind. He would withdraw anything as to the actual words used by the noble Lord; but undoubtedly the impression conveyed to his mind was that the noble Lord had made up his mind as to Mr. Goffin's guilt. Perhaps the noble Lord would remember that his (Sir James Lawrence's) reply was—"I cannot condemn a man until I have got at all the facts." But it was not only the noble Lord, but the Department, which appeared to have made up its mind to crush Mr. Goffin long before the whole of the evidence came out. The first inquiry was conducted by Colonel Donnelly, and, to say the least of it, it was conducted in a most extraordinary manner. Instead of approaching the boys in a conciliatory spirit and in a gentle manner, as if he were really anxious to obtain the truth from them, to each answer given by the boys Colonel Donnelly said—"You are a liar; you are all liars." That was the course taken by the gentleman sent down by the Department to ascertain the facts of the case. The noble Lord said that the boys were in fear and trembling when they came before the Governors. That was quite untrue, and the Governors were able to obtain very clear statements from them. He was quite aware of the difficulty of getting any Government Department to confess itself in error, or that it had done injury to an individual. An instance occurred to him which he might mention to the House. When he first came into the House he was waited upon one day by a man who was one of the most trusted of the porters connected with the South Western Railway. The man said he wished him (Sir James Lawrence) to do him a favour. He had been a member for many years of the police force, and he had injured himself very severely in struggling with a burglar, the consequence of which was that he was laid up. The doctor made up his mind that he was malingering, and gave evidence before the Home Secretary to the effect that when he examined the man's leg he found traces of iodine upon the foot which he had not prescribed. The consequence was that the man lost his pension, and he was taken into the employment of the South Western Railway, and became one of the most trusted servants they had. Some years afterwards, on some alterations being made in the chemist's shop in which the prescription was made up, the original paper was found signed by the medical man who gave evidence against this poor fellow, in his own handwriting, and in the document appeared the very article "iodine," the prescription of which he had forgotten. He (Sir James Lawrence) went to the Home Office and laid the facts before them; but the only answer he obtained was that they could not undo what they had already done. The man did not ask to be reinstated in his position, but simply to have his character cleared. But an English Public Department knew nothing of that rehabilitation of character which other Governments and nations were always anxious to undertake, and until our Government adopted the course pursued elsewhere he feared that very much injustice would be done. He had detained the House much longer than he ought to have done; but he felt warmly in regard to some of the expressions which had fallen from the noble Lord, and which he considered to be quite unjustifiable. He held that no man had a right to impute motives or talk about a public scandal in regard to the action of men who held honourable positions. He thought that greater care should be taken by the heads of Departments, and by the officials under them, as to the manner in which the public conduct of other men, as conscientious as themselves, was construed.

MR. RATHBONE said, he never rose with more pain to address the House upon any subject than he did on the present occasion. Many men whom he sincerely respected were among the Governors of the Westminster School; but it seemed to him that this was one of those cases on which it was most important that the House should express a clear opinion. A great deal of the arguments they had heard went to prove Mr. Goffin's great ability. There was no doubt that he was a man of wonderful ability as a teacher; and one of the most remarkable proofs of his ability was that he should have been able so to mislead the Governors of the School. [Sir SYDNEY WATERLOW dissented.] His hon. Friend the Member for Gravesend (Sir Sydney Waterlow) shook his head; but he really thought if his hon. Friend would only try to carry his mind back to the time when he proposed his draft Report, he would see at once that the line he had been taking to-night was absolutely inconsistent with that Report, and what must have been the state of his mind when he proposed it. Mr. Goffin swore positively that no such information ever came into his possession, and yet, in the Report proposed by the hon. Baronet, the Committee desired to record their emphatic opinion that the declarations made by the witnesses required the serious attention of the Education Department, with a view to the adoption of further precautions in order to prevent the examination papers from becoming known outside the Department before the time of examination. If that meant anything, it meant that Mr. Goffin had had the papers. It could mean nothing else; and, if so, Mr. Goffin was guilty of clear and deliberate perjury, and it was the duty of the Governors to have prosecuted him for that perjury. They were the only persons who could prosecute him for receiving money under false pretences, because it was from them he received it, and not from the Department. He imagined that most Members of the House had made up their minds that Mr. Goffin did commit these offences, and the noble Lord had shown that this was not the first offence. Then, what a frightful thing it was for the Governors of Westminster School to give their sanction and countenance to a man who had been guilty of a fraud in regard to which he must have taken the boys with him. The Vice President of the Council had told them to-day that he was going to remove some of the great temptations to fraud to which the elementary school masters had hitherto been subjected, and it was quite time that he should do so, for anyone who had been connected with public elementary schools knew how difficult it had been to maintain that high spirit of honour which was so important. But, at the same time, when they came to look at the effect of maintaining a man so able, so eminent, and so distinguished as Mr. Goffin in his position, after the Committee had distinctly come to the unanimous conclusion they did, he thought it was of immense importance that, by some means or other, the scandal of maintaining such a man in such a position should be put an end to. It was not merely that the Governors were called upon to prevent the scandal, but they ought to consider the effect of leaving such a man with power to persecute all those who had given honest and straightforward evidence against him.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that, deplorable as it might be to leave Mr. Goffin with power to persecute persons who were objectionable to him, it was, nevertheless, only a common practice even in connection with a respectable Government Department. Therefore, they could not condemn Mr. Goffin on that account. The noble Lord who had formerly been Vice President of the Council and Under Secretary of State for India (Lord George Hamilton) could, from his experience, quote many cases in which a junior member of the Civil Service had occasion to remember any unfortunate slip he might have made against his superiors for all the rest of his life. He (Mr. O'Donnell) had studied the case of Mr. Goffin, with the intention of bringing the matter before Parliament if he could conscientiously do so; but certainly the impression produced on his mind was that the case against Mr. Goffin was not made out. He did not think that sufficient stress had been laid on the peculiar nature of the study to which "coachers" or "crammers" directed their attention, when they were engaged in coaching a pupil for passing a particular examination. The first part of the duty of the crammer was to find out who the Examiners were, and, in the next place, to hunt up all the antecedents of the Examiners with the skill of a private detective. He would obtain information as to all the occasions upon which such and such an Examiner had acted, all the questions which that Examiner had put upon paper; and it was upon a wisely selected average of such questions running over a long period of years that a professional crammer proceeded in preparing his class for an examination to take place two months, six months, or one month hence, at the hands of that special Examiner. Only yesterday an old College chum of his own, now engaged in coaching, breakfasted with him. His friend complained that too many crammers, and the most successful ones, confined themselves to the business of teaching their pupils the answers to questions which, over a long space of years, the particular Examiners before whom they were to appear had been in the habit of asking of the pupils. For instance, this gentleman was a coach for some of the examinations for commissions in the Line, commissions given to Militia officers; and he said that among the Examiners at these examinations within recent years there had been Examiners who were also Examiners in the public Colleges, such as Woolwich and Sandhurst. The crammer knew very well that Mr. So-and-So, Professor of such and such a Department at Woolwich, was the Examiner; and he would, therefore, find out the class of questions that gentleman had propounded at Woolwich and Sandhurst over a series of years, and after he had found that out beyond all doubt, his pupils would be able to clear a majority of the questions asked. Cramming was a sort of art which had been brought almost to perfection in the present day. A short time ago there was an hon. Member in that House who was at the head of one of the greatest cramming establishments in the Kingdom. Unfortunately, the hon. Gentleman was deprived of his seat by the verdict of an Electoral Commission. He (Mr. O'Donnell) was sorry for that untoward event, because if the Gentleman to whom he referred had been disposed to give a brief lecture on the science and mysteries of cramming, he would certainly have been able to astonish a great majority of that House. It had been pointed out to him (Mr. O'Donnell) by an experienced crammer, in a moment of social expansion, that the more distinguished the Examiners with whom a crammer had to deal the more safe the crammer was in forecasting the questions that would be asked. Men of distinguished scientific attainments were the men who were most sure to have a dozen particular fads of which they were particularly proud. Having arrived at certain original views, they could not for the life of them help asking questions upon them year after year. He (Mr. O'Donnell) was of opinion that the whole system of competitive examinations required re-casting. It was something like the contest between big guns and iron plates; the guns had got ahead of the plates, and the crammer had got ahead of the competitive examination system. Looking at the imperfect nature of the tribunal before which Mr. Goffin went—and if there was one tribunal less satisfactory than another it was a Committee of that honourable House—looking at the imperfect nature of that tribunal, he was certainly utterly unable to come to any conclusion hostile to the good faith of Mr. Goffin. Mr. Goffin seemed to be a man of wonderful ability as a teacher, with a wonderful genius for getting at conclusions; and he was quite sure that during the period Mr. Goffin was engaged in preparing Westminster scholars under a strict cramming system, he would have made it his business to go through all the antecedents of the Examiners, and all the people the pupils were likely to come in contact with. Being a man of such ability, it was not astonishing that the pupils of Mr. Goffin, as a general rule, satisfactorily answered about 90 per cent of the questions put to them. He thought it would be most difficult, in all the circumstances of the case, for the House to draw any hasty inference as to the guilt of Mr. Goffin, or to come to any conclusion adverse to him.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he had no right to address the House again except by permission; but he would not detain the House for more than two or three minutes. The question had only been brought to his attention by the Notice placed on the Paper by the noble Lord (Lord George Hamilton); and everyone who heard the noble Lord that night must feel that he had done good service in bringing it forward. When the question was brought under his (Mr. Mundella's) notice in the Department, he made an inquiry into the nature of the charges against Mr. Goffin, and the result of his investigation was this—that Mr. Goffin was guilty of the charge brought against him, and that it was really a sad thing that a body of Governors so eminently respectable as the Governors of Westminster School should have retained a man in such an important position. The retention of such a man was little less than a scandal, and it was setting a very bad example. He was the more sorry, because it was really teaching the country to believe that the Department were disposed to charge a man with fraud when there was no real and substantial ground for the accusation. He did not know that it was possible to constitute a fairer or more complete Committee than that which had been appointed at the suggestion of his hon. Friend behind him to investigate this case. It consisted of Mr. Lowthian Bell, Mr. Moore, Lord George Hamilton, Lord Francis Hervey, Mr. Errington, Mr. Rodwell, and Sir Sydney Waterlow. His hon. Friend the Member for Gravesend charged everyone who sided against Mr. Goffin with being the prosecutor. He spoke of the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex as the prosecutor, then of Colonel Donnelly as the prosecutor; and he (Mr. Mundella) was afraid that he himself would now be looked upon as the prosecutor. Even Mr. Lowe, the present Lord Sherbrooke, was spoken of as the prosecutor, because he had happened to be Vice President of the Council, and it was supposed that he must necessarily be affected with some Departmental taint which would prevent him from fairly and honourably dealing with a question like that of Mr. Goffin. Surely the House would not suspect that Members of the Government and permanent officials were really anxious to convict any man of fraud? From what he could learn, such men as Professor Franklin and Professor Roscoe considered that the case against Mr. Goffin was proved beyond all doubt, and that it was a scandal that such a man should have been retained so long in the position he now occupied. There was no doubt that Mr. Goffin was a remarkably able man and an excellent science teacher; but he had all the less excuse for the course he had taken. It was not necessary that a man possessing so much ability should have recourse to fraud in the way in which Mr. Goffin evidently had had recourse to it in order to obtain money for his own school work. It was said that the Education Department ought to have prosecuted Mr. Goffin, and the hon. Member behind him (Mr. Errington) repeated that cry. The hon. Member, however, knew that the Department could not do so. This transaction took place nearly three and a-half years ago—namely, in May, 1878—and how could they now prosecute Mr. Goffin? An indictment for fraud would not lie against him; that was very well known. The fraud was not committed by Mr. Goffin directly for his own benefit, but only indirectly, as the money went into the hands of the Governors. If a criminal indictment had been preferred against Mr. Goffin, his mouth would have been closed; they could not have cross-examined him, and they would have been deprived of the best means of getting at the truth. All he could say about the matter was this—that he thought the discussion which had taken place would produce a good effect. He hoped the Governors of the School would, on reflection, consider that it was a scandal to allow the present state of things to continue. He should certainly confer with those who usually advised him in legal matters, in order to see what steps could possibly be taken. He was afraid that nothing could be done by the Education Department; but, if not, the Charity Commissioners might consider whether it was not their duty to interfere. He did not care how eminent or able a man might be; if he committed such a fraud as this, he was guilty of a great mistake, and, in the interests of all public teachers, he ought not to be allowed to continue in the position he occupied. It was now time that this discussion should come to an end, and, as the House could not come to a conclusion on the matter, he would appeal to it to resolve itself at once into Committee, so that the Government might be allowed to take the Education Votes.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK asked if there was to be a discussion upon the Estimates?

MR. MUNDELLA: Certainly.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

CLASS IV.—EDUCATION, SCIENCE, AND ART.

(1.) £1,283,958, to complete the sum for Education, England and Wales.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he was not anxious to trouble the Committee in any way; but he thought that the full and very interesting Statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council would require a good deal of time for the consideration of the facts contained in it before they could express any judgment upon it. He thought no excuse was needed for the long speech which had been made to them, as it was one of great interest to all who had the pleasure of hearing it; and he would only venture to remark that he hoped another time to have the satisfaction of entering at length into the points which the right hon. Gentleman had laid before them that night. He was inclined to doubt the advisability of the practice which the Vice President had adopted that night, and which he (Viscount Sandon) tried to adopt when he filled the Office of Vice President of the Council—namely, of making a Statement with the Speaker in the Chair. Unfortunately, other matters had intercepted that Statement, and the natural discussion of the points raised by the right hon. Gentleman, and the result was that they had arrived at a very late hour before they were able to discuss the Vote. As he had said, he was not to blame for not having set a bad example in the matter, because he did try to make his statement with the Speaker in the Chair; but he was prevented from doing so by the present Chief Secretary for Ireland. He gathered from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council that the experience of the last 10 years had somewhat disappointed the expectations that were raised, and, to some extent, that it dissipated some of the fears that were expressed. Some of them expected that the voluntary schools would be very much encouraged by the course of legislation adopted; but those expectations had been disappointed. On the other hand, the expectation entertained that the progress of education would be a little more rapid had been somewhat dashed. The hopeful aspect of the case was that the parties who disagreed in former years were now evincing a desire to work together in a more harmonious manner for the benefit of the children committed to their charge. He was gratified to hear the high testimony which the Vice President of the Council bore to the voluntary work of the country, both in regard to the board schools and the voluntary schools. They found that some very vague and voluntary dreams which had been formed of the past had been abandoned, judging from the Vice President's speech. Nobody spoke more strongly than the Vice President did now against the evils of free and gratuitous education. The right hon. Gentleman was perfectly consistent in that; but it was most important that a person holding the high position of the right hon. Gentleman should be able to say that the opinion of the country was entirely against free education. As to religious instruction, the testimony of the right hon. Gentleman was in favour of its value; and he (Viscount Sandon) rejoiced that it was so after the 18 months' experience the right hon. Gentleman had had of the working of the Department. He congratulated the right hon. Gentleman on the fact that it had fallen to his lot to come to the House at a time of comparative calm in the Education Department, so that he was able to turn his mind to a further revision of the Education Code. He hoped, in the long run, the right hon. Gentleman might not find that in trying to be concise he had become obscure. The right hon. Gentleman was able to undertake this important work, owing to the Department being more free in regard to the supply of schools, and owing to the board system having been started and got into full working order. He was also able to undertake the work of compulsion which had been proposed by his noble Friend the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton). His way had been cleared for him, and he (Viscount Sandon) felt that the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly right in giving a large meed of praise to the exceeding vigour of the heads of the Education Department, not only the Gentleman who was at the head of all, but those who were at the head of the subordinate departments. In regard to the Code itself, he hoped he might be allowed to record his opinion, and he trusted that all hon. Gentlemen who were interested in education would do the same. Until they had seen the system fully in operation, the whole future of the schools must depend entirely on the good working of the Code. They must remember that all the changes were purely tentative after all, and the great question which lurked behind was that of the money. They were told that they were not to consider the money question at present; but to look to it solely as an educational question. That was very admirable and very excellent; but the schools of the country must look to it from the money point of view; and the case of the board schools, and voluntary schools, as between small schools and large schools, rural schools and urban schools, must be decided by the facilities which the new Code afforded. It would, therefore, be unwise to express an opinion as to the Code until they knew how the money was to be allocated. There was one thing, however, which they ought to require. He did trust the right hon. Gentleman would watch the matter carefully, so as not to place too great a head pressure upon the children. He said that from the experience he had gained when Vice President, and he was satisfied that there was great danger of pressing too heavily on children of tender age. He would venture to call special attention to the case of the pupil teachers. He was quite sure that in many cases they demanded far too much from young pupil teachers. They had to give out these poor children, as well as take them in, and the pressure upon their minds was very great, in having to teach during the greater part of the day, to stand almost entirely throughout the day, and then to study at night. Then, also, in regard to increasing the intellectual pressure, he would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman, after the strong expressions he had used as to the advantages of religious teaching, to keep a careful watch that in their exertions for the spread of secular knowledge they did not ignore religious teaching. There was great danger, if they showed that the interests of the State in the schools was merely based on secular knowledge, that in the course of time pure religious teaching would be cast aside as of no importance whatever. He thought that was quite unintentional on the part of Her Majesty's Government; and he believed that they might virtually make it impossible that that religious teaching they wished to foster should suffer. He congratulated the right hon. Gentleman on his praiseworthy endeavours to remove the temptation to fraud which existed at present, and which were so serious in our schools. No one would rejoice more than he would when the scheme relating to the 250 attendances was carried out. As to The Child's School Book to which the right hon. Gentleman had alluded, he was in favour of getting rid of all unnecessary forms; and, therefore, he should only be too happy if he succeeded in getting rid of The Child's School Book. The right hon. Gentleman said he was also going to give greater prominence to poetry, recitation, history, and geography. He would be glad indeed if the right hon. Gentleman had time to get those matters attended to in the ordinary curriculum of the schools. For his own part, he was a little doubtful whether Milton and Shakspeare offered the best kind of poetry to children of 10 or 12 years of age; and he was rather in favour of some of our excellent patriotic lyrics which very easily adapted themselves to the intellects of children. But that was a matter of detail. The right hon. Gentleman had also assured them that he was going to lay great stress on sewing as a branch of instruction. He believed he had the honour to be the first to give the money of the State for the promotion of that most important art amongst girls, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would do all in his power to encourage it. At the same time, he ventured to put in a word for those despised subjects—domestic economy and cooking. They should all have in view the importance of teaching those useful and necessary subjects in schools. It was difficult in practice, he knew; but they were most necessary to be taught to girls, and he hoped the Vice President would encourage them. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman meant to keep the attention of Inspectors fully engaged on the moral character of the schools. Everyone who knew what schools were would see how important it was that the Inspectors should show great attention to the general moral tone which prevailed in them. The right hon. Gentleman had used one happy expression. He said he was determined that the teaching in these elementary schools should be thorough. He reminded the House that they had made it compulsory on parents to send their children to those schools; that they were bound to see that the teaching was thorough and good, and that it was absolute cruelty and wrong to subject children to insufficient instruction. That point should, undoubtedly, be kept steadily in view. He wished the right hon. Gentleman success in his endeavour to promote night schools; and he agreed that he was taking a bold and wise course in allowing clerical teachers to instruct in night schools. It was probably the most important change of any made in the Code to throw open the profession of teachers to graduates of the Universities; and he thought the more people considered it, the more they would see the advantages of making that alteration. It would, however, be necessary, in fairness to existing teachers, that they should have due warning of the change, because, having entered upon their career on the understanding that it was a closed one, they should certainly receive notice of what would appear to them a very sudden and important change. He also hoped care would be taken to find a more suitable class of teachers for rural schools. The misfortune was that it was impossible for the districts in which those schools were situated to give a high rate of pay, and yet it was exceedingly bad to have very young teachers. That question, undoubtedly, merited great attention. It was the case that there was some deterioration in respect of the time during which teachers stayed in their schools; and they found that as a rule where there was only a mistress she stayed only for a year, or possibly two years. Anyone would understand that the effect of that upon the children was disastrous. In that way the teacher had no time to make acquaintance with the children, who were always being put under new systems, while, in fact, the moral hold was relaxed. That was a very important difficulty which all interested in rural education should consider. He could not agree with the remarks of the Vice President of the Council on the subject of honour certificates. He had always regarded them both as tending to raise the tone in schools and as incentives to future exertion. He thought those certificates did tend to elevate the character of their elementary schools, and he was afraid he should adhere to that view. He thought it a pity, for the sake of £1,000, to sacrifice what he believed to be in many cases a useful incentive; and, therefore, he trusted that if any change was made the system might be modified without being abandoned. He saw that about 13,000 children in the course of the year got those certificates; and he was constantly meeting with children who had gained them and who showed them with great pride, while the parents had told him that the moral effect upon their families was surprising. There was one point on which he should be obliged to challenge the decision of his right hon. Friend if he should think it his duty to press it. He, for one, was loth in any way to lower the character of the Inspectorate, because it was of the highest importance that its intellectual standard should be kept up; so much so, in his opinion, that when he held the Office of Vice President very severe conditions were attached as qualifications for that office. Therefore, he trusted that nothing would be done to lower the position of the Inspectorate. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether there was any truth in the rumour alluded to in the Press that he held out hopes to teachers of extending the pension system generally? He was aware that he granted a certain number of pensions in cases where the teachers were old and underpaid; but he carefully guarded himself from holding out any hope whatever of a general pension system, which would be a most serious and grave undertaking for the country, and he hardly thought the right hon. Gentleman could have been correctly reported when he was said to hold out hopes of so great a change. Although he should not be sorry to see a system of assurances established which would secure teachers against the consequences of sickness and old age, he did not think it was the business of the State to go further in the matter. He did not wish to stand in the way of the right hon. Gentleman; but he must hold himself absolutely free with regard to the changes in the Code, and with regard, also, to the changes in connection with the Inspectorate.

Mr. RICHARD said, he had a Motion on the Paper on going into Committee of Supply which, yielding to the appeal of his right hon. Friend, he did not proceed with; but to which, perhaps, he might be permitted to refer in Committee and to say a few words on the subject of it. He referred to what he could not but regard as a great anomaly in their educational system—that was to say, the denominational character of so many of our Training Colleges. He did not severely blame anybody for that, because it had grown out of a state of things which existed formerly, but which no longer prevailed. It was well known that for a long time the education of the people of the country was left in the hands of voluntary associations, and they frankly and gratefully acknowledged that they rendered valuable service to the cause of education. As long as these associations were purely voluntary, and supported by the contributions of their friends, they had a right to make their own rules; but when Government undertook to subsidize those efforts, then, of course, the matter was very much altered. It was enacted that all elementary schools should be subject to the Conscience Clause, which, to some extent, modified the denominational character of those schools, but the Training Colleges remained as they were, being governed by the same rules as existed when they were purely voluntary institutions. But they were no longer voluntary institutions; so much otherwise that by far the larger proportion of the incomes by which they were supported was derived from Parliamentary grants, and the fees paid by students. He would give some figures, by way of illustration, taken from the Report of the Committee of Council. He found that with regard to the Training College at Carnarvon the total annual expenditure was £2,227, the subscriptions and donations amounted to only £293. At Cheltenham College the total expenditure was £5,275, of which only £500 was raised by subscriptions and donations; the total expenditure of the Female College in the same town being £2,281, with subscriptions and donations amounting to only £117. The British Schools College, in the Borough Road, had a total expenditure of £7,000, of which only £1,390 was raised by voluntary contributions, and the Wesleyan College, at Battersea, a total expenditure of £4,172, and the donations and subscriptions amounted to £321. Thus it would be apparent to the Committee that, so far as support was concerned, those Colleges had become almost State institutions; and the question was whether it was right that institutions, which were practically dependent on public money, to which all classes of the community contributed, should remain sectarian in their character, government, and teaching. The tendency of their legislation had been, of late years, to unsectarianize education. That was proved by the Elementary Education Act, the Endowed Schools Act, and the various Acts passed by the Legislature during the last 20 or 30 years in relation to the Universities. But the Training Colleges remained on the same footing as before, many of them being, beyond doubt, purely denominational. A Memorial had been sent in to the London School Board, signed by the members of the Teachers' Association in this Metropolis, complaining of the disabilities imposed upon them by the denominational character of the examination to which their pupils were subject before they could enter the Training Colleges. The School Board thereupon applied to each Training College in the country for copies of the forms of application for admission, and for information with regard to the nature of the religious examination required to be passed by candidates. The Returns to the London School Board were as follows:—There were 41 Training Colleges of all kinds in England and Wales. Of these, six made no Return, five had no religious examination, and 25 had returned that they required, on entrance, an examination in the Old and New Testaments and in the Prayer Book. In all the Church of England and Diocesan Training Colleges this examination was exacted. The Wesleyan Methodists required an examination in the Old and New Testaments and the Conference Catechism; and as to the preliminary inquiries of an ecclesiastical character there were a great variety. Some Colleges merely required testimonials as to character from a clergyman or minister, and others addressed questions of this kind—"Are you a Communicant?" "Are you a member of the Church of England?" "Are you prepared to make a declaration that you will continue as a teacher in the Church schools?" Now, he asked the Committee again whether it was fair that these institutions, which were supported almost entirely out of public money, should have a character so decidedly denominational as to exclude entirely from the advantages of the training they gave all the Nonconformists of the country? He did not wish to say one disrespectful word of the Book of Common Prayer. It was not his habit to speak disrespectfully of anything that was an object of reverence to any of his countrymen; but he might be permitted to say there was much in the Book of Common Prayer that the Nonconformist conscientiously objected to. They did not teach it in their schools; therefore, any of the Nonconformist teachers who wished to go to those Training Colleges were barred by the requirement that a candidate must be examined in the Book of Common Prayer. There was a great hardship in that, inasmuch as these teachers might wish to go to the Training Colleges for the purpose of, afterwards, teaching in the board schools, which did not, and were not, allowed to teach the children the Prayer Book and the Catechism. The board schools were forbidden, by the 14th section of the Elementary Education Act, from giving the children such instruction. No examination on these matters was required in the scholarship examination undertaken by the Government; and yet, when these young people presented themselves for admission to the Training Colleges, they were made to submit to that religious test examination into the Prayer Book, and, in some cases, they were compelled to declare that they were members of the Church of England. He must say it was time that all this should be changed. It was undesirable that any of these Training Colleges should be denominational in their character; but, in any case, he maintained, the sectarian restrictions which prevented others than members of the Church of England from enjoying the advantages of those Training Colleges, and other institutions supported by public money, should be removed. He was not able to move the Resolution he had put on the Paper, owing to the Forms of the House; but, if the Committee would permit him, he would read it, in order that hon. Members might see the modest proposal he intended to make as to those elementary teachers. It was as follows:—

“That the Training Colleges for Elementary Teachers, which are almost entirely maintained by public grants and by the contributions of the students, should, so long as the present system of denominational colleges exists, be open without sectarian restrictions to those candidates who, being otherwise qualified, pass the scholarship examination with the greatest success, and the same religious liberty should be secured to them during their training which the Law now secures to students at the Universities, Grammar Schools, and in public Elementary Schools throughout the Country.”

He was told it happened very frequently that pupils who had been trained in the London School Board schools, and were proficient in all other branches of knowledge, being perfectly as well qualified to enter into the Training Colleges as any of those candidates who stood by their side, yet were rejected because they would not undergo examinations in the Prayer Book. He said this was unfair, and that the time had come when some change should be effected in the interests of religious liberty.

Mr. J. G. TALBOT said, that one of the disadvantages they experienced on the present occasion, and which his noble Friend the Member for Liverpool had referred to, was that they had not been able to follow the interesting Statement of the Vice President by a general discussion. The debate had strayed over various topics, interesting in themselves, some of them highly interesting, almost sensational, and those had diverted them from the main topic of the evening—namely, a review of the educational proceedings of the past, and of the educational policy of the future. He could not help expressing a hope that if the revision of the Rules of the House was, as had been indicated, to form an important part of the programme for next Session, no new Rule would be adopted which would encourage and sanction the course of proceeding which had been pursued that night. Discussions of that kind came on under great disadvantages at such an hour of the morning, and it was very difficult for one to compress into the few minutes which he felt himself at liberty to occupy all the observations he desired to make concerning the large number of interesting topics referred to. He did not intend to go into the case of Mr. Goffin; but he would say a word with regard to what the hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. Richard) had, with great moderation from his point of view, just stated. He (Mr. Richard) had made an appeal to the Government, and he thought it would have been very desirable if they could have come to some decision on the subject. Just as in the case of Mr. Goffin they were unable to come to a decision, so also in the matter of Training Colleges they were unable to come to a decision. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mundella) would not be led into an incautious statement in approval of what had fallen from the hon. Member for Merthyr in so seductive a manner. He had spoken as though a gentle change might be made to bring these Training Colleges in harmony with other institutions in the country, conducted upon what he called the undenominational principle. If they were at an earlier period of the evening he should endeavour to persuade the hon. Member that this institution, whose example he recommended, was not so undenominational as he seemed to think. He would have reminded him of the endowed schools which came under Clause 19 of the Endowed Schools Act, and he would have pointed to the larger “public schools,” as they were called, where religious education was given. But he would not now go into matters of that kind. He would only ask the Committee to remember that any change of the kind the hon. Member proposed would be a great and fundamental change, and not only that, but it would be a change that would amount to something very much like a breach of faith, because, although it was true that those institutions were supported in a great measure by the State—and he fully recognized the fact—yet it was also equally true that they were founded in a great measure by the liberality of private persons, for the express purpose of their being connected with a certain religious denomination. That remark did not only apply to the Church of England in which he was interested. There were Wesleyan Colleges, founded by and for Wesleyans, and also Roman Catholic Colleges, which were founded by and for Roman Catholics. Therefore, he trusted the Vice President of the Council would not, in a moment of incaution, be induced to adopt the view of the hon. Member for Merthyr, and, by so doing, give a severe shock to public feeling—to a great deal of the sound feeling on which the education of this country had hitherto rested, to which the Vice President of the Council had given credit, and to which the hon. Member himself had given credit. Education in this country was, for a very long time, chiefly dependent on voluntary effort. That voluntary effort was entirely connected with some religious body, and that religious body was mainly Church of England, as being the principal representative of religion in the country. He did not know that he would detain the Committee longer on this matter, except to say this—that there was a great difference between Training Colleges and public elementary schools. In connection with the latter there was the Conscience Clause, and the children of parents of any religious opinion could be admitted, every person's religious convictions being respected. He was not merely going into those matters on his own authority, but the Schools Inquiry Commissioners in their Report said that great distinction was to be drawn between places where pupils were received, educated, and boarded, and those to which children went as day scholars. Boarding schools it was pointed out, were in loco parentum, and it was shown that to have no definite system of religious teaching in them would be a serious detriment to their character. He was not speaking to those in the House who would discard religious instruction altogether from all schools; his arguments would be of no value to them; but to anyone who believed in giving young people some religious instruction, he said that unless they instructed the teachers in some definite form of religion—he cared not for the purpose of the present argument what, so long as it were definite—they had no chance of producing that class of teachers who would be the best and truest teachers in the sense in which they wished the children of this country to be taught. On this subject, speaking of Training Colleges, he was naturally led to say a word on a very important point—namely, the new Code, of which the right hon. Gentleman had given them an outline. He spoke of graduates of any University being recognized as assistant teachers without having to undergo examination for certificates. The existing rule might be relaxed harmlessly; and if that article of the Code was carried out to any extent, they would have a large number of teachers in the country who would not have been trained in Training Colleges, which was now necessary; but would have had the advantages of that free training which was given in the Universities. No work could be more suited to graduates, who had gone through a great deal of teaching themselves, than to impart their knowledge to others. The system contemplated had been already tried, he believed, and had been found successful, especially in the case of ladies. He did not mean to say that those ladies had absolutely taken University degrees; but they had passed the University examinations, and were those who would be expected, under certain circumstances, to take degrees and enrol themselves in the ranks of school teachers. He was glad to see anything like an advance in that direction. Teaching was one of the noblest occupations possible. Anything which raised the profession was a distinct benefit to the community, and he here spoke not only of University, but elementary teaching. He most cordially thanked the right hon. Gentleman for his proposal. He had here one or two figures which he thought he might trouble the Committee with, just to show how great had been the progress of the schools connected with the Church of England—which were the larger part of the voluntary schools—and the large share they had had in the scholastic development of the country. In 1870 the accommodation in the Church schools was 1,365,000, and in 1880, 2,327,379, whilst the average attendance in 1870 was 844,334, and in 1880, 1,471,615; or, in other words,

Mr. J. G. Talbot

962,299 additional places had been provided in Church schools in 10 years; whilst all other denominations, together with the school boards, afforded additional places for 1,399,870. In 1880, there was, as he had said, in Church schools accommodation for 2,327,379, or more than half the whole school accommodation of the whole country, which was 4,240,753. It was said that the school boards represented the elementary education of the country. He did not wish to discourage the good work done by the school boards; but his view was that they had only to supplement what was already partly done by the voluntary schools in the matter of elementary education. But it was important to observe that far from killing, or even checking, voluntary effort, the school board system seemed to have stimulated and encouraged that effort. They were entitled to ask how that had occurred. There was a very pertinent view taken of that matter by some people. They said—"People won't pay twice over for the same thing." It was said—"How can you expect people to subscribe towards the support of voluntary schools when they have to pay taxes for the maintenance of the school board schools?" Well, it was because at the bottom of the voluntary system there was something sufficient to counterbalance the selfish element. There seemed to be in such a matter an analogy with the relief of the poor. It might be supposed that nobody would subscribe to voluntary hospitals, when there were infirmaries scattered all over the country provided out of the rates; but just as they found in that case that people always would provide more in the way of relief than was required to simply meet the necessities of the case, so in this case he thought they would find that the voluntary system of education would not be killed, but would rather be quickened and increased by the action of the School Board. With regard to the details of the new scheme, although they had only heard them for the first time that night, they would give to it all the favourable consideration in their power, and heartily co-operate with the right hon. Gentleman in respect to it.

Mr. LYULPH STANLEY wished to say a word or two as to the Training Colleges which were referred to by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil. In the first place, there was not only the grievance of those who were driven out of the Training Colleges by conscientious scruples, but there was the moral harm to the other ex-pupil teachers who felt compelled to sacrifice their religious scruples in order to obtain the training. That was a result which they ought to look at quite as much as to the injury to those who adhered to their religious opinions. In fact, he thought they ought to consider the latter class rather more than those who withdrew from the Colleges. Then, with regard to the training of teachers, the country paid this large sum of money in order that the most experienced and industrious of the teachers might proceed through the Colleges to the work of elementary teaching. By giving preference to an ex-pupil teacher who passed low down in the examination because he could pass an examination on the Church Service, or who gave a promise that he would teach in Church schools, they got inferior teachers when they might secure superior teachers. He did not think it necessary to labour that point further, except to remind the hon. Member for the University of Oxford that freedom of conscience and exemption from religious services and instruction existed in all the Colleges among the undergraduates. He congratulated the right hon. Gentleman on the steady progress made by his Department this year. The progress was, perhaps, not as great as they would have liked to see; but there was a sufficiently distinct progress to make them feel that they were promoting elementary education. He did not think it was necessary, at that late hour, for him to take up the challenge the right hon. Gentleman threw down as to the expensiveness of the London School Board. The right hon. Gentleman knew that he held strongly that the duty of the Department was to look after the efficiency of the School Board and not the cost, which was the business only of the rate-payers. He hoped the Department would keep their minds on the question of efficiency, and not run into other matters. They had too much of the Education Department under the late Government, when it tried to hold up economy at the risk of sacrificing efficiency. It was not proper in a debate in Parliament to drag in considerations of cost as between one school and another. Then, with regard to the proposals for the revision of the Code, no one could give a final opinion favourable or unfavourable upon them. It was a most important scheme, and full of very valuable considerations; but their remarks that night must be purely provisional, and further discussion must be reserved. But there were one or two points which he should like his right hon. Friend to consider before finally pledging himself to this scheme. He should like to suggest under No. 5 whether sewing, which was to be compulsory for all girls, might not be made optional for girls who were half-timers. It was necessary there should be compulsory sewing; but in industrial districts, where girls were half-timers, they got so little opportunity for mental training that he thought sewing should not be made part of the curriculum. Then, as to Clause 6, the Department had to steer between two shoals, the danger of mechanical instruction, and the danger of trusting everything to inspection. If they wished to give the Inspector greater power and liberty, they would be exposed to the danger of its being said that they were putting the schoolmaster under the Inspector, and enabling the Inspector to impose his own theories upon a whole district. That was a danger they ought to be alive to—the danger of excessive State interference. He was sufficiently in favour of local individualism not to wish to see that, but to see something like free play and individual working out of the educational system in the country. A stereotyped pattern of education throughout the country would be, on the whole, bad, although it might be useful in backward districts. He welcomed No. 8 as to adult teachers; but he should like to call the attention of his right hon. Friend to No. 8 in connection with Nos. 36 and 37. He gathered from the Vice President of the Council that by the latter Articles of the Code it was intended to wipe out the ex-pupil teacher in favour of certificated teachers. He did not dissent from that; but he should like to ask what was the meaning in No. 8 of an adult teacher up to the number of 40, and a certificated teacher when the number amounted to 60. Then, in No. 20, needlework would cease to be a class subject. It had been put in as a necessary subject according to the Schedule; but it would be a necessary subject in the routine of the day, and not a class subject. He did not object to that; but he would remind the Vice President of the Council that if he put needlework in the Schedule he would materially raise the standard, because at present, if needlework was taught according to Schedule, it was taught as a class subject, and it became a matter for extra grants. The modification of the specific subjects was too minute a proposal to be discussed at that hour; but it would naturally be discussed in the autumn by persons practically engaged in education. In No. 28, he thought the Vice President was going too far in the direction of checking and discouraging specific subjects unless elementary subjects were well taught. He had not the slightest objection to the provision that where less than 75 per cent passed in elementary subjects the grant should not be paid in that particular year for specific subjects; but he thought it would be hard to reduce the grant if there was less than 75 per cent passed in the previous year, for there might have been many things, such as an epidemic, for instance, to interfere with the results. He knew schools in one district of London where they frequently got less than 75 per cent, but where the Inspector reported that the state of education was thoroughly satisfactory. In fact, he believed that in that particular district schools were more efficient, passing under 75 per cent, than many other schools passing up to 85 or even 90 per cent, so different was the standard of different Inspectors. Therefore, he thought to prohibit the grant for specific subjects merely on account of the percentage of the school would be a mistake. He should not object to giving the Inspectors some discretionary power, or that if they reported the general teaching of a school to have fallen back, the grant for specific subjects for the coming year should be suspended; but he did not think they should have a mechanical self-acting standard like 75 per cent. With regard to night schools, he sympathized with the desire of the Department to raise the teaching; but night schools took up education after a boy had left the elementary schools, and it was not enough to go to the Seventh Standard in those schools, because some of the boys would probably have passed the sixth or even the seventh by the time they were 13 years old, and for these there would be no further education in the night schools. He should like to see something which would enable night schools to go beyond that. Then, with regard to No. 34 and the three pupil teachers, he sympathized with the intention of the Department to keep down the number; but three pupil teachers would be too many in a small school of, say, 120 average attendance; while, on the other hand, in infant schools with an average of 600 three pupil teachers would not be sufficient. He would rather fix the number at one for every 100 of the average attendance. That would keep down the number of teachers more than the present proposal. As to No. 36, he agreed with the proposal to reduce the value of the certificated assistant, and to let him count for 60 instead of 80; but he thought it would be necessary, if they reduced the value of the assistant, that they should reduce the value of the pupil teacher. He had hitherto been valued as half; but if they made the value 40 as compared with 60, they were stimulating pupil teachers rather than assistants. As to No. 39, dealing with graduates, that had been spoken of as if it were a concession; but it did not concede or give anything of moment, and there was nothing to prevent a graduate of a University getting an appointment to a school and sitting for his certificate. He would admit no ex-pupil teachers unless they were prepared to pass the Government examination; but he would not close the door absolutely to persons who might be of great merit, and some of whom were doing admirable work in their schools, unless they were prepared to go through a University training. Although, as a rule, that training was valuable, they might get some people who had been teaching in private schools, but could not afford University training, who were very efficient for teaching; and they would be doing great injustice to them and depriving elementary schools of valuable teachers by the present proposal. Then he thought No. 39 would immensely strengthen the argument of the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil (Mr. Richard) in favour of breaking down the present monopoly of the Training Colleges. But if they proposed that the only door of admission to the schools should be the Training Colleges, they made an overwhelming argument for the contention against any denominational distinction whatever. On the whole, however, he congratulated his right hon. Friend upon his scheme.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, he thought two parts of the Vice President's speech seemed to afford general satisfaction to the House—his expressed desire to render educational endowments more generally useful, and his statement that he would bring in a Bill next year. Although he did not now propose to go into the question of endowments at any length, he would submit to the right hon. Gentleman whether it would not be possible to do something in the meantime. The facts were these. Whereas the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) hoped that the Endowed Schools Commission would be able to deal with all the endowed schools in five years, 10 years had elapsed and less than half of the schools had been dealt with. He would, therefore, submit to his right hon. Friend whether it was not possible to increase the number of the Charity Commissioners so that there might be some more rapid progress made. Unless that was done it was perfectly clear that they could not hope that any more rapid advance would be secured. He hoped it would not be supposed that he was complaining of the Charity Commissioners. He believed they had worked with all due diligence, and that they were not to blame in the matter. At the same time, the question was one of much importance. It was one thing to prepare a Bill, and another to pass it through Parliament; and, therefore, even if his noble Friend the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish) was prepared to introduce a Bill next year, it was still very desirable to hasten the action of the Endowed Schools Commissioners in the meantime. There was one point connected with higher education upon which he should like to say a word—namely, as to the great desirability of knowing what was being done in the schools of the country. He did not desire to interfere with the action of the head masters and Governing Bodies of schools; but he thought that parents should have the opportunity of knowing what kind of education their sons would receive. They had Blue Books containing interesting and valuable statistics as to the property, land, and buildings belonging to the public schools; but they really had not, until the Returns given him by his noble Friend the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) two years ago, any information as to the system of education pursued in the public schools, and he regretted to say, in spite of all that had been said as to the desirability of introducing modern languages and science, only two or three hours at the most were being given to each of them. Those who felt with him in that matter would be sorry to see literature excluded from the public schools; but as there were 42 hours devoted to study he would hope that some greater amount of time would be devoted to those branches.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out that the hon. Member is now dealing with the question of secondary schools, whereas the Vote before the Committee is one for the elementary schools.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK thought the Vote included the expenses of the Education Committee; and, therefore, he had considered that he was justified in alluding to that question. He would, however, not pursue the question, but would only ask his right hon. Friend to give attention to the subject. Coming to the question—namely, of specific subjects in elementary schools, there was one point connected with the Inspectors to which he would like to call the attention of his right hon. Friend. His right hon. Friend had told them that evening that he proposed to deal with that subject. Last year he (Sir John Lubbock) troubled the Committee with statistics showing conclusively that the introduction of specific subjects, so far from interfering with reading, writing, and arithmetic, really benefited the merely fundamental subjects; and he thought the statistics which had been produced that day showed that experience had proved that the introduction of specific subjects had not had the effect of interfering with the study of other subjects. Although the hour was late, he hoped he might be permitted to mention one little anecdote which showed how well children were able to follow a little instruction in this matter. A friend of his, the wife of a distinguished Member of that House, had given lessons in mechanics to one of her children only about four years old. Some time afterwards she told him the story of the fox and the crane, and how the crane extracted the bone from the throat of the fox. When she came to the end of the fable the child said—"Well, Mamma, was it a hand crane, or was it a steam crane?" He regretted to find from their Reports that some of the Inspectors were very unfriendly to the specific subjects. He did not wish to quote any names, because he did not wish to make a personal attack upon the Inspectors. According to the Blue Book, for instance, one of the Inspectors said he had no sympathy with the desire to add science to the subjects already taught; another said that it would be ridiculous to see 3,800,000 children assembled listening to sermons on stones; another stated that children could not understand scientific questions at all; another did not regret that specific subjects were not taught in his schools; and another could not see what business a Fourth Standard child had to be dabbling in science. All this showed how very little appreciation there was of the instruction proposed to be given. He would not weary the Committee with other quotations to the same effect; but he would submit that these gentlemen had such strong views on the matter that they could hardly be expected to give to these specific subjects a fair trial when they were brought before them. He heard one or two expressions which fell from his right hon. Friend in his opening address with great regret. At the same time, he did not think, on further discussion, that it would be found that they differed very much after all. At any rate, he was glad to hear the proposal that technical knowledge should be continued from the commencement of school life until the close. He agreed with what had been said by the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Lyulph Stanley) as to leaving the school committees as free in this matter as possible. He objected strongly to the proposal to make grammar a compulsory subject. No doubt a very large proportion of schools would take grammar as one of the class subjects; but still he should like to leave the school committees the option of doing as they pleased in that matter. He did not understand how many specific subjects could be taken in addition to class subjects.

MR. MUNDELLA: Two.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK: May a third class subject be taken as a specific subject?

Sir John Lubbock

MR. MUNDELLA: Yes.

SIR JOHN LUBBOOK said, he was glad to hear that that was the case. Of course, they could not now discuss all the details of the proposed arrangements. It struck him in looking through the Code that it might be improved in details; for instance, that it made rather too little reference to plants; but that question they would have an opportunity of considering afterwards. He was glad, as a University Member, to see the step which his right hon. Friend proposed to take in that direction; and, on the whole, he thought they might fairly congratulate his right hon. Friend on the fact that the alterations he proposed were likely to be of benefit to the education of the country. He thanked the Committee for allowing him to make these observations; and in sitting down he would only add that they might all congratulate themselves on the energy, ability, and zeal with which the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President was conducting the important duties of his Office.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he trusted the hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. Richard) would excuse him if he expressed some pain at the observations which the hon. Member had addressed to the House. It seemed to him that the hon. Member was bent on invading the voluntary principle. He might be wrong; but that was the impression that the speech of the hon. Member conveyed. He was old enough to remember when the representatives of the denominations strove earnestly for the recognition of that principle, and he very humbly aided them in that object; but now the hon. Gentleman pointed with jealousy to the success of that very principle, because the most successful denomination had been the Church of England. Next to the Church of England, the hon. Member pointed out, not as a subject of congratulation, but as a subject of regret, the amount which the Wesleyans had earned for their Training Colleges. Now, if that was not a recognition of the voluntary principle, he (Mr. Newdegate) knew not what was. The hon. Gentleman would carry the point at issue to this—that not equality of treatment, but numerical equality, should be insisted upon; and that was a most tyrannical principle. The hon. Member would excuse him if he asked the hon. Member to glance back at the period of the Commonwealth. Surely he would accept Cromwell, advised, as he was, by his chaplain, Owen, and his secretary, Milton, as in favour of religious freedom up to the point when freedom became irreligious. If the hon. Member would study the history of the Commonwealth he would find that Cromwell, advised by Dr. Owen, and with Milton for his secretary, was compelled to restrain with a strong hand that denominational jealousy which that great man clearly foretold would, if gratified, prove fatal to all religious freedom.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, it was stated that they had little to do with economy, but that their great point should be efficiency. The Education Department had to consider both economy and efficiency, and the attention of the country had therefore been properly directed to the increased expenditure for educational purposes. The grant in 1870 amounted to something like 9s. 8d. a-head. It had now risen to 15s. 8d. a-head; and he was afraid, from some indications which his right hon. Friend had given, that he did not contemplate any limit to the amount to which the grant might go. He should be sorry to object to any expenditure that would secure the efficiency of the schools; but as there was a growing tendency towards extravagance in the local administration of the educational expenditure of the country, and as it arose, to a great extent, from having the Imperial Exchequer to fall back upon, he did think that that was a point deserving of attention. He did not propose to pursue that matter further; but with respect to the challenge given to him by the right hon. Gentleman, he wished to call attention to one sentence contained in the Report of the right hon. Gentleman himself, which the right hon. Gentleman did not read to the House, but which he (Mr. H. H. Fowler) regarded as very unsatisfactory and very depressing. The Report said that—

“Whereas, out of 1,900,000 scholars examined, there were 969,000 over 10 years of age who ought to have been presented in Standards IV., V., and VI., but that only 461,000 were so presented.”

[MR. MUNDELLA: Hear, hear!] His right hon. Friend said “Hear, hear;”

but he (Mr. Fowler) contended that it was a most unsatisfactory state of affairs that only one-half of the entire number were presented. The Report, however, did not state there what it did in the Appendix—namely, that the total number who passed in Standards IV., V., and VI., out of the 461,000, was only 263,000; and he ventured to say that when they found so large a number who failed in those Standards, it was impossible that they should allow the education to remain there. In Standard VI. last year 52,625 children were presented for examination; but only 58 per cent of that number passed. The practical result of that was that they were paying in this country something like £5,000,000 per annum for the education of the rising generation, out of which the Imperial Exchequer and the local rates contributed £2,750,000, and yet the result was that less than 40,000 children passed a satisfactory examination in reading, writing, and arithmetic. He said that that was not a satisfactory state of things, and he had sufficient confidence in the right hon. Gentleman to believe that he would do his utmost to bring about a better condition of affairs. He was sorry to see in the New Code introduced to the House that night that it was not intended to grapple with the question of the age at which children should be compelled to pass in the several Standards. By Clause 15 it was provided that a boy of 10 years of age, after April, 1883, should be passed over in the First or Second Standards. Now, the First Standard ought to be passed by a boy of seven, the Second by a boy of eight, the Third by a boy of nine, and the Fourth by a boy of 10. And yet he saw a clause introduced to allow children over 10 years of age to go on for two years, and then to allow them to escape two of the Standards. Their educational system had now been in force for 10 years; and he thought the Department would be justified in saying, before they granted the public money to any school children, that a child of seven years must pass in Standard I., another of eight in Standard II., and so on, carrying out their own rule. In that case he did not think it would be found that out of 461,000 children examined in Standard IV. only 260,000 were able to pass. He congratulated his right hon. Friend on the masterly and statesmanlike manner in which he had made his Statement that evening, and on the determination he had evinced to make his administration of that Department a great success; but he would press upon him the necessity of raising, as far as possible, the standard of general education.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he hoped it would not be thought disrespectful if he did not reply to many of the questions which had been addressed to him in the course of the discussion. The noble Lord the Member for Liverpool (Viscount Sandon) had made some useful suggestions, and also the hon. Member for Oxford University (Mr. J. G. Talbot). He should very much like to allude to those suggestions if it were not for the lateness of the hour. He had only time to answer the question which had been raised by his hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr (Mr. Richard). Before doing so, however, he would say in reply to his hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), who asked him to put more pressure on the schools of the country in order to bring more children into the higher standard, that that was not where the pressure was required. The pressure should be put first on that House, and next on the local authorities. If they wanted the children to pass in the Six Standards they should have the courage to do what was done in Switzerland, Germany, and other countries, and say to the children that they must continue at school from the 6th to the 14th year, until they had passed through all the curriculum laid down. It was of no use saying to a child that it might work half time as soon as it had reached the Second and Third Standards, and full time when it had reached the Fourth, and then complain that the schoolmaster did not make all the children pass the Sixth Standard. It was not the fault of the secular schoolmaster, but of Parliament which seemed to have a low estimate, of what the education ought to be, and had never had the courage to do its duty to the children. They talked about foreign competition, and yet they still sacrificed their children to that foreign competition. When Parliament exhibited more courage his faith in the principles of a higher education would be considerably strengthened. What they ought to do was to keep their children at school up to their 14th year. That was his answer to the statement of the hon. Gentleman, and the whole answer he had to give him. He certainly believed that their system and their schoolmasters were quite as good as those of any other country. He was sorry he was not able to give as complete an answer to the hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. Richard) as he should like. He confessed that the question of the Training Colleges had not occupied his attention. He was assured, however, that school board teachers did go to the Training Colleges, 123 male and 224 female teachers having passed through them, according to the last Return. He was told that legislation would be necessary on this subject; but that depended on the will of the House. He thought no teacher ought to be debarred from the Training Colleges on account of his or her religious opinions, and he was prepared to consider what was necessary to be done in that matter. If his hon. Friend would give him a little time he would look into the question. His noble Friend (Viscount Sandon) had complained that he had set a bad example by making his Statement with the Speaker in the Chair; but he could assure him that this course was adopted after much consideration, and with due regard to the convenience of the House, for had not his Statement been made under these circumstances, he was sure, having regard to the number of Motions on the Paper, that he should have been making it now. He hoped, after the satisfactory discussion which had taken place, that he might be allowed to take this Vote.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, he regretted that this most important subject of education had been brought on so late in the Session, and at so late an hour of the night. He thought it was a reflection on Members of the House that when small matters were under consideration, there was, as a rule, a full attendance, but that when subjects of the deepest interest were before them they found themselves reduced to scarcely a quorum. The Vice President of the Council had not absolutely closed the door against his hon. Friend (Mr. Richard); but he was bound to say that the assurances he had given were of a very vague character. Now, in these days, when religious tests had been removed in every direction, it was impossible that in such a matter as elementary education those who were qualifying themselves for the position of teachers should be debarred from entering any public training institution they pleased. Sooner or later some change must come. He thought his hon. Friend had put his proposal in the mildest form, having regard to the prejudices of those who sought to maintain the denominational character of the Training Colleges; but if it was found that some relaxation of the present tests was not conceded, he was certain that some radical change must be made in the direction of establishing Training Colleges against which the objection now urged would not lie. The hon. Gentleman the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) had reproached his hon. Friend with having gone counter to the voluntary system. But he did not see how this could be said, seeing that 95 per cent of the maintenance of these institutions came from the public funds, and that there only remained 5 per cent upon which they could hang their claim to be considered voluntary institutions. They were not voluntary institutions; they were public institutions controlled by denominations and maintained by public money, and they were, therefore, anomalies. It was only fair on the part of his hon. Friend to say that, unless some substantial proposal by way of relief were made, it would be necessary next year to proceed much further than his hon. Friend now proposed. Let hon. Members look at the possible injury done by the present system. The hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Lyulph Stanley) truly stated that the object should be to provide the highest class of teachers which the country could find; and what had been the result of the Test Act so far as our Universities were concerned? The last 17 years would testify. In 11 of those years the highest honours had been taken by Dissenters, who, before the Act was passed, were denied the right of entry. There had been gross injustice done to men belonging to the Dissenting Bodies of the country in placing obstacles in the way of their entrance into suitable training institutions. Again, he must say that the right hon. and other hon. Members were by no means entitled to call the denominational schools of the country voluntary schools, because they were only so to a limited extent; and they knew that a great proportion of their cost came from the taxes of the country and the payments of the children. The great blot on the Education Act of 1870 was the leave given to denominational bodies to claim and occupy as much ground as they liked; and the country, as was well known, was startled by the sudden zeal shown by denominationists to occupy ground which ought to have been really occupied by a national system of education. In the rural districts it was notorious that this denominational zeal had been shown for the purpose of keeping out board schools and the representative system. He himself had a curious instance of this presented to him in conversation with a clergyman in the North of England, who said—"Although he was certain the change must come, he had been round to all the farmers to put them on their guard against the possibility of having board schools in the parish." That was evidence of the strongest kind of the prejudice which prevailed in certain quarters against the board schools. It was now asked that what was maintained at the public expense, and what was established by national authority, should be put under national control. He deeply regretted that their Episcopalian friends did not take up their position side by side with their fellow-citizens in the maintenance and furtherance of national control with regard to the educational system of the country. In conclusion, his right hon. Friend pointed to the sum of £18,000 a-year contributed in aid of the Training Colleges; but he thought he must know that that sum represented but a small percentage of their entire cost, and by no means entitled him to defend their present position. He believed that those who were favourable to national education in this country would be justified in putting entire confidence in his right hon. Friend, knowing that he would hold the balance fairly, and that justice would be done.

MR. WOODALL wished to know whether, in addition to the grants upon class subjects, aid would be given towards instruction in specific subjects in night schools?

MR. HEALY asked, in reference to the statements of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), whether it had been brought under notice that the real reason why children were prevented from passing in the higher Standards was that they were compelled, owing to the inherent difficulty of our orthography, to pass the first seven or eight years of their lives in learning to read? He asked, also, whether anything had been done with regard to the Memorial from 130 school boards for making use of a concurrent phonetic system of spelling? He should be glad to know whether the Department had made any inquiries into the matter, and whether they were prepared to give that proposal recognition side by side with the old musical notation? He might as well give Notice that he would take an early opportunity of moving that a Select Committee be appointed to consider the desirability of establishing a phonetic system of spelling.

Mr. Illingworth

Vote agreed to.

MR. BIGGAR said, it was now after 2 o'clock, and he therefore begged to move that the Chairman report Progress. It was unreasonable to keep them sitting here at this hour, when they had most important Business to get through to-morrow. They would, at their next Sitting, have the Land Bill before them again, and it was desirable that they should be able to give that attention to it which would enable them to deal with it satisfactorily. In the last Parliament they were never asked to vote money after 1 o'clock; but now the Government seemed to think it the proper thing to ask them to sit up all night voting money.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Biggar.)

MR. MUNDELLA said, the question of Science and Art was thoroughly discussed in the early part of the night. The hon. Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock) had sat there a very long time to discuss the British Museum Vote.

MR. BIGGAR said, he did not wish to be unreasonable. The Government were anxious to make a Jew's bargain; but he (Mr. Biggar) desired to be perfectly reasonable. Therefore, on the understanding that after the Science and Art Vote had been disposed of Progress would be reported, he would withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. G. HOWARD said, that in the absence of his hon. Friend the Member for Ayrshire (Mr. Cochran-Patrick), who had interested himself in the matter, and who, if he had been present, would have called attention to it, he wished to say a word with regard to the General Pitt Rivers' Correspondence. A Committee, upon which were to be found some of the very best names from a scientific point of view, was appointed to consider whether General Pitt Rivers' offer should be accepted or not. The Committee unanimously recommended that the collection should be taken over, and one was rather surprised to find that the Department had not adopted that course. They gave as their reason for not accepting the collection, first of all, want of space; but that was a bad argument in connection with a National Museum, especially now that something was being said about enlarging it. The next reason given was that there was a collection of a similar kind at the British Museum. Well, that was entirely disputed not only by General Pitt Rivers himself, but by the Committee, who stated that the collection would not interfere with any existing collection. It was arranged on different principles, and illustrated different points. He would not detain the Committee, but would urge most strongly on the Government the desirability of reconsidering their decision. He trusted they had not given a final answer.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, that, as Chairman of the Committee to which reference had been made, he hoped he should be allowed to say one or two words. He had heard one or two murmurs, and if hon. Members were to discuss these Votes, he trusted the Committee would allow them to do it without interruption. This collection of General Pitt Rivers was, perhaps, one of the finest collections in the world. The collection was offered to the nation by General Pitt Rivers, and not only that, but this gentleman undertook, if the collection were accepted, to provide a curator at his own expense. The Committee unanimously decided that the collection was of the greatest value and interest, and should be accepted; and, having done that, the Government then declined to receive it, on the ground of want of space. It would have been much better if the Government had made up their mind not to accept the collection at the outset, instead of appointing a Committee of scientific gentlemen, whose time was of great value to them, whose recommendation had been ignored. He did not suppose the hon. Member wished to divide the Committee on this Vote; but he (Sir John Lubbock) would like to know whether the decision of the Department was final, or whether the matter was still open? General Pitt Rivers did not care whether the collection was under the South Kensington authorities or those of the British Museum; but, having got together a most interesting collection, he wished to present it to the nation, and it appeared to him (Sir John Lubbock) very unwise to decline it, and not to see whether some arrangement could not be made under which it could be accepted. If the Government did not care about putting the collection in the South Kensington Museum or the British Museum, arrangements could, perhaps, be made for exhibiting it permanently at Liverpool or Manchester. He therefore ventured to express a hope that the Government would not look upon this matter as absolutely finally closed, but would place themselves in communication with General Pitt Rivers, with a view to seeing whether some arrangement could not be made for the purpose of accepting this very valuable collection for the benefit of the nation.

MR. MUNDELLA: The Department quite recognized the public spirit of General Pitt Rivers; but the ground on which they have declined the collection is that it is not suitable for preservation in the Museum at South Kensington, where the collections have reference to Art and applied Science. It is an ethnological collection, and can be of no kind of value in the work South Kensington has to do. As to want of space, the hon.

Member is mistaken about that. The gallery in which the collection is arranged belonged to the Commissioners of 1851. They at first allowed us to have it without rent; but they now ask us to pay £2,000 a-year for it. More than that, General Pitt Rivers says the collection requires a certain amount of space, and that amount of space seems to us to be altogether out of proportion to the advantages of possessing the collection. He says he will require almost double the amount of space he at present occupies at once, and then he desires to have the collection entirely under his own control. He requires that the collection shall not in any way be dispersed, or dealt with otherwise than as he pleases. He insists on having it entirely under his own management during his lifetime. It seems to me that gifts made to the nation in this form should not be accepted. No one, however generous he may be, has a right to impose these conditions. A gentleman, in giving a collection, should say, as many people have said before—"You may take my collection as a whole, and I will have no connection with it whatever." As it is, General Pitt Rivers wants to have the collection under his own control, and we are to pay the expense of its maintenance. The proper place for the collection is the British Museum, where there is already a small collection. Why should not this collection go with the National Collection? No doubt it is a very interesting collection; indeed, it afforded me considerable pleasure when I went to see it; but, at the same time, South Kensington is not the place for it.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS said, what a pity it was that General Pitt Rivers did not go to the University of Oxford, where he would have got abundant room and better treatment than he had received from the stingy autocratic body he had gone to.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, the collection was at South Kensington already, so that the objection of want of space was not a good one. If they accepted the collection, and desired to part with it, the Government could give it up again at any time. General Pitt Rivers had offered to provide a curator; and, again, on the question of space, hon. Members would see, if they referred to the Report of the Committee he had referred to, that they had expressly guarded themselves against the demand for so much space. If it was understood that the refusal was on the part of the South Kensington authorities, and not on the part of the Government as a whole, they would have gained their point. Whether the collection was put in South Kensington or the British Museum was not a matter of importance. What they desired was that this valuable collection should not be lost to the nation.

MR. MAGNIAC said, he entirely agreed with the view which had been taken of this matter by the South Kensington authorities. The collection was entirely different to anything at South Kensington, and it took up an enormous amount of room. It was utterly unsuitable, and the Government was right in not accepting it. It was said that General Pitt Rivers would provide a curator. So he would; but at his death the authorities at South Kensington would have to look after the collection themselves. As to the British Museum taking the collection, that was entirely a matter for General Pitt Rivers and the Museum Trustees. The Government could not control them, and if General Pitt Rivers wished his collection to go to South Kensington, he had nothing to do but to go to the Trustees. It would be putting their funds to an improper purpose to accept the collection at South Kensington.

MR. HEALY said, there was an item of £150 for house rents for Sir Richard Wallace's Collection, which was removed in 1873. Why should the Vote have gone on since 1873? This Vote embraced the Dublin Museum of Science and Art, and he was sorry that the Vote should have been taken, as the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray), who was not now present, was very much interested in it. The hon. Member would be in his place to-morrow, and he (Mr. Healy) had hoped that he would have been able to speak upon this matter. There was a strong feeling in Ireland on the subject of the Science and Art Museum of Dublin, and it would have given his hon. Friend much satisfaction if he could have had an assurance with regard to it.

MR. MAGNIAC said, that on page 314, in what was supposed to be a résumé and analysis of the Vote, there was an item of £30,380 for "purchases, catalogues," &c. There was not a line, however, in the Estimates showing what the purchases had been. They knew that South Kensington and the other Departments must purchase specimens; but it was desirable that the details of those purchases should be shown, as, owing to jealousy, the different Departments might compete with one another.

MR. MUNDELLA: As to the question asked by the hon. Member opposite, I stated about a month ago that we had sent a person over to Ireland to see what amount of space was required at the Dublin Museum, and to prepare a ground plan. We have received from the Treasury a notice that the Office of Works in Dublin is prepared to put out an advertisement inviting tenders for the building of a new Science and Art Museum forthwith. Nothing can be done until that matter is decided.

MR. BIGGAR wished to have an explanation of the item £6,234 for "Simpkin's Defalcations," and of the item £500 for "Solar Physics." What did these Votes mean?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he was sorry to state that "Simpkin's Defalcations" was an item which had appeared in the accounts for many years. The defalcations were only wiped out last year. With respect to "Solar Physics," he thought that explained itself.

MR. HEALY said, he saw in the Vote the item of £150 for house rent, and he would suggest that if it was to be a permanent item it should be transferred to the Buildings Vote.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he thought the noble Lord was right in saying the solar physics spoke for itself. It was evident he had not much to say in support of it, and all the best authorities in the country thought that this item ought not to appear in the Estimates. The ex-Astronomer Royal, writing on this subject, said—

"I think that the granting of public money for scientific research ought not to be sanctioned, unless in one of the following cases:— Either where it appears probable that results useful to the public will be obtained, or where it appears that scientific investigations, interesting to the educated classes, and commensurate with the probable cost, are beyond the reach of private persons or societies, but may be undertaken with advantage at the public expense. My objection to the establishment of the Committee on Solar Physics is intended to apply only so far as it is a paid Committee; I do not object to the purpose for which the Committee was appointed, or to the payment of a secretary, or to expenses incidental to an office. The Committee, I believe, have faithfully discharged their understood duties, and I shall willingly co-operate with them to the best of my power."

What was this item? £500 was paid to one or two men who thought they were promoting scientific research, while they were simply amusing themselves by looking through telescopes and spectroscopes from one year's end to another. He was not at all singular in his opinion upon this. In April there was a special meeting of the Royal Astronomical Society with regard to this item, and the following resolutions were passed:—

"(1.) That, in the opinion of this Society, the granting of public money for scientific research, in cases where it does not appear that results useful to the public will be obtained, or where the researches proposed are likely to be undertaken by private individuals or public bodies, does not tend to the real advancement of science. (2.) That this meeting considers it inexpedient that a Physical Observatory should be founded at the national expense. (3.) That this meeting is of opinion that the Government grant to the Committee on Solar Physics at South Kensington should be discontinued. (4.) That, in the opinion of this meeting, full accounts should be published of all money expended by the Government for scientific purposes, and that in all cases the nature of the work to be undertaken should be defined as clearly as possible."

His expression as to looking through telescopes was not his own; it was the expression of Sir Edmund Beckett, who said—

"You may employ anybody if you like to amuse himself with looking through a telescope and a spectroscope, and there may be no definite work expected;"

and—

"On the other hand, if a man is to be paid for only amusing himself, in order that he may every now and then publish a book on some solar theory, or something of that kind, there is no sort of security that he will be employed usefully."

And again—

"There was the great object that was to be obtained by what has been called in later times by the amusing name of the science of sun-spottery. I do not know that that science so-called has done much for mankind."

These were the views of the Astronomical Society, and he thought that Society might be supposed to have as good a knowledge of the subject as Members of this House. Mr. Ranyard, one of the members of the Society—

“Considered that those who asked for endowment ought to be able to show the usefulness of the researches upon which they were engaged—for instance, that the study of solar physics was useful to prevent periodical famines in India, and so on.”

Mr. Bidden, who was certainly an authority, said—

“Having listened to the letter of the Astronomer Royal, he thought it was directed to discouraging the grant of money to gentlemen of a scientific turn who had no particular definite object in view, but who desired to promote in a particular manner the science in which they were interested, without any evidence of its being for the benefit of mankind in general. No doubt, many would be very glad to spend more of their time in scientific experiment, and to dignify it with the name of scientific research; but there should be an adequate motive of public utility for making an application for a grant of public money.”

He thought that was very reasonable, and he should be glad if the Government could state what Public Service had been forwarded by voting this item for Solar Physics year after year. He had no hesitation in saying that he regarded it as a waste of money, given to keep a particular individual in a very pleasant semi-occupation—in something like what Addison called “physi-idleness.” It was not worth while to pay £500 to gentlemen for physi-idleness.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. STORY-MASKELYNE thought the observations of the hon. Member ought not to pass without comment by one who knew Mr. Norman Lockyer. He did not like to hear an hon. Member, who knew nothing about this matter, speaking of the labours of scientific men in a most insolent manner—

MR. HEALY rose to Order, and asked whether the term “insolent manner” was a proper term to use?

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not know whether it is un-Parliamentary, but it is not becoming.

MR. STORY-MASKELYNE would withdraw the words, and substitute “most unbecoming manner.” He was sure that if the hon. Member knew anything at all about the branch of science to which Mr. Lockyer had contributed important discoveries, one of which had been crowned by the medal of the French Academy—a body that was certainly a good judge—he would see that something had been done by the gentleman of whom he spoke in such a flippant manner. He did not think any £500 could be voted for a better purpose than that of promoting such research.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he certainly would not withdraw his Amendment. He knew it was Mr. Lockyer who was concerned; but he had not gone upon his own opinion, but on those of the ex-Astronomer Royal and other members of the Society.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, this Vote was made on the special recommendation of a special Committee of distinguished gentlemen.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, he had been talking to the ex-Astronomer Royal a few days ago, and thought he expressed an opinion rather the opposite of those given in the passages quoted by the hon. Member.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR repeated that what he had read had been the proceedings of the Royal Astronomical Society in April last. Mr. Christie, the new Astronomer Royal, read the letter of the ex-Astronomer Royal in the sense in which he signed the first of the third resolutions.

MR. HEALY said, he differed somewhat from his hon. Friend the course he had taken; but he thought the hon. Member was as much entitled to be heard on the subject as the hon. Member for Cricklade (Mr. Story-Maskelyne). His hon. Friend had known Mr. Lockyer for 15 years as a friend; and he was, therefore, perhaps, competent to know what that gentleman's capabilities were. He himself would not oppose any Vote for scientific research; for he did not think this country spent enough in that direction. He believed every one of Mr. Lockyer's theories had been confuted; but they could not expect to get truth without discussion, and he would respectfully ask his hon. Friend to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he would also appeal to the hon. Member to withdraw. What this country had done in science was highly valued in India.

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he was perfectly convinced that this was money thrown away; but as he did not think he should have anyone to "tell" with him he would withdraw.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(3.) £69,939, to complete the sum for British Museum.

Mr. SPENCER WALPOLE: You are about to move, Sir, the Vote for the British Museum, and there are two points upon which I wish to speak. The first is on the apparent increase in the Estimate. That is not an increase proper, but is an increase entirely, or almost entirely, on account of the removal of collections to the South Kensington Museum, and for the necessary increase of the staff. At the same time, I expect this increase will go on for a few years until the whole of the collections are removed. The other point arises out of an observation which I understand was made earlier in the discussion upon the grants to private local institutions. The right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council will probably be pleased to hear what I am going to say. Two or three years ago power was given to the Museum to give duplicates to these local institutions. I understand that something has been said this evening to the effect that the Trustees of the Museum neither give duplicates nor lend any part of their collections to these institutions; but the Trustees are forbidden by Parliament from lending their collections, and are bound to preserve all collections in the Museum to all posterity. With regard to duplicates, when we transferred the Natural History Collections, we took care to see what duplicates could be given, and several have been sent to six or seven of the largest institutions in the country. The question of loans is one involving much greater considerations than can be discussed on a mere Vote. Those loans can only be made by Act of Parliament, and then you will have to consider whether you will entirely alter the British Museum as contrasted with the South Kensington Museum, the one being a repository where everything is to be found for the purposes of study; the other being a place more or less for the granting of loans. I venture to suggest this for the consideration of the Committee.

Mr. THOROLD ROGERS said, he fully recognized the force of the remarks which had been made by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole); but it was only fair to say that the position taken up by the Trustees of the British Museum in regard to the lending of books and manuscripts was regarded by most foreigners as singularly churlish. They could get the loan of MSS. from Florence, Vienna, Berlin, and other places; and the University of Oxford, with which he was connected, was also willing to lend any rare books or MSS. it possessed. A rigid rule against lending prevailed, however, in the British Museum, and it was an exceedingly churlish rule. He hoped that the Trustees would be induced to make some arrangement by which important MSS. and documents might be lent to other Museums, where they would be copied and kept in perfect safety. He only made these remarks in consequence of what the right hon. Gentleman had said, and also in connection with the fact that a large amount of the treasures of the British Museum was rendered practically useless to the great mass of scholars throughout the world in consequence of the great expense attending a journey to London, that being the only place where there was a possibility of seeing them.

Mr. MAGNIAC said, he wished to make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole), as one of the Trustees of the British Museum, to induce the Museum occasionally to part with some of its MSS., and also to extend the hours during which the building was allowed to remain open. He thought the adoption of such a policy would be of material advantage to the country, and conduce to promote the interests of the Museum itself. If the Trustees were of opinion that at present they had no power to do this, a short Act of Parliament might be brought in giving them the power, and he believed it would be hailed with great satisfaction. The library of the Museum was at present rich in the possession of MSS., and only wanted one other collection to be quite perfect. He believed that a good collection of Spanish MSS. was the only absentee, and he trusted that steps would be taken to remedy the deficiency.

MR. STORY-MASKELYNE desired to say a word in regard to the transfer of the collections from the British Museum to South Kensington. The transfer commenced more than a year ago; and at the time when the last year's Vote was taken the collection of minerals with which he had been connected for a period of 32 years had been already removed to the South Kensington Museum without the slightest accident, and had been arranged in accordance with plans previously made for its exhibition and safe-keeping. He was sorry to think, however, that this was the only collection which had yet been completely transferred. He believed that the Geological Collection had been transferred, but that it had not yet been completely arranged. The Botanical Collection was nearly transferred; but in biology not a single specimen had as yet been removed. He thought it was a great pity, seeing that an important and costly Museum had been built at South Kensington for the reception of these collections, that so long a time should elapse before it was in a position to fulfil the purpose to which it had been dedicated. At present the space to be vacated at the British Museum was still incapable of being devoted to the collections remaining at that locality. It was very much to be regretted, and he wished to know whether any steps towards completing the transfer were about to be taken? He believed that the keeper of the Department had an idea that he must move all at once or not at all. It seemed to him (Mr. Story-Maskelyne), however, that it would very much help the transfer to move part, and that a good deal might be done in arranging such a part in the course of the next few months. He understood that most of the cases were now very nearly ready for the reception of the specimens; and he hoped to have some assurance from the right hon. Gentleman that the transfer was to be soon begun and be rapidly and properly carried on. He believed that there would be plenty of room in the Museum for General Pitt Rivers' Collection, if it was a collection of a kind desirable to be incorporated with those now at the British Museum—a point on which there seemed to be much question.

Mr. Magniac

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, the difficulty in completing the removal of the Natural History Collection arose from the fact that it had been found impossible to induce the late Government to give the money that was required for providing the necessary cases; and it was impossible to remove the various specimens of birds and animals until cases were fitted up for their reception. He thought that hon. Members would hardly wish that some of the specimens should be removed before the whole of them could be transferred. If they were removed bit by bit they were likely to sustain injury. As to the desirability of allowing the precious MSS. possessed by the British Museum to go abroad, although a good deal might be said in favour of it, still there were various considerations of great weight which had hitherto induced those who had looked into the matter to believe that it was better to keep them in England. At any rate, the Trustees could not fairly be blamed for not doing so, because at present they had no power. To lend the MSS. as suggested would be contrary to the law.

Vote agreed to.

MR. BIGGAR thought the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council would not object now to report Progress. There were several other Orders upon the Paper which it would be necessary to dispose of, and the hour was late—nearly 3 o'clock. He did not mean to argue that the next two or three Votes were likely to give rise to much discussion; but they would occupy no larger amount of time on the next Supply night than they would then. He would therefore, suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the propriety of reporting Progress.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he did not propose to take any of the succeeding Votes, except the Vote for Education in Scotland. He would take that Vote, which he believed would not require discussion, and he would then move to report Progress.

(4.) £228,435, to complete the sum for Public Education, Scotland.

MR. J. A. CAMPBELL wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council how Scotland would be affected by the new arrangements in regard to the Education Code? Nothing had been said in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman before the House went into Committee as to Scotland; and he was afraid that it was not intended to extend the advantages of the New Code to Scotland. He trusted that no length of time would be allowed to elapse before Scotland received a scheme somewhat similar to that which was now offered to England. He wished, further, to ask the right hon. Gentleman why it was that the Education Department had not yet put in force two of the provisions of the Education (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1878, relating to the examination of higher class schools—which were part of the Scotch educational system. One of these provisions related to the examination of higher class schools which were not under school boards—private schools—and gave power to the Department to appoint Examiners to such schools, provided that the managers of the schools offered suitable payment for the examination? There would thus be no expense to the Department in carrying out this provision of the Act. The second provision related to the examination of higher class schools under school boards. In that case, there would be some additional expense to the Education Department; but it would be very little compared with the great advantage which the cause of education would derive from having an examination of the higher class schools conducted by officers of the Education Department, and having all the schools examined on one uniform system. If this were done, it would give the school boards a much higher sense of the importance of the schools of this kind under their charge. He would, therefore, ask if the Education Department contemplated putting in operation these two provisions of the Education (Scotland) Amendment Act of 1878?

MR. MUNDELLA said, the scheme contained in the New Code was intended to apply to England and Wales only; but if the Scotch people approved of it there would be no difficulty in extending it to Scotland. The necessity, however, for a New Code was not so urgent in Scotland as in England, because many of the provisions contained in the new arrangement were already adopted in Scotland. The Scotch Code was very much more liberal than the English Code; but if the New Code was found to work satisfactorily, he should be perfectly ready to make the two systems thoroughly uniform. As to the other question of the hon. Member in regard to the provisions of the Education (Scotland) Amendment Act of 1878, the hon. Gentleman would probably be aware that some doubts had been expressed as to the provisions in regard to the examination of higher class schools and the power of inspection possessed by the Department under the Act. He should be happy to take the question into consideration.

Vote agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.
Committee to sit again To-morrow.

REGULATION OF THE FORCES BILL.

[BILL 195.] CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

MR. CHILDERS: On Thursday I appealed to the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) to take off his objection to this Bill. He said he would consult the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) on the subject. The blocking Notice, however, has not been removed. I would repeat my appeal. It is necessary that the Bill should pass, because unless it is accepted the soldier is likely to suffer very materially.

MR. BIGGAR said, that he must have forgotten on Friday to speak to his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork, and on Saturday he (Mr. Biggar) was not in the House. To-day his hon. Friend was not present; but he hoped to-morrow to be able to ask him about it. He should be prepared to take off the Notice; but he had given a positive promise to the hon. Member for the City of Cork that he would not remove it until he (Mr. Parnell) had had an opportunity of moving an Amendment.

MR. CHILDERS remarked, that on Friday he saw both hon. Members in the House, and was somewhat surprised that the Notice had not been removed. He trusted, however, that the hon. Member for Cavan would take an opportunity of conferring with his hon. Friend.

Consideration, as amended, deferred till To-morrow.

PATRIOTIC FUND BILL.—[Lords.](Mr. Secretary Childers.)

[BILL 240.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CHILDERS, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, the object of the Bill was to enable the Patriotic Fund Commissioners to give up one of their schools for which they had not sufficient money, and to give the Government more control over the expenditure of the fund. He did not think any question would arise as to the Bill; but in Committee he would give all necessary information.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Childers.)

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would inform the House whether, out of the funds they were about to save, they intended to endow any institution for Catholic orphans?

MR. CHILDERS said, the school which had been kept on by the Patriotic Fund Commissioners was a boys' school at Wandsworth.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

NATIONAL DEBT BILL.—[BILL 236.]

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lord Frederick Cavendish.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that he should like to know the nature of the Bill, as some hon. Members, particularly an hon. Member who generally sat at the end of that Bench, were very much interested in it?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH in reply, said, that the Bill was merely a formal measure to carry out a promise made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he would not raise any opposition to the progress of the Bill.

Bill considered in Committee, and reported; to be printed, as amended [Bill 243]; re-committed for Thursday.

SUPPLY.—REPORT.

Resolutions [6th August] reported.

Resolutions 1 to 18 agreed to.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, that he should like to ask the noble Lord (Lord Frederick Cavendish) to postpone it. He made this appeal because he intended to bring forward a Motion which, unfortunately, he had not yet put on the Paper. He did not, however, think he should be out of Order in reading it to the House, and the House would then see why he made the appeal. The terms of the Motion were as follows:—

"That in view of the increasing importation of foreign and Colonial food-stuffs, and the consequent decrease in the value of agricultural property in Great Britain and Ireland, it is expedient to appoint a Committee of Experts to inquire into and report upon the probable effects of foreign competition on British agriculture, and the rentals of English and Irish land."

He was in this position. This was a Motion on going into Committee of Supply; and, looking at the state of Public Business at present, it did not seem likely that he should ever have an opportunity to move this Motion. If he did move it, he would undertake not to occupy the House more than a couple of hours in its discussion. As far as he, personally, was concerned, he should not occupy more than half-an-hour in the statement he should have to make; and, no doubt, it would be very easy for the Government to answer him. If he had not an opportunity of moving the Resolution he believed he could raise the question on this Vote, for in this Vote the Agricultural Commissioners were included. The noble Lord would not lose anything by giving him the opportunity he sought, because he (Lord Frederick Cavendish) was sure of getting the money he required.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he saw no possibility of being able at any other time to bring on the Report of Supply earlier than that. Therefore, it would be useless to postpone the Vote. If the hon. Member wished to bring forward his Motion and make a speech, why did he not do so at once?

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, it would take a week to prepare the speech.

RIVERS CONSERVANCY AND FLOODS PREVENTION BILL.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF SANDWICH asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether the Rivers Conservancy and Floods Prevention Bill would be brought forward in this House again next Session? He was very sorry to see that, after it had passed through their Lordships' House, and been read a second time in the other House, it had been withdrawn.

EARL SPENCER, in reply, said, that this Bill had been given up with extreme regret and under the greatest pressure. He could assure his noble Friend that the Government would consider the matter, and, if possible, re-introduce the Bill early next Session.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS REGULATION BILL.—(No. 201.)

(The Earl Beauchamp.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

EARL BEAUCHAMP, in moving that the Bill be read a second time, said: My Lords, I shall endeavour, as far as possible, to abstain from entering into the merits of what is known as the Ritualistic Question; but I think, that in order to make my Bill clear, it is necessary that I should explain to your Lordships, in as few words as I can, the circumstances attending the passing of Thorogood's Act, in the year 1840, when a Bill was brought into Parliament by Lord John Russell and Lord Morpeth which dealt with the case of Mr. Thorogood. He was then a prisoner in Chelmsford Gaol for not appearing to a citation in an Ecclesiastical Court to show cause why he refused to pay sums of money assessed upon him for church rate. Your Lordships will observe that Mr. Thorogood was not in prison for refusing to pay church rate. I do not complain of it; but he had adopted a course which put that out of the question, and he was in prison solely for refusing to appear to a citation in an Ecclesiastical Court, as is the case with Mr. Green. He had been in prison for a period of 18 months, after a good deal of litigation; and on the 30th July, 1840, Lord John Russell and Lord Morpeth brought in the Bill which afterwards passed into law. Mr. Thorogood was a Quaker, who had conscientious objections to the payment of church rates, and his imprisonment under the circumstances I have mentioned had given rise to a good deal of scandal and of hostile feeling amongst various parties. It therefore appeared to the Government of the day undesirable that he should any longer languish in prison, and the Act was passed which is known by the name of Thorogood's Act, although I need not say the name does not appear within the four corners of the Act. It empowered the Privy Council, or the Ecclesiastical Judge in whose Court the case was tried, to order the discharge of persons in custody under a writ de contumace capiendo; but there was a proviso that no such order should be made by the Privy Council or the Ecclesiastical Judge without the consent of the other party or parties to the suit, and another proviso—

“That in cases of subtraction of church rates for an amount not exceeding £5, where the party in contempt has suffered imprisonment for six months and upwards, the consent of the other parties to the suit shall not be necessary to enable the Judge to discharge such party so soon as the costs lawfully incurred by reason of the custody and contempt of such party shall have been discharged, and the sum for which he may have been cited into the Ecclesiastical Court shall have been paid into the registry of the said Court, there to abide the result of the suit, and the party so discharged shall be released from all further observance of justice in the said suit.”

The Bill was very carefully considered both in the House of Lords and the House of Commons, and underwent various amendments. The House of Commons proposed that the limit of imprisonment should be 12 months; but the House of Lords diminished the term of imprisonment from 12 months to six. Lord John Russell, in the debate on the Bill, said that he believed things were in such a state that if they were to get Mr. Thorogood discharged from prison a Bill must be introduced for the purpose, and in pursuance of that belief the Bill was introduced. A debate occurred, in which many eminent men took part, and the Bill was the result of careful consideration, and was accepted as a compromise in a matter which had given rise to considerable feeling. In the case of Mr. Thorogood, he objecting from conscientious reasons to the payment of the money, it was found by other parties, and Dr. Lushington, of his own motion, released Mr. Thorogood from prison. The Act is by no means obsolete, for in the course of the last few years it was used in the case of Mr. Tooth, apprehended under a writ de contumace capiendo, but discharged from custody by the Judge of the Ecclesiastical Court, with the consent of the parties to the suit. At the present moment, unless the consent of the other parties to the suit is given, the person in prison cannot be discharged. Now, my Lords, a case has arisen to which I must refer—namely, the case of the Rev. Sidney Green, now in prison under a similar writ ever since the 19th March last. In the year 1840, as I have said, Parliament gave relief by passing a measure which had the effect of releasing from prison a Quaker who entertained conscientious objections to submitting to the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts. I now ask your Lordships to read a Bill a second time which will meet the case of the Rev. Sidney Green, in prison for the like cause, and enable him to be released from prison at the expiration of six months. There are various ways of looking at the case of Mr. Green. It may be looked at technically as regards the contempt, and it might be looked at it in its moral aspects as bearing on the whole Ritual Question, and more particularly as regards the wearing of vestments during the performance of Divine Service. As regards the moral aspect, as bearing on the whole Ritual Question, I wish to dismiss it as briefly as possible; but I may very fairly ask your Lordships why this particular congregation, consisting, as it does, of poor persons, should be singled out for attack by the Church Association? Mr. Green is a person who has been labouring for many years of his life amongst the poor and neglected; he has brought his parish into a very high state of organization; his schools are excellent, and he enjoys the esteem and regard of the whole parish. There are certain persons whom he may have offended; but I ask your Lordships why this congregation should be selected for disturbance, and why Mr. Green, whose character is, in the highest degree, all that a clergyman's should be, should be subjected to this harassing conduct on the part of the prosecutors, the Church Association, while rich congregations are left completely undisturbed, and persons who have powerful friends are allowed to pursue, without check or hindrance, precisely the same practices as Mr. Green has been pursuing? I may go a step further, and say that the Bishop of Manchester himself, who allowed the case against Mr. Green to go, does not profess to observe the law for the non-observance of which Mr. Green is now in prison. The Bishop of Manchester, he being asked how to reconcile this with his own conscience, said that when he was invited by his archiepiscopal superior to wear the legal vestments—which he did not then wear—it would be time enough for him to consider what course he should pursue. I do not think, under these circumstances, any good case has been made out why Mr. Green should be selected for prosecution, when the Bishop of Manchester himself, his ecclesiastical superior, does not comply with the law under which Mr. Green is now languishing in prison. There are legal questions connected with the case with which I need not trouble your Lordships; but there is one very serious question which I will shortly advert to. The whole contention turns upon whether certain advertisements, published in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, are, or are not, in force in the Province of York. The Privy Council has held that they are in force in the Province of Canterbury, although there is some doubt about how far they are in force there; but I believe I am quite right in saying that there is not the faintest shadow of reason for supposing that the advertisements in question ever ran in the Province of York. I only mention this to your Lordships to show that the matter is one of considerable doubt and complexity. As regards the moral aspect of the case, therefore, Mr. Green may contend that the matter for which he is in prison is one of considerable doubt; but I pass this question by. Mr. Green is in prison, technically, for a contempt of Court, and for nothing else, as was also Mr. Thorogood; and I wish to draw your Lordships' consideration to reasons why the law under which he is now in prison should be amended so as to enable him to be released at the end of six months. He is in prison for contempt of Court, and I am forced to ask your Lordships whether the Court which he has contemned is one which receives such universal respect as that a man is to be thrown in prison because of his not obeying its commands? My Lords, it is enough for me to say that so much difficulty exists in the minds of men on the subject of this Court that in the early part of this Session your Lordships were moved to vote an Address to the Crown, praying for a Royal Commission to inquire into these Ecclesiastical Courts. That Address was moved by the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, who, I presume, had sufficient grounds for making that Motion. Certainly it was agreed to by your Lordships; and I think, under those circumstances, it may fairly be contended that the Court Mr. Green has contemned is not entitled to that unquestioning obedience which would entitle its every order to be received with undoubting submission. I may at least say that the Court itself has given so much dissatisfaction that it may be said to be on its trial. A noble Earl opposite shakes his head; but I say if there was no dissatisfaction why was the Inquiry moved for? Persons may shut their eyes to the facts of the case, but nobody can deny that the Court has given great dissatisfaction, and that the subject requires the investigation which it is now receiving at the hands of the Royal Commission. My Lords, it is said that Mr. Green has only to submit himself to the judgment of the Court to obtain his release. I know that that is the case; but I will tell your Lordships why he cannot submit himself to the Court. He conscientiously believes that it would be wrong for him to do so. But even assuming that that belief of Mr. Green is ill-founded, I ask, has not the punishment which he has suffered been sufficient for the wrong which he has committed? That is the question which we have to ask ourselves. Supposing the Court was perfect in its constitution; supposing that all its dicta had been such as to command the unquestioning assent of the minds of men, I still ask whether the imprisonment which Mr. Green has now suffered is not a sufficient punishment for his wrong-doing? Punishment should bear some proportion to the offence committed, and if Mr. Green should remain in prison for three years, or all his life, a punishment would be inflicted revolting to the consciences of men. It is the indefiniteness of the punishment which makes it so severe and cruel. If we could measure it we might estimate its proportion to the offence, but we cannot. We do not know how long this imprisonment may continue, and I do ask your Lordships seriously to consider whether a punishment of six months is not an imprisonment amply sufficient for the offence which Mr. Green has committed. If he had been subjected to the sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court for any of the gravest offences which a man could commit; if he had been proceeded against and excommunicated for incest, he could not be imprisoned for a longer period than six months, because the writ de excommunicato capiendo which runs in consequence of such proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court can imprison a man for no longer a period than six months—and, therefore, if Mr. Green had committed the most aggravated offence to which I have referred, his imprisonment could not be for a longer period than six months. I need not cite the case of the Ecclesiastical Courts, but I will take the case of offences outside the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts. It is within my own knowledge that in a deliberative Assembly of high antiquity, and possessed of august privileges, when the privileges of that Assembly were set at naught and its authority contemned, a person bound to obey its orders was imprisoned; but how long was that person imprisoned? One night's imprisonment was held to have purged his offence, and he was released without any promise exacted with regard to the future. My Lords, if an officer in a railway train criminally assaults a woman who may be in the same carriage with him, he is committed to prison for one year, and at the end of that period he is released. I ask your Lordships whether an indefinite imprisonment hanging over the head of an exemplary clergyman, because he conscientiously objects to the jurisdiction of a Court, is not a punishment revolting to the consciences of men? Such a state of things would never have been deliberately adopted, but must have been brought about in consequence of some complication of ecclesiastical law, which complication I now ask your Lordships to disentangle. But, my Lords, it may be said—and this is an argument which I dare say we shall hear advanced by those who, I think, might show more sympathy with Mr. Green—that he should not be released without a guarantee for the future against further lawlessness. It must be remembered that Mr. Green is not in prison for the offence of wearing vestments—he is in prison for contempt of Court; and I do not myself understand how the arguments with regard to the practice complained of can be urged when he is in prison, not for the performance of those practices, but simply for having contemned the jurisdiction of the Court. It is obvious that if inability to accept an interpretation of an historical fact as to the use of vestments is lawlessness, it is lawlessness of a very different character to that which to the minds and consciences of men commends itself as a fit subject for such punishment. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has given divers judgments on this point as to the wearing of vestments. The Judicial Committee, in the case of "Westerton v. Liddell," decided that the vestments worn by Mr. Green were legal. In the case of "Clifton v. Ridsdale," which is now thought to be law, what did the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council say? If the only law as to the vestments is to be found in the Ornaments Rubric, clearly the vestments of Edward VI. fall within the law. That is the judgment of the Privy Council in the very case under which Mr. Green is imprisoned. I think your Lordships might view with indulgence the conduct of a gentleman who, conscientiously believing that that which he saw was black and not white, declined to commit himself to the statement contrary to his plain belief. As regards the view taken by some that Mr. Green should promise to conform in future to the decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, I say that is not the point before your Lordships. The point before your Lordships is a very narrow one—namely, whether the punishment which Mr. Green has suffered, and is suffering, is not sufficient for the technical offence of contempt of Court which he has committed? I cannot understand, if he be a criminal, why he should be treated in an exceptional manner. Thieves, burglars, and convicts of all descriptions, when they have undergone their punishment, are released from prison without any engagement being asked for the future. They are set free, and if they offend against the law again, they are subject to the penalties of the law and again imprisoned. What did Lord John Russell say in the debate on Thorogood's Act as regards this part of the subject? He said that the vindication of the law seemed to him to be often better maintained by taking no notice of such offenders, just as Sir Robert Walpole had said on one occasion—"The hon. Gentleman wishes to be committed to the Tower, but I shall do no such thing." I contend that Mr. Green has suffered enough for the offence he has committed. Mr. Green's parishioners were naturally asking why they were deprived of his ministrations, thinking that a man who had undergone sufficient imprisonment ought to be released. I dare say we shall hear something of our old friend the aggrieved parishioner, and we shall, no doubt, be told that the parishioners of Miles Platting have a right to the performance of Divine Service in accordance with the law. I am bound to say, with regard to that, that I do not think very much consideration is due to the bogus parishioners who were put forward to enforce the law at Miles Platting. I call them bogus parishioners for this simple reason, that in the bill of costs which Mr. Green is called upon to pay there is an item of no little singularity, which I do not think will commend itself to many of your Lordships' sense of justice. There is a charge made by the solicitors for the prosecution—and Mr. Green having been condemned in costs is bound to pay it—for the correction of a mistake, it having been ascertained that one of the proposed complainants had not completed the residence in the parish required by law. Seeing that the solicitors for the prosecutors are sending in this bill to Mr. Green, and asking him to pay for a mistake which had been made in consequence of one of the complainants not having resided in the parish during the time required by law, I think I am justified in saying that the parishioners who have brought this case forward are only nominal prosecutors. The real prosecutors being, as I believe, the Church Association—which I say without fear of contradiction—and the nominal prosecutors being merely bogus parishioners, I do not think they are entitled to much consideration at your Lordships' hands. These are the very parishioners who were summoned to attend the Bishop of Manchester, and declined the invitation; but, notwithstanding, the Bishop of Manchester thought it his duty to exercise his discretion, and allow the prosecution to proceed. The Services which are being carried on in Miles Platting church are neither more nor less than exactly the same as they were before Mr. Green was imprisoned. There is no doubt whatever that the gentleman officiating holds the same views as Mr. Green, and that the practices complained of will be continued until a prosecution is instituted, although after what has taken place it is very improbable that another prosecution will be instituted in that parish. I venture to doubt whether the Bishop of Manchester would allow another prosecution to be instituted, which has been so discredibly conducted. The proceedings have been stigmatized by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack as a scandal. I shall not apologize for the use of that expression. They have been stigmatized as a scandal, and I am justified in making the observations I have made with regard to the prosecutors in this case. But, my Lords, the Public Worship Regulation Act was enacted, we were told, to protect the rights of parishioners. Let us consider for one moment the state of the parish in which Mr. Green has so long ministered, and the view taken of his conduct by his own parishioners. The population of the parish is about 4,500; there are 370 children in the day schools; the communicants, excluding those on week days and saints' days, on an average of the 12 months, are 45 a-week. A Petition has been presented for the release of Mr. Green, signed by 940 householders out of a total number of 1,140, and I think, therefore, I may fairly assume that the ministrations of Mr. Green are such as to commend themselves to the majority of the parishioners. As far, therefore, as the aggrieved parishioner is concerned, the case has entirely failed. There is not a shadow of pretence for saying that any real parishioner has been aggrieved, for, in order to make up the number required for this miserable prosecution, a gentleman is brought in who, at the time of the institution of the proceedings, had not completed the term of residence required by law. What is the treatment to which Mr. Green, a conscientious clergyman, who has spent 15 years in labouring amongst the poor and neglected of his parish—what is the shameful treatment to which he has been subjected? A letter was addressed by Mr. Green to the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, in which he described the treatment to which he had been subjected by the bailiffs who were put in possession of his rectory by the Church Association. This letter was written some time ago; but the treatment he complains of has been renewed subsequently, and his goods sold. He says that the bailiffs were put into his house on the 24th January, and continued there without intermission, day and night, until March 19, when he was put into prison. He says it was impossible for his wife to remain under such circumstances, and she left home at the time he was obliged to do so, and took refuge in a neighbouring cottage. On one occasion, Mrs. Green, having visited the house to get some clothes for her baby, was so frightened by an intoxicated bailiff that she had never been well since. That is the statement of the treatment to which Mr. Green has been subjected. I hear a noble Lord remark that I have been already speaking for half-an-hour; but I can only say that half-an-hour is not too much time for your Lordships to give to such a subject, and I must protest against these interruptions. If it is necessary, I will go on speaking for another half-an-hour on the discreditable way in which Mr. Green has been treated. I decline to sit down. The real question is this—Is the House, or is it not, prepared to extend that measure of relief to Mr. Green which, in the year 1840, it thought not improper to extend to one of the people called “Quakers?” I do not know what the antecedents of Mr. Thorogood were; I do not know whether he had passed his life amongst the poor and afflicted; I do not know whether, at the age of 40, or whatever it may be, he was torn away from his wife and family, and subjected to the treatment which Mr. Green has described; but I do know this, that Parliament at that time, in its wisdom, thought it was a fit case to be considered, and did not grudge the time and pains necessary to inquire into the case; and that at the end of the Session—for the Bill was brought into the House of Commons on the 30th July, and received the Royal Assent on the 10th August. My Lords, I do not know how the proceedings were conducted in Thorogood’s case, nor do I know whether the Judge acted as legal adviser to the prosecutors—though I should suppose Dr. Lushington to be incapable of such conduct—but blunders have been committed by the solicitor and counsel for the prosecutors in this case, for which Mr. Green has to pay. They are of a remarkable kind. The bill of costs, which is now a public document, shows that the most extraordinary proceedings have been taken in this case, which will not bear public investigation. I have referred to the case of Mr. Green as briefly as I could; but it is a case, although not on all fours with the case of Mr. Thorogood, because if it had been a case on all fours with the case of Mr. Thorogood, there would have been no necessity to trouble your Lordships on the present occasion—I do say that the imprisonment of Mr. Thorogood under the writ de contumace capiendo, was considered a grievous scandal and offence. Whether it was that the consciences of men in high places were touched, or the fears of friends of the Established Church were moved, I do not know; but a feeling of indignation was excited by his imprisonment, and a Bill was introduced and passed into law. Now I come to the Bill which I have laid on your Lordships’ Table. The provisions are very simple. The second proviso in Thorogood’s Act is repealed which had reference to the payment of church rates. In the 2nd clause, it is proposed to enact that after six months a person in custody under a writ de contumace capiendo shall be discharged out of custody by the sheriff, gaoler, or other officer in whose custody he may be, without any order. Clause 3 enacts—

“That such party or person shall, notwithstanding his discharge, remain liable for the costs lawfully incurred by reason of his custody and contempt.”

Clause 4 provides that the person—

“Shall not, by reason of his discharge in manner aforesaid, be released from further observance of justice in the suit in which he has been pronounced in contempt.”

Therefore, if he offends against the law in future, a remedy is provided, and he can again be subjected to the same ecclesiastical penalties as he has been subjected to in the past. Then Clause 5 provides—

“That it shall be lawful for the Judicial Committee of Her Majesty’s Most Honourable Privy Council, if the party be in custody in consequence of any proceedings before the said Judicial Committee, or for the Judge of the Ecclesiastical Court, or if the party be in custody in consequence of any proceedings before such Judge, to declare by order made in open Court before the said period of six months has elapsed, that, for reasons to be specified on the face of such order, the party so in custody shall not be entitled to the benefits of this Act for the further space of three months, and thereupon the party shall not be entitled to the benefits of this Act until the expiration of nine months."

There may be circumstances, my Lords, in which it may be desirable that a provision of that sort should be put into force. I do not attach much importance to it myself; but still there may be circumstances which may make it desirable, and, perhaps, that provision may make your Lordships more ready to pass the Bill. The 2nd clause, my Lords, is really the operative part of the Act. That provides that at the expiration of six months the person committed to gaol shall be discharged from custody. Now, my Lords, that is the point where this Bill differs from Thorogood's Act, and the difference is this—that it provides that the prisoner shall be discharged at the expiration of six months without the concurrence of the other parties to the suit. In the year 1813, an Act of Parliament was passed dealing with the writ de excommunicato capiendo in a similar manner to that in which the writ de contumace capiendo was dealt with by Thorogood's Act. That Act, passed in the year 1813, was introduced by Sir William Scott, and provided that no person who should be pronounced or declared excommunicate—

"Shall incur any civil penalty or incapacity whatever in consequence of such excommunication, save such imprisonment, not exceeding six months, as the Court pronouncing or declaring such person excommunicate shall direct."

I ask your Lordships to extend the provisions of Thorogood's Act in the manner indicated by the Act of 1813, and to say that the imprisonment under a writ de contumace capiendo shall not last for a longer period than the imprisonment under a writ de excommunicato capiendo. My Lords, at the commencement of Reigns it used to be the practice to pass Acts of Grace, which would exactly have met a case of this kind. I trust we are a long way from the commencement of another Reign—and I believe the practice has been discontinued—but I am quite sure, if the occasion should arise for it, no more fitting Act of Grace could inaugurate a Reign than the release of a person like Mr. Green, who is imprisoned under the circumstances I have described. In the present Session of Parliament attempts have been made to relieve persons who entertain conscientious objections to vaccination from the penalties which they may have incurred. I say in the same way that the law as it now stands in reference to cases such as that of Mr. Green requires a similar amendment, and I trust that your Lordships will pass this Bill as a messenger of peace. I am quite sure that unless something is done to relieve the grievous scandal of an exemplary clergyman, such as Mr. Green is, lying in prison for an indefinite period under an order of contempt of Court, his goods dispersed, his home broken up, a sense of dire injustice will rankle in the minds of men; and so far from the views of Mr. Green being in any way put down or repressed, the infallible result will be that they will gain greater currency among people who see one so deservedly beloved by those who know him preferring imprisonment and wrong rather than give up his conscientious objections to an invasion of the spiritual authority of the Church. I hope your Lordships will agree to the second reading of this Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Earl Beauchamp.)

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, I am most anxious—as anxious as the noble Earl can possibly be—that Mr. Green should be released from imprisonment. Indeed, as a step towards that result, unaware of the noble Earl's intention, I gave Notice of Questions, which will be in your Lordships' hands to-morrow, to be addressed to the Lord Chancellor on this subject. I would state that these Questions are based upon my deep conviction that this gentleman has suffered quite a sufficient penalty for the offence he has committed, and that it will be a very great misfortune if a conscientious man, as we have every reason to believe Mr. Green to be, should be imprisoned, I may almost say, for life, on account of his conscientious convictions. Of the Questions that I proposed to ask the Lord Chancellor, one was whether, considering all the circumstances of the case, he did not think Mr. Green's punishment excessive? I also wished to know what was the process which necessitated the sale of his goods by public auction? And further—and this is the gist of the whole matter—I wished to know whether there is any limit to the time for which a man may be imprisoned for contempt of the authority of the Court? I quite agree with the noble Earl that it is not desirable that any man should be incarcerated for an unreasonable length of time for such an offence as Mr. Green has committed. I wish to call your Lordships' attention to the distinction which I think ought to be drawn in all such cases, and which obviously was drawn in the case of Mr. Thorogood in 1840. When a man, however unwisely, is convinced in his conscience that he cannot do certain things, I wish your Lordships to consider whether it does not verge on persecution to insist that he shall come to a Court and declare that to be right which, unfortunately, in his conscience he thinks wrong? That was exactly the case with Mr. Thorogood in 1840. He owed, I believe, 5s. 6d. for church rates, and so strong were his conscientious convictions against the payment of these church rates or the acknowledgment of any authority which implied that he ought to pay them, that he was content to languish in prison for 16 months. The country was, of course, scandalized at a respectable man being imprisoned in these circumstances, and, as it could never have been the intention of the law that the man should remain in prison for life, therefore, by the universal consent of both Houses of Parliament, a measure was passed in order to allow Mr. Thorogood to come out of prison. Lord John Russell, in the discussion on that subject, having been told that the prosecutors were not willing to be consenting parties to the liberation of Mr. Thorogood, introduced a special clause saying that after a certain time the consent of the prosecutors was not to be required for the liberation of these gentlemen. That clause stands part of the Act, and I do not see why—for I entirely agree with the noble Earl on that point—what was good for a Quaker who conscientiously refused to pay church rates, should not be good in a case of this kind. Mr. Green has already received, at least, as severe a punishment as his offence deserves; but if nothing except his publicly declaring that he is willing to obey the law will effect his release, he may have to remain in prison for an indefinite time. In order to meet the case of Mr. Thorogood, Lord John Russell moved that after a certain time the man should be released without the consent of the prosecutors; and if the object of the present Bill is to apply a similar principle to the case of Mr. Green, it shall certainly have my cordial support. I am sorry the noble Earl should have deemed it necessary to go into other matters, and to make remarks which are hardly calculated to conciliate those who are willing to agree with the general tenour of what he said as to the liberation of Mr. Green. The Bishop of Manchester was, no doubt, actuated by the highest sense of duty, and performed that duty in a way which would be found, if examined, to be by no means unwise or harsh. I believe, also, that it is totally beside the question to inquire into the costs in this case, and I am sorry that the noble Lord thought it necessary to refer to them in his speech. The difficulty which remains, and which we shall have to consider very carefully when the Bill goes into Committee, is this—How a gentleman with these conscientious convictions is to be kept out of prison after he has once been released? How is he to be prevented from getting into prison again? With respect to Mr. Thorogood, the moment he was set at liberty there was an end to the case; but great difficulty would arise if Mr. Green were so unwise as to set at naught the decisions of the Court so soon as he is released from the imprisonment which now prevents him from violating them. There is a further point to which I wish to direct attention. A moral obligation which did not exist before is now imposed on this gentleman to obey the law. He has himself appealed from the Court below to your Lordships' House in its judicial capacity; and in its judicial capacity this highest Court of Appeal has pronounced that the law is against him. Now, I do not see how a man can, with any degree of fairness or propriety, disregard the decision of the Court to which he has himself appealed. Mr. Green would exhibit a spectacle that would be most unseemly, if he endeavoured by violence to return to those ministrations which have been declared to be contrary to law. So far as the gentleman himself and his influence in his parish are concerned, I have no opportunity of forming an opinion, except from the statements made in the public papers. I have no doubt, however, they have been truly described by the noble Earl, and I shall be glad if the noble Earl or the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack can advise any process by which, saving the majesty of the law, and the duty of the clergy to obey the law, Mr. Green may be liberated. I trust the noble Earl's Bill will be read a second time, it being understood, however, that nobody is pledged to its details, which may possibly require amendment in Committee.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I cannot help thinking that your Lordships generally will agree with the sentiments expressed by the most rev. Prelate towards the close of his speech—namely, that saving the majesty of the law and the duty of the clergy to obey the law, it would be desirable to devise the means of releasing this gentleman from prison; and I am sure it would be very agreeable to your Lordships to do so. Your Lordships will require to be satisfied on the first point, and will not regard that as a condition which can be set aside even if the consequence of insisting upon it should be to create a difficulty as to this particular case. Nothing is of more importance than to maintain the authority of the law. It is the equal obligation of all classes of Her Majesty's subjects to obey the law; and nothing can be more necessary than steadily to resist the idea that individuals are to make themselves judges of the law and to set themselves above it, whether they be clergy or laity who say that they will obey no decision and no interpretation of the law except such as commend themselves to their own minds. In an Established Church, at all events, it is fundamentally necessary that those who by the law enjoy temporal emoluments and temporal rights should abide by the law with respect to the conditions on which those rights are to be enjoyed. When principles so vital as these are at stake, no man is at liberty to be governed by his own party spirit or caprice. With regard to this particular case, after what has fallen from the noble Earl, my observations shall be as few as are consistent with putting your Lordships in possession of the facts of the case. I fully believe Mr. Green is a gentleman who deserves the praise which has been bestowed upon him for zeal and for much good work which he has done. It is a matter of extreme regret that such a man should do anything else which can tend to bring him into conflict with the law. It is a mistake, however, to represent his case as if it turned—though that would make no difference in principle—upon resistance to some decision of the Ecclesiastical Courts upon a single point like that of vestments. I hold in my hands a book which was lately before your Lordships' House in your judicial capacity upon that appeal to which the most rev. Prelate has referred, and I find there charged against him no fewer than 11 instances of disobedience to the law as declared by the judicial tribunals, some relating to ornaments of the Church alleged to have been set up in his church by this gentleman, contrary to what has been declared to be legal; some relating to various ceremonies introduced by him, particularly in the performance of the Service for the Holy Communion. These are 11 in number, some of which may, perhaps, be variations of charges substantially the same; but vestments are the subject of only one of them. Taken as a whole, together with the fact that Mr. Green did not think fit to appear in Court and defend himself against any of them, they appear plainly to show that this gentleman has persuaded himself that no obedience is due from him in these ceremonial matters to any decision of any of the Ecclesiastical Courts. I really do not like even for a moment to take notice of some exceedingly irrelevant and, I venture to think, injudicious observations of the noble Earl, in which he glanced at arguments which had been used as to the soundness of the reasons upon which the decisions of the Privy Council rested with regard to the particular point of vestments. If those decisions could be shown to be open to all the criticisms bestowed upon them by persons to whom the law has not committed the office of judgment, there would remain 10 other matters which are included in the charge in this case. That shows how unwise such a course of argument is. The noble Earl made another most extraordinary suggestion, and that was because the most rev. Prelate had moved for, and the Crown had granted, a Royal Commission with reference to the Ecclesiastical Courts, some slur was supposed to be cast upon those Courts and the Judges who preside over them pending the inquiry. We have had a Judicature Commission, on which many important charges in the temporal Judicature have been founded. But nobody ever thought of suggesting any such inference from the appointment of that Commission; during its inquiry it was not suggested that the Courts were not doing their duty, or that they could with propriety be disobeyed. It would have been better that on this occasion no argument of that kind should have been used. I wish now to refer to the actual state of the law, which, in my opinion, is not satisfactory. The Act of 1813 was passed for objects which were in some respects desirable—to get rid of excommunication merely to compel obedience to the orders of the Ecclesiastical Courts. That Act substituted imprisonment for excommunication as a means of enforcing the orders of a Court, and it did not provide for release, except on the condition of obedience. I am not at all sure that there may not have been inherent power in a Court, if its authority were vindicated, to release; but that would depend on the nature of the case. The reference made to the provisions of the Act as to excommunication as a positive ecclesiastical punishment is not in point, because the Act, while in that case limiting imprisonment strictly to a fixed time, leaves excommunication in full force with all its ecclesiastical consequences, and a clergyman who had been sentenced to it would be disabled for the performance of all ecclesiastical functions till the excommunication was removed by absolution. After that Act another was passed, under which were taken the proceedings to which the most rev. Prelate referred for the sale of the rev. gentleman's goods. Never was I called upon to discharge a duty which I did with less relish; but it had pleased Parliament in its wisdom to impose upon the Lord Chancellor the absolute duty, from which he could not escape, of issuing a writ of sequestration, and, if required, ordering the sale of goods for the payment of costs. It was as disagreeable to me as it could have been to the noble Lord to carry out such a law. Under the Thorogood Act, to which the noble Earl had referred, no right was given to an unconditional release; it was granted conditionally on payment of the whole amount claimed in the suit, and of the costs; justice was then satisfied, and there was no object in continued imprisonment, six months' imprisonment being fully sufficient for the mere purpose of punishment. There are clauses in the present Bill to which I object, and which were not sufficiently explained by the noble Earl. One of them proposes to give the Court an invidious discretion to extend the imprisonment from six months to nine. There is another provision in the Bill, that after the contumacious person is released he shall be liable to be again imprisoned if he shall repeat his offence, and this operation may be repeated toties quoties until he finally submits. I believe, my Lords, that this would call into existence a worse state of things than that which is now sought to be amended. It would, in my opinion, be far better to substitute for renewed imprisonment, in the case of a subsequent repetition of the same act of disobedience to the law, a provision similar to that contained in the Act of 1874, which makes immediate deprivation, or deprivation after a very short interval, the necessary consequence, when a further inhibition issues from the same Court, after a first inhibition has been relaxed. I see no way in which to avoid these scandalous imprisonments except a provision that on a repetition of the offence the party offending shall be absolutely deprived of his ecclesiastical preferments. If the noble Earl is willing to have the Bill so amended, I think we shall have accomplished a very good work.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: It is not necessary, my Lords, on this occasion to consider those questions which at present disturb the Church. Once here, the matter can only be one of law. Whatever our view of those speculative opinions may be, I think we are all agreed that if a clergyman has disobeyed the law and been declared contumacious, he is clearly and manifestly in the wrong. But as it is admitted that, under the present condition of the law, the offender when once in prison is liable, if he refuses to submit, to be permanently imprisoned, nobody, I think, can say that such a state of things is conformable to justice or to the ideas now universally entertained with respect to persons acting on conscientious convictions. I have no reason, therefore, to contest the observations which have fallen from the noble and learned Lord on the Wool-sack. I would urge upon your Lordships to allow the Bill to be read a second time, and that we should go into Committee without being pledged as to the precise remedy to be provided for an undoubted evil. I entirely sympathize with what the noble and learned Lord suggested, that in the case of the release of an offending clergyman security should be provided against a repetition of the offence; but whether the remedy suggested by the noble and learned Lord is on the whole the most desirable I would rather not say until the matter has been more fully discussed. I think we ought to read the Bill a second time and go into Committee agreed that the present state of things is one that ought not to be allowed to continue. At the same time, I do not, by affording a remedy to Mr. Green, wish to give any countenance to his proceedings or his disregard of the decisions of the Courts which have dealt with his case.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS (MONEY) BILL.—(No. 186.)

(The Lord Thurlow.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD THURLOW, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, the Bill was nothing more nor less than the Annual Budget of London outside the City for the coming year, and was equivalent to the Annual Money Bill which was brought in since the year 1875. The Bill of last year provided funds up to the 31st December next, and unless the present Bill should become law by that date, the Metropolitan Board would be absolutely without borrowing powers. The Bill conferred new powers up to the 31st of December, 1882. The objects of the Bill, which were sufficiently shown by the Schedule attached to it, related to certain supplementary provisions for 1881, and provided funds for the maintenance of the Fire Brigade, the building of certain stations, and the purchasing of some new sites. Money was also required to continue works on the Thames Embankment, and £100,000 for main drainage works. Then, with respect to the service of 1882, three Bills had already passed both Houses, requiring money for the purchase of lands and manorial rights on Hackney Commons, Brook Green, and Hammersmith; and for building new bridges at Battersea and Putney, which would cost £760,000. The other provisions of the Bill were similar to those which were contained in former Bills, and related to the ordinary expenditure of the Board for 1882 for large street improvements, authorized by Acts of 1872 and 1877, and included in former Money Bills—such as Coventry Street, Haymarket, the new street from Regent Street to Bloomsbury; and for smaller street improvements, such as widening streets by setting back houses where opportunities might occur; also for drainage and for the fencing of parks and commons, of which an area of 1,666 acres was now under the jurisdiction of the Board. Expenditure would also continue under the Thames River Prevention of Floods Act and the Artizans' Dwellings Act. The Bill not only provided for the Board's own requirements, but enabled it to lend money to the School Board, the Asylums Board, and other local bodies, to the extent of £1,100,000; this was in conformity with former precedent. Although the gross borrowing power of the Board was stated in the Bill at £4,548,335, it might be well to point out that the new net borrowing power conferred by the Bill was only £1,463,629. Then they came to Clause 14 of the Bill, with reference to which a Petition was now lying on the Table. This clause was introduced into the Bill on its passage through Committee in the other House of Parliament, and met with the hearty approval and support of Her Majesty's Government. It was very short and simple, and he would read it to the House—

"The Board may, as part of their general expenses, pay all costs, charges, and expenses which may be incurred by them up to December 31, 1882, incidental to any inquiry to be instituted with respect to markets for the sale of food supplies within the Metropolis, as defined by the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, and preliminary to, and incidental to the preparing, applying for, and obtaining an Act of Parliament with respect to such markets or any of such markets."

Now, he ventured to think, considering the importance of the question of the market accommodation of the Metropolis, as lately brought to light, especially in connection with the collapse of the Billingsgate Fish Market—about which he would presently quote a few words from a Report by Mr. Spencer Walpole, Her Majesty's Inspector of Fisheries—that it would have been very shortsighted—to use the mildest term—if the Metropolitan Board of Works in their Annual Budget Bill, had made no reference to the subject, and that the reference made to it in Clause 14 was of a very moderate and inoffensive character. Mr. Walpole, in his Report, said—

“Billingsgate owed its connection with the fish trade of London to its position on the river. The Thames was the highway, and practically the only highway, by which fish could be brought into the City.”

But he went on to say—

“These conditions have changed. The railways have superseded the river, and fish, instead of being sent up to London in smacks, is now carried up by fast trains, run specially for that purpose.”

Owing to the bad land approaches to Billingsgate vans were delayed for days on their journey from the railway stations to the market, and Mr. Walpole mentioned a case of one van that was crowded out and unable to reach the market and be unpacked for 11 days. It was hardly necessary to add that the fish it contained was then found to be unfit for food and condemned. Clause 14 of the Bill did not touch the legal question of the binding and perpetual character of the Charters of Edward III. and Charles II. These would have to be produced; and it was possible, if not probable, that their inapplicability to the ever-growing requirements of London might be transparent. They were granted at a time when the City of London was everything, and when the Outer Circle was not even dreamt of. Their Lordships knew that each succeeding Census showed the City of London to be steadily decreasing, not, indeed, in power, nor in dignity, nor in wealth, nor in prosperity, but in population, so much so, indeed, as by 54 per cent in 20 years; while London outside the City had actually increased during that period by a similar amount, or more than one-half. The Census taken the other day put the population of the City at 51,306, and of London without the City at 4,713,000. Her Majesty's Government were of opinion that these facts materially affected the question of the ultimate market authority for London; but what did Clause 14 really propose in the meantime? It did not set aside the ancient Charters conferring monopolies which were, no doubt, suited to the spirit and possibly to the wants of the 14th century, nor did it provide funds for the immediate acquisition of sites for new markets, for the preparation of plans, or for advertising for tenders. It only provided funds for the purpose of legal inquiry, and, if necessary, to defray the expenses incident on going to Parliament for further powers. Having regard to their duty towards the public, he did not think the Metropolitan Board of Works could have done less. He would now say a few words about a Notice given by the noble Earl opposite (Earl De La Warr) for referring this Bill to a Select Committee. There was no precedent for this course, either in this or in the other House of Parliament. Such a course, indeed, had never been proposed with reference to a Metropolitan Board of Works Money Bill until this year, when it was rejected in the other House of Parliament by an overwhelming majority. The Bill bristled with figures, representing many millions, much of which had not only been already spent, but actually already voted by Parliament. These figures represented the public works, the Fire Brigade, and drainage of the Metropolis—subjects which it was quite impracticable for their Lordships to deal with in a Select Committee. The course proposed by the noble Earl would be as inconvenient as it would be unprecedented. There could be no doubt that the proper course for their Lordships to take on the present occasion was the one pursued in previous years on Bills of this kind—that of referring them to a Committee of the Whole House.

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2^a.”
—(The Lord Thurlow.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly.

EARL DE LA WARR said, he rose to move that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee. He did not object to the whole of the Bill, but only to Clause 14. With that clause in it he failed to see how the measure could be described as a purely financial measure. By that clause it was proposed to give power to the Metropolitan Board of Works to inquire into the subject of provision markets in the Metropolis, and, if necessary, to apply to Parliament for an Act dealing with such markets. The Corporation of the City possessed market rights and privileges which dated back 500 years and more, and which had been confirmed by several Acts of Parliament, one of them being a recent Act. Their Lordships should bear in mind that upon the securing of those rights between £2,000,000 and £3,000,000 were invested in the City markets. This was a very grave and serious question. What had occurred in the other House of Parliament, he believed, was this. The Bill passed the second reading, probably, with little or no attention, and in Committee this clause was introduced unexpectedly, no Notice having been given to any of the parties concerned, who did not know of it sooner than the public generally. And yet this very clause most materially affected their rights. The Bill was passed in a House, he believed, of 59 Members—a Bill which concerned the ancient rights and privileges of the Corporation of the City of London, and involved very large interests. He asked their Lordships whether that was the way a question of this kind should be disposed of, and whether it was not very reasonable that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee, where the interests of all parties concerned might be considered? The Corporation were ready to do anything they could to promote the establishment of good markets, and they would support any well-founded scheme for that purpose. They did not ask that the clause should be rejected, they courted inquiry; because they well knew, and he well knew, that if an inquiry were given it would be shown that they were far from disregarding the duties and responsibilities imposed upon them. A very careful inquiry had been made by the Corporation into the state of Billingsgate Market, and witnesses were examined from all parts of the country to ascertain what was best to be done in the public interest. The matter was under the consideration of the Corporation, who were doing their best for the benefit of the public. The markets of London were, as their Lordships knew, wholesale markets. The City of London would rather encourage the establishment of retail markets; but the retail markets of which they lately had experience had in two instances entirely failed. One was most liberally founded, or attempted to be founded, by the Baroness Burdett-Coutts, and another by a large Railway Company; and yet both failed. It was a very important question that this Metropolis should be supplied with better markets, and the Corporation of London were ready to do everything in their power to promote their establishment. He hoped these reasons would be considered of some weight, and would induce their Lordships not to reject the Bill, but to refer it to a Select Committee, where the views of all the parties concerned might be heard. He begged to move that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

Moved, "That the Bill be referred to a Select Committee."—(The Earl De La Warr.)

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, he was very glad the Government did not intend to consent to refer this Bill to a Select Committee. The case put by the noble Earl was a very good case in its way, but it had no reference to this Bill. In fact, the noble Earl had so carefully studied the Petition of the City of London that he had not read the Bill itself. The clause to which objection was raised did not interfere with any of the privileges of the City. It simply authorized the Metropolitan Board of Works to pay any expenses they might incur in their inquiry how to provide a better supply of fish for the Metropolis. The noble Earl said that the City of London was willing to assist in any inquiry. How, then, could the City of London or the noble Earl say that this was an attack upon their interests? Their Lordships had seen the Petition drawn up by the City Remembrancer, and circulated among the Members of that House. It was of a very extraordinary character. It said that—

"The Metropolitan Board of Works proposed to take advantage of the outcry against the Billingsgate Market to repeal by a side-wind the Charters and Acts of Parliament defining the City's market rights."

No such thing. The intention of the Metropolitan Board in this Bill was only to institute an inquiry with regard to the markets which supplied food to the Metropolis. But the City Remembrancer worked himself up to a high pitch of excitement as he proceeded; the Petition said—

"No institution, no property is safe, if it may be taken away or prejudicially affected without notice."

No one proposed to do either; and it was wholly unnecessary to give notice to the City about the inquiry which the Metropolitan Board of Works proposed to hold. The Petition went on to say—

"The Metropolitan Board of Works have not now and never had any responsibility about the food supply of the Metropolis; but the Corporation always have had, the Charters being not only to the City, but within seven miles circuit thereof."

But if the Corporation had always had charge of the food supply of the Metropolis, then it was high time there should be an inquiry into the manner in which that responsibility had been discharged, for everyone was aware that the distribution of food, and more particularly of fish, to the Metropolis was in a most unsatisfactory condition. This Petition partook somewhat of an Irish character, because, having stated that property and every other institution was not safe, it pointed out that the attempt of the City to establish a second market had been a failure. But if that was the case, how could the property of the City be injuriously affected? It would be wholly without precedent if their Lordships were to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. If there were any objection to any particular clause, the proper way was to consider it in Committee of the Whole House, where the noble Earl would have an opportunity of submitting his case. On these grounds, he held that the Motion of the noble Earl should be rejected.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, a Metropolitan Money Bill was a comparatively recent thing, and he objected very strongly to a matter of this importance, which, apparently, affected the rights and privileges of many persons, being introduced in this way, instead of by a separate Bill. The clause referred to was fairly open to objections, and he should therefore support the Motion of the noble Earl for referring the Bill to a Select Committee, before which the case for the City of London might be heard.

On question, resolved in the negative.

Bill committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

The Earl of Camperdown

LEASES FOR SCHOOLS (IRELAND) BILL.

(The Lord O'Hagan.)

(NO. 188.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD O'HAGAN, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, the object of the Bill was to confer certain powers for the purpose of having suitable sites provided for schools in Ireland. The necessity for such a provision was very great, and it arose in this way. The National Board in Ireland had about 7,000 schools, some of which were what were called vested schools and the others non-vested. The vested schools were those to which the Commissioners gave State aid. It gave two-thirds of the money necessary to build the schools, the balance being subscribed by the localities. The non-vested schools were built entirely by the localities. There were about 2,000 vested schools, and 5,500 non-vested. The vested schools generally were very good buildings, properly equipped and with suitable accommodation; the non-vested schools were, generally speaking, in a very poor and miserable condition—not properly equipped or arranged. The people had a difficulty in obtaining sites for schools, and were, to a large extent, deprived of the benefit of schools for their children. In past times that had somewhat arisen from the feelings with reference to the form of education given by the National Board; but they had long ceased, and the difficulty now arose not from sectarianism of any kind, but from the want of power in the people of the country to give proper leases. The condition on which the National Board supplied to the vested schools two-thirds of the money necessary to erect buildings was that it should have a lease of 60 years, or a lease of three lives and 31 years. These leases, of course, were necessary in order that the public money, which was expended to the extent of several thousands a-year, should not be laid out except on a proper title, and a proper title could not be had. Provisions similar to those contained in the present Bill had been contained in several previous statutes. The Bill would reach not merely to the National Board, but to people of all denominations in the country, giving them all the same ad-antages. The tenure it was proposed to confer on the schools was a tenure of 900 years at the most and 99 years at the least, with proper powers of inspection and powers of resuming the premises if, for three years, they failed to be devoted to the purposes of the grants. Under these circumstances, it appeared to him that their Lordships would have no objection to the proposal. He had received a letter from a clergyman in Ireland, who stated that he had been to considerable expense in getting together the necessary materials for a school in the hope of being recognized by the National Board; but all his labour and expense had been thrown away, since the owner was only tenant for life, and could not execute for more than 21 years, which would not satisfy the Board. The owner was willing to grant a lease so far as he could; the National Board were willing to grant aid so far as they could; and the clergyman was willing to make any sacrifice and build if he could. The necessity of a new school was admitted, and yet the whole thing was stopped by the state of the law, which the Bill sought to remedy. In conclusion, he begged to move that the Bill be now read a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord O'Hagan.)

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, he had no objection to the second reading, but could not see why there should be power to grant a lease for so long as 900 years. The landowners might as well grant freehold sites at once as give very long leases.

LORD O'HAGAN said, it was proposed that there should be a nominal rent, but he thought that might be left over for Committee.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY asked whether, if a garden were attached to a school, the property would come under the operation of the Land Law (Ireland) Bill?

LORD O'HAGAN said, it would not. Only those persons who possessed full leasing powers would be able to grant sites for schools.

LORD VENTRY said, he wished to point out that Clause 1 would apply to private schools.

LORD O'HAGAN said, that that could be rectified in Committee,

After a few words from the Earl of LONGFORD,

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

CORRUPT PRACTICES (SUSPENSION OF ELECTIONS) BILL.—(No. 208.)

(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that last year Commissions were appointed to inquire into certain corrupt practices which occurred at the General Election. They reported that corrupt practices had extensively prevailed in seven burghs detailed in the Bill. The effect of the Bill was to suspend, until the assembling of Parliament next year, the power of electing Members of Parliament in these burghs. It was obviously desirable that Parliament should take into consideration the state of things which prevailed in these burghs, with a view, if necessary, of awarding such punishment as might seem in the wisdom of Parliament to be required.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

ARMY—THE AUXILIARY FORCES—THE MILITIA—MEMORANDUM OF JUNE, 1881.

THE EARL OF SANDWICH said, he rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for War some Questions respecting the Militia and Mr. Childers's Memorandum which was presented to Parliament in June, 1881. He complained of the way in which the adjutants had been treated in certain cases, and said it would be a great boon if portions of the Militia were paraded before the Royal Family. Officers who had been 50 years in the Service felt the stigma on themselves and their regiments at being left out in the distribution of honours; and the subject had been mentioned to him by many officers who naturally felt aggrieved to find themselves superseded by colonels of three or four years' experience.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, he wished to put a Question with reference to the new Rules relating to summary punishment. In his opinion, if the Militia were to have the advantage of them, and they were to be exhibited at the Post Offices, they would not be likely to give an impetus to recruiting for the Militia regiments.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, that when the Militia became subject to military law, they would come under the same provisions, in regard to summary punishments, as the Regular Forces. As to the present organization of Militia being permanent, they had heard lately a good deal about the words "permanent," "fixity," and "durable." He could not say that it would be permanent; but he hoped and believed that the arrangements now made with regard to the Militia would be durable. As to the removal of regiments to the depôts, he agreed that in some cases it might have caused some inconvenience, the accommodation not being sufficient. The accommodation at the regimental depôts having been provided for the regiments in the sub-district, there was difficulty in asking Parliament to add county buildings for the accommodation of Militia regiments. The question had been before a Committee over which he presided, and certain recommendations had been made; but much depended on the arrangements which could be made with the county authorities. The Secretary of State for War was very anxious to do all he could to maintain the popularity and efficiency of the Militia and to maintain the union between the Line and the Militia. The position of an officer of Militia was quite different from that of an officer of the Line in regard to retirement, and some discretion was given, depending on the reports of the inspecting officer. There was a fixed age in each rank, with permission to exceed it by five years in special circumstances; and the arrangement was as liberal as it could well be. Captains were retired at 50 or 55, compared with 40 or 43 in the Line. Colonels would be allowed, in special cases, to stay on till they were 60 years of age. Paymasters having been appointed for sub-districts, adjutants acted only as sub-accountants and not as paymasters; and if this were to be recognized as ground for a claim, it would be the opening wide of a door for every sort of compensation for services which came within a man's ordinary duties. A very substantial rise had been made in the pay of the adjutants on the understanding that the new pay was to be in lieu of former remuneration for all services, and he ventured to think that they had no claim for anything further. It was felt by everyone in the Army that the Militia should be encouraged, as it was a most efficient and valuable force. But he did not think there was any necessity or any intention at present to take any extraordinary measures in the shape of Royal Reviews to encourage the force. It would maintain itself without any such stimulus. The question of honours was a difficult and delicate one to talk of in the House, and he could not help regretting that the noble Lord should have taken the unusual course of calling attention to their recent distribution. The distribution of honours was attended with very considerable difficulty, and the Secretary of State for War took the greatest possible care to make it as fair and just as possible. He regretted very much that the inevitable result of the distribution, where so many had claims to distinction, was that some should be disappointed; but this he could say, that the distribution was accepted as having been justly and fairly made. It never for a moment entered into his right hon. Friend's head that those who were disappointed had any stigma cast upon their characters, and he could not conceive that such an idea could, inside the House or out of it, be seriously entertained.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he desired to refer very briefly to the closing observations of the noble Earl. He quite agreed that the question was one which it was very difficult to discuss in that House; but he could not help saying that the difficulty into which the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War fell was in ear-marking and assigning a particular number of honours for a particular service. At the first sight it appeared to be a very reasonable proceeding, but it almost inevitably resulted in the disappointment of some persons. It naturally led to a feeling on the part of those who were excluded that a reflection was cast upon them, although he quite admitted that that could never have been intended. A very sound rule had always prevailed in both Houses of Parliament that conferring of honours by the Sovereign should not be the subject of discussion. Individual cases were not susceptible of discussion; but he thought that the difficulty which had arisen was traceable to the innovation which he had pointed out. It was certainly a mistake to take out of their established order a particular number of decorations, and say—"These shall be the rewards in a particular service." There should be a general form of awarding honours, and, to avoid dissatisfaction, people should not be allowed to look upon it as a matter of chance.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that, without expressing any opinion on what the noble Marquess had said, he believed it was true that when the noble Marquess was himself in Office something of the same kind had occurred in the distribution of the Order of St. Michael and St. George, of which a certain number had been set apart for the Foreign Office.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, they were not assigned to any special service. They were not taken out of the order, but were created for the special purpose.

LORD STRATHNAIRN said, that he supported the conclusions at which his noble and gallant Friend had arrived.

House adjourned at a quarter past Eight o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter before Four o'clock.

VOL. CCLXIV. [THIRD SERIES.]

QUESTIONS.

TRIPOLI—CONSULAR JURISDICTION.

MR. HINDE PALMER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there will be any objection to present to Parliament a Copy of the Protocol of the 12-24th of February 1873, signed at Constantinople between the Representatives of Great Britain, France, Italy, and Turkey in regard to Consular jurisdiction in Tripoli, referred to in Earl Granville's Letter to Lord Lyons of July 15th 1881, recently communicated to Members?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the Protocol asked for by my hon. Friend will be at once laid on the Table.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIAN ADVANCES.

MR. E. STANHOPE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What is the total extent of the territory in Central Asia recently annexed to the Russian Empire; and what portion of it has hitherto been considered to belong to Persia?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at St. Petersburg has been officially informed that the country immediately surrounding Askabad is the southern boundary of the Tekke Oasis, which has been annexed to Russia; that the head-quarters of General Rohrberg, General Skobelev's successor, are at Askabad; but that there may be a few troops at Gowars, and that some troops advanced as far as Luftabad, but have returned. Until Her Majesty's Government receive more exact information on the subject of the boundaries of the new district, it would be very difficult to say the exact area in miles, and there is also a difficulty caused by the fact that the Frontiers before the annexation were not settled Frontiers. It is by no means certain that any portion of the territory referred to belongs to Persia; and it will be inexpedient to express any opinion as to how far the Russian advances trench, if they do so at all, on what has been considered Persian territory. Correspondence on the subject has taken place, and further information has been sought for as to the exact boundaries, and it will be placed before the House.

VISCOUNT SANDON asked, how soon it was expected that the information could be laid, and in what form it would be placed, before the House?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE thought there was no difficulty in giving a promise that any further information on the subject, whether in the form of a map or otherwise, would be placed before the House as received by the Government. The names were not marked on the maps the Government at present possessed, and he thought it was very difficult to construct a map.

POST OFFICE—WEATHER FORECASTS.

MR. EARP asked the Postmaster General, Whether, considering the importance to agriculturists of a knowledge of weather forecasts, he can arrange to have notice of them given through the post offices of the United Kingdom by telegraph and otherwise, in order that they may be posted up outside post offices for the information of the public?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, I am very sorry not to be able to accede to the request contained in the Question of my hon. Friend. It would, I find, be acting in opposition to the understanding upon which the Telegraph Acts were passed if the Post Office became a purveyor of news. It was, I believe, contemplated that the Post Office should confine itself to the transmission of news. I think the object sought for by my hon. Friend might be easily attained in another way, because I have ascertained that the Meteorological Department would be willing to supply weather forecasts at little more than a nominal charge. Almost the only expense, therefore, would be the cost of telegraphing the message, and by the Telegraph Act it is provided that if a message is sent to an exchange or a club the Press rate only shall be charged, which is 1s. for the first message of 75 words, and 2d. for each copy. If, therefore, a number of towns or villages combined, the charge would be extremely small.

ARMY—THE CASE OF MR. LYNALL THOMAS.

MR. LEAKE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the shorthand writer's notes of the trial "Thomas v. The Queen" are the same as are printed in a verbatim Report of that trial extending to 844 folio pages; if so, whether he observed the evidence that, at Shoeburyness, in September 1860, a shot of 175lbs. weight, with a charge of 25lbs. of powder, was for the first time on record projected 10,075 yards from a 7-inch 7-ton gun designed by Mr. Lynall Thomas, and that General Campbell, a Crown witness, affirmed that Mr. Thomas's gun was the most powerful piece of rifled ordnance that up to that time had been produced, having regard to the weight of projectile and the charge employed; whether he observed that the judge in his summing up drew attention to the fact that, whenever the decisive question was put to the Crown witnesses whether Mr. Thomas's gun was not substantially the same as the Woolwich 7-inch muzzle-loading guns of the Service, he, the judge, could never get a direct answer to the question; whether he observed that after fifteen days' investigation, and after hearing the evidence and cross-examination of such eminent witnesses for the Crown as Mr. Bramwell, Captain Noble, General Campbell, and others, the special jury gave a verdict for Mr. Thomas; whether, in his perusal of the proceedings on appeal, he observed that the Divisional Court of Queen's Bench quashed the verdict on technical grounds only; whether he is aware that the late Attorney General on August 4th 1879, stated in the House that this decision did not involve the question whether Mr. Thomas was or was not the originator of the system of heavy ordnance; and, whether, under these circumstances, he will reconsider his decision in the case of Mr. Thomas?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to the first part of my hon. Friend's Question, I have to inform him that the shorthand writer's notes are in print. But I must altogether decline to treat separately, and explain to the House in the course of an answer to a Question, particular statements by individual witnesses. I have already expressed my opinion upon the whole case, after carefully reading the evidence, counsel's speeches, the Judge's Charge, and the proceedings in the Queen's Bench Division. I ought, however, to say, with reference to my hon. Friend's suggestion that the verdict was quashed on technical grounds, that the words used by the Judges were that the "verdict was not satisfactory," that—"There clearly must be a new trial. We stopped you (the Attorney General) upon the evidence, because we were of that opinion," and that "the foundation of Mr. Thomas's claim wholly failed." Again—

"There was no contract at all from the beginning to the end between the Government and Mr. Thomas."

I can only, therefore, repeat that Mr. Thomas, in my opinion, has no claim whatever on the Exchequer, legal or equitable, except as a matter of mere compassion; and I am not prepared to recommend Parliament to make him a grant on this ground for the reasons I have already given.

MR. LEAKE said, in consequence of the answer given by the right hon. Gentleman, he should call attention to the matter early in the next Session.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—EMI-GRANT SHIPS.

MR. J. G. TALBOT asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether the result of the inquiry instituted by him into certain complaints made as to the accommodation and treatment of emigrants on board Atlantic steamships has been to satisfy the Board of Trade that those complaints are in the main without foundation; and, whether he has taken any steps to suggest to shipowners the advisability of making the additional precautionary arrangements referred to in his Minute contained in Blue Book recently presented to Parliament?

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he would submit to the right hon. Gentleman the advisability of his postponing a definite answer to the first part of the Question until the Motion on the subject standing in the name of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) was discussed.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, he had already, in his Minute prefixed to the Papers before the House, expressed his opinion on the subject. That opinion was that, so far as Miss O'Brien's complaints against the shipowners and other persons connected with the trade were concerned, they were entirely disproved. As regarded the second part of the Question, he had already sent copies of the Report and suggestions of the Board of Trade to all the principal shipowners in the Kingdom, and had called upon them to submit any observations they had to make on the subject. There was no reason, he believed, to doubt that shipowners would not voluntarily adopt any precautions necessary to carry out the objects which the Government had in view.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS ACT—CASE OF REBECCA ATKINS.

MR. PASSMORE EDWARDS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in considering the Memorial sent to him on the 17th June 1881, by William Atkins, praying for the release of his daughter Rebecca Atkins, from custody under the amended Industrial Schools Act, the careful consideration of the facts included any testimony offered by the relatives of the child; if, considering the Report of Assistant Police Commissioner William Harris (85,386), and dated 29th April 1881, to the Chelsea Vestry and the resolution of the Vestry at a subsequent date, he will now accede to the prayer of the said Memorial; and, whether he approves of the apprehension of children without summons or warrant, and of the conduct of the police in this case, who prevented the child seeing her parents during the ten days of her confinement before the order of detention was made by the magistrates?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, this matter was not, as seemed to be suggested by the Question, a subject connected with the police at all. It was a proceeding by the School Board under the Act of 1866, which gave power to any person to bring before two Justices a child under the age of 14, who was either in the condition of begging or wandering about without proper abode. Last year that clause had been extended to the case of female children of tender years, who were found in brothels, with the effect of saving them from degradation and crime. Under that Act proceedings were taken in this case by the School Board officer. The police had nothing to do with the matter, except to give evidence as to the character of the house in which the child was found. The magistrate was satisfied with the evidence, and the child was ordered to go to an industrial school, and he had no reason to think that the proceeding was an improper one. As far as he knew, there was nothing to complain of in the case; but, of course, if there had been any mistake as to the character of the evidence, and if the evidence were refuted, it would form a ground for the discharge of the child.

ARMY (INDIA)—COLONEL BURROWS.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether any communication has been made to Colonel Burrows, either by the Government of India or by the India Office, informing him of the grounds on which the Governor General in Council refused to adopt the recommendation of the Governor of Bombay in Council that Colonel Burrows should be permitted to return to his permanent brigade; and, whether this decision was arrived at after any investigation at which Colonel Burrows was called upon for an explanation or defence; and, if not, whether an opportunity will be given to Colonel Burrows to defend himself against the charges made against him which are at present anonymous?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, in December last the Government of Bombay were told by the Government of India that the Governor General in Council could not agree to the proposal of the Bombay Government that Brigadier General Burrows should be permitted to revert to his permanent brigade command, as, though his personal courage and gallantry were fully admitted, the Viceroy in Council was of opinion that the Brigadier General did not exhibit that degree of military capacity which would justify his being again intrusted with responsible military command. This must have been communicated to Colonel Burrows, as he appealed against the decision. That appeal was answered by the Government of India on the 2nd of May, 1881; and the Government of Bombay was informed that the previous decision was arrived at after very full and deliberate consideration of all the circumstances of the case, and the Governor General in Council was unable to depart from it. This was forwarded to the Commander in Chief of the Bombay Army for communication to Colonel Burrows. So far as is known here, there are no anonymous charges against Colonel Burrows. The Government of India, after a careful review of the facts of the case, came to a deliberate conclusion that it would not be to the advantage of the Public Service to again intrust Colonel Burrows with important military command. As being responsible, in the first degree, for the security of Her Majesty's Indian Dominions, they had no other course than to act on the judgment they had formed on the whole matter.

PUBLIC HEALTH—SMALL-POX (METROPOLIS).

MR. HENRY ALLEN asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, in view of the increase of Small Pox in the Metropolis, he will furnish the latest statistics of its comparative incidence on vaccinated and unvaccinated persons?

MR. DODSON: Sir, the Registrar General's Returns show, as far as practicable, the actual number of deaths from small-pox among vaccinated and unvaccinated persons in the Metropolis. These Returns are issued every week, and include only persons who have died; but I have no means of ascertaining the exact number of cases of small-pox which occur among persons who recover, except as regards the patients in the Metropolitan hospitals; and I will endeavour to lay these statistics on the Table of the House at an early period.

WAYS AND MEANS—INLAND REVENUE —OFFICERS OF THE EXCISE

IRRAWADDI.

MR. PULESTON asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he can inform the House how many Division Officers of Inland Revenue (Excise Branch) have in the last three years been promoted over the heads of their seniors in the service; whether the collectors are adverse to the system of special recommendations; and, whether, as carried out, it causes discontent in the service?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, out of 155 division officers of Excise examined for promotion since November, 1878 (96 of whom passed their examinations successfully), only 12 were promoted over the heads of their seniors. The Board of Inland Revenue are not aware that collectors are adverse to the system of special recommendations. I am not aware that there is any discontent, except among officers passed over; but I may add that selection is very important for the efficiency of the Service.

Sir William Harcourt

VACCINATION—FRENCH SOLDIERS IN AFRICA.

MR. BLENNERHASSETT asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to a statement which has appeared in several French newspapers to the effect that fifty-eight French soldiers are now in hospital at Algiers terribly afflicted with disease arising out of vaccination with impure lymph; and, whether he will cause inquiry to be made into the circumstances with the view of obtaining information that may be useful in this country?

MR. DODSON: Sir, an extract from a French newspaper has been sent to me containing a quotation from a journal published in Algiers, in which it is stated that the 4th Regiment of Zouaves has been afflicted with disease in consequence of vaccination. I have no means at my disposal for making inquiry into the matter, and it would only be by the courtesy of the French Government that any information could be obtained on the subject. I will consider, however, whether any communication should be addressed to them through the Foreign Office for that purpose.

LAW AND POLICE—SPEECH OF MRS. BESANT AT THE HALL OF SCIENCE.

MR. RITCHIE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to a speech made by Mrs. Besant at the Hall of Science on Sunday evening, to the following effect:—

“Mr. Bradlaugh had desired on Wednesday last to fight the battle alone; but he now bade her tell them that he intended to go down to the House of Commons; that he did not mean to be prevented by the means that had been used against him; that the next time he went he would take care to protect himself against any violence. He bade her tell them why he appeared to be so patient the last time, but he also bade her to tell them that he did not intend to show the same forbearance again. Mrs. Besant gave an account of the reception which she and the daughters of Mr. Bradlaugh met with at the House of Commons on Wednesday. She remembered the order which their leader had given them—‘Don’t struggle with the police; don’t fight with the police;’ but had she known of what was going on in the Lobby when she stood on the steps leading from Westminster Hall, she would have let their supporters go and show Mr. Speaker Brand something of the same sort that his mob of police were showing to a Member of Parliament. She advised them to make good use of their time, and said ‘a little drilling would not be bad, because otherwise the police have a great advantage over you.’ They would do well to join the Volunteer regiments, and take advantage of the drilling and the training. It was always well to know how to be able to guard themselves. The Volunteer regiments were perfectly legal, and the more that joined them the better would it be for their own cause in the future. Mr. Bradlaugh was going to the House of Commons again, but he was not going to tell them when. He was not going to let the officials know when he was going, but he would let a large number of his own supporters know;”

whether such speech had come to the knowledge of the Government prior to their decision, announced to the House yesterday, to deal with the question of Mr. Bradlaugh’s admission to the House next Session; and, whether the Government will take measures to prevent the threatened riot?

MR. GLADSTONE: I knew nothing whatever of this speech till I read it in the Votes this morning. In regard to the maintenance of order in the neighbourhood of this House, I have nothing to add to what has been said by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whose duty it is, of course, to support by every means in his power the authority of this House; nor have I any reason to suppose that those means will be inadequate.

PORTUGAL (INDIA) — THE GOA TREATY.

MR. CARTWRIGHT asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether the financial results consequent on the first year’s execution of the Goa Treaty have proved highly satisfactory to both Governments concerned; and, whether there are any official reports showing these mutually satisfactory results; and, if so, then whether he would make these reports public in view of the very erroneous opinions widely circulated by the Portuguese Press in regard to the nature and bearing of the provisions of the Treaty?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, no Report had been received from the Government of India on this subject, though they had been asked to furnish one, and had been subsequently requested to furnish an immediate reply. He might state that a very favourable Report had, however, been received through the Foreign Office from the Portuguese authorities as to the working of the Treaty; but he did not think it was desirable that that should be laid on the Table until it could be accompanied with the Report from the Government of India which had been asked for.

INDIA—THE STRAITS SETTLEMENTS— THE MALAY CHIEFS.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether Her Majesty's Government will consider the expediency of releasing the Malay Chiefs from Perak now detained administratively at the Seyohelles without having been subjected to trial or convicted of any offence; and, whether they will communicate with the Governor of Singapore with a view to at least their conditional liberation, even if it be not considered expedient to permit their return to their own country?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, the inquiry suggested by the hon. Member's Question will be made by the Governor of the Straits Settlements.

RAILWAYS—THE BLACKBURN RAIL- WAY ACCIDENT.

MR. BRIGGS asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he has had his attention directed to the fatal railway accident at the Blackburn Railway Station; whether a representative of the Board of Trade will be present officially at the inquest; and, whether a full investigation into the causes of the accident will be made?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Sir, I have seen with very great regret, in the papers of to-day, an account of the fatal accident referred to. I have also received a Report from the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company on the subject. Colonel Yolland, the senior Inspector of the Board of Trade, has been instructed to make a full inquiry into the matter. I have no power to insist that he shall be present at the inquest; but if the Coroner desires it Colonel Yolland has been instructed to give him all the assistance in his power.

The Marquis of Hartington

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.

CONSIDERATION OF LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

[FIRST NIGHT.]

Order for Consideration of Lords' Amendments read.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Amendments made by The Lords to the Land Law (Ireland) Bill be now considered,"—(Mr. Gladstone),—put, and agreed to.

Lords' Amendments considered.

The following Amendments read a second time, and, on the Motion of MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND, agreed to:—In line 21, leave out ("has agreed") and insert ("shall agree"); and in line 23, after ("State") insert ("in writing").

The next Amendment, in line 26, leave out from ("Court") to ("declare") in line 28, and insert ("shall") read a second time.

On Question, "That this House doth agree with The Lords in the said Amendment."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. Law) moved to disagree with the Amendment. One effect of the Amendment was shortly this—Certain requirements were inserted in a former part of the clause, obliging the tenant to give the prescribed notice to the landlord of his intention to sell, and also certain information. Supposing, then, that a particular number of days' notice was required by the landlord, and that the tenant was an hour or a day late, though not affecting the merits of the case in the smallest degree, the Court, according to this Amendment, would be bound, without any discretion whatever, and at the bidding of the landlord, to declare the sale void. It would be most unreasonable to exact that, and he therefore asked the House to disagree with the Amendment. The clause, as it originally stood, gave the Court perfect power to declare a sale void if the interests of the landlord and the justice of the case required.

Motion made, and Question, "That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said Amendment,"—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland,)—put, and agreed to.

On the Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND, the next Amendment, in line 28, after ("void") insert ("if the landlord shall so require,") disagreed to.

Page 2, line 5, after the word "Court," insert the words—

"Provided, That the landlord's objection shall be conclusive in the case of any tenancy in a holding where the permanent improvements in respect of which, if made by the tenant or his predecessors in title, the tenant would have been entitled to be compensated under the provisions of 'The Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870,' as amended by this Act, have been made by the landlord or his predecessors in title, and not by the tenant or his predecessors in title,"

—the next Amendment, read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with The Lords in the said Amendment."

MR. GLADSTONE said, the Amendment was one of which the House would perceive the effect to be that it placed it absolutely in the power of the landlord, under certain circumstances, to exclude any particular person proposed to him as tenant from the tenancy, and by a succession of such objections it, of course, placed it in the power of the landlord, as there was no limit to such objections, to exclude that particular tenant from the benefit of the sale of the tenant right. As the Amendment stood, it was inadmissible; but having considered it, he found it might be amended in such a way as to bring it in a certain sense into conformity with the principle of the Bill. By the Bill, as it stood, they were not unwilling to recognize, under given circumstances, that in certain cases where the permanent improvements on the holding had been created and substantially maintained by the landlord and his predecessors in title a difference might be recognized. In that spirit, therefore, he proposed to ask the House to agree to the Amendment, with several Amendments, and the substantial Amendment of inserting after the word "made" the words "and substantially maintained." He was bound to say they asked the House to do this distinctly as a concession to the other House of Parliament, and not because they believed it to be an improvement in the Bill. There was no doubt, in a case of this kind, they freely admitted, that where the improvements had been made and permanently maintained by the landlord, the tenant, unless he had made other improvements himself, had nothing to sell except his right of occupancy; but they saw no reason why he should not sell that right of occupancy; on the contrary, they thought it better he should. At the same time, the question was one with regard to which two things might be said. On the one hand, a very strong desire had been manifested in favour of the Amendment by a large minority of that House, and certainly by the other House of Parliament; and, on the other hand, although the Government thought it a deterioration of the Bill, it was not such a deterioration as to make them think it necessary to invite the House to take its stand and decline to admit it. He need not say that if it were an alteration of the Bill of that character, they could not ask the House to agree to it. He would now propose, in the first place, to amend the Amendment in a verbal manner, by altering the words "to be compensated" to the words "to compensation," then in the seventh line to insert after the word "made," the words, "and substantially maintained," and in the eighth line to strike out "or," and insert "and."

Amendment proposed to said Amendment, in line 4, to strike out the words "be compensated," and insert "compensation;" in line 7, after the word "made," to insert the words "and substantially maintained;" and in line 8, to strike out the word "or," and insert "and."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Speaker, on a point of Order, whether it was not open to a Member to move the absolute rejection of the whole of the Lords' Amendments?

MR. SPEAKER said, it would be competent for the hon. Member, after the proposed Amendments on the said Amendment had been disposed of, to make a Motion in regard to the said Amendment itself, on the proposed Amendment to the Amendment to leave out, in line 5, the word "compensated," and insert "compensation."

MR. PARNELL wished to say, that he must not, by being silent, be taken as agreeing to the course proposed by the Prime Minister of agreeing to the Lords' Amendment with the Amendments proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. Of course, it was right on the part of the Government to amend the Amendment as they desired, and then they should be able to take the opinion of the House as regarded the Amendment itself; but they could not do so at present. When the proper time arrived he should move a further Amendment.

MR. HEALY asked the Prime Minister whether it was not the fact that the acceptance of the Lords' Amendment did not amount to a practical admission that the tenant had no interest in the holding except the improvement he had made himself?

MR. GLADSTONE said, the acceptance of the Amendment did not amount to such an admission in all cases, because such an admission was contradicted by a number of substantial enactments in the Bill; but he would fully admit that the Amendment as amended undoubtedly did say that a class of tenants, in very rare cases where the improvements had been made and "substantially maintained by the landlord," had no interest in the holding except in respect of the improvements made by themselves.

MR. GIBSON said, the Amendments which the Prime Minister had just announced proposed an alteration of the Lords' Amendment, which was one of importance. It dealt with a class of Amendments which proposed to reserve the right to landlords to manage their estates on the English system, and this Amendment only proposed to preserve to landlords one of the principles which was recognized in England—that was, to enable the landlord who had made permanent improvements on his property the privilege of selecting his tenant. That was really all that was given by the Lords' Amendment. The Prime Minister had said that he had agreed to the Amendment with the proposed alterations as a concession. He was bound to say that the proposed alterations reduced the concession to extremely narrow limits, because it would be the invariable experience that, if a landlord had made a permanent improvement on his property, and if, in addition to proving that he had made those improvements, he had to prove he had substantially maintained them, there would be very little protection to English-managed estates.

MR. H. R. BRAND said, that, as he understood the Lords' Amendment, it would possibly take effect after a sale. He wished, therefore, to ask the Government whether it would not be necessary further to amend the clause by excluding a case where the tenant might have purchased the improvements of the landlord under the 8th sub-section of the 1st clause?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAW) said, the suggestion was well founded, and that the Amendment would require the addition of other words, these being "made or acquired."

Amendments to said Amendment agreed to.

On Motion of MR. GLADSTONE, said Amendment further amended, by inserting in line 8, after the word "not," the words "made or acquired."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with The Lords in the said Amendment as amended."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. PARNELL moved to insert, at the end of the said Amendment, these words—

"Provided, That in the opinion of the Court the landlord shall not have been compensated for such improvements by increase of rent or otherwise."

That, he thought, was a reasonable proposition. The Lords' Amendment was based on the supposition that the landlord had made the improvement, that the landlord, therefore, owned the improvement, and that the tenant did not own it. But if the tenant had paid for the improvement, in the opinion of the Court, by increased rent or otherwise in such a way as to disentitle the landlord to the full benefit of the Amendment, he thought it was a matter the Court should be entitled to take into account if it was desirous to do so.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the said Amendment, as amended, to insert the words "and Provided, That in the opinion of the Court the landlord shall not have been compensated for such improvements by increased rent or otherwise."—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. Parnell

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, the Amendments which had been already made to the Lords' Amendment had, as his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gibson) pointed out, very materially reduced the value of the provision, and if they were to adopt the words which were suggested by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) he (Sir Stafford Northcote) thought the value of the provision would be destroyed altogether. In point of fact, they would be thrown back upon the uncertainty which existed previously with regard to that particular clause. The uncertainty was admitted before, and should not be revived now that it had been removed. The proposition in the Amendment as it stood was to save the uncertainties which might attend the operations of the Court in regard to a certain class of holdings, which were a comparatively rare number, but which were of an important character. In order to provide for those cases, it was provided, not that the question should be decided by the Court taking evidence and treating the whole matter as an open question, but upon the principle that the landlord's objection should be conclusive in case of his having made and maintained certain improvements. He presumed that one of the great objects aimed at by the Proviso was that an inducement should be given to the landlord to make and maintain his improvements, in order that he might stand in the better position he would in that event occupy under the Bill. He trusted the Government would not accept the words now proposed.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am obliged to decline the proposed addition of the words of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) on this ground—In the Act of 1870 we did, in respect to the tenant, recognize the principle that he might be compensated by a reasonable lapse of time in respect of improvements he had made, and that the use and profit of those improvements for a certain time might be considered as compensation; but we do not recognize that principle in the present Act. None of the enactments of the present Bill are founded on that principle; and, not acknowledging it as respects the tenant, I do not think it would be quite equitable in our view that we should acknowledge it as respects the landlord. It is also difficult to see how the landlord could receive compensation for his improvements in the shape of rent under the system which the Bill will establish; because, under the Bill, every tenant will be entitled to obtain from the Court the adjudication of a fair rent. Now, fair rent upon improvements would be a rent, undoubtedly, allowing liberally for the interest upon the cost of those improvements; but it would hardly be a rent which would repay the landlord in respect of his whole capital outlay. But the main ground on which I should stand is, that we do not introduce that principle of compensation by engagement for a certain length of time, either as regards landlord or tenant. It is much better, I think, that those who make improvements should have the whole benefit of the improvements.

MR. HEALY said, it was a somewhat remarkable thing that the Government were unable to recognize the equitable principle of the Amendment of his hon. Friend (Mr. Parnell). If that principle was inequitable, why did not the Government bring in a clause in the present Bill to repeal the principle in the Act of 1870? The principle was in that Act, and his hon. Friend simply proposed to import it into the present Bill and apply it to the landlord. But the Government did not think what was sauce for the gander was also sauce for the goose. He had never heard such a piece of special pleading as that they had just heard from the Prime Minister in refusing the Amendment of his hon. Friend. ["Oh, oh!"] They knew what this would lead to. That refusal would lead to a great deal of dissatisfaction in future. It seemed, however, that the Government had made up their minds not to settle the Land Question in Ireland, but to pass their Bill. They were prepared to swallow as many of the Amendments of the Lords as they thought the House would stomach, and send the Bill back to the Lords with the wheels greased by that acceptance, and thus pass the Bill anyhow. By giving way to the Lords' Amendment in this respect, however, they were only laying up a store of uneasiness for themselves at a future time. He had hoped they had learnt a lesson, for they should have remembered what was the result of the acceptance of the Lords' Amendments to the Act of 1870. He and his hon. Friends who acted with him would on those grounds go to a division, not merely upon that Amendment, but as against the clause as amended by the Government.

MR. LEAMY said, he was afraid there were many hon. Members willing to accept the Lords' Amendment, because they thought it would not affect many tenants. He, however, thought it would affect a great many tenancies in which the tenancy had been broken by eviction or other causes within recent years. It would enable the landlord, in every case in which he had made any substantial improvements on a holding, to refuse to allow the tenant to sell at all. It would also very much, he was afraid, operate in the case of death intestacy. In case a tenant died intestate, the landlord would be entitled under the section to come in and refuse to accept the son of the deceased tenant, or, in fact, anyone belonging to his family. When a man died it was also uncertain under the section whether the landlord would allow the farm to go to the next of kin.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, that the apprehensions of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Leamy) were entirely without foundation. If there were no permanent improvements on the farm to the landlord's credit, then he would have none. With reference to the arguments of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), he contended that it was impossible to suppose that the landlord's property was to be bought out by the rent. He could not see, for instance, how a landlord who had built a house on the land could be said to have been compensated for it by the rent which he fairly received for the use of it; and so, also, with other improvements.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN quite agreed with the view that substantial and permanent improvements made on the land by either landlord or tenant should be the property of the landlord or tenant for all time, provided he has not paid them. But when the landlord imposed an increased rent, the question was whether the landlord was not in the course of a certain time thoroughly compensated. He maintained that the landlord sold his improvements when he charged an increased rent; for he was really paid for them in the course of a few years, and they should then become the property of the tenant. If a tenant built a house, why should he not be allowed to sell it? It was the same with the landlord. There was no necessity to assent to the Amendment which the Government proposed to accept. It need not be assented to by any hon. Member in the House, for it was utterly unjust.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he hoped a division would be taken against the clause, and not upon the Amendment, as he would willingly vote against the clause, but could not assent to what had been moved by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). Would anyone, he asked, tell him in how many years a landlord would be compensated for having expended, say £1,000, on a farm building on which he was receiving 6 per cent interest? The case was exactly the same as that of money being invested in the funds and earning good interest; and no one could say that in such investment the State ought, after a certain number of years, to become possessed of the capital of the investor.

MR. MACARTNEY said, that no landlord would be recouped in any reasonable number of years for the capital invested in improvements at 4 or 5 per cent.

MR. MARUM protested against the assumption that there were many English-managed estates in Ireland. Therefore, he did not believe that, practically, any Irish tenancies would be affected by the Amendment; but he could not help thinking it was inserted as a hole of escape in case of the consideration of an English Land Bill.

MR. PARNELL said, that as it did not seem to be the opinion of hon. Gentlemen opposite that two divisions should be taken, he should allow the Amendment to be negatived. He would, however, raise a strong protest in the matter.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question proposed.

MR. PARNELL said, he regretted exceedingly that the Government, at the very threshold of the consideration of the Lords' Amendments, should have yielded on that important matter. The number of holdings that would be affected by the proposed Amendment might seem to some hon. Members to be very limited; but it was not so. In every case where the title of the tenant had been recently broken, and a new tenancy was created, all the past improvements effected by the original tenant would be shut out from consideration by the Court, and the Court would have to refuse to allow such a tenant to sell his tenant right. That discretion was taken away from the Court. The number of tenants' titles that had been so broken through in Ireland was very numerous, and he believed only a small minority could prove the continuity of their titles. A great deal of the power of the Court with reference to the free sale would be taken away. The Amendment would have a large and extensive application, and would shut out a number of the very best tenants in Ireland. Many titles had been broken about 1850, and if the landlord could show that a farm which had been greatly improved by the tenant up to 1850 had not been much improved by the tenant since the breach of title, and that the landlord had effected some single improvement on the farm himself, the Court would have to forbid the tenant exercising his right of free sale.

MR. GLADSTONE said, it was not necessary for him to follow the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) into the merits of the Amendment; for, after all, he believed there was not much real difference of opinion between them. The Amendment had no real connection with breaches of tenancy at all, and he should be sorry if the idea went forth as having the authority of the House that wherever there had been a breach in the tenancy the Court would have to consider the making of permanent improvements only from the date of the last breach. That would give the Amendment quite a different character from that which it rightly bore, and he wished to disabuse the House of the idea. In the view of the Government, the Amendment had no connection with breaches of tenancy at all. Whenever there was a breach of tenancy, it would be necessary for the landlord to show that he had maintained the permanent improvements. [MR. PARNELL: Since the breach?] No, not at all—whatever improvements were on the farm.

MR. HEALY said, that the Amendment possessed one great advantage, in that it would, by its operation, affect a substantial body of tenants, the higher class tenant farmers, who were not supposed now to be in sympathy with the Land League, and it was likely to have important results in the future, as it would show them the complete impossibility of that House, or the other House, or the present Government ever doing them anything like justice.

Question put.

The House divided: — Ayes 258; Noes 100: Majority 158.—(Div. List, No. 361.)

Line 16, after ("improvements"), insert ("on a holding"), the next Amendment, agreed to.

Lines 16 and 17, leave out ("on a holding") and insert ("or paid for"), the next Amendment, agreed to as far as leaving out the words "on a holding;" but disagreed to as regards inserting "or paid for."

Page 2, line 28, after the word "tenancy," insert the words—

"Where before the passing of this Act the landlord or any of his predecessors in title has purchased or acquired the Ulster tenant right custom, or the benefit of a usage corresponding to the Ulster tenant right custom, to which any holding was subject, and such holding has, in pursuance of section one or section two of 'The Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870,' ceased to be subject to such custom or usage; or

"Where before the passing of this Act the landlord or any of his predecessors in title has purchased or acquired the right of sale of the tenant's interest in such holding, and where the tenant or any of his predecessors in title have been paid the consideration for such purchase or acquisition either by payment of a sum of money, or by a corresponding abatement of rent, or where the tenant or any of his predecessors since such purchase or acquisition is or are not proved to have paid money or given money's worth, with the express or implied consent of the landlord or any of his predecessors in title, on account of becoming the tenant of such holding; and

"The tenancy in such holding is sold for the first time after the passing of this Act, the landlord shall be entitled to apply to the Court to have paid to him out of the purchase moneys of the tenancy the sum which he can prove to the satisfaction of the Court to have been paid by him or his predecessors in title by way of consideration for the purchase or acquisition of the Ulster tenant right custom, or of the benefit of such usage, or of any right of sale of the tenant's interest in such holding; subject nevertheless to any deduction which the Court may deem just in respect of any money received by the landlord or his predecessors in title by way of fine, increased rent, or otherwise on account of the sum so paid as aforesaid,"

—the next Amendment, read a second time.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, this is an Amendment of considerable sweep, and it is one which it is quite impossible for us to ask the House to agree with. I am bound to say that I think it is, unfortunately, framed for the purpose of giving effect to the views of those who supported it. There are verbal inaccuracies in it which are gross, and it requires to be altered very considerably in order to make it intelligible. That, however, is only a grammatical criticism; the purpose of the Amendment is perfectly clear quite independent of these inaccuracies. I will not, in order to briefly describe it, go back upon the lengthy argument we had in Committee on the question of the cases where the landlord had purchased up the Ulster tenant right, and where, in consequence of that purchase, the tenant was remitted to the general law as defined by the Act of 1870, or as expanded and enlarged by the Bill now under consideration which we sent to the House of Lords a short time ago. I will assume that that argument is fresh in the recollection of the House. I will, however, point out how it is that the Amendment proposes to deal with the case. It aims at embracing all the cases in which the landlord has acquired by purchase the tenant right, admitted or supposed to exist upon his farms, either under the Ulster Custom, or under any custom analogous to the Ulster Custom; or anywhere, in fact, where such transaction has taken place. How does it propose to deal with the tenants in these cases? It deals with them in this way. It makes a certain provision applying to the first occasion on which the tenancy shall be sold after the passing of this Act; and it provides that, on that occasion, the landlord may recoup himself, out of the purchase money of the tenancy, any sum which he may prove to the satisfaction of the Court that he has paid in respect of the tenant right upon that holding. Now, Sir, without entering into the general argument, it is sufficient for my purpose to mention the one, as we think, absolutely fundamental and conclusive objection to this transaction.

The argument is this—that even supposing—which I admit only for argument's sake, and by no means as a proposition by which I abide—even supposing the landlord entitled to compensation, he is to be compensated under the Amendment by the wrong man. The landlord has paid a sum of money to tenant A in order to purchase the tenant right upon his holding. He then lets it to tenant B, who, by the terms of this agreement, shall have acquired no benefit whatever from the purchase, by the landlord. According to the terms of the Amendment tenant B takes no benefit whatever from the transaction; and yet it is provided that when tenant B, under the general provisions of the Bill, proceeds, for the first time, to sell his tenant right, the landlord may recoup himself out of moneys paid to tenant B for the price paid to tenant A, there being no continuity of interest between them, and it not being required by the same Amendment that tenant B shall have taken the smallest interest from the transaction. Under these circumstances, as there is no possibility of amending it, there can be no question that the Amendment ought not to be accepted, and I must ask the House to disagree to it entirely.

MR. GIBSON said, that he had heard the statement of the Prime Minister, that the Government could not assent to the Amendment, even with alterations, with regret. The Amendment was obviously one of importance, and it was one of substance; but it did not interfere in the slightest degree with the main provisions of the Bill. The Amendment sought to grapple with a state of facts which, if left unamended and unchanged, might work an injustice to a substantial class of landholders in Ireland—to be found in Ulster and in other parts of Ireland. They all knew that some landowners in Ulster had given considerable sums of money to purchase up the tenant right custom. If the clause was left as it was in the Bill as it left that House, and if those cases were not in some way dealt with by some special legislation, they would have put themselves in a distinctly worse position by buying up the tenant right. These unfortunate persons would not only lose what other Irish landlords would lose, but would also lose the sums they had expended in the purchase of the tenant right. If there were verbal inaccuracies the Prime Minister could easily remedy them, for no one was more capable to do so; and there were other hon. Members of the House who had paid particular attention to grammar. Whether the Amendment dealt with the subject in the best way was another thing, and might be well open to question; but surely such facts called for some special legislation and special treatment. He knew of a case where a landlord had paid £16,000 for the tenants' interest in the hope of getting the control over the sales of his farms, and the future tenants of the farms freed from that form of tenant right. Unless the Amendment was agreed to, that money would have been thrown away; and that landlord under the Bill would be, to say the least, in a position highly inequitable and very exceptional. Surely in that and similar cases the landlords were entitled to some relief, even if not the precise relief afforded by the clause as it stood. How did the Amendment propose to deal with the existing state of facts? It did not allow the landlord to keep his claim suspended over the tenant's head for ever. On the contrary, it compelled him to act almost immediately the Act had passed, and to substantiate it on the first sale of the tenant right; and it did not allow him to receive compensation, unless he could satisfy the Court that he or his predecessors in title had, as a matter of fact, made these money payments, and that they had not been repaid, by increase of rent or any other way. He must repeat his regret at the decision of the Government, and ask as many who agreed with him to enter a protest against the unreasonable attitude of the Government in declining to accept the Amendment in any shape or form.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW), in moving to disagree with the Amendment, said, that in the £16,000 case referred to by his right hon. and learned Friend opposite (Mr. Gibson), and which was well known to him (the Attorney General for Ireland), the object of the landlord buying up the tenancy was for the express purpose of preventing the outgoing tenant having any dealings with the incoming tenant, so that there should be no transmission of interest from the one to the other. If that landlord was a wise man he had got something for his purchase, and if he had not charged an increased rent he could do so under the Bill. But why, because the landlord might have made an improvident purchase from A, should he go to B when he sold his tenant right and say — "Come, now, pay me back what I gave for the tenant right?" Why on earth should that be? Why should the landlord be indemnified for a foolish bargain, by the incoming tenant, who might never even have seen his predecessor, and, at all events, got nothing from him?

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the said Amendment." — (Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

MR. BRAND said, he should follow the Government into the lobby, because he thought the Amendment dealt with the case in a most unjust way. As the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland had said, if the landlord paid an unfair price for the tenant right, it was monstrous that he should be able to call on the present tenant to pay him again.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland forgot that it was left to the Court to say what the landlord was to have. ["No, no!"] He (Captain Aylmer) maintained that the right hon. and learned Gentleman was not acting equitably. It seemed to him (Captain Aylmer) that the incoming tenant was the right person to pay, because, if by the Act he got the right to sell, surely he had the right to pay the money. The Bill, moreover, gave him fixity of tenure for 15 years. He was very sorry the Government would not accept the Amendment, because it would have the effect of removing that damning word "confiscation," which was partly applicable to the Bill as it left the House. He thought the matter ought to be left entirely in the hands of the Court, and that the landlords ought to be left in a position to bring in question the amount which had been paid by the outgoing tenants, subject, of course, to the deductions which might be deemed just, having reference to increased rent.

[First Night.]

MR. NEWDEGATE: Sir, the issue of this Bill is at length clear. The Party which used to be the Party of Progress has become extensively retrograde. The principle of this Land Bill, it is now clear, is the establishment of feudalism in Ireland. This principle is not absolutely new among the Liberal Party; for it was contemplated and indicated in this House by the late Mr. John Stuart Mill, and was probably the fruit of his Indian training. What is this principle of compensation for disturbance? It is recognizing in the tenant what the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) has just described as a title, a valuable interest in the land, which is to be saleable, totally apart from all interests in improvements which he may have made upon his holding, for his interest in these improvements has been otherwise recognized and dealt with. That which the House is now dealing with is an interest supposed to exist in the tenant, arising out of the mere fact of occupation apart from all improvements. This Bill will convert all that is now freehold in the ownership of Irish land into copyhold, and that is a feudal tenure; but apart, as you propose to create it, from all obligation to military service. You Liberals are in the habit of taunting me with being antiquated in my opinions. My principles are modern, compared with those on which you Liberals are now acting, for you have gone back 200 years to find the system you have now adopted. Feudal tenures were abolished in this country by the 12 Charles II.; you are reversing the principle of that Act, yet you still call yourselves the Party of Progress.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT felt that a very monstrous and gross injustice would be perpetrated on the landlords of Ireland if the Amendment were not passed, because the Bill would enable the tenant to sell that which he had already been paid for. ["Oh, oh!"] It was no use mincing matters. With regard to the question, he would ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland whether the landlords of Ulster had not purchased the tenant right of tenants mainly and principally in their interest? It would, therefore, be an act of gross injustice to the landlord to deprive him of the tenant right, after having paid hard cash for it.

MR. FITZPATRICK said, that the system of allowing landlords to buy out the tenants was a new one; and he regretted that the Government could not accept the Amendment in some shape or other, and thus endeavour to do justice to the landlords of Ireland. In his idea, Parliament ought to give all the encouragement possible to that class of landlords who had done their best to make prosperous the country in which they lived.

MR. WARTON (speaking amid great interruption) said, the fallacy which underlay the argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland was that the landlord had paid a preposterous price for the tenant right. He (Mr. Warton) need not remind so distinguished a lawyer that men, as a rule, acted more reasonably than that; but even if they paid a fair price efforts were made to take their property away.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he was sorry to intervene between the House and the division; but the House was asked to perform an act of such gross and glaring injustice, an act supported by arguments so disingenuous as those which had come from the Front Bench, that he could not keep silent. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland put a case where a landlord had bought up the tenant right, and assumed that in consequence he charged an increased rent. The right hon. and learned Gentleman assumed that he had given a preposterous price for it, which he made the tenant recoup him in addition to the rent put on, although he knew perfectly well that at the end of the clause were the words—"But whatever sum the landlord may be entitled to is to be subject to deduction for any money which he receives by way of fine or increased rent." If the landlord had received compensation by way of increased rent, how could the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland say that, under this clause, he had a right, in addition, to ask for all the sum he had paid? Suppose two tenants came into two tenancies, side by side; in the one, tenant right existed, and the incoming tenant paid £500 for the right; in the other, the tenant right had been acquired and bought up by the landlord, he (Lord George Hamilton) would assume, for the same sum, £500. It was now proposed that the man who had paid absolutely nothing for the tenant right should be able to sell the tenant right in exactly the same way as the man who had paid £500 for it. ["No, no!"] That was what the Government proposed, and he defied anyone to contradict him. The Prime Minister had admitted it, and had altered Clause 7 in consequence of that admission. If you divide the interest on any holding between the tenant right and rent, the tenant right and the rent combined would exceed the value of the holding—that is, it would exceed the amount any tenant would pay in the shape of rent; and now the Government said that when the landlord had both interests, though he could not compensate himself in the shape of increased rent, he was to be mulcted of that which they had previously encouraged him to obtain. The Prime Minister, on the occasion of moving the second reading of the Bill, had made an eloquent peroration, in which he had said that he was walking by the light of justice, and that, therefore, he could not go astray; but he (Lord George Hamilton) wished they heard a little less of it in his words and saw a little more of it in his acts.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, if the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) would read the clause carefully, and reflect a little, he would see that although there was a possible injustice in some few cases to the landlords if the Amendment were not accepted, there was a certain and greater injustice to the tenant if it were. The Ulster tenant right consisted of a number of elements of which the improvements made was one. Let them suppose that the tenant whose tenant right was purchased had made a large number of improvements; in that case it was obvious that for the tenant right he would get a considerable sum of money. Suppose that the price the landlord paid for the tenant right was £1,000, the rent of the holding being £100 a-year. All the improvements became the landlords. The incoming tenant had no further claim to these improvements. The landlord let to a new tenant, say at a rent of £150 a-year, which was supposed to be a fair rent, and the rent which would be fixed by the Court. The Court, in fixing the rent at that sum, would take into consideration the fact that the landlord was the sole person who had made the improvements, and that the tenant had nothing but the bare right of occupancy. The tenant proceeded to sell his tenancy next year, having paid £150 rent for a single year. Of course, all that the landlord had received, and all that it was right to deduct, was £50, so the £950, according to the clause, still remained due to the landlord out of the purchase money. But what had the tenant to sell? He had got to sell the tenancy only, with the rent fixed at £150 a-year, because the landlord had purchased up the improvements. Suppose the tenant sold for £300, whatever he got was to go to the landlord, and the landlord was to be entitled to every bit of it. Even although the tenant sold for £300 or £400, because he had made improvements, the whole of the money which he received for his improvements was to go to the landlord in payment of £950. That was the proposal of this clause. ["No, no!"] He (the Solicitor General) said that was the proposal of the clause, and that was the proposal they were asked to accept in the solemn name of justice.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 272; Noes 145: Majority 127.—(Div. List, No. 362.)

On Motion of Mr. GLADSTONE, the next Amendment, in page 2, line 34, after ("tenancy,") to insert—

("Or for moneys payable to the landlord under the preceding sub-section in respect of the purchase or acquisition by the landlord or his predecessors in title of the Ulster tenant right custom or the benefit of such usage, or of any right of sale of the tenant's interest in such holding,") —agreed to.

Page 3, line 30, after the word "usage," insert the words—

"(15.) Where a sale of a tenancy is made under a judgment or other process of law against the tenant, or for the payment of the debts of the deceased tenant, the sale shall be deemed to be made by the tenant, and shall be made in the prescribed manner, subject to the conditions of this section, so far as the same are applicable.

"(16.) Any sum payable to the landlord out of the purchase moneys of the tenancy under this section shall be a first charge upon the purchase moneys.

"(17.) A landlord, on receiving notice of an intended sale of the tenancy may, if he is not desirous of purchasing the tenancy otherwise than as a means of securing the payment of any sums due to him for arrears of rent or other breaches of the contract or conditions of tenancy, give notice within the prescribed time of the sum claimed by him in respect of such arrears and breaches, such sum failing agreement between the landlord and tenant to be determined by the Court, and should the tenant determine to proceed with the sale may claim to purchase the tenancy for such sum, if no purchaser is found to give the same or a greater sum; and the landlord, if no purchaser be found within the prescribed time to give the same or a greater sum, shall be adjudged the purchaser of the tenancy at that sum,"

—the next Amendment, read a second time.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, though the Government did not see the necessity for the Amendment, they would ask the House to accept it, subject to the omission of the words "shall be deemed to be made by the tenant," which would enable the Court to meet a difficulty of procedure which occurred to him. He would move the omission of these words accordingly. The effect would be that the sale should be made simply in the prescribed manner subject to the conditions of the section. That would enable the Court to make rules to carry out the provision of the section, so far as might be, in conformity with the ordinary legal system.

Amendment proposed to said Amendment, in line 3, to leave out the words "shall be deemed to be made by the tenant." — (Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the said Amendment."

MR. HEALY said, he did not see how the conditions prescribed in the 1st clause could be complied with. Who was to give all the notices that were to be prescribed, because they could hardly expect the sheriff to do so, and it would not be to the interest of the tenant to do so?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) replied, that the matter would have to be settled by the Court.

MR. LEAMY asked if, under the Amendment, a landlord not instituting proceedings to eject a tenant for non-payment, could proceed against him by way of summons; and, also, if he would have the right of pre-emption where he proceeded by writ of summons against the tenant for the recovery of his rent?

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE asked whether, after the landlord had become the purchaser of the tenant right, and a new tenant had been put upon the farm, the new tenant would be enabled to sell the tenant right of the farm which the landlord had been adjudged to have bought?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW): I cannot speak again.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Yes, Sir; he would be able to sell his interest, whatever it is.

MR. PARNELL thought it would be desirable to have an answer to the question which had been put to the Government by an hon. Member sitting on his side of the House (Mr. Leamy), as to whether the effect of the Amendment would be to take the sale out of the category of sales made by the tenant, and, if so, under what class of sales it would come; and, further, whether the landlord would have the right of pre-emption or not under Clause 1?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) rose to answer the question, but—

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE rose to a point of Order, demanding of the Speaker whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman could answer these questions, after having refused to reply to a question put by him (Viscount Folkestone)?

MR. O'KELLY: For the purpose of enabling the right hon. and learned Gentleman—"Order, order!"

MR. SPEAKER: I have to point out that it is customary to allow considerable latitude in answering questions to a right hon. Member having charge of a Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, the matter would be remitted by the clause to the Court to prescribe the rules. His belief was that the Court would not rule that any right of pre-emption existed for the landlord.

Question put, and agreed to; words struck out accordingly.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with The Lords in the said Amendment, as amended."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

MR. HEALY said, this sub-section (15) had been put in at the instance of Lord Cairns. Under the Amendment, the landlord could not only exercise his right of pre-emption and evade the sale, but could have the sale take place 10 times over.

Question put.

MR. PARNELL asked whether sub-sections 16 and 17 were before the House at present, or only sub-section 15?

MR. SPEAKER said, that sub-sections 15, 16, and 17 were before the House.

MR. PARNELL wished to move the omission of sub-section 16.

MR. SPEAKER said, it was too late to do so, the Question having been put. The House had now to decide on sub-sections 15, 16, and 17 together. The one could not be isolated from the others.

MR. HEALY rose to a point of Order. Hon. Members in his part of the House thought the Question before the House was sub-section 15, and were not aware that the other sub-sections were put. He asked whether the Amendment could not be amended?

MR. SPEAKER said, the sub-sections were dealt with, and one of them had been amended. It was not in Order now to move to omit any particular sub-section, as he had put the Question that the House agree with the Lords' Amendment, as amended.

MR. PARNELL said, he was sorry to learn it was now too late to move the omission of sub-section 16, and a part of sub-section 17, for he believed he could have induced the House to refuse to agree to that sub-section. He should be obliged, in consequence, to take a division against the whole of the Amendment. Sub-section 16, which provided that any sum payable to the landlord out of the purchase moneys of the tenancy under the section should be a first charge upon the purchase moneys, gave an entirely new right of a valuable character to the landlord. It gave the landlord a preferential claim against the tenant, and that, he submitted, was a most unfair provision. He could either proceed by ejectment for non-payment, or he could compel the tenant to sell his interest in the holding. The landlord thus had a preferential claim for the whole of his rent, and was exceptionally protected over other creditors as regarded one year's rent. Up to the present time the landlord had no such preferential claim. Some valid reason should be given by the Government for affording landlords this double chance. He thought that the Government had not acted fairly in agreeing to the Amendment on such slight examination, and that they ought to have given some strong reasons for the course they had taken in the matter.

MR. RYLANDS said, he also regretted very much that, owing to the form in which the Amendment was before the House, they could not deal with this 16th sub-section. As that sub-section stood, it might work such a gross injustice to the creditors of tenants in Ireland that he could not vote for the Amendment. It might so happen that when a permanent improvement was made, the landlord might come and sweep in the whole of the money. It was quite plain, and if any person chanced to visit the earth from another sphere, he would see at once that these Amendments had been made by a House of Landowners. He should certainly vote with the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell).

MR. DAWSON said, he was surprised that this matter should have escaped the attention of the Government, for the question, which was closely allied to the Law of Distress, had already been discussed. It was a very retrograde step for that House to take. It was now impossible for them to retrieve their error.

MR. GIBSON said, he wished to point out to hon. Members that those sub-sections only applied when there was a sale of the actual tenancy on which the rent accrued, and it would be absurd, he thought, when the tenancy was sold, not to make some provision that the rent should be paid out of the proceeds.

Insert Clause A (Prohibition of subdividing and sub-letting), the next Amendment, read a second time.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, the proposed clause ran as follows :—

“The tenant from year to year of a tenancy to which this Act applies shall not, without the consent of the landlord in writing, sub-divide his holding, or sub-let the same or any part thereof. Any act done by the tenant in contravention of this provision shall be absolutely void.”

By the Bill, as it stood, a tenant from year to year was prohibited during a statutory term from sub-letting or subdividing without the consent of the landlord; but if the same tenant had no statutory term, there was no prohibition or direction as to whether he might sub-let or not. The difficulty was one which chiefly affected the tenant, having regard to the frame of the Bill. As hon. Members were aware, the only tenant who was a tenant within the meaning of the Bill was a tenant in occupation of his holding, and the necessary result of that was that if the tenant was tempted to sub-let, even although he broke no statutory condition, because none existed, he would at once put himself outside the scope of the Bill. Therefore, it was of enormous importance to the tenants that their obligations in respect of sub-letting should be made uniformly applicable, and that they should know that if they did these acts they put themselves entirely outside the Bill, and rendered themselves incapable of going to the Court to have a fair rent fixed. The clause proposed was, therefore, inserted so as to warn the tenants, and render it impossible that they should damage themselves by sub-letting or sub-division. The Government, however, proposed to omit the last sentence of the clause added in the House of Lords, declaring that any act done in contravention of this provision should be absolutely void, because it was unnecessary, as an illegal act was necessarily void, and to insert words providing that letting on conacre, agistment, or temporary pasturage should not be deemed a sub-letting within the meaning of the Act.

Amendment proposed to said Amendment, to leave out, at end, the words—

“Any act done by the tenant in contravention of this provision shall be absolutely void,” and insert “agistment or the letting of land for the purpose of temporary depasturage, or the letting in conacre of land for the purpose of its being solely used, and which shall be solely used, for the growing of potatoes or other green crops, the land being properly manured, shall not be deemed a sub-letting for the purposes of this Act.”

MR. HEALY said, after the statement by the Government that they thought it desirable for the protection of the tenants that this sub-letting provision should be inserted, it would be useless for the Irish Members to raise any objection; but it was one of the extraordinary things about the Bill that what they gave with one hand they took away with the other. The Bill was one of the most ingenious legislative instruments ever produced by Parliament. They were told that to give a tenant the benefit of this Bill they must take away the right he at present possessed—the right of sub-letting. [“No, no!”] The House, by repealing the 13th section of the Act of 1870, took away the power of the landlord to veto the right of assignment; but they now proposed to neutralize that by taking away the power of sub-letting. He considered it a most unfortunate thing that the Government found it necessary to insert the clause.

MR. LEAMY said, one of the objections to the Amendment was that it would prevent a tenant building a labourer's cottage and attaching it to a piece of land. He must, however, say candidly that, with that exception, he had no objection to see the power of sub-letting taken away.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, he thought the words inserted by the Lords at the end of the clause were quite necessary, and that the noble Lord who proposed them knew more of the state of things in Ireland than the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland. Seeing how difficult it was to turn out an Irish squatter, he was not sure that the far wiser plan would not be to put it on record that any act done in contravention of the provision would be regarded as absolutely void.

MR. PARNELL thought the Government might make some qualification of the proposed Amendment, which would give to the tenant under the Act of 1870 the right which the repeal of the 13th section gave him—namely, the right of sub-division by assignment to more than one person. The result of the present proposal was that the Government took away, by the clause, the right which they had previously given the tenant,

Would it not be fairer, he asked, to modify that clause so as to secure him against danger, and leave to him his right of sub-letting, and at the same time giving him the right of applying to the Court to fix a judicial rent and a statutory term?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) pointed out that the hon. Member (Mr. Parnell) was under a misapprehension, because assignment was one thing and sub-letting and subdivision another. The 13th section of the Land Act of 1870 dealt only with assignment, and it provided, in the case of assignment without the consent of the landlord, that there should be no compensation for disturbance. But the provision they were now considering dealt only with the case of sub-letting or subdivision, and what the Government had done in framing the clause was entirely consistent with the provisions of the Land Act.

MR. DAWSON hoped that the Amendment would not interfere with the right of occupiers to let land for labourers' dwellings.

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

Said Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

Amendments as far as Amendment in page 5, line 15, read a second time.

On Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND, the first five agreed to, as follows:—In page 3, line 37, leave out from ("intestate") to ("then") in line 39; in line 40, leave out ("next of kin"), and insert ("persons entitled under the Statutes of Distribution to his personal estate"); in page 4, line 2, leave out ("his"), and insert ("the"); in lines 7 and 8, leave out ("next of kin"), and insert ("leaving any person entitled to his personal estate or any part thereof"); and in line 9, leave out from ("tenant") to the end of the clause.

On Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND, in page 4, line 25, after ("tenancy") insert ("after giving to the landlord the prescribed notice"); and in page 5, line 10, leave out from ("soil") to the end of the paragraph; the remaining Amendments disagreed to.

Page 5, line 15, leave out the words "subdivide or sublet his holding," and insert the words—

"In writing, subdivide his holding or sublet the same, or any part thereof, or erect or suffer to be erected thereon, save as in this Act provided, any dwelling-house, in addition to those already upon the holding at the time of the passing of this Act, nor suffer to be used as a dwelling-house any building which, at the time of the passing of this Act, was not so used, with the knowledge and consent of the landlord,"

—the next Amendment, read a second time.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the Government did not think the Amendment could be assented to as it stood, although at the same time it had a reasonable purpose in it. The multiplication of dwelling-houses on a holding was not an act fairly within the province of the tenant, and might prove very injurious to the holding. He divided, however, the Amendment into two parts, that which related to the erection of any new dwelling-houses; and, secondly, that which related to the use of any building for the purposes of habitation which at the time of the passing of the Act was not so used. With regard to the first, the Government thought that the words were objectionable on the grounds of ambiguity. He need hardly say that the Government were quite opposed to the multiplication of dwelling-houses on a holding; but it was quite evident that in some parts of the country it would be a common and very useful thing that where a tenant had gone upon the holding, living in a poor hut not well situated for the purposes of a dwelling-house, it might happen that, improving in his circumstances and means, he would erect a decent dwelling-house, and cease to occupy that hut as a dwelling-house, and convert it into an out-house. It would be, he thought, a great pity to allow any words to go into the Bill to discourage that proceeding. He therefore proposed to strike out the words standing in the Amendment, "in addition to," for the purpose of inserting "otherwise than in substitution for." That, he thought, would prevent the arbitrary multiplication of dwelling-houses. With regard to the second part of the Amendment, the Government proposed to omit it altogether, because, after all, how did the case stand? They had still a large portion of the population of Ireland very indifferently lodged. The man occupied a small hut, which was tolerable for himself and wife; but, as his children multiplied, he might require additional accommodation which might be enough for him, however poor, and he might add to the comfort of his family by occupying some out-buildings attached to the house. Or, again, he was not prepared to say that if a daughter or son of the man married, it should be absolutely forbidden to him by the law to find accommodation for them on the holding, when, by adapting some building which might possibly be on the holding, and not required for any other purpose, this could be done. The Government, however, proposed to concede to the House of Lords and hon. Gentlemen opposite the proposal that the permission to sub-let or sub-divide should be a permission in writing.

Amendment proposed to said Amendment, in line 5, to leave out the words "in addition to," and insert "otherwise than in substitution for."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he objected to the Amendment altogether, and considered it was a monstrous interference on the part of the Government with the rights and comforts of the Irish peasants. It was based upon that peddling and intrusive action of the landlords which should be put a stop to rather than encouraged, and the Amendment ought to be rejected altogether. The Prime Minister had admitted, as everyone would be prepared to admit, the wretched condition of the dwellings of the peasantry, and yet the proposal of the Government directly deprived a tenant who might have risen in the world of the privilege of passing from a hovel into a somewhat better house, and of the power to build a more commodious dwelling.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR, while agreeing that the Amendment was an extremely absurd one, did not consider that the Government should reject the whole of the Lords' Amendment, because the great evil of Ireland at the present time was its overcrowding. That was acknowledged by everyone; and it was also a fact that a man put his married daughters, sons, and, in many instances, his grandchildren, into wretched lodgings on his holding, and although that was not formally sub-letting, it was one of the evils of overcrowding that existed to some extent. At present the landlord had some check upon that system, and he had power to give his tenant notice to quit; but, according to the present proposal, the landlord would not be able to hold any threat over his head. He anticipated, therefore, that in the poorer parts of the South and West of Ireland overcrowding would be further increased among the agricultural population. The Government were not only encouraging the people to live in bad houses, but discouraging them from building good ones. Although the proposal of the Lords appeared stringent and harsh, he hoped the Government would not take it away without introducing some provision by which the evil of overcrowding might be avoided.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE said, he regretted extremely that the Government had decided not to accept the Amendment of the Lords, which he considered was the most wholesome one that had been made by their Lordships. By rejecting the latter part of the Amendment the Government would tend to increase those wretched habitations, for all sorts of out-buildings and hovels, which were now used for cow-houses, cart-sheds, and stables, would be used as dwelling-houses for human beings, not only in the West and South of Ireland, but in his own Province, where the people lived in an unsanitary condition. He thought the Government should be glad of the provision of the House of Lords, that no out-house or building should be used as a dwelling without the consent of the landlord. Labourers sometimes were lodged in those out-houses, and the tenants charged them—in parts of Ulster—four or five times as much for those so-called dwellings as they paid for them themselves, or that would pay for a good dwelling-house.

MR. W. E. FORSTER thought the last speakers were trying to guard against an evil that the Bill already guarded against. The danger of overcrowding was mainly as to the subdivision of the tenancy into a great many small divisions. The Government had prevented that; and if these words were not struck out, as proposed by the Prime Minister, they would be simply substituting one shape of the evil for another, for there would be more overcrowding of the families in the bad houses in which they were now living.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOOTE said, it seemed to him that the Government were proceeding in this matter, as in other matters connected with the Bill, with a very extravagant suspicion and distrust of the landlords. The argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister and others was that if the last words of the Amendment were not left out they would, in point of fact, be preventing any building which was not now in use as a dwelling-house from hereafter being used as a dwelling-house. But that was not the meaning of the Proviso at all. Why were they to suppose that the landlord would fail in that which was at once his duty and interest, seeing that the best arrangements were made for housing the people living on his estate? If it was desirable that any particular houses should be enlarged by taking in out-houses and converting them into a dwelling-house, the landlord would be the first man to promote it. There was no reason why he should object. On the other hand, they were going to take away the voice of the landlords in the matter, and, by the Amendment before the House as amended by the Prime Minister, they were encouraging the adoption of the principle that where places were not fit for habitation there should be more crowding of people into them, to the manifest disadvantage of those who were to be so overcrowded. He thought the objection which the Government had taken to the last portion of the clause was an unreasonable one. The Amendment did not prevent out-houses being used as dwellings, but said that they must not be so used without the consent of the landlord.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he had listened to this discussion with absolute dismay, because it seemed to him that taking any persons belonging to families who might have married, and putting them into small out-houses which were absolute pigsties, was certain to produce overcrowding and that disregard of sanitary laws which was one of the great causes of the misery that prevailed in Ireland. One of the greatest blessings to Ireland, he believed, would be if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland would take care that the ordinary sanitary laws were enforced in rural districts, because the people were not yet alive to the dreadful evils which resulted from this overcrowding. In the interests of the tenants they ought to preserve them against this temptation. Instead of encouraging families to increase on one holding that was insufficient to maintain one family, what would be more natural than that some of them should go out into the world and provide for themselves elsewhere? The only cure which he looked forward to for the purposes of remedying this evil, and which he believed would be a national one, was the amalgamation of the smaller holdings into the larger ones, and the raising of the social status of the tenants in possession.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he thought the House must be under some misconception of the view of the Government. He could not believe that it was the intention of the Government, by their proposal, if a tenant farmer wished to provide extra accommodation for his increased family, that he must have recourse to a disused cow-house or shed. At least, if the farmer did so, he should be allowed to make the said cow-house fit for human habitation. What was the use of the Government maintaining the distinction that a man might only put members of his own family into out-houses, when the farmer had permission to make it into a dwelling-house? If the Government really intended that a farmer should have the right of providing decent accommodation for the members of his family, they ought to say so plainly in their Amendment. He was convinced that the plain meaning of the Government's Amendment was not its intended meaning.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, there were two distinct things in the Amendment—one part of it related to the sub-letting and sub-dividing of land, and the other to the erection of dwellings. As to the first, it might in some parts of Ireland be objectionable; but he could not see what objection could be raised to the substitution of a better class of buildings for small tenants than those which now existed. He had often heard of Conservative proposals; but the most wonderfully Conservative proposal that had ever come before his notice was that now before the House to conserve the mud hovels of Ireland, for that was what the Amendment came to. Though there were many objectionable Amendments on the Paper, he considered this the worst of all. It was a notorious fact that the peasantry of Ireland had been for generations past the worst-clad and the worst-housed in Europe, and yet these objectionable dwellings were to be conserved by the Government. Why should the House of Lords or the House of Commons object to give every possible encouragement to the erection not only of better, but larger dwellings on farms? He hoped that before the discussion closed the Government would think better of the course they had proposed.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN observed, that the right hon. Baronet (Sir Stafford Northcote) said the Government seemed to be animated with a great fear of the landlords; but there was no need to cast reflections on the Irish landlords as a body in discussing that Amendment. In all preventive measures they had to deal with the one exceptional member of the community who might do wrong, rather than the 99 who of their own free will did right. That principle applied to the present Amendment, which he considered a most mischievous one, which it was to be regretted the Government had encouraged, because they were practically giving to the landlord a power of limiting the accommodation on the farms of Ireland. If Conservative Members were satisfied with the dwellings of Ireland as they at present stood, let them say so openly. He would refer hon. Members to the case of Lord Leitrim, as a well-authenticated illustration of the autocratic power wielded by the landlord. A tenant, dissatisfied with his thatched hovel, built a snug little cottage on the English model, and nicely slated. The hut which he left after the new dwelling was finished was converted into a cow-house. The first time Lord Leitrim passed the spot, and saw the tenant had built a tidy house, he sent for the tenant and asked who gave him permission to build, and what he had done with the old house. The tenant answered that he had put the cows in it; whereupon Lord Leitrim ordered the tenant to leave the new house and return to the old hovel, which he accordingly did, while his cattle were placed in the newly-built dwelling. He believed that if the Lords' Amendment were modified in the manner proposed, the result would be that the industrious and well-disposed tenant farmer would be seriously hampered and embarrassed by the power which the landlord would still be enabled to exercise over him.

Mr. T. D. Sullivan

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) explained that by striking out the words "in addition to" the tenant farmer would not be enabled to have two dwelling-houses upon his holding, retaining them both as dwelling-houses. It would exactly meet the case referred to by the hon. and learned Member (Mr. A. M. Sullivan), for there was nothing to prevent him building a new house, and using the other as a cow-house or for any similar purpose. The first part of the clause was not so objectionable; but it must be borne in mind that if the tenant brought a family, and put them into possession of a house on his holding, in point of law that would be a sub-division of the holding. It was better for the tenant that he should be warned. The landlord had no right to pry into the social life of the tenant, and try to find out how many rooms he had in his dwelling, or which building he used as a cow-house. He (the Attorney General for Ireland) thought, however, he might fairly require that the number of dwellings should not be multiplied, because it probably would be that the only reason for building another dwelling was that there might be a sub-letting or sub-division when it was built.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he understood that the Amendment, as proposed by the Government, amounted to this—that a tenant might build himself a new dwelling-house in substitution of the old one, and turn the latter into a cow-house or pigstye; but if, after a time, he desired to provide for the accommodation of his married daughter or son, he might eject the pigs, and give their abandoned stye to his children for a dwelling, but he could not build a new house for them. It seemed to him that the Amendment was an encouragement and a fostering of the worst form of overcrowding they could possibly imagine.

MR. C. S. PARKER observed, that to provide for the increase of a family by suffering to be used as human dwellings buildings which were not intended or fit for such a purpose, was a very bad arrangement. Surely, it would be a more natural and a better course to provide for the increase of the family by adding to the existing house. If, therefore, the Government would insert the words "or in enlargement of" in their own Amendment, he thought the desired end would be attained. The Amendment ran, as corrected by them—

“Erect, or suffer to be erected thereon, save as in this Act provided, any dwelling-house otherwise than in substitution for.”

There he would suggest that the words “or in enlargement of” should be inserted, and then the Amendment would continue thus—“those already on the holding.”

MR. DAWSON said, the law itself was sufficient to prevent overcrowding. It stipulated there should be 300 cubic feet of space to every person occupying a house; and if the Public Health Act were carried out properly, they never would hear of those atrocious crimes which arose from overcrowding in England as well as in Ireland. The House would be surprised when he said there was only one corporate body in Ireland who had carried out the last Public Health Act in its integrity, and that was the Corporation of Dublin. If the Government would insist upon a proper observance of the law in that respect, a vast improvement would very speedily take place.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, he had listened with very great interest to the remarks of the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Dawson), who was soon to occupy the highest civic position in Ireland, and hoped the happiest results would follow from his influence when he occupied it. He quite agreed with the hon. Gentleman that in Ireland as well as in England the true remedy for the overcrowding which they desired to stop lay in the rigid application of the existing laws by the public authorities. The Government were willing to accept a certain portion of the Amendment, and he should give them his support, because he believed it would be useful so far as it went. He earnestly hoped, however, that the Local Government Board, aided and supported by the Irish Members, irrespective of Party, would firmly carry out the present law, because if they did that they would accomplish very good work. The landlords were placed in a very difficult position in this matter, because if they prohibited sub-letting and the evils which flowed from it, a greater cry was raised on the ground of their alleged tyrannical conduct; while, on the other hand, if they did not try to prevent that horrible system of sub-division, which was carried out very often by a man bringing in his own son as a lodger, then they were told that they were neglecting the interests of their tenants. Landlords were held up to public execration because they did not provide better accommodation for the people on their estates, although their efforts in that direction encountered the greatest difficulties. The only way in which a landlord could be supported was by the public sanitary authorities coming forward and insisting that the law should be carried out.

MR. BRODRICK thought that the proposals of the Government had met with no approval from any quarter of the House; and if the suggestion of the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Parker) was accepted, there would exist no reason for omitting the words in the House of Lords' Amendment which the Government proposed.

MR. CALLAN also approved of the suggestion of the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Parker), and said the people of Ireland well remembered the verdict of wilful murder passed in relation to an occurrence on the Lansdowne estate, and the terms in which Chief Justice Pigott denounced the inhuman regulations prevailing on the estate with respect to sub-letting. If this Amendment passed, the offences against humanity of 30 years ago would simply be perpetuated. If the clause were accepted without some material modification, it would legalize to some extent the inhuman practice which was so strongly denounced by Chief Justice Pigott.

LORD ELCHO said, everyone must wish to see the people well-housed, and therefore he thought the view of the Prime Minister would not hold water. He (Lord Elcho) was glad to learn that these cabins and pigstyes could not be let, because that would be sub-letting, as forbidden by the Act. By way of showing how sub-letting was apt to grow up, he would ask the attention of the House to a case within his own knowledge where a tenant with a holding of 10 acres at £5, upon an estate on which sub-letting was prohibited, did, without the knowledge of the landlord, let two portions of his holding for £5 10s. That was more than his own rent, and yet the man had paid no rent for two years. He (Lord Elcho) had always been told that the great evil of Ireland was overcrowding, and surely, therefore, it was of the utmost importance to take all possible means to prevent sub-letting and over-crowding. It was, no doubt, desirable that the dwellings should be commensurate with the size of families; but there was the well-known attachment to the holding which tended to the concentration of the whole members of the family in one place, and made it quite possible that a tenant, wishing to keep all his family at home, might add to the house and make it unsuitable to the holding; and therefore he thought it would be well to insert the words "provided always that the existing buildings are suitable to the holding."

[First Night.]

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

Amendment proposed to the said Amendment in line 5, to leave out all the words after the word "Act," to the end of the said Amendment.—(Mr. Gladstone.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the said Amendment."

SIR JOHN HAY, arguing in favour of the retention of the latter portion of the Lords' Amendment, said, that after they had built their improved cottages, there was great difficulty in getting rid of the old ones; and he could give an instance with respect to himself which had happened within the last 12 months. He built an improved cottage upon the farm and allowed the old one to remain, and he afterwards found that the tenant had let the old one for £5 a-year to persons who were not wanted upon the farm, and who were no credit to it. Fortunately, in Scotland, the landlords had powers which the Irish landlords had not—namely, that of unroofing the cottage and getting rid of the persons so brought in—and thus they were able to remedy the evil. For his part, he viewed the words inserted in the clause as an exceedingly advantageous Amendment. He agreed with what had been said about the surroundings and the amount of population; but if they were going to keep on the land an extra population, living in a state of wretchedness in buildings unfit for human habitation, they were legislating in a direction that would have still worse effects upon the population of the country. He submitted, therefore, that the last part of the provision ought to be retained, and so prevent the appropriation of buildings for dwelling-houses which were really not suitable for human habitation.

MR. W. E. FORSTER denied that, by striking out the latter portion of the Lords' Amendment, the Government were giving encouragement to the use of out-houses for living in or to sub-letting. There was a provision against sub-letting already, and the question was this—were they to have words in the Amendment which would make it impossible, without the written consent of the landlord, that any sort of building, happening to be not previously used as a dwelling-house, should ever be allowed to be so used? It would be an interference with the tenants which could do no good. There might be something worse than a bad dwelling, and that was no house at all. The only way to obviate the evil was not by such Amendments as these, but by generally raising the standard of living in the country.

MR. LALOR hoped that the words would be struck out, and pointed out that it would be necessary in certain cases to convert out-buildings into dwelling-houses. In the present state of Ireland, and taking into consideration the dwelling-houses of the people, he thought the Amendment was most unworthy the House from which it had come, and it would be most unworthy for this House to allow it to remain in the Bill.

SIR THOMAS ACLAND appealed to the Government not to strike out that part of the clause, unless they put something better in its place. The custom of inhabiting unsuitable dwellings in Ireland was a disgrace to that country, and ought to be discouraged as far as possible.

MR. W. H. SMITH agreed with the hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Thomas Acland). He (Mr. W. H. Smith) would deplore any Amendment by which encouragement would be afforded to persons to live on the land in excess of the number it could properly accommodate, and in dwelling-houses which were unsuitable for habitation. The Amendment of the Prime Minister on the Lords' Amendment would leave unguarded the danger, that was too common, which arose from the fact that grown-up members of the family were, through feelings of kindness, allowed to remain on the farm, when, in point of fact, they ought to go away. He hoped the House would not insist on striking out those words.

MR. HEALY said, he hoped the House would not yield to Whig pressure. He would remind the Government that it was not the opinion of North Devon, nor the opinion of Westminster, that they had to consider, but the opinion of the Irish people. What did the hon. Members for those places know about Ireland? They were told, indeed, that the Irish tenants were so much in the habit of building palatial residences that it was necessary to protect them against themselves by giving the unfortunate and powerless landlords the right of objecting to any building they wished. Had those who talked in that way seen the squalor in which the Irish people lived, had they seen the hundreds of habitations occupied by a dozen persons each, and did they want to prevent these unfortunate people from providing themselves with better houses? ["No, no!"] Hon. Members might say "No!" as long as they liked; but that was the meaning of the clause. The Irish did not live in those miserable dwellings of their own choice, and he thought it discreditable that hon. Members should try to prevent the Irish people from having better houses. He not only objected to the words proposed to be left out; but he objected to the whole clause, regarding it as a miserable prying provision into the private affairs of the tenant which ought not to be accepted.

MR. MACARTNEY objected to the tenants having power provided to convert out-houses into dwellings, and said, that the multiplication of families on the same farm—which generally happened when a married son or daughter occupied an out-house or barn as a house—was a fruitful source of disputes and quarrels among the families themselves and annoyance to the landlord. The Amendment introduced into the Bill was a good one, and he maintained that all it did was to prevent more than one family being located upon one farm that was too small for them.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, that the effect of the omission of the words would be to enable tenants to build out-houses and then to use them as dwelling-houses.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the position of the Government in regard to the Amendment was this—the more difficulties hon. Gentlemen opposite raised in reference to the omission of the latter portion of the clause, the more doubt they created in the minds of the Government as to whether they should retain the clause at all. They wished to retain the clause; but they could not with those words in it. If the objection to striking out the words proposed was so great, he must frankly admit that the only alternative the Government had was to strike out the clause altogether. They objected to the last part of the clause, because it would be an intolerable inquisition into the private affairs of the tenant to see whether he had used certain buildings on his farm for the accommodation, perhaps, of a growing family. The remarks of hon. Gentlemen about the necessity of comfortable houses for the Irish tenants to live in reminded him of the old story at the time of the abolition of the Corn Laws, when people replied to the allegation of the scarcity of bread, that the confectioners' shops were full of cakes and buns. It was a question between living and no living at all. Certain people crowded their families into these miserable places, and therefore they would prohibit them from putting them into out-houses where the adaptation might be perfectly easy and proper. By not prohibiting persons from converting out-houses into dwellings it was said they encouraged them to do something absurd; but the gentry of Scotland had overbuilt themselves, and had been compelled to sell their estates. He could name counties in Scotland where there was hardly a gentleman but had had to do this within the last two generations. Would it, therefore, be a wise thing to say that no gentleman should be allowed to build upon an estate more than a certain portion of the rental? They did not encourage the gentry of Scotland to build enormous houses beyond the means of their estates, merely because they did not prohibit them. And it was only a question here whether they should absolutely prohibit. The Government held that the matter with which the Amendment dealt was not one in which the Legislature ought to pry, or with which they ought to interfere. They declined to make the precise prudence of everything done by every tenant in Ireland an object of legislative enactment.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he was surprised that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister should have recourse to so antiquated a joke in support of his argument, and still more that he should have made so egregious an historical blunder in quoting it. All the world, except the right hon. Gentleman, knew that the saying about the confectioners' shops dated, not from the era of Corn Law Repeal, but from that of the French Revolution, and was attributed, not to an English squire, but to an illustrious Princess. The hon. Member for County Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) ought to know something of the question, and he was in favour of the retention of the words. He (Lord John Manners) thought it would be an excellent thing that the Irish tenants should be discouraged from inhabiting the wretched abodes of which they seemed to be so fond. He was anxious, as far as possible, to meet the views of Her Majesty's Government, and such a case as that indicated by the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. It might be possible to do that by introducing the word "separate," so that the words might run "nor suffer to be used as a separate dwelling-house." He begged to move that the Amendment be amended in that way.

Further Amendment proposed to said Amendment in line 7, after the words "as a," to insert the word "separate."
—(Lord John Manners.)

Question proposed, "That that word be there inserted."

MR. PARNELL said, that as the Government had not conciliated the Conservative opposition by agreeing to one part of the Lords' Amendment, it would be better to re-consider their position and see whether they would agree to any portion of it at all. It was a matter of a very small and petty character; but the power which had been used by landlords in that way had caused considerable irritation. He fully admitted that in ordinary circumstances it was not right that the tenant should be permitted to build a house and bring in people not at all connected with him. But in the case of a near relative—a mother, for example—a man might desire to provide a separate house; or, in the case of a young married couple, the old father or mother might desire to have them in a separate dwelling, and it seemed desirable that that should be permitted.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the intention of the Amendment of the noble Lord (Lord John Manners) was to draw a distinction quite arbitrary, and for that reason he could not accept it. There might be two houses perfectly suitable, and one could be used because attached to the dwelling-house, and the other could not because detached from it.

LORD JOHN MANNERS begged to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

ON MOTION of MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND, in page 5, line 28, after ("minerals,") to insert ("or digging or searching for minerals,") the first Amendment, agreed to; and, in line 32, after ("title,") insert ("and which the tenant, at the time of the passing of this Act, may be entitled by law to cut and remove,") the second Amendment, disagreed to.

Page 5, line 34, leave out the words "may be required," and insert the words—

"The tenant may be entitled to cut in exercise of any right enjoyed by him immediately before the commencement of the statutory term,"

—the next Amendment, read a second time.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND (MR. LAW) said, he thought the House might accept this Amendment. It gave the landlord the right to cut turf on a holding save such as the—

“Tenant might be entitled to cut in exercise of any right enjoyed by him before the commencement of a statutory term.”

He did not see more than a verbal difference between the Lords' Amendment and the original provision in the Bill; but if the Lords wished to state the provision in a longer way he had no objection.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said Amendment.”—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

MR. PARNELL hoped the Amendment would not be hastily accepted. He thought the Government should first assure themselves that the change was not to the disadvantage of the tenant. There was a distinct difference between the Amendment and the provision which originally stood in the Bill. The original provision allowed the tenant to cut the turf that might be required for the use of the holding; but it did not go into the question whether the tenant was legally entitled to exercise the right of cutting the turf, and it was from that point of view that he thought the provision was of some value to the tenant. But under the new provision, and taking into consideration the effect of an Act passed in 1860, the tenant might be under the obligation of purchasing the turf required for his holding from the landlord to any amount that would be equal to the rent for the whole holding. The original provision also prevented the turf being cut by the landlord. He therefore considered that the amending words made an essential difference on the sub-section as it stood when it left the Commons, and hoped the House would disagree with the Lords' Amendment.

MR. GIVAN said, as the Mover of the Amendment which was accepted in the Committee of that House, he objected to the alteration introduced by the Lords. At the same time, he believed that if it were agreed to there would be no restriction upon the right of the tenant to cut such turf as he was entitled to and as actually existed upon the holding. But it would open a door to the landlord to enter the holding and cut turf, which, although not immediately required for the holding, must be essential to its value hereafter. His (Mr. Givan's) intention was to save, not only the turf necessary for present use, but for future use. If the Lords' Amendment were accepted, that purpose would not be secured.

MR. HEALY said, that if the clause were adhered to, it would deprive many poor people of their right to cut turf for fuel, and the consequence was that the poor people in various parts of Ireland, if deprived of their turbary rights, would starve from cold at different periods of the year. On the hon. Member for Leitrim's (Mr. Tottenham's) estate 50 heads of families had been sent to gaol (according to that evening's paper) for having insisted on their ancient right to cut turf. This showed that there was a strong feeling on the subject in Ireland. He hoped the Government would give way in this matter. Sometimes the landlord would exact for the turf an amount equal, perhaps, to the rent of the holding.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, that when he expressed the opinion that the clause inserted by the Lords was practically the same as that which appeared in the sub-section when it left the Commons, he had only looked at the words cursorily, and understood that the Lords had only made a verbal Amendment, as represented by them at the time of its introduction; but as there seemed to be an impression that the Amendment was against the interest of the tenant, and likewise some doubt as to whether the words it contained meant the same as those originally in the Bill, it would, he thought, be better for them to keep to their own words, and strike out the Lords' Amendment. He would, therefore, request leave to withdraw his Motion agreeing to the Amendment in order to ask the House to disagree to it. [“Oh, oh!” and “No, no!”]

MR. TOTTENHAM said, the Bill, as originally introduced, was not intended to give the tenants any rights they had not previously enjoyed; but an Amendment to the hon. Member for Monaghan's (Mr. Givan's) Motion, which was accepted by the Government, gave him a new right, and the object of the Amendment of the Lords was simply to put the right back to its original shape. He regretted to see a Minister accept in one breath an Amendment, and ask leave to withdraw it in another. It was a most singular instance of a Ministerial change of mind in a very short space of time. It was most extraordinary even in connection with this most extraordinary Bill, and he hoped the House would not allow the right hon. and learned Gentleman to do as he wished. He (Mr. Tottenham) would press the Amendment to a division.

Question put.

The House divided: — Ayes 146; Noes 263: Majority 117.—(Div. List, No. 366.)

Amendments, as far as the Amendment in page 5, line 43, read a second time.

Page 5, line 35, after ("roads") insert ("fences"), and after ("water-courses") insert ("passing and repassing to and from the seashore with or without horses and carriages for exercising any right of property or royal franchise belonging to the landlord"), the first Amendment.

MR. HEALY moved to insert "by any existing right of way."

Amendment proposed to said Amendment, in line 3, after the word "seashore," to insert "by any existing right of way."—(Mr. Healy.)

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Said Amendment agreed to.

Line 38, after ("game") insert ("as defined for the purposes of the Act twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth Victoria, chapter sixty-seven"); and line 41, after ("game") insert as defined for the purposes of the Act twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth Victoria, chapter sixty-seven), the remaining Amendments.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) moved to disagree with the Amendments, which, he said, made certain birds game which had been included in no previous Game Act in England, and no Act in Ireland, until the year 1864, when they were made so by an Act passed then for a particular purpose. If the House resolved to disagree with the Amendments, he would consent, at a subsequent part of the sub-section, to insert the following definition of the animals and birds which should be included under the head of

"Game":—Hares, rabbits, pheasants, partridges, quails, landrail, grouse, woodcocks, and snipe.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the said Amendments."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

MR. PLUNKET said, his right hon. and learned Friend was not correct in the statement he had just made, as he would find in the older Irish statutes, now still in force, that the birds he was excluding from the list were included in the Game List. If only the animals and birds mentioned by his right hon. and learned Friend were included under the head of "Game," there would be a serious infringement of the present right of the landlord's property. These birds were included in the Statute of 1864, and he trusted that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would not exclude them from the Act. Without the suggested alteration, the rights of the landlords were already sufficiently curtailed. He regretted the decision of the Government, and all the more so because the reason given was that the wild ducks proposed to be excluded were migratory. He trusted his right hon. and learned Friend would be able to adopt the language deliberately chosen in the Act of 1864.

MR. H. R. BRAND said, he also hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman would re-consider his decision. By the Irish Game Act of 1864 wild duck were included as game; and if now taken out of the Bill, the result would seriously affect proprietary rights, for the people would pursue them, and, in so doing, injure other game. The tenant would be likely to lose more in powder and shot than he would gain by being allowed to shoot those birds.

MR. FITZPATRICK supported the Amendments. In many parts of the South-West of Ireland those birds bred all through the year, and the best ornithological authorities regarded them as game birds of the best kind. Besides, there were such things as "decoys," which were worked on pecuniary principles, and gave a large return to the landlord, besides affording employment on a large scale—he knew one which brought in £300 a-year—and in them widgeon, teal, and wild duck were bred. The decoys would be ruined if the Amendments were disagreed to, because the farmers would shoot the ducks at night on their lands, and the employment now given to the people in watching them would be taken away. He hoped nothing would be done that would injuriously affect those interests.

COLONEL BARNE said, that in the part of the country he came from more sport was spoilt by decoys than by anything he knew. He would like to see every decoy there done away with, and hoped the Government would have no mercy on them. His experience was that they caught all their neighbours' ducks, and wrung their necks.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he was in hopes that some hon. Member for Hampshire or Dorsetshire, where wild fowl most abounded, would have risen to give his views on this subject. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland made an excursion into those counties he would find that wild fowl added considerably to the food supply of the country. ["Question!"] That was the Question, for if those birds were taken out of the category of game they would sooner rather than later be all destroyed. The Lords' Amendment was, therefore, most wise, and was in the interests of the whole community.

Question put, and agreed to.

Consequential Amendment proposed to be made in the Bill, to insert as a separate paragraph, page 5, line 43, the words—

"The word game, for the purpose of this subsection, means hares, rabbits, pheasants, partridges, quails, landrails, grouse, woodcocks, and snipe."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, after the word "means," to insert the word "deer."—(Viscount Folkestone.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'deer' be there inserted."

MR. PARNELL objected to the Motion, and contended that it was an unreasonable thing to protect deer, which were not, so far as he was aware, protected under any ordinary Game Act. These animals in Ireland did not range the mountainous country, but were, or should be, kept by proprietors in enclosed deer parks. If allowed to range beyond those parks into a cultivated country, deer were most mischievous animals, and farmers should have the right to destroy them as an unmitigated nuisance.

MR. HENEAGE took exception to rabbits being included. He would like to know by what statute rabbits were game?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) explained that the reason for rabbits being included was in order to preserve the concurrent right that the landlord and tenant possessed.

Amendment to the proposed Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Consequential Amendment agreed to.

In line 43, after ("1880") insert—

"And the provisions of the Act twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth Victoria, chapter sixty-seven, shall extend where such rights of shooting and taking game belongs exclusively to the landlord as though such exclusive right were reserved by the landlord to himself by deed,"

—the next Amendment agreed to.

Amendments, as far as the Amendment in page 6, line 27, read a second time.

Lines 3 and 4, after ("sub-section") insert—

("During the continuance of a statutory term, all mines and minerals, coals, and coal pits, quarries of limestone and other stone and slate, gravel and sandpits, woods and underwoods, and all bogs and bog timber, turbaries for cutting turf, and rights of turbary, except such of the said rights as the tenant, under the contract of tenancy subsisting immediately before the commencement of the statutory term, was lawfully entitled to exercise, shall be deemed to be exclusively reserved to the landlord,")

—the next Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he could not accept the Amendment, which was founded upon a misrepresentation of the law which governed these matters. It was superfluous, and, like all superfluities, was mischievous. All these things were absolutely the landlord's property, and all that he required was to get at them.

[First Night.]

Motion made, and Question, "That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the said Amendment,"—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland),—put, and agreed to.

On the Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND, page 6, line 6, after ("liquors") insert—

("Nothing contained in this section shall prejudice or affect any ejectionment for non-payment of rent instituted by a landlord, whether before or after the commencement of a statutory term, in respect of rent accrued due for a holding before the commencement of such term,")
—the next Amendment, agreed to.

Page 6, line 8, leave out ("consequent on an increase of rent by the landlord,") the next Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. LAW), in moving that the House disagree with the Amendment, said, there was no very important question involved in it, except by way of reference; but when they came to the proposed modification of the 7th clause a substantial issue would be raised.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the said Amendment."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

MR. GIBSON said, that the Amendment was the first point at which attention could be drawn to an important question in connection with the power of resumption and statutory terms.

Question put, and agreed to.

Page 6, line 12, after ("estate") insert ("including the use of the ground as building ground,") the next Amendment, agreed to.

Page 6, line 27, leave out from the word "as" to the word "prohibits," in line 33, the next Amendment, read a second time.

MR. GLADSTONE said, it was unnecessary to argue this Amendment. The provision which it was proposed to omit revived the whole question of compensation for disturbance which was adopted upon very full consideration in the House of Commons. The Government would distinctly adhere to the increased scale of compensation agreed upon in the Bill as it was sent to the other House. He moved that the House disagree with the Amendment.

MR. HEALY said, that, while opposed to the Amendment, he believed the old scale under the Land Act of 1870 was far better than the new scale for the smaller tenants under £10 valuation.

MR. W. H. SMITH hoped the House would agree to the Lords' Amendment. The new scale was adopted in Committee; but, certainly, no ground was shown why the amount of compensation should be so large as was now proposed. Although, as the right hon. Gentleman had said, they had discussed the question at considerable length, yet he (Mr. W. H. Smith) ventured to think that the other House of Parliament had acted wisely in the matter, and that there was not sufficient ground for disagreeing to their Amendment.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 293; Noes 172: Majority 121.—(Div. List, No. 367.)

Amendments, as far as page 8, line 18, read a second time.

On the Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND, page 6, line 37, leave out from ("land") to ("From") in page 7, line 27, the next Amendment, disagreed to.

Page 8, line 9, after ("mill") insert ("otherwise suitable to the holding on which it is erected,") the next Amendment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with The Lords in the said Amendment."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

MR. J. N. RICHARDSON (who spoke amidst cries of "Agreed!") said, this Amendment of their Lordships had affected a great number of tenants in the North of Ireland. The words as introduced by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland in Committee protected the tenant fully, but the words in the Amendment made in "another place" were not only unnecessary, but mischievous.

MR. GIVAN opposed the Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

Page 3, line 15, leave out from the second word "landlord," to the word "may," in line 17, the next Amendment, read a second time.

Mr. GLADSTONE, in moving that the House disagree with the Lords in the said Amendment, said, the Government could not agree to it. ["Oh, oh!"] Well, they were not likely to be brought to accept Amendments by such expressions, which had no influence whatever. Tenant and landlord were not in the same position, and they could not open the Court to the landlord without qualification. This was a matter on which the Opposition were very desirous that landlords should be admitted to the Court, and the Government accordingly had given the landlord the admission into Court after demanding an increase of rent from the tenant. To that principle the Government must adhere, and permanently adhere. After demanding that increase of rent and its being refused, they thought there should be an admission, as there must have been an attempt to settle with the tenant on the part of the landlord before invoking the intervention of the Court. That was a principle that was founded on reason. They did not see why the same rule should not be applied to the landlord; but, at the same time, they would sooner change the order, and rather than agree to the omission of the words they would make the principle applicable to the tenant, and compel him also to make application to the landlord in the first instance. In no kind of way could they be induced to agree to leave the words out.

Mr. GIBSON said, that when the Bill was first introduced the Court was only open to one of the parties, and that was the tenant. That was so abhorrent to the decency and common sense of the House, that at once and very early, long before they came to Clause 7, the Prime Minister announced that the Court would be thrown open to the landlord. [Mr. Gladstone: In a particular mode.] The Prime Minister stated very early that he would indicate the way in which it would be opened when they came to Clause 7. How was that done, and how was it done now? He should have thought if the Courts were to be Courts of Justice, the doors should be open to both sides, which was the order in all the Queen's Courts throughout the world. There were two ways by which it might be open to the two parties. The proposition might have said that either party, landlord or tenant, might equally appeal to the Court to fix a fair rent. The Prime Minister in his wisdom, after consulting with his Colleagues, elected not to follow that course, but preferred to say to the landlord—"We will alter our original view, and allow you into Court; but we will not allow you in with the same freedom and the same absence of shackles that the tenant can enter the Court. We will compel you to put yourself in the invidious position of demanding a rise of rent before you can appeal to the intervention of the Court, and then you will come before the Court in the somewhat prejudiced position of a man who has not been satisfied with the existing rent, who has demanded an increase at such a figure that the tenant has been bound to refuse it." He could have understood that mode of argument if the Prime Minister had gone further, and said—"I will make each party tell his story before going into Court;" and that was what was intended by the Amendment proposed in Committee by the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill). He (Mr. Gibson) asked what principle of justice was it that actuated them in preventing equal measures being meted out to landlord and tenant, and not compelling the latter before going into Court to declare that he demanded a decrease and that the landlord refused it? He thought it was extremely advisable that the tenant should be equally compelled with the landlord to name his reduction. He contended that each party should go into Court unhampered, and if it was thought desirable to curb the landlord, exactly the same course of reasoning ought to apply to the tenant in making his claim to the Court.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, there was one important consideration which his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gibson) did not seem to have noticed. The landlord and tenant were by no means in an equal position, altogether irrespective of the Court. ["Oh, oh!"] By the law of the land the landlord had the inherent power of increasing his rent, but the tenant had no power whatever to reduce it. They therefore thought, having regard to the power which the landlord possessed, that it was only right that this distinction should be here made. The obvious objection to the Lords' Amendment was that the two parties—the landlord and the tenant—did not stand in equal positions in reference the one to the other. A further reason why the Government objected to the striking out of the words "After having demanded from such tenant an increase of rent which the tenant had declined to accept," was that if the landlord made a reasonable proposition, the tenant would have an opportunity to close with it and get a statutory term without being taken into Court.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, that, in the same way, the landlord ought to have an opportunity of accepting a proposed decrease without being taken into Court by the tenant. If a tenant wanted a decrease, let him give notice to his landlord of the amount he sought, so that the landlord might have the option by granting it and avoiding the Court. The tenant might then, by an amendment of the clause, be allowed a statutory term. He would appeal to the Prime Minister whether he was not bound to accept the Amendment in consistency with what he had said in reference to an Amendment on this subject when the House was considering the Bill in Committee—namely, that the Government were anxious that the landlord and the tenant should have every encouragement to settle their differences out of Court? It had been urged against the Amendment that the Court would fix the rules which should be observed when the parties came before it. But there were many landlords who would not like to run the risk or bear the expense of going into Court. Why, therefore, should not the like rules be observed without the parties going into Court, thus enabling them to settle their differences without its intervention?

MR. SYNAN thought the Amendment an unreasonable one, forcing the people to go into Court instead of keeping them out of it. The landlord had the remedy in his own hands if he desired to raise his rent, and need not go into Court. The tenant, however, could not reduce his rent, and ought to be at liberty to appeal to the Court for that purpose.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, the only advantage the landlord would derive from going into Court would be to show a rent-roll in case of his being obliged to borrow money, and it was absurd that he should be compelled to make an unreasonable demand for an increase of rent to entitle him to go to the Court for so reasonable a purpose.

MR. H. R. BRAND thought the matter would admit of a compromise. From what he could gather from the speech of the Prime Minister, the Government did not have so much objection to the landlord and tenant having an equal right to go to the Court; therefore, he would suggest an Amendment to the Lords' Amendment. It seemed to him what hon. Gentlemen opposite wanted to prevent was the forcing on the landlord the necessity of imposing upon the tenant an increase of rent before going to the Court; and their object, on his (Mr. Brand's) side of the House, was to get the landlord to make some agreement with his tenant without driving him to the absolute necessity of going to the Court. He would suggest, in order to satisfy both parties, the insertion of the words "after failure of agreement between landlord and tenant" in place of the words "demanded an increase of rent." Should this suggestion be adopted, the parties would equally have a right to appeal to the Court in the event of private negotiations failing.

MR. SPEAKER ruled that it was too late to make the Amendment to the Amendment, unless the Motion to "disagree with the Lords" were withdrawn.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS expressed a hope that the Government would allow an opportunity to be given of taking the sense of the House upon the suggestion made. There were many cases where a landlord did not wish to increase the rental of his tenant, and where the rent might be a very reasonable and fair one; but yet where the tenant might be found to say—"I will not pay this rent any longer; I will only pay the Poor Law valuation." Surely the landlord in such a case, the difficulty having arisen from no fault of his, but from the fact of the tenant refusing to pay, where he thought the rent a fair one, and did not seek to raise it, ought to be able to go to the Court and have the question settled as to whether the rent was or was not a reasonable one.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he thought it desirable that there should be a compromise upon this matter. He, and those who were acting with him, could not help thinking that a very strong step had been taken by giving the Court power to regulate the dealings between landlord and tenant. This step was one of an anomalous and peculiar character, and it would, no doubt, encourage a great deal of undesirable litigation. Everyone must feel that it would be very desirable if they could establish some system of arbitration; but matters had gone beyond that, and, after all, their desire must be to preserve as much as possible the right of free contract. Two suggestions had been made. One was that they should take away the necessity which the Bill, as it stood, imposed upon the landlord, and which was not imposed upon the tenant; while the other was that the tenant should be rendered subject to a limitation similar to that which was put upon the landlord. He understood that the Government were disposed to look with more favour on the second method than on the first. The suggestion of the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Brand) was, in his opinion, well worth consideration. There might be some technical difficulty in the way, but that might be easily got rid of; but if the Government could not accede to that suggestion, he might, perhaps, be allowed to suggest that it would be well to make the clause read as follows:—

“The tenant of any tenancy, or such tenant and the landlord jointly, or the landlord, after in the case of the landlord having demanded from such tenant an increase of rent which the tenant has declined to accept, and the tenant, after in the case of the tenant having claimed a reduction of rent which the landlord had declined to accept, may from time to time,” &c.

That would have the effect of putting the landlord and tenant on a similar footing; and he thought, though he would not move it, that the suggestion was likely to facilitate a settlement of the matter.

MR. CARTWRIGHT hoped that some compromise which would be agreeable to all might be arrived at, seeing that there was little difference between the opinion on one side of the House and that on the other upon the subject. It seemed invidious to draw such a distinction between landlord and tenant.

MR. PARNELL trusted the Government would not yield any more to the Conservative Opposition in regard to the question before the House. The Government had already done a great deal in extending facilities to enable the landlord to go into Court. In fact, it was one of the great blots pointed out when the measure was first introduced; but the Government had entirely disregarded the views of those who thought that the landlord should not have special privileges. They were now asked to go further in an attempt to permit the landlord to go into Court for the purpose, practically, of having a judicial stamp put upon the present rent, and compelling the tenant to submit to the statutory requirements incidental to a judicial tenancy, many of which were of a very disadvantageous character. It should be remembered that, under ordinary circumstances, it would be impossible for a tenant to obtain an abatement of rent, without a surrender of the interest in his holding, the protection given by the 7th clause being the only thing which would prevent the landlord from absorbing the tenant's interest. But the landlord was in no fear of losing his interest. If the tenant should refuse to pay his rent, the landlord could reject him, sell his interest by public auction, and distrain upon his stock. Both parties ought, in his (Mr. Parnell's) opinion, to be put upon an equal footing. The positions of the two parties were not similar, and they could not reason by analogy when they said the two parties should be put upon the same footing. He begged the House to remember that, after all, the landlord was in a different position to the tenant, and he had any one of four or five different remedies, whereas only one was open to the tenant; and if the proposal that had been made were agreed to, the clause would become an additional engine for enabling the landlord to recover his rent, a purpose for which it was never intended. Instead of settling matters, many landlords would take advantage of the Amendment to drag their tenants wholesale into Court, thus subjecting the tenants to expensive lawsuits.

MR. GLADSTONE: After what has fallen from the hon. Member (Mr. Parnell), I think there is very great force in his argument, as far as it goes, as to the difference existing in the position of the two parties. But I am bound, however, to say that there is a good deal of truth in what has fallen from my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Brand); and if I am able to do so I should not object to give up my own point and re-open the matter on the basis of the suggestion of my hon. Friend. I understand him to suggest, not that the tenant and the landlord should be put upon the same footing, but to enable the landlord to obtain an advantage which he is supposed to value highly, and which, if he does value, we ought not to grudge to him if we can give it without hardship to the tenant—namely, the advantage of fixity. The proposal of my hon. Friend would have this effect—that the landlord must still make an endeavour to arrange with the tenant out of Court. That is a matter to which we adhere. He must still make that endeavour; but he might make it in accordance with the spirit of the proposal of my hon. Friend; and, therefore, so far as that point goes, I am quite ready to consider the words proposed by my hon. Friend. I am afraid, however, that we have already got beyond that point. I am willing to accede to the withdrawal of the Motion, if it be the pleasure of the House; but I am entirely in the hands of the House with respect to the matter, and if the Motion cannot be withdrawn we must adhere to our determination to disagree with the Lords' Amendment.

MR. SPEAKER: It is right I should explain to the House that the Question now before it is—"That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the said Amendment." In the event of that Motion being pressed to a division and carried, the effect would be to restore the words struck out by the Lords; but, at the same time, those words themselves would be open to amendment.

MR. GLADSTONE: Am I to understand that after disagreeing with the Lords' Amendment we may amend our own words?

MR. SPEAKER: Yes; the Question now is, "That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the said Amendment."

MR. GOSCHEN wished to know if the House was to understand that the Government, while disagreeing with the Lords' Amendment, would amend the clause in the manner indicated by the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Brand)? If that were so he should certainly vote with the Government; but, in the first instance, he wished clearly to understand if the right hon. Gentleman intended to entertain that proposal?

MR. GLADSTONE: I shall consider myself in exactly the same position if the House disagrees with the Lords' Amendment as that in which I would have been if the Motion had been withdrawn. It will then be open for the House to amend the original words of the clause.

MR. HEALY wished to ask a question upon a point of Order. The Question was, "That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the said Amendment." If that Question were carried, what Question would then be before the House? The Question before the House would have been decided; and he apprehended that it would not be in Order for anybody, after the Lords' Amendment had been decided, to re-open it again. Subject to the ruling of the Speaker, he denied that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister would have the right, after the Lords' Amendment should have been decided and done with, to raise any other question until the next of the Lords' Amendments was reached. He asked for the ruling of the Speaker upon the point.

MR. SPEAKER: The words of the clause kept alive by disagreement with the Lords' Amendment will then be open to amendment.

Question, "That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the said Amendment" put, and agreed to; said words accordingly restored to the Bill.

MR. H. R. BRAND said, that after the word "accept," he proposed to insert the words—"or after failure of agreement between the landlord and tenant." In point of fact, his proposal was to leave out the words—"after having demanded from such tenant an increase of rent, which the tenant has declined to accept," and then to insert the words—"or after failure of agreement between the landlord and tenant."

MR. HEALY, as a point of Order, contended that the Amendment was irregular. The words proposed to be inserted were exactly the words which had just been refused by the House. [Cries of "No!"]

MR. PARNELL desired to say a word on the point of Order. He wished to put it to the Speaker that the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Brand) was now moving precisely the same Amendment as that which the House had just negatived—namely, to leave out from the second word "landlord" to the word "may" in line 17. That was the Amendment already disposed of, and the hon. Member now proposed to move it again.

Amendment proposed to the words so restored to the Bill, in page 8, line 17, after the word "accept," to insert the words "or after failure of agreement between the landlord and tenant."—(Mr. H. R. Brand.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. HEALY, upon the point of Order, would again ask Mr. Speaker whether these words could be inserted? The House were engaged in considering the Lords' Amendments. The Amendment now proposed was not a Lords' Amendment. The Lords' Amendment had been disagreed to; and as the House was engaged in considering the Lords' Amendments, he would ask the Speaker what the insertion of these words had to do with the Lords' Amendments?

MR. PARNELL denied that the Amendment had any reference to the words of the Bill which had been kept alive by the refusal of the House to agree with the Lords' Amendment. The Lords' Amendment omitted from the clause the words "after having demanded from such tenant an increase of rent which the tenant has declined to accept," and the Amendment of the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Brand) did not interfere with those words at all. It left those words precisely as they were, but introduced fresh words which were not affected by the Lords' Amendment. He would therefore submit that they did not come within the ruling of Mr. Speaker, that after having disagreed with an Amendment of the Lords, it would be competent for the House to alter the words of the clause which were kept alive by the refusal of the House to agree with the Lords' Amendment.

MR. SPEAKER: I may say upon the point of Order raised by the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), that the Amendment is proposed in the form of an addition, and as it is relevant to the subject-matter sent down from the Lords, it is therefore in Order.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN asked if he would be in Order, in a case where the House disagreed with the Lords' Amendment, in moving any other addition to the Bill, as it left the House of Commons? Was he able to propose any Amendment of the Bill as it was sent up to the House of Lords, in any part which had been omitted by the Lords? There were many instances where the Lords had amended the Bill by omitting certain portions of it, and there were several cases in which he could propose useful Amendments to the Bill as it left the Commons. He wished, therefore, to know if he would be in Order in going into such questions?

MR. SPEAKER: I cannot decide the point until I have the hon. and learned Member's Amendments before me.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am glad, Sir, that you have ruled that an addition may be made to our own words when we have determined upon restoring such words to our Bill by disagreeing to the Lords' Amendment to them. My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Brand) has moved certain words which Her Majesty's Government think might be more clearly expressed than they are in my hon. Friend's Amendment by another Amendment coming in exactly at the same place as an addition. The words we would propose to substitute are these—"or after having otherwise failed to agree with the tenant as to what is a fair rent." That would let in other modes of procedure between the landlord and tenant in the same way as is proposed by the Amendment of my hon. Friend; but it would leave the matter more clear.

MR. H. R. BRAND said, he was quite ready to withdraw his Amendment in favour of the one suggested by his right hon. Friend.

MR. GIBSON said, he was bound to state, before the Amendment was withdrawn, that the proposal of the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Brand) was not at all the proposal he had understood that hon. Gentleman was going to make and had announced to the House. The inequality which was indicated to exist between the landlord and tenant was that the landlord was bound to formulate his demand; and when the question was under discussion, the hon. Member intimated his intention of proposing, immediately after the word "after," in line 15, to introduce the words, "the parties have failed to agree," or some similar words. The Amendment now presented by the hon. Gentleman, and even as presented by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, in his (Mr. Gibson's) opinion, made no substantial change, good, bad, or indifferent, in the Bill, because it left the landlord saddled with the special and exceptional provision of having to go into Court after having demanded from the tenant an increased rent, which the tenant had refused, while the tenant could bring the landlord into Court, and ask the Court to measure whatever the Court might consider to be a fair rent. The sole effect the present Amendment would have was that it would anticipate another Amendment, which the Government had, lower down on the Paper, referring to the power of agreement between the parties. The words proposed by the hon. Member for Stroud would have, practically, no effect whatever. They would leave the words of the Bill as they were; and if the hon. Member would look at the bottom of page 5 of the Amendments, he would see that ample power had been given by the Lords. Indeed, the fullest possible power was given to the two parties, at the instigation of either, for the purpose of making an agreement between themselves. The Amendment suggested by the Prime Minister would, he thought, still leave the landlord in an unfair position.

MR. H. R. BRAND hoped he would be allowed to explain. He should have been glad to move the words he had suggested after the word "after," and to cut out the words "such increase of rent;" but he was informed that, as a point of Order, there were difficulties in the way; and, therefore, he had adopted the course he had taken, and had substituted other words.

MR. GLADSTONE: With regard to the withdrawal of the Amendment, my view is that the words which we have suggested are identical in effect to those which I have sketched out, although in form they are slightly different. But it would be idle to move them unless they would be received by the House.

Question proposed, "That the Amendment be, by leave, withdrawn."

MR. HEALY said, he objected to the withdrawal of the Amendment.

Amendment again proposed, to amend the Amendment by inserting, after the word "accept," in line 17, the following words, "or after failure of agreement between landlord and tenant."—(Mr. H. R. Brand.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and negatived.

MR. GLADSTONE: I beg to move to insert after "accept," the words, "or after having otherwise failed to agree with the tenant as to what is a fair rent." The Amendment is entirely to the same effect as that which was moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Brand). The matter is entirely in the hands of the House; and if, as a matter of form, the Amendment can be regularly moved, I am prepared to move it.

MR. SPEAKER: It is proposed to amend the Amendment by inserting after the word "accept" the following words, "or after having otherwise failed to agree with the tenant as to what is a fair rent."

MR. PARNELL said, the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had himself pointed out that these words were identical with those which had just been rejected by the House; and he would therefore respectfully ask whether, under the circumstances, it was competent for the right hon. Gentleman to move them. It appeared to him that the words, "or after failure of agreement between the landlord and tenant," were substantially the same as the words, "or after having otherwise failed to agree with the tenant as to what is a fair rent." Both Amendments meant precisely the same thing; and he would ask whether, under the circumstances, the second Amendment could be moved?

MR. HEALY wished to be allowed to say, on the point of Order, that when an Irish Member in Committee proposed an Amendment similar in spirit, although not in general details, with another Amendment which had been previously moved, he was always shut out from moving it. He would, therefore, put it to the Speaker whether, as the Amendment of the Prime Minister was substantially the same as that of the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Brand), he was not similarly irregular now in moving it?

MR. MACFARLANE said, he also desired to say a word on the point of Order. There could be no question that the present Amendment was the same as the last, because the Prime Minister distinctly moved it on the ground that it was identical. He would, therefore, ask Mr. Speaker if it were possible to put an Amendment which had been declared by the right hon. Gentleman who moved it to be identical with one which had just been negatived?

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he did not see what use there was in continuing the discussion after the Prime Minister had admitted that the Amendment was substantially the same as that which had just been negatived. Personally, he could not see that the Amendment was of any use at all. The clause said—

“If the tenant, or the landlord and tenant jointly, or the landlord, after having demanded an increase of rent which the tenant declined to accept.”

Surely, that was a failure of agreement, and it was enough to have it inserted in the clause once, without submitting a further Amendment on the same point, and calling upon the House to negative it twice over.

MR. T. COLLINS said, the Speaker had already proposed the Question; and having been proposed, hon. Members were out of Order in objecting to it.

MR. SPEAKER: I am bound to say that, on comparing the two Amendments, they appear to me to be substantially the same. Therefore, I do not think that the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman can be put.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I am placed in a position of considerable difficulty by the proceeding which has just taken place. I do not wish to use unpleasant language on the subject; but I do not think that I have been hardly fairly treated. I rise now to ask if I shall be in Order in moving the Amendment which I read to the House just now, as a suggestion, seeing that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Brand) has been shut out? Of course, I cannot move the first words of the Amendment I proposed to submit, because they come in at the beginning of the words which have been restored; but I would propose, at the end of the Amendment, after the word “accept,” to add these words—

“And in the case of the tenant having claimed a reduction of rent, which the landlord has declined to concede.”

That would, as nearly as possible, put the two parties on an equality. In the case of the landlord, he must first have demanded an increase of rent, which the tenant has declined to accept; and then, in the corresponding case of the tenant, he must have claimed a reduction of rent, which the landlord declined to concede.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN wished to say a word upon a point of Order. [Cries of “Order!”] It might be ruled that he was too late if he rose after the Question was put. He desired respectfully to say that if he had correctly heard the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote), they were very much the same as the Amendment they had already dealt with, only more so.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAW) wished to ask a question—namely, whether the Amendment was in Order, as it dealt with a tenant's application, which was not touched by the Lords' Amendment? The first part of the clause only related to the tenant's application, and it had not been made a matter of dispute either there or in the House of Lords. Having passed that part of the clause, the right hon. Gentleman now proposed to go back and further to deal with the right of the tenant to make the application. The Lords had not touched that matter at all; and he would ask, as a point of Order, whether they could go back upon the question now and impose a new restriction and qualification on the tenant's application?

MR. SPEAKER: It appears to me that there is no objection to my putting the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman. The observations of the right hon. and learned Gentleman raise matters of argument which are for the determination of the House. I see no grounds for proposing not to put the Amendment.

[First Night.]

Amendment proposed to the words so restored to the Bill, in page 8, line 17, after the word "accept," to insert the words—

"And in the case of the tenant having claimed a reduction of rent, which the landlord has declined to concede."—(Sir Stafford Northcote.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I think this proposal is a decidedly different one from that which was proposed by the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Brand), and it seems to me to be much more objectionable. As we were unable to entertain the first proposal, I do not see how we can entertain this. It lays down the principle that the tenant should be put on the same footing as the landlord in regard to going into Court. I will not repeat the arguments of my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland that the tenant and the landlord are not in the same position; but I may say that the effect of adopting this Amendment would be to qualify the action and power of the tenant to go into the Court, which we have already declined to do. My objection to the Amendment is this—I do not think we can practically look upon the landlord and the tenant as being on the same footing in a matter of this kind. Take the case of a large number of small cottier tenants. The landlord knows precisely what rent he ought to get, if he knows his business; but, on the other hand, the small cottier has an idea of his own that he ought to have a lower rent. As a matter of form, we think it would be unwise to make him state the exact figure he thinks he ought to pay. If we were to do that, the probability would be that we should drive these small tenants into making extravagant demands, and they would get assistance from people altogether outside as to the nature of the demand they ought to make.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, that many hon. Members felt a difficulty in applying their minds to the consideration of this Amendment. The Amendment of the Lords affected the landlord; whereas the present Amendment affected the tenant. The Amendment sent down from the other House said nothing at all about the tenant; whereas the present Amendment dealt entirely with the tenant.

MR. GOSCHEN said, it was his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister himself who proposed to submit an Amendment in the shape of a compromise if it were possible; and his right hon. Friend suggested that it might be more acceptable if the landlord and the tenant were put on the same footing. It was in consequence of that suggestion that his hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. H. R. Brand) had endeavoured to find a solution which would be satisfactory to both sides of the House, and to the Lords as well as to the Commons. What had happened since appeared to be this—In the first place, there was a misunderstanding as to the withdrawal of the Amendment. Some hon. Members objected to the withdrawal of the Amendment, notwithstanding that the Prime Minister announced his intention, if it were withdrawn, of submitting another Amendment identical in substance. It was next understood that, if the Amendment were not withdrawn, no other Amendment to the same effect could be moved. The question was asked that the Amendment should be withdrawn; but the Amendment had been moved, and could not be withdrawn without the consent of the House. The House refused to allow the Amendment to be withdrawn, and the Amendment was accordingly negatived. It was then found impossible to move the words which had been offered by Her Majesty's Government in substitution of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Stroud; and he thought it would be admitted that his hon. Friend, and the Government, and the House, had been placed in a difficult position by what had occurred. If the Government did not see their way to accept the proposal now submitted by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote), which affected the tenant, perhaps they would be able to suggest some other means by which effect might be given to the proposal they had originally made, in order to give effect to the views of the hon. Member for Stroud.

MR. GLADSTONE: As far as I am concerned, I am not aware of any method that remains open to me of giving effect to the proposal of my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Brand), or I would willingly avail myself of it. I am not aware that any method is now open to me of giving effect to the suggestion of my hon. Friend to enable the landlord to obtain the fixity of rent which he supposes to be a real benefit to him, without the preliminary of proposing any increase of rent. There were two difficulties. Although I should have preferred putting this burden on the tenant in the way proposed by the Bill to the method proposed by the House of Lords, I never stated that it would take the form of an enactment that would be acceptable to the Government. I only maintained that it was less objectionable than the Amendment which had actually been made. But there is another objection, in which I see very great force—namely, the objection stated by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland, that the present Amendment does not attain the very great object stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross)—namely, the enabling of the landlord to obtain fixity, without going through the preliminary of demanding an increase of rent. That was the principal inducement, and the only inducement to me, to accept the suggestion of my hon. Friend, because it was one of those happy suggestions which offer a boon and an advantage to the landlord, without imposing the smallest burden upon the tenant. To the present Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman opposite we could not agree. I hope, however, that it may be in the power of the House of Lords to vary the clause as suggested, by opening the door which is now closed.

MR. HEALY said, he had never listened to a more extraordinary statement than that which the Prime Minister had just made—namely, that the Amendment of the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Brand) offered a boon and advantage to the landlord, without giving a corresponding disadvantage to the tenant. How could a favour be bestowed on the landlord without being taken from the tenant? Was it no disadvantage to the tenant that the landlord should be able to force him, by means of a bogus arrangement, into the Court? Those words were certainly germane to the Amendment of the hon. Member, because, after the failure of an agreement between the landlord and tenant, the landlord would be able to make an impracticable proposal to the tenant, which would drive the unfortunate wretch into Court. And that, they were told, was an undoubted boon to the landlord, without being any disadvantage to the tenant. [Laughter.] An hon. Member opposite laughed; but probably hon. Members who sat on that (the Home Rule) side of the House had as much influence and power as the hon. Member in getting these things settled for the tenant. And perhaps they had succeeded to some slight extent. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) might have the confidence of the people of Ireland or he might not; at all events, the Government had not. He wished to inform the Government that, if proposals like this were accepted by them, Irish Members would hold their minds in a state of balance. He had given the Bill the closest and most conscientious attention possible, and what he should do when it came on for further consideration in Ireland with regard to its acceptance would depend a great deal on the working of the 7th clause. So important did he regard the Amendment of the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Brand) that, if it was accepted by the Lords and sent down to that House, where it was accepted by the Government, his advice to the tenants would be to fight it out on Land League principles, and make the landlords skip.

Question put.

Page 8, line 20, leave out from the word "Parties" to the second word "and," in line 21, the next Amendment, read a second time.

MR. GLADSTONE: The House will remember that this Amendment was moved by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell). It did not form part of the original proposal of the Government, but it was accepted by them, not as altering in any way the substance and effect of the clause, but as meeting the desire of a great body of opinion, especially of Irish

[First Night.]

Members in the House, and likewise as conveying a certain assurance to the minds of the people of Ireland. The words of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk were—"And having regard to the interests of the landlord and the tenant respectively." These words having been struck out, I am compelled to look at them in conjunction with other changes which have been made in this clause dealing with the question of rent, and which, I am bound to say, gives to the present Amendment an importance and character, as it now stands in conjunction with other Amendments, such as it did not bear when under discussion amongst ourselves. For the sake of illustration, I will refer to an Amendment which I have particularly in view, and which I think extremely objectionable, and inadmissible on the part of the House. In page 7 of the Lords' Amendments as printed, in sub-section 9, these words occur—

"The rent of a holding shall not be reduced in any proceeding under this Act on account of any money or moneys' worth paid or given by the tenant or his predecessors in title otherwise than to the landlord, on coming into the holding."

It is quite evident that these words have the most natural bearing on the words now immediately before us; and, viewing the very objectionable character of the words, I have no hesitation in saying that I must move to disagree with the Lords in the said Amendment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the said Amendment."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: The right hon. Gentleman has not confined his remarks to the particular words now in question; but he has connected them with the general Amendments which have been made by the House of Lords in the 7th clause, and has specially pointed to the definition which was made in the form of the sub-section to which he has called the attention of the House. Well, under these circumstances, it is obvious that we are engaged in a really serious discussion, and one which touches very closely the most delicate and the most important points of the controversy which may still have to be waged upon this Bill. Sir, I am reluctant to trouble the House with anything like a general discussion—which I might almost do after the words which have been spoken—on this important principle, the question of fair rent. I will abstain from doing so, and I will only make use of very few words in order to explain my own view as to the position of the House with regard to the Amendments touching fair rents. There can be no doubt of this—that there has been continually brought before the attention of Parliament a complaint which has been made by the Irish tenant, to the effect that the raising of rent may eat up the tenant's interest; and, on the other hand, there is the danger to be guarded against, that the tenant's interest may eat up the rent, and it is very difficult indeed to arrive at a proper conclusion with regard to the principle upon which fair rent is to be assessed, so that it shall be free from danger on either of these two sides. Now, the first proposal of the Government was that there should be given in the clause which relates to fair rent some rather minute directions to the Court as to the principle upon which they are to assess the fair rent; and the definition which was to be given of the interest of the tenant, and which was to be taken into account when the fair rent was fixed, was considered to be a very complicated subject—a subject of a great deal of discussion and dispute. At length we seemed to come to this conclusion—that it would be better not to encumber the Court with directions of this kind, but to omit them, and leave it to the Court itself to decide what would be a fair rent between the two parties. I must say, when that was proposed, many of us thought it would be the best and most satisfactory solution; and so far was I influenced by this consideration that I abstained from moving Amendments I had given Notice of, intending to give a reasonable definition, as we thought, of fair rent and of the tenant's interest as affecting fair rent, and which was substantially taken from the late Mr. Butt's attempted legislation. However, we withdrew all that, and the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell) subsequently came forward and said—"You must put in the words 'having regard to the interests of the landlord and tenant respectively.'" Now, that does give a direction to the Court to some extent, and it revives the necessity for some sort of understanding, some kind of direction which may prevent a misconception as to the intention of Parliament. Undoubtedly, the words which are inserted in the 9th sub-section, as it has been drawn, would very materially mitigate the difficulties which still may arise. I will call the attention of the House to the general way in which the fair rent and the tenant's interest bear the one upon the other. We are constantly being told that the rent does not interfere with the tenant's interest, and that the tenant's interest does not interfere with the rent. That is not and cannot always be the case. A man is prepared to take a farm, but before he takes it he wishes to know two things; he wishes to know what charge he is to pay on coming into possession, and what the rent will be which he will have to pay in the course of his tenancy. It is, in fact, very much like the question a man asks himself when he is going to take a house, say in London, where he has to pay a certain premium for entering into possession, and where he has afterwards to pay a certain annual rent charge. If the rent charge is to be heavy, he, of course, expects to pay a lower premium; and if the premium is high he expects a lower rent. In the case I am supposing in London, a fine is paid to the landlord as well as the rent; but in Ireland the fine is not paid to the landlord, but to the outgoing tenant, and the rent to the landlord, and the question is, whether the fine is to eat up the rent, or the rent is to eat up the fine. Suppose a man has arrived at the conclusion that he can afford to pay five years' rent for the purpose of coming into a holding—for the purpose of buying up the interest of his predecessor. Supposing he is prepared to pay £250 to come in at a rent of £50 a-year. Those who complain of the rent eating up the tenant's interest will say that, after a time, the landlord may come forward and say—"I am not satisfied with this £50 a-year; I must have £60." The tenant would say—"I cannot afford to pay £60 a-year, because of the amount I had to pay to come in; if I have to pay you £60, I should have paid less than £250 to the outgoing tenant." In this way there is supposed to be a danger of the rent eating up the tenant's interest. Well, precisely the converse will take place if the outgoing tenant, who is now to be allowed to sell his interest for the best price he can get, says—"You must give me not £250, but £300." In that case the tenant would be obliged to say to the landlord—"I cannot give you the full rent of £50 a-year; I must pay you a less sum." In this way the raising of the charge on the tenant's interest would fall, and fall entirely, on the rent of the landlord. As to the proposal which has been made in connection with the words we are now considering, it is a proposal, as I understand it, which is intended to have this effect. It is to say that when the rent of the holding is about to be settled—is about to be either increased or reduced by the Court—it shall not be reduced in respect of any money that may be paid by the tenant on his coming into the holding. It is not intended, as I understand it, to apply to past transactions; for instance, it is not intended to affect the Ulster Custom or the cases in which a certain sum has been paid before the passing of this Act by the predecessor of the tenant who is now in possession. But I understand it to apply to future cases, to those who may come in under this Bill, and may be induced, by the advantages and facilities offered to them, to sell their interest to the incoming tenant at a high price. The incoming tenant purchasing at this high price, as he is encouraged to do, will say—"I have had to pay so much for my predecessor's interest in the holding that I cannot afford to pay you (the landlord) the rent which you have been in the habit of receiving, and which, if it had not been for this high price, I should have been prepared to give." The intention of the House of Lords, as I understand the Amendment, is that the landlord ought to be protected against a proceeding of that kind, and I must say I think it a very reasonable proposal. I am told that the words of this Clause 9 go rather further than I have described. If that is so, it would be very easy to alter it; but we have not come to that yet. At the present time we have to bear in mind that we are going too far or not far enough in the words which have been struck out by the House of Lords, and which were put in on the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk. If you trust the Court, if you think it competent to deal with these delicate matters, why not leave it alone to exercise its functions—why not allow it to deal with these cases as they arise on general principles of equity, such as would guide any Court? If, on the other hand, you think it necessary to give instructions, give them in such a way that we can all agree to them. What seems to be the facts of the case are these. The Government thought it would not be right to give any guidance to the Court; but when they came to turn their hand to it they were obliged to abandon their first idea. Then came the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk and said—"This will not do. You must insert words which were not a part of your original proposal, and which are inconsistent with your original proposal. You must strike out the direction in your draft of the Bill." He comes forward and introduces these words—"Having regard to the interests of the landlord and tenant respectively;" and the House of Lords strikes them out as being inconsistent with the original intentions of the Government.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL hoped the House would not desire, at that stage of the Bill, to go over again that long discussion which they had had on this matter in Committee. Unless compelled to do so, he should decline to go into the general reasons in favour of the insertion of these words. He desired to point out to the House that, apart from the intrinsic merits of the words of the clause as it left that House, they had, from other circumstances, acquired an importance amongst those people for whom the Bill was intended. The special circumstances were these—In the Bill as originally drawn by the Government there were inserted words giving a direction to the Court that in fixing a fair rent it should have regard to the tenant's interest. It was quite true that afterwards, finding the precise definition or guide as to fixing the fair rent would not work and was not practicable, the Government were inclined to strike out the words, and leave the matter entirely at large. But they were met with this difficulty—that they had themselves first suggested this regard to the tenant's interest. They were further embarrassed, as a great many hon. Members in the House knew, by the testimony which reached them from all quarters representing Irish opinion on the matter. They found that this reference to the interest of the tenant was considered of great—nay, of vital—importance to the interests of the tenant. Finally, after a discussion in the House, the words as they now stood in the Bill were accepted, and accepted by a very large majority; and he well recollected that the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Stafford Northcote), in discussing this matter, was good enough to say, in referring to his (Mr. Russell's) Amendment, that he noted it, and was glad to recognize it as a proof of advanced opinion in the House on this matter. After a great deal of discussion, the words were inserted in the Bill, and the measure left the House with these words in it. Now, he (Mr. Russell) wished to state what the effect on the public mind would be if the Lords' Amendment were agreed to. No one had yet pointed out, either in that House or the other, how the original words accepted by the Committee could work injuriously to the interests of the landlord. He had read everything which had been said about it, and he had not been able to appreciate or realize any argument showing how the landlord's interests would suffer. What, then, would be said out-of-doors if, having put this reference to the landlord's and the tenant's interests in the Bill—having, after prolonged discussion in Committee, come, by a large majority, to the conclusion that the words should be inserted—if, in answer to the other House, who, to put it mildly, did not very strongly represent the tenant's point of view, these words, upon which so much store was placed by the Irish people, were struck out? During the progress of this Bill he had received a great many letters from a great many quarters, and from no part had there come so unanimous an expression of opinion as to the necessity of a provision of this kind as from the North of Ireland. Since the discussion in the House of Lords he had received, again and again, the strongest protest against the striking out of these words. It had been represented to him that men who did not at first attach so much importance to the words, intrinsically, as he did, now considered that, as they had once been in, to strike them out would have an injurious effect. He would earnestly urge upon the House that the omission of these words, which he conceived to be highly important, would be disastrous; and he trusted, therefore, that the Commons' Amendment would not be abandoned.

Sir Stafford Northcote

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 270; Noes 154: Majority 116.—(Div. List, No. 369.)

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I think, at this hour of the night, the House will be willing to adjourn. There is a great deal of serious Business to be done, and I wish to give Notice that I shall move an Amendment on sub-section 5, to amend the Lords' Amendment at page 9, by adding in the 3rd line the words "during the statutory term." I move that the debate be adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Sir Stafford Northcote.)

MR. GLADSTONE said, he should much more cheerfully assent to an adjournment if he thought there was a strong inclination on the part of the House to close the debate to-morrow.

MR. HEALY thought the question of closing to-morrow depended very much on the Government.

Question put, and agreed to.

Further Consideration of Lords' Amendments deferred till To-morrow.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE BILL.

(Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Arthur Cohen, Mr. Lewis Fry, Sir John Holker, Mr. Monk.)

[BILL 218.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, explained that it was entirely one of consolidation and codification. At present the law relating to Bills of Exchange was scattered over more than 20 Acts of Parliament, and there had been decisions in nearly 2,000 cases. Under those circumstances, the commercial community had long been anxious that the law should be condensed and brought together in a more accessible form. He did not propose to go beyond the second reading of the Bill in the present Session; but he should be glad if the House would consent to the second reading, so that he might be able to bring the measure more prominently before the commercial public during the Recess. He would not trouble the House with any further remarks. He would only say, in conclusion, that the present Bill had been prepared at the instance of the Associated Chambers of Commerce and the Institute of Bankers, and had been carefully examined by high legal authorities.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir John Lubbock.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he intended to assent to the Motion; but it must be perfectly understood that he did so on the assumption that the Bill, which was an important measure and dealt with the consolidation of the law, was proceeded with no further in the present Session. He understood that his hon. Friend only desired now to call the attention of the commercial world to the subject, and that he did not propose to go beyond the second reading of the Bill. On the part of the Government, he (Sir Henry James) had no objection to that course being taken.

MR. RYLANDS said, he did not rise for the purpose of opposing the Motion for the second reading of the Bill; but he was quite aware that there were points in the matter which were open to considerable discussion. He therefore wished it to be distinctly understood that, in assenting to the second reading, neither Her Majesty's Government nor any independent Member were giving their assent or approval to all the provisions which were contained in the measure.

MR. MAGNIAC remarked, that he should like to enter a caveat upon one point referred to by the hon. Baronet who moved the second reading of the Bill (Sir John Lubbock). His hon. Friend said that the Bill had the approval of the Associated Chambers of Commerce and the Institute of Bankers of London. Now, it ought to be known that the bankers of London had nothing to do with any Chamber of Commerce; and whether it was known to the Associated Chambers of Commerce or not, he (Mr. Magniac) was quite clear that it was utterly unknown to the merchants of London. It would, therefore, be well to read the Bill a second time, so that its provisions might be made known generally. But while he supported the proposal to read the Bill a second time, he hoped it would be understood that he did not in any way commit himself to any principle contained in it.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, his hon. Friend the Member for Bedford (Mr. Magniac), who had just sat down, said there was no Chamber of Commerce in London. That was quite true; but there was an Institute of Bankers in London, of which his hon. Friend in charge of the Bill (Sir John Lubbock) was President, and they took great interest in the measure. But, of course, in a Bill of considerable length there would be points of detail which would require discussion, and which it would be open to the House to consider next Session. He was very glad that the House was likely to read the Bill a second time. He hoped it would take the same course next Session, so that an opportunity might be afforded of considering the provisions of the measure in Committee, where every point connected with them could be raised.

MR. WHITLEY said, he would not oppose the second reading of the Bill on the understanding that, after it had been read a second time, it would be carried no further. He had intended to oppose the Bill; but on that understanding he would withdraw his opposition. Up to the present time, the bankers and merchants of Liverpool had had no opportunity of knowing anything about the measure. He thought it was one which he should be glad to support in another Session, if the simple object of the Bill was to codify the various Acts of Parliament which relate to Bills of Exchange. In the meantime, it would be understood that in assenting to the second reading the House did not commit itself in any way to an approval of the principle of the Bill.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK remarked that, as he had already explained, the principle of the Bill was simply to codify and consolidate the law in regard to Bills of Exchange and bring it together. He understood that his hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool (Mr. Whitley) did not object to that. All the details of the measure could be discussed in Committee. He thanked the House for the reception which had been given to the Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

REMOVAL TERMS (BURGHs) (SCOTLAND) BILL.

CONSIDERATION OF LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

MR. J. STEWART, in moving that the Lords' Amendments to this Bill be considered forthwith, said, they were merely of a verbal nature, and there could be no objection to their being considered at once.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Lords' Amendments be forthwith considered."—(Mr. J. Stewart.)

MR. WARTON said, he must object. In the first place, he had failed to catch even the title of the Bill; but, further than that, he objected to any Bill being considered at that hour—half past 1—which was not down on the Paper. He remembered, on one occasion, that a Bill passed in a very curious manner, owing to the non-observance of the Rules of the House, and he had ever since determined to object to the repetition of such a practice.

MR. J. STEWART said, that, of course, if the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) objected, it would be impossible to go on with the Bill now.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): Go on.

MR. J. STEWART wished to impress upon the House that at that period of the Session it was absolutely essential to make Progress with any measure which it was intended to pass into law. He would, therefore, with the permission of the House, persist with the Motion he had made.

MR. WARTON appealed to Mr. Speaker whether it was possible to take the Lords' Amendments to a Bill in the way now proposed, seeing that the Bill itself was not down upon the Paper for Consideration? Notwithstanding the hon. and learned Attorney General's direction to the hon. Member (Mr. J. Stewart) to "go on," he (Mr. Warton) would like to have a distinct ruling from Mr. Speaker on the point.

MR. SPEAKER: The Bill has been to the Lords, and has come down with certain verbal Amendments. It is usual to consider such Amendments without giving Notice; but if the hon. and learned Member for Bridport presses his objection, the Amendments cannot be considered now, and the debate must stand adjourned.

MR. WARTON said, he would not press his objection after the statement which had been made by Mr. Speaker.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendments considered, and agreed to.

QUESTION.

ROYAL UNIVERSITY OF IRELAND— UNIVERSITY WORK.

MR. DAWSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to the Report of the President of Galway College and to the strong advocacy therein contained of the retention of teaching as a part of University work ; and, whether the New Royal University, making no provision for teaching, leaves the great mass of the Irish people without any provision for academic training, whilst a minority will have the Queen's Colleges and Trinity College to supply to them that great advantage ?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the Report was, no doubt, most interesting, and the President did put strongly the advantages of University teaching and training, as well as of examination, and he showed that the Queen's Colleges continued to give that advantage. But, interesting as the question was, it was not a practical one, since the House had decided it in establishing the new University, for which an Act was passed a year or two ago.

MR. DAWSON said, that in consequence of the answer he had received he should, early in next Session, bring forward a Motion declaring—

“That, in the opinion of this House, it is inexpedient that the vast majority of the people of Ireland should be without academical teaching, while the minority had the advantage of the Queen's Colleges and of Trinity College in Dublin.”

ORDER OF THE DAY.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.

CONSIDERATION OF LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

[SECOND NIGHT.]

Lords Amendments further considered.

Page 8, line 23, after the word “rent,” insert the words—

“Provided always, That where application is made to the Court under this section in respect of any tenancy, and the Court is of opinion that the tenant of the holding in which such tenancy subsists, or his predecessors in title, has or have caused or suffered such holding to become deteriorated, contrary to the express or implied conditions constituting the contract of tenancy, the Court may refuse the application, or may postpone the further hearing of the same until after the performance by the tenant of such conditions as the Court may think proper,”

—the next Amendment, read a second time.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, the Amendment was one which he should ask the House to disagree with. It was an Amendment which had already been considered, discussed, and rejected by the House. The truth was that it was one of the old Land Committee Amendments, which had been amply discussed there, and the answer given to it he had only to repeat. Everything which would properly be a fair basis for opposing an application for a judicial rent was provided for under the 8th clause, which gave the Court full power to reject an application whenever the conduct of the applicant had been unreasonable. No conduct could be more unreasonable on the part of the tenant than to cause or suffer his holding to become deteriorated, and then apply to fix a fair rent for it. It had frequently been held, under similar words in the 18th clause of the Land Act, that such conduct was “unreasonable,” and disentitled the tenant to relief.

[Second Night.]

That applied to mere permissive waste; but if there was deterioration of the holding with the object of getting a lower rent, that would be fraudulent, and if they had any confidence in the Court at all they might leave such conduct to be dealt with by it. Apart from that, however, there was a manifest mistake—at least, he presumed it was a mistake in the Amendment—for it could hardly have been intended—but it provided against deterioration, caused or permitted not only by the tenant, but by his predecessors in title, so that the present tenant might be refused a fair rent because of something which had been done by his predecessor 50 years ago.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the said Amendment."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

MR. GIBSON said, that if the Court would proceed upon the lines set forth by the Attorney General for Ireland he was satisfied. But the right hon. and learned Gentleman had gone somewhat further. He had sneered both at the structure of the Amendment and at the source from which it had come. The object of the Amendment was to prevent the tenant seizing the opportunity, when the farm was at its worst by his own fault, to get a judicial rent fixed. Although the Amendment might not be agreed to, he trusted that the words of the right hon. and learned Gentleman would have some effect on the Court.

Motion agreed to.

Page 8, line 35, leave out from the word "landlord," to the end of subsection 3, the next Amendment, read a second time.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he need not acquaint the House that this Amendment was one to which the Government could not ask the House to agree. The third paragraph of the clause provided that—

"Where the judicial rent of any present tenancy has been fixed by the Court, then, until the expiration of a term of fifteen years from the rent day next succeeding the day on which the determination of the Court has been given (in this Act referred to as a statutory term), such present tenancy shall (if it so long continue to subsist) be deemed to be a tenancy subject to statutory conditions, and having the same incidents as a tenancy subject to statutory conditions consequent on an increase of rent by a landlord."

The House of Lords had struck out the words which follow—namely,

"With this modification, that, during the statutory term in a present tenancy consequent on the first determination of a judicial rent of that tenancy by the Court, application by the landlord to authorise the resumption of the holding or part thereof by him for some purpose having relation to the good of the holding or of the estate, shall not be entertained by the Court, subject nevertheless to the provisions in this Act contained for the benefit of labourers in respect of cottages, gardens, or allotments."

It had been stated the previous night that there was no opportunity whatever of drawing a distinction between the first statutory term and subsequent statutory terms. There was one case in which he was disposed to admit that the first statutory term need not be distinguished from subsequent statutory terms, and that was where the tenant at the end of the lease came in as a present tenant. He did not think there was any reason why at the end of a lease, say, of 40 or 50 years, a tenant, in virtue of his present tenancy, should take a further term of 15 years absolutely exempt from the statutory resumption. The Government would endeavour to provide in a subsequent Amendment that in the case of leases the lease itself should count as the first statutory term.

MR. HEALY considered the proposal to be made by the Attorney General for Ireland an equitable one; but he wished to point out that the Amendment made in this House with regard to judicial leases had placed the future tenant in a worse condition than he would have been had the Bill passed in its original shape. A future tenant would be liable at the end of his lease to be turned out without a day's notice. He trusted the Government would see that future tenants should not be debarred from the benefit of the Act of 1870.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE confessed that, in reality, this question, with the exception of resumption, was a much larger question than appeared on the face of it. He did not believe that if they deprived the landlord of the right of resumption after the first 15 years they would ever be able to restore it. He was certain that if at the beginning of a second term of 15 years an attempt was made to reserve the landlord rights, a new and formidable agitation would arise. Practically, they were depriving the landlord of the right of resumption for ever, and in a short time they would see a short Act introduced assimilating the two statutory terms. He had no wish to divide the House; but he was anxious that this question should not be determined without his entering his protest in regard to it.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, the remarks in regard to leases which fell from the Prime Minister raised an important point which would have to be discussed on a subsequent Amendment. The Prime Minister argued that a distinction might be made between the position of the tenant at the end of a lease and other present tenants. He supposed they would have further information on that point when they came to discuss it. With regard to the present proposal on the Lords' Amendment, one would have thought a year ago that it was natural that the landlord should have the power of resuming a portion of his land for the general benefit of his estate; but they were now so entirely divorced from the old position of the landlords that he hardly knew how the Government were to deal with a question of this sort. Sometimes the Opposition were led to suppose that the intention of this measure was to get rid of landlordism altogether. But in that matter the Government did not go quite the length of the Land League. The Government said they ought to keep the landlords, but ought to regulate their relations with their tenants. That was the scheme on which the Bill was supposed to be based; but they were constantly coming across instances where the landlords were refused their clear rights. He was afraid that if they took away the legal rights of the landlord for 15 years it would be very difficult to restore them. It did not require much knowledge of Irish affairs to say that if the legal right of the landlord to resume possession for good reasons during the first tenancy was taken away, it would be very difficult, if not impossible, to re-establish it. The treatment of this question distinguished the spirit with which all Amendments in which the right of the landlord was implicated were dealt with.

MR. W. E. FORSTER differed entirely from the right hon. Gentleman's criticisms. It was merely a question of yearly tenants obtaining a 15 years' lease. The object of the Government was not in any degree to abolish landlordism. The House, no doubt, would feel that, having thoroughly debated the matter previously, they could hardly be expected to go into the arguments again.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 145; Noes 96: Majority 49.—(Div. List, No. 370.)

Amendment proposed to the words so restored to the Bill, in page 9, line 3, to leave out from the word "subject," to the word "satisfied," in line 7, both inclusive, and insert the words—

"Unless (a) such present tenancy has arisen at the expiration of a judicial lease, or of a lease existing at the time of the passing of this Act, and originally made for a term of not less than thirty-one years; or (b) it is proved to the satisfaction of the Court,"—
(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the said words so restored to the Bill."

MR. GIBSON, on a point of Order, inquired of the Speaker whether a decision on this point would not prejudice a similar question in a succeeding clause? He did not wish the question as to the termination of the lease, which would require to be hereafter discussed, to be got rid of on a side issue now.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT, also on a point of Order, inquired whether it was competent for the Government to amend words which had been passed by this House and sent up to the Lords, and which the Lords rejected; the Lords' Amendment being rejected here, was it competent for the House now to amend the former words which were provisionally inserted in the Bill?

MR. SPEAKER replied that a similar question to that asked by the hon. and gallant Baronet was raised on the previous day during the consideration of the hon. Member's (Mr. Brand's) Amendment. In his opinion, it was competent for the House to amend words restored to the Bill in consequence of the omission of certain words involved by the rejection of an Amendment by the Lords. That was the course which the right hon. and learned Gentleman proposed to take. With regard to the other question raised, he had not informed himself sufficiently to give a clear decision on the matter.

After Mr. GIBSON had consulted the Speaker for a few minutes,

MR. SPEAKER said, it appeared to him that the House would not be precluded from entertaining the point adverted to by the right hon. and learned Member when they reached the future clause of the Bill.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he did not wish to discuss the merits of the Attorney General for Ireland's proposal; but he must point out the inconvenience of the course now being taken, and the remarkable conduct of the Government. They were now called upon to assent to words which they had not previously seen, and which the Government itself had apparently not contemplated a few minutes ago. He agreed with his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gibson) that it was very difficult to judge the effect of a decision on this point now upon a subsequent clause which would have to be discussed. The Speaker had expressed his opinion that the Amendment would not preclude the future discussion of the question of leases; but that was a decision rapidly arrived at, and without a full consideration of the bearing of the Amendment. It was the duty of the Government to give a full explanation. Some intimation had been given, but it was so obscure that the House was not able to make out what it meant. In rejecting the Lords' Amendment there was an impression that the original words should be restored; but the substitution of other words without Notice might be in Order, but clearly was most inconvenient, and made proper consideration impossible.

MR. GLADSTONE said, if they were to conduct these conversations in a querulous tone and to listen to complaints without any ground whatever, it was quite idle to talk of limiting the discussion of this Bill. The complaint was that they had been obscure in the declarations of their intentions; but for what purpose was this Amendment proposed? Why, to meet the views of Gentlemen opposite. He proposed an Amendment which had for its object the making of the lease a statutory term. He wanted to know whether that was obscure or not? Then they were told that there had been no notice. It was totally impossible for the Government, who were bound to review the whole of these Amendments, to prepare beforehand the Amendments which it might be their duty to propose on the Lords' Amendments, and that was the ground upon which he said that the complaints of the right hon. Gentleman were querulous—a disposition to make complaints for which there was no sufficient cause. It must be remembered that these words now proposed would be reviewed elsewhere; but if hon. Gentlemen opposite could suggest a better mode of proceeding, the Government were quite ready to consider it. He did not see how this Amendment would preclude the discussion to which the right hon. Gentleman referred, especially when they considered that they had the ruling of the Chair, a ruling unaccompanied with any doubt on the part of the Speaker, and with regard to which they were safe in relying upon.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS suggested they had better get on with Business; but he could not forbear saying that no one, throughout the whole debates on the Bill, could take the slightest exception to the conduct of his right hon. Friend (Sir Stafford Northcote). His right hon. Friend's observations were perfectly fair and just; and he heard with some surprise and disappointment the Prime Minister apply to them an epithet which was quite undeserved, and which he (Sir R. Assheton Cross) felt sure the Prime Minister would be the first to regret. They had come to the conclusion that as the Government had made up their mind last night to move the Amendment in question, it might have been placed on the Notice Paper.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the difficulty was that if they had done so others would have required other Amendments to be placed on the Paper also.

MR. W. H. SMITH observed, that hon. and right hon. Gentlemen near him could not accept the responsibility of this Amendment. It had come upon them by surprise, and they were quite incapable of expressing any judgment upon it. He would, therefore, advise his Friends not to divide against it.

Question put, and negatived.

Words inserted.

Page 9, line 14, leave out ("may, if it think fit,") and insert ("shall, if the landlord so requires,") the next Amendment, read a second time.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, the clause originally provided that the Court "may, if it think fit," disallow such application; but the Lords changed that to "the Court shall, if the landlord so requires." He thought the discretion originally given to the Court should be retained, and moved to disagree with the Lords' Amendment.

Motion agreed to.

Page 9, line 16, leave out from the first ("the") to the end of the sub-section, and insert—

("Permanent improvements in respect of which, if made by the tenant or his predecessors in title, the tenant would have been entitled to compensation under the provisions of 'The Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870,' as amended by this Act, have been made by the landlord or his predecessors in title, and not by the tenant or his predecessors in title,")

—the next Amendment, read a second time.

On Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND, Amendment amended, by inserting, in line 6, after the word "made," the words "and substantially maintained."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) moved to insert, in line 7 of the Amendment, "and" for "or."

MR. GIBSON said, he was not sure that the Amendment might not be attended with serious results. His objection to the Amendment was that under it the landlord would not be able to get the moderate benefit of the provision unless he could prove that the improvements in question were made by himself and his predecessor in title.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, it was intended to provide that the maintenance should be continuous, and the difficulty was that the words "the landlord" or "his predecessor" did not involve continuous maintenance.

VOL. CCLXIV. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. GLADSTONE said, if the improvements had been made 50 years ago, and if they had been substantially maintained by the landlord and his successor in title, that would be sufficient.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, it might be sufficient for right hon. Gentlemen opposite; but the question was, whether it would be sufficient for the Courts? It would be a great pity that the present opportunity for making it clear should be lost. He understood the Government wished it to be enacted that the improvements should be made by the landlord or his predecessor in title, and maintained by the landlord and his successor; why not, then, insert the necessary words to express that intention?

Amendment agreed to.

Lords' Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

Page 9, line 33, after the word "fixed," insert the words—

"(6.) Subject to rules made under this Act, the landlord and tenant of any present tenancy to which this Act applies may, at any time, if such tenancy is not subject to a statutory term, or, if the tenancy is subject to a statutory term, then may, during the last twelve months of such term, by writing under their hands, agree and declare what is then the fair rent of the holding; and such agreement and declaration, on being filed in Court in the prescribed manner, shall have the same effect and consequences in all respects as if the rent so agreed on were a judicial rent fixed by the Court under the provisions of this Act;"

—the next Amendment, read a second time.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, the Government thought this new sub-section was an improvement, and would ask the House to accept it. They expected the Court would lay down rules which would secure the perfect freedom of the parties to come to an agreement of this kind.

MR. HEALY moved an Amendment to omit the word "present" before tenancy. He did not see why the Government should stand in the way of the landlord, and a future tenancy having the same rights as a landlord of the present tenancy.

Amendment proposed to the said Amendment, in line 2, to leave out the word "present."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'present' stand part of the said Amendment."

MR. GLADSTONE said, he did not know whether the hon. Member had carefully considered the effect of his Amendment; but it seemed to the Government to be really a circuitous mode of making a clear distinction between the present and future tenancies; and if that was so, of course they could not accept it.

MR. HEALY said, that was his intention.

Amendment to the said Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment agreed to.

Page 9, line 39, sub-section 8, leave out from the word "term," to the word "in," in line 41, and insert the words "and on any such application no rent shall be made payable," the next Amendment, read a second time.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) moved to disagree with the Amendment. He said, he should propose, subsequently, to add words defining the improvements on which no rent was to be paid as such as the tenant would be entitled to be compensated for under the Land Act of 1870.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the said Amendment."—
(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

MR. GIBSON said, the way the matter was now proposed to be left by the Government was this—they proposed that no rent should be paid under any circumstances upon any improvement made by the tenant at any time, or by his predecessor in title. The sole restriction which his right hon. and learned Friend desired the House to accept was that improvements in respect of which the tenant had received compensation should be omitted from the proposal of the Government. He apprehended that the Land Act of 1870 would show that even under that restriction grievous injustice might be done to the landlord. He did not say it would be done in many cases; but he would indicate how it might work. Under the Land Act of 1870 it was quite true that there was no restriction of time with respect to permanent improvements. The Land Act of 1870 said, and this Bill said, that a tenant, at the end of a statutory term, might apply to the Court to determine what would be a fair rent for the next statutory term, and the tenant might say that no rent should be payable in respect of any tenants' improvements, whether buildings or reclamation of waste lands. The Amendment introduced by the Lords was introduced to effect the object of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), and to do so by words almost the same as those of his Amendment. The Prime Minister was trying, by the Amendment moved by the Attorney General for Ireland, practically to cut down all restriction, and to unduly lower the landlord's interest.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the words moved by his right hon. and learned Friend were, as appeared by the Notice Paper of the House of Lords, the same words as the Marquess of Salisbury intended to move, although he afterwards receded from them. The Government certainly did not think that rent ought to be charged on improvements for which the tenant was entitled to be paid.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he thought the Government were seized with great admiration for the Amendment of the Marquess of Salisbury, especially when he did not move it. The words of Viscount Monck, which were adopted by the Marquess of Salisbury, were much better than those originally set down in the Notice Paper; and he could not see why the Government should prefer vague words rather than those which were clear and precise. At the beginning of a statutory term the rent was fixed, and it was fixed in view of improvements made by the tenant. When, at the end of a statutory term, the tenant again came into Court and asked that the rent should be adjusted, it was perfectly proper that the landlord should not allow any improvements to be considered which were made before the first rent was fixed. The effect of the Lords' Amendment would be to carry out that object, and he hoped the House would adhere to the Lords' Amendment.

MR. HEALY said, he thought it would be a cruel thing for landlords to be allowed to charge rent on account of improvements made by tenants, the result of the sweat flying out of them for many long years. Viscount Monck, who wanted to make the tenants pay rent on their own improvements, it should be remembered, was a Member of the Bessborough Commission.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 256 ; Noes 147 : Majority 109.—(Div. List, No. 371.)

Consequential Amendment proposed to the said sub-section in page 9, line 42, after the word "title," insert the words—

"And for which the tenant would be entitled to compensation under the provisions of 'The Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870,' as amended by this Act."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. GIBSON regarded this Amendment as a most important one ; but he did not propose to repeat observations he had already made. He desired, however, to ask the Government a question. Did they propose that, if any tenant was able to show that improvements had been made on his holding of a permanent character, or that waste lands had been reclaimed any number of years ago, he should be entitled to a diminution of rent, and that the landlord should have no power of showing that the rent had been moderate and that the tenant had received the benefit of his improvements? Under the Bill as it stood there was nothing to intimate to the Court that those facts should be taken into account.

MR. W. H. SMITH wished to ask the Government one question on this matter. In the event of an agreement having been made with the tenant, under which the tenant was bound to reclaim land and make other improvements, in consideration of which agreement a low rent was charged, and made payable for a long period of time, after which the land would come into the landlord's possession, he wanted to know how the landlord's right was preserved under this Act, as he saw no provision which would secure to the landlord the increased value of the property he was entitled to have, looking at the fair arrangements made between the landlord and tenant.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, if the tenant had been already paid for his improvements he would not be entitled to have the rent kept low because of the improvements, which could no longer be considered his.

MR. HEALY said, the House of Lords lost nothing whatever by inserting as many hostile Amendments as they could, and the Government now seemed disposed to give them a great deal of what they asked. The Whigs and Tories were allowed to hammer the Ministry upon the anvil as much as they liked ; but the Radical supporters of the Government, who agreed with the Irish Members in thinking that the Irish tenants should be relieved from their difficulties, did not seem to have a tongue amongst them, for they allowed the Bill to be cut to pieces like a corpse on the dissecting table. The words the Government now proposed to interfere with gave more satisfaction to the Irish tenants than almost any other part of the Bill ; and now, at the last moment, the Government dissipated the hopes they raised by giving in to the House of Lords. Home Rule Members had been told that they not merely fostered, but lived by agitation. Well, if they lived by agitation, the Government were now supplying them with the breath of their nostrils. The fact was the Bill was but a patchwork and compromising measure ; and the tinkering of the House of Lords to which the Government were about to give countenance would leave behind reminiscences which would not soon be forgotten.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he did not admire the style of argument by which the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Healy) tried to obtain advantages for the Irish tenant. He (Mr. Mitchell Henry) remembered that when the words referred to were inserted he got up and said to the right hon. Gentleman that there were no words in the whole Bill which would convey so much comfort to the Irish tenant as those which were now going to be tampered with. The raising of rents in consequence of improvements made by tenants was the very basis of all agitation in Ireland. The great principle in the words in question could be comprehended by the whole of the tenantry of Ireland ; but the rest could not be comprehended even by the most intelligent. The words in question were going to be altered, for what purpose it was impossible to say. He asked the Prime Minister, who, he feared, had been altogether misled upon the subject, to take the course which he took yesterday, to retract the alterations proposed by the Attorney General for Ireland, and to stick to these words and require them to become law. If he did that it would do more to insure a favourable reception for the Bill in Ireland than any other thing that could be done. It would do more than anything else could to insure the success of the Bill and to prevent our having a new agitation in Ireland.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the Amendment moved by his right hon. and learned Friend was in complete conformity with the intention with which the original words were adopted. He was afraid, however, the original words were wider in scope, and that if they were totally unqualified the tenant might be entitled not only to claim compensation for certain improvements in the shape of buildings, and the reclamation of land which might have been made at a remote day, but likewise he would be able to claim compensation for improvements for which he had already been paid, such, for example, as had been mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith)—namely, for improvements which had been made under a positive covenant requiring the tenant to make them, and for which payment was made to him in the shape of a low rent. Under these circumstances, the Government could not recede from the Amendment, which was intended to give roundness and completeness to the enactment they proposed. The Amendment stood on a perfectly clear and intelligible principle—namely, that the tenant should be liable to be charged rent upon improvements for which he was not entitled to be paid, and that he should not be charged rent upon improvements for which he was entitled to be paid.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, the Amendment was not on the Paper, and Members had great difficulty in following the exact intention of the Amendment. The apprehension in his mind had not been removed entirely by the statement of the Prime Minister, and he would tell the House why. He entirely agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) and with the Prime Minister that it would be, of course, absurd in a case where a tenant had been paid for improvements, and these had become the property of the landlord, to allow the tenant to claim the right to pay only a low rent because of improvements he had made. But, as he read the clause, he understood it would stand thus—that no rent should be allowed or be made payable in any proceedings under the Bill in respect of a certain class of improvements—that meant in respect of other improvements—not limiting itself to improvements for which the tenant had been paid, and which had become the property of the landlord, but left at large.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he thought the discussion illustrated the extreme difficulty they were placed in in endeavouring to regulate these matters, and he thought the difficulty had been increased by the attempt which the Government had made in their Bill to lay down directions, which were, after all, but imperfect directions, as to the mode in which different cases were to be dealt with. With regard to this particular case, he thought they were all agreed that they should protect the tenant against any rent being charged in respect of improvements he had made. But then the words proposed might, without any guard, render it impossible for a landlord to raise the rent with reference to improvements for which the tenant had been already paid. The Government had so far felt that, that they were desirous of introducing words which by reference to the Act of 1870 might show that the preserving a tenant from rent charged for his improvements did not apply to cases of that sort. A clear definition was desirable, and he would make the suggestion that instead of the words proposed referring to the Act of 1870 some other words should be added in the form of a proviso at the end of the words now proposed, and the words he would suggest were—

“Provided that the Court shall take into consideration the time during which such tenant may have enjoyed the advantage of those improvements, and also the rent at which such holding has been held, and any benefits which such tenant may have received from the landlord in consideration, expressly or impliedly, of the improvements so made.”

The hon. Member for Wexford cheered that ironically.

Mr. Mitchell Henry

MR. HEALY: Because the Government refused that to the hon. Member for Cork yesterday.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he thought he had not been mistaken in the Gentleman who cheered. Those words were themselves taken from the Act of 1870 with reference to the cases in which the Court was to award compensation to the tenant for improvements made by him. Under that Act the Court was to take into consideration the time during which the improvements had been enjoyed, and so forth. But that section was confined to the case of improvements made before the passing of the Act of 1870 on a holding held by the tenant under a tenancy existing at the passing of the Act. The original sin of the present Bill was that it attempted to deal with those matters by a Court, and that had been made more difficult by the particular way in which they had chosen to deal with the directions to be given to the Court. However, they had accepted that principle of the Bill which involved the intervention of the Court, and they were obliged to give it such directions as might make the matter clear. He submitted the words which he had read to the House as, perhaps, indicating the only way in which they could satisfactorily get out of their difficulty.

MR. SHAW agreed with those who thought that the change proposed in that clause would act very injuriously on the public mind in Ireland. The words of the sub-section were of too wide and general a character, and, if left as they were now, they might lead to serious misunderstanding. If those words were adopted without any qualification such as the Government proposed, it would be possible in many districts in the North of Ireland to raise the rents 50 per cent on the improvements of the tenants. The improvements for which the tenant could obtain compensation under the Act of 1870 or under the Bill were permanent buildings and reclamations of waste land; but for those gradual improvements made by the tenant year by year, until an almost barren region now looked like a garden, the tenant might under that clause have to pay an increased rent. He did not think that was the wish or the intention either of the Government or of right hon. Gentlemen opposite; but it would lead to agitation and unpleasantness such as they had heard nothing of. The North of Ireland was a peculiar place, its people were a peculiar people; and he did not desire to see that part of the country whipped into an agitation on that or on any other subject, because there would be a great deal more than words in such an agitation. Probably some words might be inserted in the Bill by which the Court might have under its review fertilizations and other improvements on which the tenants of the North of Ireland would consider it a very heavy grievance to be charged additional rent. That was one of the most serious questions which had yet come before the House upon those Amendments, and he hoped that the Government would see some way out of the difficulty.

MR. GIVAN believed that no change made in the Bill since it left the House had caused more bitter disappointment in Ulster than the one now under consideration. He was also much surprised that the Government should think for a moment of making the proposed addition to the sub-section. It was inconceivable that the Court would give the tenant compensation for improvements which he had already been actually paid for. If they looked at the Act of 1870 they would see distinctly the limited nature of the power given to the Court to award compensation for improvements, because the tenant was excluded by that Act from all improvements made 20 years before the claim, except permanent buildings and the reclamation of waste lands. He need scarcely remind the House that a great many of the improvements which were made by the tenant farmers in the North of Ireland were improvements which could not come under the head of reclamation of waste lands. For instance, improvements—such as planting trees, levelling fences, making roads, and a hundred other things which had been accomplished by the tenants of the North of Ireland, and rendered their holdings much more valuable than they were before, and which did not come under the exception of sub-section A, Clause 4, of the Land Act of 1870. Consequently, his experience had been—and he knew also the experience of many of the County Court Judges was exactly the same—that, owing to the wording of the subsection in question, they had been tied down from giving sufficient compensation for improvements to tenants, and were not able to decide in favour of many just and equitable claims. He respectfully suggested to the Government that they should not accept these words, and thus avoid imposing a very harsh limitation upon the tenant.

MR. PLUNKET felt sure that no one in the House wished that either in Ulster or in any other part of Ireland there should be a confiscation of the improvements of the tenant by the action of the Court or by a capricious addition to rent. His right hon. Friend (Sir Stafford Northcote) had proposed words which he thought the majority of the House would be prepared to adopt in their substantial sense, if not in their precise form, if any direction was to be given to the Court. Those words were taken from the 4th section of the Land Act of 1870. He would ask the Government to make a provision which was clearly contemplated in the Act of 1870, and which, by applying the 4th section of that Act to the process of fixing the fair rent, might not be wholly unsatisfactory.

MR. LAING said, he did not wish to take up the time of the House; but he thought the difficulty might be got over if the Government would add these words to the sub-section—

"For which the tenant or his predecessors in title shall not have been paid or compensated by the landlord or his predecessors."

This, he thought, did not interfere with the prohibition against raising rent for tenant's improvements, but took out the cases which had been pointed at in the course of the discussion.

MR. W. FOWLER said, he thought the suggestion worthy of consideration, and he had intended to make a similar suggestion—namely, to add the words—

"For which the tenant shall not have already received payment or compensation from the landlord."

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he thought that if the Government adhered to their proposal the clause had better be left out altogether, because it would take away concessions to the tenant which had already been made and would transform a boon into an injury.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he hoped the Lords' Amendment would be accepted by the House, as he believed it would give general satisfaction to the North of Ireland.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAW) said, he did not think that the House could well accept the proposal of the right hon. Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote). To select one provision of the Land Act in Clause 4 and reproduce it there in the Bill would rather suggest that the rest of Clause 4 was not to be incorporated, and would thus only create confusion and perplexity. The clause of the Act of 1870 to which the right hon. Baronet referred was made to apply only to tenancies existing at the passing of the Act, because it was intended that future tenancies should be contracts made by persons with their eyes open. The principle now to be kept in view was that the tenant was not to be charged rent for what was his own property. There were, he feared, practical difficulties in the way of adopting the suggestion of the hon. Member for Orkney (Mr. Laing). It might do very well if they were only dealing with recent events; but it would not be easy, in cases where they had to go back a great many years, to show that improvements made by the predecessor of the tenant had been paid for by the predecessor of the landlord. He did not see his way at this moment to accept the words suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk. The Government were, however, not so wedded to their own proposal as to be unwilling to adopt any other which would operate fairly both to landlord and tenant. He was afraid that the object they all had in view could not be effected with mathematical accuracy and precision, but they might attain substantial justice; and he hoped to discover some mode of meeting the fair requirements of the case.

At this point the SPEAKER left the Chair for 10 minutes.

When the Chair was again taken,

MR. EDWARD CLARKE commented upon the state of indecision which the Attorney General for Ireland appeared to be in on the subject under discussion, and thought it would be a much safer course for the House to abide by the Amendment originally proposed than adopt the result of the consultation which had just taken place while the Speaker was absent.

Mr. Givan

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, that what the Government desired to do was to deal justly with the claims of both landlord and tenant; and he thought it was only a man who had an absurdly good opinion of himself who would refuse to consider all suggestions made for improvement of so important and intricate a measure as the present. The Government, not being particularly wedded to their own Amendment, had, on consideration, decided to adopt words which he thought were substantially the same as what had been proposed by the hon. Members for Dundalk, Orkney, and Cambridge. He had found, on further consideration, that the Land Act of 1870 furnished a corrective for the difficulty which he chiefly feared. Where a tenant could prove by witnesses that he had made improvements, of course he would be allowed for them. Again, if there were no living witnesses, the tenant must of necessity resort to the presumption enacted by the 5th section of the Act of 1870. But that presumption was itself restricted to improvements made by the tenant within 20 years before the passing of the Act. The landlord would therefore, he thought, be perfectly safe under the circumstances; and, accordingly, the Government were willing to accept these words in substitution for their own proposal in respect of improvements made by the tenant or his predecessors in title—

“And for which, in the opinion of the Court, the tenant or his predecessors in title shall not have been paid or compensated by the landlord or his predecessors in title.”

He asked leave to withdraw the original Amendment proposed by him in favour of the one he had now read.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, this was not the first time the Attorney General for Ireland had placed Amendments on the Paper, and then, after they had led to a certain amount of discussion, asked permission to withdraw them. He had now made a complete change during the short time the Speaker was absent for luncheon. In the first instance, the right hon. and learned Gentleman spoke strongly in favour of his own Motion, and then he found in the Land Act a provision which relieved him of all his difficulties. Under these circumstances, the proposal of the Attorney General for Ireland to withdraw his Amendment would be resisted from that (the Opposition) side of the House.

Question put.

The House divided: — Ayes 138; Noes 272: Majority 134.—(Div. List, No. 372.)

Consequential Amendment proposed to the Bill, in page 9, line 42, after the word “title,” to insert the words—

“And for which, in the opinion of the Court, the tenant or his predecessors in title shall not have been paid or compensated by the landlord or his predecessors in title.”—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. GIBSON said, that if any time had been lost at that stage of the Bill the Government alone was to blame. They had had ample time to consider the Bill in all its various stages, and here was the result. They came down to the House with a distinct proposal, which was introduced by the right hon. and learned Gentleman in a speech of 10 minutes, and which was presented from the Chair for the acceptance of the House. Afterwards, however, the right hon. and learned Gentleman announced that the Government had so far modified their views that they advised the House to accept suggestions which had been made by some other hon. Members. The result of all this was that they had just divided on the Government proposal, and the Government had voted against their own Amendment. Now, the proposal against which the Government had just divided was one which had had the sanction of Mr. Butt and of the hon. Member for the County of Cork (Mr. Shaw), when he proposed a Bill. The Amendment differed from the present one in some important particulars. The present proposal had been drawn up at a moment's notice, he believed, by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell), and it was now suggested for the acceptance of the House. For one thing, the present Amendment had no express limit as to time, and the only qualification stated was that the tenant must show that he had not been paid or compensated. The argument in favour of this extremely vague and loose qualification was, no doubt, strengthened a little by the fact that there was some period of time in respect of which the presumption would not be against the landlord. But the qualification should have stated in terms some limit as to time, and some reference as to the value of the improvements. In his opinion, the Amendment was unsatisfactory, as being without express limit as to time—unsatisfactory, inasmuch as it did not take sufficient account of the value of the improvements at the date of claim, and most unsatisfactory as it did not adequately direct the attention of the Court to some of the most important elements which any Court should fairly take into account. These matters had been referred to in the suggestion of his right hon. Friend (Sir Stafford Northcote); but they had been but lightly touched by the Attorney General for Ireland. The words now before the House, however, contained some limit which the Bill, as it stood, did not; and he would not, therefore, vote against them.

MR. GLADSTONE said, so far as the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman was an attack or a censure upon the Government he did not propose to deal with it. His duty—although it was quite within the licence of the right hon. and learned Gentleman to use the time of the House in attacks of that kind—was to reply to the arguments so far as they admitted of an answer. The right hon. and learned Gentleman objected to this Amendment; he likewise had argued in favour of an Amendment not directly before the House. The first objection was that there was no limit of time within which the tenant might be compensated. There was no limit of time wherever the tenant was able to prove that the improvements were his; but there was a distinct limit of time where he could not prove that, and that limit was the limit of presumption under the Land Act of 1870. The presumption under that Act stopped at a certain point—except where, in rare cases, the tenant would be perfectly entitled to compensation—and beyond that point he had no presumption, and the improvements would be taken to be the property of the landlord, and part of the holding which the tenant took. With reference to there being no limit of value, that limit was this—improvements were to be tested by the addition they made to the letting value of the holding. Those were matters included in the Amendment before the House, particularly in the words “paid for or compensated by the landlord or his predecessors in title.” The Government held that the Amendment was just and fair; and he did not believe that the practical difference between the Amendment of the Government and that which they had determined to abandon was great. But that was a matter upon which it was not necessary to enter. The Amendment covered the whole case laid down by the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

Question put, and agreed to.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he thought he should be in Order in moving the Amendment which he was about to move. The right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite had taken objection to the Amendment because it was incorporating into the Bill the provisions of a certain section of the Act of 1870, and by so doing it might be held to exclude other parts of that Act. But he intended the words as substantive words, and not merely as a reference to the Act of 1870. All agreed that there should be a proper instruction to the Court to preserve the rights of the tenants, with a due consideration of the rights which they had already enjoyed. The words he proposed were deliberately adopted in an analogous case in the Act of 1870.

Consequential Amendment proposed to the Bill, at the end of the foregoing Consequential Amendment, insert the words—

“Provided, That the Court shall take into consideration the time during which such tenant may have enjoyed the advantage of such improvements, also the rent at which such holding has been held, and any benefits which such tenant may have received from his landlord in consideration, expressly, or impliedly, of the improvements so made.”

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the Government could not agree to the proposed words. So far as they laid legitimate ground for consideration, he had already shown that they were included in the words which had already been admitted. A low rent or other material money benefits given by the landlord in respect of improvements was completely provided for. But there was another Amendment in the words in respect to which they were not prepared to give the same approbation. That was that—

“The Court shall take into consideration the time during which such tenant may have enjoyed the advantages of such improvements.”

The doctrine accepted at the time of the Land Act of 1870, and which he certainly declined to accept the night before, was the doctrine that the enjoyment by the tenant for a certain time of his own improvements might have reimbursed him for the cost of those improvements, and by a natural process they passed over to the landlord. But that was not the basis upon which they proceeded now, and there was no occasion for it. The tenant's improvements were the tenant's own property, and he would not admit the principle that the time during which he had enjoyed those improvements was any reason for their passing away from him.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that the words of the Prime Minister would lead to the inference that in no case under, for example, a building lease should the buildings put up by the lessee come into possession of the landlord. [“No!”] The principle laid down was that the person who took the property at a low rent from the landlord, and erected permanent buildings upon it, should for ever retain those buildings. [MR. GLADSTONE: No!] He was glad the right hon. Gentleman disavowed that inference. But what was his objection to the words? Why should the tenant, already compensated by the lowness of the rent, be compensated again?

Question put.

The House divided: — Ayes 147; Noes 277: Majority 130.—(Div. List, No. 373.)

Page 9, line 42, after the word “title,” insert the words “during such statutory term;” and also insert, as a new sub-section—

“(9.) The rent of a holding shall not be reduced in any proceedings under this Act on account of any money or money's worth paid or given by the tenant or his predecessors in title, otherwise than to the landlord, on coming into the holding,”

—the next Amendment, read a second time.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he should like to know if the right hon. Baronet (Sir Stafford Northcote) intended to move to insert after the word “given,” in the new sub-section, the words “during the statutory term.”

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he would like to know the view of the Government on the matter.

MR. GLADSTONE: That the Amendment of the Lords and the right hon. Baronet were both bad.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he would not propose the Amendment unless it would modify the objection of the Government to the Lords' Amendment. He should like to hear the objection to the clause as modified by the Lords.

MR. GLADSTONE said, they decidedly objected to sub-section 9, because, as the Bill was originally drafted, it was alleged against the Government—although they did not admit it—that they had introduced into the 7th clause expressions which led to the belief that the value of the tenant's interest was to be deducted from the fair rent before the fair rent was fixed. That they always disclaimed—that they were not two parts; but one of an actual whole—and that the principle of deduction was one which ought not to be mentioned in connection with the fixing of fair rent. On that basis the Bill was sent up to the House of Lords. The principle of deduction was now being introduced in the form of positive enactment. The Government denied that any deduction was to be made. They believed that the tenant's interest should be fairly estimated on its own ground under the 1st clause, and the fair rent similarly estimated under the 7th clause. The Amendment would produce a mischievous effect upon the minds of the people of Ireland. It was quite impossible to introduce the notion of deduction. With respect to the Amendment of which Notice had been given on the previous night, he admitted that it took the poison out of the Lords' Amendment, providing, as it did, that rent should not be reduced in respect of the price given by the tenant during the statutory term. Certainly not. The tenant entered on the statutory term subject to a fixed rent, and would make his bargains with his eyes open. But if it were to be enacted that no deduction in respect of the price given by the tenant during the statutory term should be made, the inference would be raised that such deduction was to take place after the term. The Court would be influenced in that direction with that enactment before it. In the interest of the landlord they could not agree to that proposed Amendment of the Lords' Amendment; nor, in the interest of the tenant, could he agree to the Amendment itself.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE admitted that it was important to consider what inference might be drawn from the words proposed to be introduced. He only proposed to introduce those words—with respect to the price given during the statutory term—in the event of the clause being negatived by the Government. The object was to provide means of showing that the intention of the Lords was not to interfere with the existing rights of tenants in Ulster or elsewhere. The Government might say that the rent and the tenant's interest must be kept separate; but the saying so 50 times in the impressive manner the Prime Minister could say it would not alter the real condition of the case, which was this—that if a man had to give a large price for his holding, then he could only afford a low rent, or vice versa. The question was, when it came to an adjustment of those two considerations, which was to give way? In introducing the principle of free sale, undoubtedly the competition, or the "land-hunger," would increase, and many would be induced to bid high prices for holdings they desired to get. Having paid that, it would not be possible to pay the rent the farm had hitherto paid; and then came the question, which should give way—the rent or the amount which should be paid for tenant's interest? Was the tenant to be allowed to go to the Court and say the rent was exorbitant because of the high price he paid for his holding? That was a point against which the Lords' Amendment was intended to guard. He admitted that the Amendment of the Lords was susceptible of being misunderstood so as to interfere with the tenant's rights on account of money paid by him. But the object of the Amendment had been clearly expressed by his noble Friend the Marquess of Salisbury, and he thought that it ought to be accepted. It ought to be taken into consideration that the Government were operated on by extrinsic influences—that was, the Land League; and the Amendment contained nothing unjust to the tenant.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, it appeared to him that the adoption of the Amendment now before the House was essential if effect was to be given to the declaration of the First Lord of the Treasury, that it was not the purpose of the Bill that the payment by the incoming to the outgoing tenant should interfere with the landlord's rent. The House should remember that it was now giving a direction to the Land Court, which was to be established by the Bill, for the purpose of insuring that the rent to be paid by the incoming tenant should be a fair rent. Now, unless the House declared by some terms equivalent to the purport of this Amendment that the payment or price for the occupation to be paid by the incoming to the outgoing tenant should not be taken into account in assessing that which was to be the fair rent payable to the landlord, all English practice proved that that payment for entry would be a prime element in determining the amount of rent thereafter to be received by the landlord. If, therefore, the First Lord of the Treasury was sincere in his repeated declarations, that those payments on entry should not affect the future rent, it was manifest that he ought to adopt the principle and purport of the Amendment now before the House. He said that not without information and experience, for it was he who moved for and carried the Select Committee on the Agricultural Customs of this country in 1848. He had been for years the lord of manors in this country, and he took a somewhat active part in the debates which preceded the adoption of the Agricultural Holdings Act; and he fearlessly asserted that unless the future fair rent was declared in the Bill to be a matter separate and distinct from the payments which the Bill contemplated as to be necessarily incident to entry upon, or to admission to, Irish holdings, the amount of those payments on entry would inevitably determine the amount of the future rent; whereas, if the amount of the fair rent be declared by the Bill to be a matter—as the First Lord of the Treasury said it ought to be—distinct and apart from those payments, the amount of the future fair rent to be paid by the incoming tenant would limit and determine the amount of compensation, or whatever it might be, to be paid by the incoming to the outgoing tenant on entry upon, or admission to, the holding.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR understood that the Leader of the Opposition did not propose to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice last night, so that the House was not discussing the Lords' Amendment as it stood on the Paper. The Prime Minister said if the Amendment were accepted it would be misunderstood in Ireland. In plain words, then, if a clear definition of a principle, which the Government themselves admitted to be a right principle, were put into the Bill, a feeling of disappointment would spread throughout the whole of the Irish tenantry. This was an indication that this Bill was presented in a different colour to the House from what it was presented to the people of Ireland. It was to be a shield of gold on the one side, and of silver on the other. They were told that the Bill would only compel the landlord to do that which the good landlord had already done. The Irish tenants expected much more than that. They expected a substantial slice of the landlord's property. The Government, by their own admission, told them that was so. It was too late to prevent the Bill from violating all the recognized principles of legislation, and too late to prevent the whole of the agricultural property of Ireland from being put in the hands of a triumvirate. It was not too late, however, to prevent the income of Irish landlords from being unjustly reduced by the operation of this clause. This they could accomplish by adopting the Amendment. If that Amendment should be rejected the Bill would be open to the charge of being a scheme of public plunder.

MR. CHAPLIN supported the Amendment, not only as one of the most valuable among the Lords' Amendments, but also because it was in accordance with the repeated declarations of Members of the Government. He thought the House ought to accept the Amendment, and he hoped the Government would reconsider their decision. The Prime Minister disclaimed the idea of deducting tenant right from the rent. They had been repeatedly told it was not to be carved out of the rent; but the Prime Minister said he did not admit that in the construction of the Bill. But the Court, under the 7th clause, would be compelled to take into consideration the amount paid to the tenant. It was quite true there was a nominal safeguard placed in the hands of the landlord against the price given for the tenant right being excessive. The Court would be obliged to decide the price on the basis of the price obtainable in the open market. He could not understand how, in justice or good faith, it was possible for the Government to refuse to accept the Amendment. He trusted that it would be sternly adhered to by the House of Lords.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 268; Noes 133: Majority 135.—(Div. List, No. 374.)

Page 10, line 31, after ("tenancy") insert ("and for a term not exceeding sixty years"), the next Amendment, read a second time.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) advised the House to accept the Amendment, which gave the lessee a run of 60 years.

MR. HEALY asked the Attorney General for Ireland if he did not think that the future tenant was placed in a worse position by the changes in the clause than the present tenant? He thought the Government should do something to restore the future tenant to his former status.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. PARNELL asked, would he be in Order in moving the following addition to the sub-section referred to in the last Amendment?—

"Provided that no refusal by the tenant to accept a lease under the provisions of this section from his landlord shall be deemed by the Court to be unreasonable conduct."

MR. SPEAKER ruled that the Amendment could not be put.

Page 11, line 12, leave out from ("and") to ("considering") in line 14, the next Amendment, disagreed to.

Page 11, line 29, leave out ("as if no") and insert ("notwithstanding"); line 30, leave out ("had been taken") the two next Amendments, agreed to.

[Second Night.]

"(6.) A tenant compelled to quit his holding during the continuance of a statutory term in his tenancy, in consequence of the breach by the tenant of any statutory condition, shall not be entitled to compensation for disturbance,"

—the next Amendment, read a second time.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) asked the House to accept the Amendment. The tenant was already precluded from claiming compensation in every case of a serious breach of statutory conditions; and there was, therefore, no harm in accepting the Amendment.

MR. HEALY said, the statement of the Attorney General for Ireland was true, generally; but he did not mention that the acceptance of this Amendment would make more numerous and more stringent the statutory conditions which would render the tenant liable to eviction.

Amendment agreed to.

Page 13, line 27, leave out ("may") and insert ("shall,") the next Amendment, agreed to.

Page 13, lines 31 and 32, leave out ("immediate landlord for the time being") and insert ("landlord being a limited owner,") the next Amendment, read a second time.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) moved to disagree with the Amendment.

MR. GIBSON thought his right hon. and learned Friend had not represented to the House the unfair position in which several landlords would be placed if some modification was not made in the Bill as it left this House. The clause, as it originally stood, meted out rather rough justice to the landlord, and he could quite understand that the Peers should have made this change. He did not intend to comment at length on the question; but he could not allow the Amendment to be disagreed to without entering his protest.

MR. MARUM thought that to allow the sub-tenants or occupying tenants to be displaced in the way the Amendment would bring about would be most unsatisfactory.

Amendment negatived.

Page 13, line 34, leave out ("next superior") and after ("being") insert ("succeeding to him in estate"), the next Amendment, disagreed to.

Page 14, after Clause 15, insert Clause B—

(Provision as to certain claims of pasturage and turbary.)

"Where the tenant of a holding by virtue of his tenancy exercises over uninclosed land a right of pasturing or turning out cattle or other animals in common with other persons, or exercises a right of cutting and taking turf in common with other persons (which right is in this section referred to as a common right, and which other persons, together with the tenant, are in this section referred to as commoners), then if such holding becomes subject to a statutory term the court may, during the continuance of such term, on the application of the landlord, or of any commoner, by order restrain the tenant from exercising his right of pasture or cutting or taking turf in any manner other than that in which it may be proved to the court that he is, under the circumstances and according to the ordinary usage which has prevailed, with the consent of the landlord, amongst the commoners, reasonably entitled to exercise the same,"

—the next Amendment, read a second time.

MR. PARNELL thought the words "on the application of the landlord" might be struck out, and the right restricted to the tenants, who would have the power of arranging their own disputes.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, if there were a number of tenants it was much better for them that the application should be made by the landlord.

On the Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND, the Amendment was amended as follows, and agreed to:—In line 2, after "exercises," insert "in common with other persons;" line 3, after "animals," leave out "in common with other persons;" lines 5 and 6, after "persons," leave out "which right is in this section referred to as a common right, and;" line 14, after "the" insert "express or implied."

Page 14, line 6, after ("may") insert ("after service of the prescribed notice upon the landlord"); line 8, after ("land") insert ("in a situation to be approved by the landlord, or failing such approval to be determined by the Court"); line 12, after ("act") invert ("and notwithstanding such subletting the tenant shall for the purposes of this Act be deemed to be still in occupation of the holding"), the three next Amendments, read a second time, and agreed to.

Page 14, line 13, leave out from the word "the," to the end of the Clause, and insert the words—

"Portion of any holding so let does not exceed half an acre in each case, and that the total number of such lettings of portions of a holding does not exceed one for every twenty-five acres of tillage land contained in the holding,"

—the next Amendment, read a second time, and disagreed to.

MR. O'SULLIVAN moved to omit the word "tillage." The retention of the word would make the Amendment ridiculous, as applied to holdings in Ireland. No average farmer tilled 25 acres of land.

MR. GIBSON asked what would a farmer having only 25 acres of pasture want a labourer's cottage for?

MR. PARSELL hoped the Government would agree to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Limerick, or to some substantial modification of the original clause.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member could not move an Amendment in the Bill which had not been touched by the Lords.

MR. PARSELL said, his hon. Friend proposed to move an Amendment to the words which had been kept alive by the rejection of the Lords' Amendment. He asked the Government, following out the precedents which they had adopted all the way through this Bill, not to lay down a hard-and-fast line, and limit the discretion of the Court in this matter. The limitation was too severe. It would be difficult to find 25 acres under tillage even on very large farms. In their case, then, there would be a paucity of labour. It was a mistake to think that labour was not required upon pasture land. It had to be drained, fenced, top-dressed, &c.

MR. O'SULLIVAN proposed to leave out the word "tillage," so that a labourer's cottage might be erected for every 25 acres on a farm.

Amendment proposed to the words so restored to the Bill in page 14, line 15, to leave out the word "tillage."—(Mr. O'Sullivan.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'tillage' stand part of the said words so restored to the Bill."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) explained that there was no hard-and-fast line laid down here at all. It was to remove the hard-and-fast line that the Lords' Amendment had been rejected. Where there were 26 acres there might be two cottages, if the Court so decided; and in the case of anything under 25 acres—with, say, five acres tillage and the rest pasturage—it would be possible for the Court to authorize one cottage to be built.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, under these circumstances, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Page 14, line 36, leave out ("said Acts") and insert ("seventh section of the Act of the Session of the tenth and eleventh years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter thirty-two"), the next Amendment, read a second time, and agreed to.

Page 15, line 15, leave out sub-section 3, the next Amendment, read a second time.

MR. GLADSTONE said, this was an Amendment which it was impossible for them to accept. It was most important that where these pre-emptions were made, in the exercise of the special privileges of the landlords, there should not be an immediate creation of future tenancies in respect of them. It would tend to disturb that important provision of the Act which aimed at securing a certain period of tranquillity and stability in Ireland without any change at all other than might grow out of the failure on the part of the tenant to fulfil the conditions of his holding.

LORD JOHN MANNERS thought the tranquillity which the right hon. Gentleman proposed to obtain would be procured by a provision essentially unjust and unfair; and he submitted that tranquillity in Ireland, or anywhere else, produced by such means was not the sort of tranquillity to which the House ought to be a party. The Amendment of the Lords gave vitality and effect to the 1st clause of the Bill, which suggested to the landlord that he should exercise his right of pre-emption. That right was rendered entirely valueless and useless by the words which the Prime Minister proposed to retain, and which the House of Lords asked them to reject. With these words in the Bill the right of pre-emption would be a mere empty formula and a delusion.

[Second Night.]

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 242; Noes 124: Majority 118.—(Div. List, No. 375.)

And it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, Further Consideration of Lords Amendments stood adjourned till To-morrow.

In reply to Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, MR. GLADSTONE said: We propose to proceed with this Bill as the first Order to-morrow. I hope that we may dispose of it at an early hour, and, if so, we shall then proceed with the Navy Estimates. It is intended to propose a Sitting on Saturday, and if this Bill should come back from the Lords we shall propose to proceed with it. The Navy Estimates will not be taken after 9 o'clock.

House adjourned at Six o'clock.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL STATE—THE BOUNDARIES.

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

LORD BRABOURNE called attention to the Convention just concluded with the Transvaal Boers, the 1st Article whereof stated that the new Transvaal State would “embrace the land lying between the following boundaries,” and added—“here follow three pages of definitions of Boundaries”—without any clue to what these were. He (Lord Brabourne) reminded their Lordships that in the Instructions which the Secretary of State for the Colonies gave to the Commissioners on 31st March, he entered with some elaboration into the condition of the different districts of the Transvaal with reference to the numbers of the Native population resident in each, and suggested that one or more of these districts should be severed from the Transvaal for the better protection of the Natives, and the greater security of peace for the future. He wished to ask the noble Earl (the Earl of Kimberley), Whether his suggestions had been wholly, or in part, accepted, or whether they had been discarded and set at nought by the Commissioners; in fact, whether the noble Earl could state what the new boundaries would be, and whether any future Papers to be presented in reference to the Transvaal would comprise a map of the new State?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, in answer to the Question of my noble Friend, I may state that, after full consideration, it was decided not to sever from the Transvaal any part of the territory which had previously been considered to belong to the State. My noble Friend will see that I have not got the full text of the Convention, simply because it was not thought worth while to have three pages of definitions telegraphed; but I can give him the main definitions of the boundary as they were telegraphed before the Convention was signed—“External Boundaries of Future Transvaal State.—On the South as at present; on the South-east, the boundaries of Zululand and Swaziland as lately defined under the authority of Her Majesty's Government; on the East, boundaries of Lydenburg and Zoutpansberg at present recognized; on the North by the Limpopo River; on the North-west and West, the boundaries as laid down in 1880 by the Colonial Government; and on the South-west by the boundary of the Keate award, as recommended. It will leave outside the Transvaal the Barolong Chiefs Montsioa and Moshete, the Korama Chief Massou, and the Batlapi Chiefs Mankaroane, Mathlabani, and the ex-chief Gasibone.

“Keate Award Territory.—The new boundary line proceeds from Ramathlabama in a southerly direction till it reaches the Hart River below the Salt Pans, thence along that river to Manusa, and then through Koppie Inkel to the boundary of Griqualand West, midway between the Vaal and Hart Rivers. It will leave within the Transvaal all occupied Boers' farms held in title, except portions of two, and exclude about 75 registered but unoccupied farms, the titles of which will be cancelled, the owners receiving such compensation as the Volksraad may assign.”

When the Government receives the Convention in full, and Papers are presented, I will take care that a map is included.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS REGULATION BILL.—(No. 201.)

(The Earl Beauchamp.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE said, he wished to make a few remarks at that stage of the Bill. He did not from its title know the nature of it, and therefore he was not in the House when it was read a second time; but, as he was a member of the body through whom Mr. Green was now in prison, he desired to make a few remarks. In bringing forward the Bill, the noble Earl in charge of it (Earl Beauchamp) begged the whole question by calling in question the legal action and authority of the Courts that dealt with the case. When a case went against a person, he was always inclined to think the law was bad and badly carried out; and in Ireland, where at present lawlessness prevailed, the lawless parties felt exactly the same thing. They said they did not like the law, and therefore would not obey it. The plea was one he certainly should not have expected from anyone in the position of the noble Earl. There might be reasons for changing the constitution of a Court or of the law; but, while they existed, every good subject of the Queen should consider that he ought to be bound by the law, and to obey the Court. The most rev. Primate (the Archbishop of Canterbury) had again and again stated that the Courts having arrived at a decision, it was necessary to enforce the law; but when, after a struggle of years, it was enforced, he moved for a Commission which had been treated as calling in question the authority of the Courts that administered the law, and now he would send back Mr. Green to carry on without check his illegal proceedings. Under the circumstances, it was not surprising that it was said that indirectly the most rev. Primate and the right rev. Bench had given encouragement to the lawlessness that existed in the Church. The noble Earl wanted to know why did the Church Association select a poor parish, and attack Mr. Green, the clergyman of that poor congregation, and his friends in their illegal practices, instead of attacking a rich one? The answer was plain. The Church Association were obliged to take up cases in defence of poor congregations. The poor could not defend themselves. They could not choose their Church, but were obliged to attend the one in their own neighbourhood; the rich could do so, backed as Ritualistic clergymen were by the funds of the Church Union. The most rev. Primate asked that Mr. Green should be allowed to return to his cure of souls and carry on illegal practices. Did the most rev.

Primate consider that this was a matter of no importance? It was of far greater importance than the inconvenience Mr. Green suffered from his own contumacy. It was to prevent this wrong that Mr. Green was kept in prison. The most rev. Primate the other evening grieved that a conscientious man like Mr. Green should be put in prison. Now, conscience was a very varying thing, and in some countries while the men went out to rob, the women stayed at home to pray. Every man's conscience was hurt when he had to do that which he did not like to do. There were two kinds of conscientious clergymen—those who, like Cardinal Manning, conscientiously held views contrary to the Church of England and conscientiously left it. Mr. Green, on the contrary, held views, or, at any rate, carried out practices, contrary to the law of the Church of England while remaining in it. He would hardly become a Cardinal; but probably he could become a priest of the Church of Rome, or, indeed, any other Church to whose laws he would yield obedience. What hardship was inflicted on Mr. Green when, if he would give up the emoluments of the Church, he could free himself and act according to what his conscience dictated? If he were liberated unconditionally, he would go back to his congregation, and continue to encourage his parishioners to practice doctrines that were foreign to the Church of England, and which the Courts of Law had decided to be illegal and contrary to the covenant by which Mr. Green held his position in the Church of England. Did the most rev. Primate think that that would be desirable? Was it not most important to the people, and more important than whether Mr. Green should wait a little more or less in prison? Surely the welfare of the congregation should be as much thought of as that of the clergyman. If he could be prevented from committing these offences again, he (Lord Oranmore and Browne), no more than any of their Lordships, wished that the rev. gentleman should be retained in prison. They must remember that Mr. Green was one of those clergymen who refused obedience as much to Bishops as to the Civil Courts; they owned no authority but their own consciences; they were bound by no contracts and no promises. Each was an infallible Pope to himself and his followers. There was no law against that; each of them was free to stand, on that ground but he was not free to enter on a contract to receive all the advantages accruing under it, and to repudiate the obligations, as decided, with the exception of the Court of Arches, by the same Courts which interpreted contracts in all other cases. He hoped there was no doubt that Englishmen would support the rights of free contract, and no doubt either that the Civil Courts would preserve the right of interpreting the legal bearing of such contracts. As to the analogy with the case of Mr. Thorogood, as was shown by the noble and learned Lord upon the Woolsack the other evening, he (Lord Oranmore and Browne) could see none. It was of little importance that he did not pay 5s. 6d. church rates; while it was of the greatest importance that a clergyman of the Church of England should be bound to fulfil the legal obligations he had undertaken. But the fact was that Mr. Thorogood was released directly he complied with the law, and the fine was paid. The most rev. Primate stated how impossible it was, if Mr. Green were released, to enforce the obligations. But whose action had made it so? When the Royal Commission was proposed, he (Lord Oranmore and Browne) had expressed the opinion that it would be highly undesirable, as it could arrive at but one conclusion. He was informed that the right rev. Bench had, for the future, unanimously resolved not to allow any clergyman to be prosecuted, though his ministrations were undeniably contrary to law, pending the Report of the Royal Commission.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: There is no foundation whatever for that statement.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE said, of course he accepted that denial, as far as regarded the most rev. Primate himself; but there were cases in which Members of the right rev. Bench had said plainly and distinctly what he had stated, and they were Bishops who did not in the least favour the High Church party; and he knew this, that no action had since been taken by the members of the Church Association. He had been under the impression that the resolution he had referred to had been passed, and he was glad to hear it denied, because he hoped they would be able to enforce the law against recalcitrant mem-bans of the Church of England. Circumstances had prevented his calling attention to the constitution of the Commission; but had he time he could show that it was a wholly one-sided Commission.

Lord Oranmore and Browne

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES) said, the noble Lord was evidently not aware of the Amendment which it was proposed to make in Committee.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE said, that was so. He must, however, complain that there had not been a member of the Church Commission appointed by the Prime Minister. The right rev. Bench had often condemned both the Church Association and the Church Union; but while the former was not represented on the Commission, there were two Members of the latter upon it, and results had shown that the former society was fighting in support of, and the latter against the laws of the Church of England. As to the wish that Mr. Green should be released from prison, he heartily desired that Mr. Green should be released, if he would either fulfil the obligations he had undertaken as a clergyman of the Church of England, or, if he could not do so conscientiously, no longer continue to retain a false and injurious position. The statement they had heard the other day from the noble and learned Lord the Lord Chancellor, which was to the effect that it was important that the law should be carried out, was most satisfactory. The noble and learned Lord put forward these views with the weight of his high position and free from all taint of partisanship; and he (Lord Oranmore and Browne) had no doubt that he would support those views in no undecided tone.

EARL BEAUCHAMP said, he regretted very much that the noble Lord (Lord Oranmore and Browne) was not in the House on Tuesday when the Bill was read a second time. He (Earl Beauchamp) had never said that the decision of the Law Courts should not be obeyed; what he did say was that it was not right that the decisions of the Law Courts should be pressed home with a savage rigour as they had been. The noble Lord stated that the reason why the Church Association had taken up the case against Mr. Green was because a poor congregation was not able to defend itself. But that was not a reason worthy of the noble Lord, because the congregation of Miles Platting only wished to be left alone. The noble Lord had also alluded to the fact of their being unable to attend other churches; but it was evident that they did not desire to do so, as Mr. Green was much respected by them. The Church Association had been unable to get any of the parishioners to take part in the proceedings against Mr. Green, and it had been necessary for the prosecutors to qualify strangers as parishioners by obtaining for them a residence, and the cost of this proceeding Mr. Green had been obliged to pay. It was a matter of notoriety that Mr. Green enjoyed the confidence of his flock and the whole of his parish in a most remarkable manner.

House in Committee.

Clause 1 (Repeal of part of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 93).

On the Motion of The Earl BEAUCHAMP, the following Amendment made:—In page 1, line 8, leaves out ("first recited,") and insert ("said.")

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 2 and 3 severally agreed to.

Clause 4 (Party not to be released from further observance of justice).

On the Motion of The Earl BEAUCHAMP, the following Amendment made:—In page 1, line 17, after ("such") insert ("party or"), and after ("person") insert ("or party.")

Moved, at end of Clause to add—

"Provided always, that if such suit be one brought under the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, no further proceedings shall be taken in such suit unless the bishop of the diocese certify in writing under his hand that the party or person has since his release from custody had an opportunity of submitting to his godly administrations and has failed to submit to the same. Provided further, that upon such certificate being filed in the registry of the Court by which such party or person has been pronounced in contempt, such party or person being an incumbent within the meaning of the said Public Worship Regulation Act, shall be liable to the same penalty as an incumbent against whom a second inhibition in regard to the same monition has been issued within the provisions of section 13 of the said Act, and his benefice or other ecclesiastical preferment shall thenceforth become void as provided in the said section."—(The Earl Beauchamp.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR moved to amend the Proviso by extending it, not only to suits under the Act of 1874, but to all ecclesiastical suits: and also by following, as nearly as possible, the procedure pointed out by the clause in the Act of 1874, to which reference was made, by the introduction of certain words with the view of giving fuller effect to the provisions of the Public Worship Regulation Act.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE asked, if the Proviso was adopted, what means would be left to bring clergymen who offended against the law before the Court?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in reply, said, that the object of the proposal was that the responsibility should be thrown on the Bishop. The reason which recommended that course to their Lordships was that they were dealing with the case of persons whose minds were peculiarly constituted; and who, though they had not thought it consistent with their duty to obey the admonitions of the Courts, might think it right to obey an admonition coming from an authority which they acknowledged.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Power to prolong imprisonment for a further period of three months).

On the Motion of The Earl BEAUCHAMP, Clause omitted.

Moved, To add the following Clause:—"This Act may be cited as the Discharge of Contumacious Prisoners Act, 1881."—(The Earl Beauchamp.)

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, he was glad to hear that the Bill was to be passed under a more accurate but less ambitious title than the "Ecclesiastical Courts Regulation Bill." There could be little difference of opinion with respect to the limited purpose of the Bill; but its original title was entirely misleading, and conveyed the idea that an attempt had been made at a very late period of the Session to deal with a far more difficult question.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY was understood to say that he did not find any fault with the Judge of the Court or with the Church Association. He thought that the punishment for contumacy was too long. There should be a fixed period, say six months, and then, if the clergyman was still disobedient and totally disregarded the law, he should be got rid of altogether from the Church.

Motion agreed to; Clause added accordingly.

House resumed.

The Report of Amendments to be received To-morrow; and Standing Order No. XXXV. to be considered in order to its being dispensed with: Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 198.)

METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS (MONEY) BILL.—(No. 186.)

(The Lord Thurlow.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES) said, that he felt bound to take advantage of that opportunity of again expressing his objection to Clause 14, which would entail heavy expense upon the ratepayers of the entire Metropolis, though the proposal had been made without Notice in the other House, or any preparation to contest its expediency or justice. The Bill, in fact, affected the interests of the ratepayers without giving them power to appear and protect those interests. He protested against legislation of that character being brought forward at this period of the Session, and in such a hurried way. The Amendment which was proposed to be moved by the noble Earl (Earl De La Warr) should be agreed to, as the proposition of the promoters of the Bill was most unusual.

House in Committee.

Clauses 1 to 13, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 14 (Expenses of inquiry as to markets).

EARL DE LA WARR rose to move an Amendment which, he said, would have the effect of merely giving power under the clause to the Board of Works to make inquiries into the food supply of the Metropolis, without authorizing them to obtain further powers from Parliament. He submitted that if their Lordships agreed to the clause as it stood, the interests of the City would be seriously affected, especially seeing that power would be given to set up rival markets against the City markets without notice having been given to the parties interested. It had been stated in the debate on the second reading of the Bill that the measure would not affect the interests of the Corporation of the City of London; but he was at a loss to understand how that could be. He contended that it did in a most important matter. Sums amounting to upwards of £3,000,000 had been invested in the City markets, upon the security of the Corporation; and he contended that that body was both willing and competent to do all that was required in the matter. The origin of this attempt to establish new markets was, of course, the alleged inadequacy of Billingsgate; but the lately issued Report of Mr. Spencer Walpole confirmed the view taken by the Corporation—that the true complaint against Billingsgate Market was, not that it was in every way insufficient, but that it was not easily accessible. The Corporation had already enlarged the market, and, having received the Report of a Committee, who had in an exhaustive manner inquired into the fish supply of the Metropolis, they were prepared, as far as possible, to do what might be necessary to make the market more easy of access. Before long they had every reason to believe they would be able to bring about that desirable result. Mr. Walpole had stated that it would be a serious loss to the public if the fish market were removed from the river side. There was no objection whatever to these markets being improved. It was not only the Corporation of London that was interested in this question. The ratepayers of the Metropolis were also largely interested. The effect of the Metropolitan Board taking into their hands all the markets of the City would be enormously expensive. Millions of money would be required to establish these markets, and the burden would fall upon the ratepayers, who were already overburdened with taxes, and were petitioning that some of those taxes should be removed. This Bill would give to the Metropolitan Board of Works power to borrow more money chargeable to the ratepayers for the supply of fish to the public, a large portion of whom were not ratepayers. He moved to omit all the words of the clause after the words “ Management Act, 1855.”

The Lord Chancellor

Moved, In page 6, line 39, to leave out from (“ Metropolis Management Act, 1855 ”) to end of clause.—(The Earl De La Warr.)

LORD THURLOW said, he could not accept the noble Earl's Amendment, and felt he had some reason to complain of the course taken by the noble Earl with reference to this Bill. The other evening he gave the noble Earl a fair opportunity of taking the sense of the House on the question he had just raised; but he did not avail himself of that opportunity. The course now pursued appeared to him to be slightly unusual, inasmuch as the noble Earl had given no Notice of the Amendment to the House. Nor had he himself received private Notice of it.

EARL DE LA WARR said, he had sent Notice of it to the noble Lord.

LORD THURLOW said, in that case, no Notice had reached him. This was certainly a money clause, as it contained distinct provisions for money to be expended with a specified object. He could not agree with any of the arguments adduced by the noble Earl. The case was stated very fully the other evening, and he had nothing to add to that statement.

LORD MOUNT TEMPLE pointed out that the clause would not empower the Metropolitan Board of Works to establish a market in any part of the Metropolis. It only enabled them to make preliminary inquiries and arrangements for the introduction of a Bill, when the proper time would arrive for the City to make any objections they pleased to its proposals. The monopoly of Billingsgate doubled the price of fish, and led to the destruction of the unsold fish. The improvement of markets was necessary for the public good, and ought not to be sacrificed to a rivalry between the Metropolitan Board and the Corporation of the City. He hoped their Lordships would not agree to deprive the Board of the power they ought to possess of considering whether there should not be a fish market in the Metropolis in addition to that of the City. The objection of the Corporation was invented too late. If it had been valid it ought to have prevented the Hungerford and Columbia markets.

EARL DE LA WARR said, the Corporation of the City of London did not object to the establishment of any number of retail markets.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN remarked that, if that were so, he could not understand why they objected to this clause, seeing that it afforded the only practical means by which a great public want could be met.

On question, resolved in the negative.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

Bill reported without amendment; and to be read 3^d To-morrow.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE REVISED CODE.

DEPARTMENTAL STATEMENT.

EARL SPENCER, in rising to make a Statement upon the proposals for revision of the Code and the Examination Schedules of the Education Department which had been laid on the Table of the House, said, those proposals were brought forward in fulfilment of the pledge he had given last Session on behalf of the Government. He should have preferred to bring them forward at an earlier period of the Session; but the subject was so vast, and surrounded by so many difficulties, that that was found to be impossible. As it was, they did not propose to at once alter the Education Code, and the alteration, of which notice was now given, with a view to discussion in the Autumn, would not take effect till some time in 1882—a plan which was convenient both to the Department and to school boards and teachers throughout the country. The new system would insure pretty much the same payment to schools as the old. The average schools would earn about the same sum as hitherto, the best schools a little more, and the worst schools a little less. At present payments to schools were classed under four heads—1. the general payment to schools on average attendance, including efficiency and music; 2. individual payments by results on passes in Standards; 3. average attendance payments for class subjects; and 4. individual payments for specific subjects. The principle of payment for average attendance was now to be applied to three of these four heads of payment, leaving only the specific subjects to be paid on individual examinations. It was found that individual payments for passes in the Standards did not work quite fairly to the schools and the teachers. At the Inspector's visit, children might be absent from illness, or on account of the weather, or the season of the year in which the inspection took place, and the earnings of the school must therefore be very much diminished. That was a matter which was much complained of. It was also found that there was a tendency on the part of teachers to direct their efforts to one class of children and neglect another. That evil would be corrected by the proposals now made, as failure in any department of the school would affect the whole grant, and not merely so much of it as might be earned by the neglected children. Moreover, if payments on the individual passes were done away with, and made to depend on the average attendance of children, there would no longer be any inducement to fraud. Another great improvement that would follow from a system of payment on the average attendance was a simplification of the present system of auditing. There were 1,900,000 children examined last year. The audit department examined the school-history of every one of these children during seven years, which was generally the duration of school-life of children. This was to see that payment was not made twice for the same thing to any one child. These figures would give an idea of the vast work involved by the auditing of individual passes. He would give their Lordships an illustration of the way in which the system of paying on average attendance would work. Let them suppose a school in which there were 300 children in average attendance, and that 250 should be present at the time of the Inspector's visit. Supposing him to examine 200, the number of passes possible would be 600, there being three subjects in which each child could pass. Supposing, however, that only 500 passes should be made, or only 83 per cent of the possible passes, then the full payment being, say, 10*s.* for every pass—he took a hypothetical figure—the payment would be 83 per cent of 10*s.*, or 8*s.* 6*d.*, and the capita- tion grant would be 300 times 8*s.* 6*d.*, or £127 10*s.* All children that should have been six months in a school would be presented to the Inspector for examination; and while all would continue to be examined in the Third and higher Standards, it would be for him to judge how many he ought to examine in the Second Standard. The result of the scheme would be a great diminution in the work of examination, though the Inspectors' duties would be increased in other ways. Out of 1,000,000 children above seven years of age who had usually been examined in the past in Standards I. and II., only 500,000 would be examined in the future. In order to meet one of the objections levelled at the existing system, the Department proposed to give Examiners and Inspectors power to classify the children examined by them according to the manner in which they should have passed the examination. The question of the grant to a school would be affected by this classification, because an extra grant would be given to schools classified as fair, good, or excellent. At present, a school which passed its scholars well obtained no more than another in which the same number of children barely scraped through. The proposal would thus counteract the present tendency to bring down schools to a dead level of teaching merely what was enough to pass. With regard to the question of class subjects, no very great change was proposed. Schools would be regarded as consisting of two divisions. Two class subjects might be taken up in each division. Steps had been taken to meet the objection that fancy subjects should not be taught to children who were not well-grounded in the "three R's." Specific subjects would only be taught to children who had passed the Fourth Standard, and not even then, unless 75 per cent of the possible passes were obtained in the "three R's" at the beginning of the year in which specific subjects were taken up, as well as at the end of the year during which they had been taught. Steps would be taken to encourage the extension of night schools, where there had been a diminished attendance since the introduction of compulsory education. The number of scholars had fallen off from 70,000 in 1870 to 40,000 in 1880. Boys used to work during the day and attend school at night. Now they must attend day-schools till they had passed a reasonable Standard, and, having done so, were not inclined to go also to night-schools, more especially if the instruction in them was confined to the "three R's." They proposed to adopt other and more interesting subjects as class subjects. They also proposed that in night-schools ministers of all denominations, often the only available teachers in country districts, should no longer be debarred from teaching subjects with which they were familiar, and which they made interesting to the night scholars. He now came to the question of teachers. The teachers under the Education Department formed a small army in themselves, numbering, as they did, upwards of 70,000. There were 30,000 certificated teachers, 7,600 assistant teachers, and 33,000 pupil teachers. There were, in addition, a small number of stipendiary monitors; but as the system was not found in practice to work well it was proposed to do away with it. Of the teachers, the waste by retirement and death each year amounted to 6 per cent, so that the supply required each year was about 1,800; and as, owing to the increase of population, additional schools would be required, the number of teachers to be supplied annually would soon be over 2,000. The Training Colleges were only able to supply about 1,500 each year, leaving a deficiency of 500; and, to secure that number, it was proposed to admit as teachers persons, men or women, who had been at any University in the United Kingdom. It might be said that such persons would not be likely to become teachers; but when he mentioned the remarkable fact that he had on his list the names of no fewer than 130 men who had taken first-class University honours who were candidates for the position of Her Majesty's Inspectors, he thought their Lordships would agree with him that a very large number of less distinguished persons would be found ready to become teachers in their larger schools. With respect to pupil teachers, a rule would be laid down that not more than three should be engaged at any one school. That alteration would, he thought, have a very important effect upon education, because it was manifest that a pupil teacher was not as competent to teach large classes as was an assistant teacher. Pupil teachers were apprenticed for four years, from 14 to 18 years of age, and about 8,000 finished their apprenticeship each year. A large number of those who desired to follow the Profession went to the Training College. Last year the number was 4,000, of which number 3,000 passed; but 1,500 only could be admitted. A regulation would be made that an assistant teacher should be required for every 60 scholars, instead of 80 as heretofore. Then with respect to infant schools, in schools where 40 infants attended a separate adult teacher would be required; and where 60 attended there should be a certificated teacher. The Schedule as to needlework would be simplified—a change which it was believed would be attended with beneficial results. With respect to music, 1s. was now allowed for each pupil taught; but in future the allowance would be 6d., and an additional 6d. if music was taught from notes or according to the Tonic Sol-fa system. Within the last few years, immense strides had been made in that direction, nearly all the masters sent out by the Training Schools being competent to teach by notes, or, at all events, to examine by notes. With regard to honour certificates, it was proposed to stop the granting of them. It was hoped that the boys holding honour certificates would be induced to remain at school; but, in the working of the system, it was proved that they did not do so. It was found that the conditions were not complied with, and that a better class of children than was intended reaped the benefit; and it had, therefore, been determined to do away with the honour certificates. The money that would be saved would probably be required for increased grants to night schools. The Child's School Book was to be abandoned, because it was a great deal of trouble, and it had broken down where it was most needed. A child had been found in Manchester with 11 books instead of one. It was not proposed to introduce these changes at present in Scotland, which was, in many respects, more advanced than England; while the Scotch Code already contained some of the principles of the change now proposed for the English Code. In order to obtain greater uniformity of inspection, and prevent, as far as possible, the injustice that arose from the different standards of different Inspectors, which made examinations severe in one place and lax in another, it was proposed to organize the Inspectorate to a certain extent, to place a senior Inspector in charge of a large division containing several districts, and to bring the senior Inspectors together for consultation and discussion. A class of Sub-Inspectors would act under the District Inspector, who, in turn, would be supervised by the senior or divisional Inspectors, and in that way the desired uniformity would be attained to a greater extent than at present. He must acknowledge the assistance that had been received in the consideration of these changes, not only from the Department, but also from those who probably knew most of the working of the Code—namely, the schoolmasters—and he hoped the changes would be accepted willingly and with pleasure by that important body.

Earl Spencer

LORD NORTON said, he must express his satisfaction with the worthy manner in which the noble Earl the Lord President of the Council had treated national education. The presentation of the Code in draft for discussion in the Recess was a treatment of the subject in no Party spirit, but as of equal general interest, and an appeal to the nation for their opinion on a paramount national question. The most cursory reading showed its intention not to be further complication, but greater clearness and consolidation on the basis of their accumulated experience. It would be unworthy of such frank treatment to venture at once to criticize its details; but one or two remarks on the leading features of its revision of former Codes he would offer in its own spirit. Experience justified its change of principle in making public grants from payment on individual results to premiums on the average attendance and sufficiency of schools. But here came in the old difficulty of adjustment to town and country. Was it impossible to have a rural and an urban standard, as they had rural and urban local authorities, and as the Scotch had parish and borough schools? One standard could not equally suit both. But their primary interest was in the manual labour class, which must leave school early for labour, and could not have the time, or means, or object, to rise as high as the town artisan in book-learning. Some attempt was made in the scheme to meet that difficulty by dividing schools into lower and upper divisions, and allotting subjects to each.

The lower they might suppose to represent elementary education; but if so the upper must mean secondary education. Then followed the question—Did they undertake more than elementary education in the publicly-aided national schools? Had they gone beyond the original intention, and were they right, in including secondary instruction in elementary schools? The words used in describing the Seventh Standard in the scheme were, that it was meant for those who had passed the Sixth Standard sometime before leaving school. But it never was intended that children of the working class should be kept at school a day after they were fit to go to work. Any higher learning, therefore, should be meant, not as a smattering of incipient science to fill up an ideal interval, but for children who were really going on to higher education. So far as this scheme made the distinction between primary and secondary teaching clearer, it was wise. It avowedly recognized the provision of much higher education as part of national education; but it was to be hoped it meant to separate it from elementary education. There could be no doubt they were undertaking middle-class education; and, if so, they should do it distinctly and more thoroughly, and not mix it up with primary education, to the injury of both. The discussion of that draft Code in "another place" came on in a debate on museums for the promotion of art in the Provinces. That showed the connection in idea of the New Code with higher education. South Kensington was doing still more for art education than the Seventh Standard and specific subjects in the Fourth Schedule proposed for sciences and foreign languages. But a greater proof of higher ambition was the proposal in the scheme that graduates of the two Universities should be assistant teachers in national schools. It was said that many such men were wanting employment, and that this would open a new avenue to them. That was a consideration for the learned men supplied so much in advance of demand. But as to the schools, it was significant as considering their assistant masters to be men on a par with the clergy, clearly an advance from the first idea of elementary education of the working class. The amounts of particular grants were not stated; it might, therefore, be intended that this secondary education should be self-supporting, and that the illusory scale of 9d. fees as a limit of elementary education should be done away with. What were now set up at Bradford and elsewhere as higher schools were only another set of elementary schools, with the same smattering of science; only at higher, yet not self-supporting fees, for a separate provision to the middle class. There might be intended in the completion of this scheme exhibitions to help cleverer children of the working class to extend their schooling in common with the middle class to higher study. All that might modify one's general opinion of the scheme, and judgment must, therefore, be deferred. One good sequence from the debate of last year was apparent in the proposed provision of better books. It was seen that the art of reading could be better taught by books conveying progressive knowledge, instead of what were now condemned by the Vice President himself as foolish tales and miserable commonplace scrap-books. The whole draft showed a liberal and earnest intention to improve our national education.

After a few words from Lord BRAYE, the subject dropped.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS (HALF-PAST TWELVE RULE).

RESOLUTION. ADJOURNED DEBATE.
ORDER DISCHARGED.

Order for resuming Adjourned Debate thereupon [3rd May] read.

MR. MONK moved that the Order of the day for the adjourned debate on the Public Business (Half-past 12 Rule) be discharged. He made this Motion with great reluctance and considerable regret, because his proposal that the Rule should not apply to the Motion for Leave to bring in a Bill, or to any Bill which had passed through Committee, had received the support of the Government, and also because there was a general and growing feeling on both sides of the House that some modification was required of a Rule which placed irresponsible power in the hands of a single Member of that House. He left the matter with confidence in the hands of Her Majesty's Government, who, he understood, intended to deal with that and other matters connected with Public Business early next Session.

Motion agreed to.

Order discharged.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. MONK moved that the Order for Committee be discharged. He regretted very much the necessity for this, as the Bill had been considered in a Select Committee of the House, presided over by the Attorney General. Next Session he would certainly re-introduce the Bill, as he heard from many correspondents that there was no measure which more required urgency than this Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Order discharged; Bill withdrawn.

[BILL 47.] SECOND READING.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for resuming Adjourned Debate on Second Reading [8th April] read.

MR. MONK, in moving that the Order for resuming the debate on the second reading of this Bill be discharged, said, that the only Member who opposed it was the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Makins), who was one of the Members of the Select Committee that approved of the Bill.

COLONEL MAKINS said, that he was not a Member of the Committee, and had not approved of the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Order discharged; Bill withdrawn.

QUESTIONS.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—THE NEWRY POST OFFICE—CLERKS' CHRISTMAS GRATUITIES.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Postmaster General, if he is aware that the clerks of Newry Post Office have not received any part of their Christmas overtime for the past three years, although they were called on to furnish a return of same; and, if the above facts are true, will he issue such instructions as will remedy the cause of complaint?

MR. FAWCETT, in reply, said, he found that it was the case that the clerks referred to by the hon. Member had not received any part of their Christmas overtime for the past three years. He greatly regretted this negligence, and he had given instructions that careful inquiry should be made, and had taken steps to prevent its recurrence.

STATE OF IRELAND—ARMY—THE 28TH REGIMENT AT BIRR.

MR. HEALY asked the Secretary of State for War, If he has inquired into the conduct of the rioters of the 28th Regiment at Birr on the 1st instant; and, whether it is intended to remove this regiment from Birr?

MR. CHILDERS: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that the disturbance at Birr on the 1st instant has been the subject of careful inquiry. I sent to the officer commanding there the hon. Member's letter, addressed to me, with its inclosure, from which he had cut off the signature, and evidence was taken from all the sources indicated in that letter by a Court, consisting of the colonels of the 1st Battalion of the Gloucester Regiment and the 2nd Battalion of the Leinster Regiment, and a major of the 1st Battalion of the latter. It appears that a party of seven soldiers, who gave no provocation whatever, were attacked in the street by a mob of roughs, who shouted at them, "Down with the English bastards" (and another epithet which I will not repeat), and "We will fight for the Land League and kill the best man of the 28th," and commenced throwing stones at them. This appellation of "English bastards" appears to have been too much for the soldiers, all of whom were Irishmen; and one of them, named Patrick Donnelly—not sober at the time—threw a stone at the mob, which struck one, Patrick Chaffey, and knocked him down. For this Donnelly has been convicted, and is undergoing a sentence of two months' imprisonment. The conduct of the regiment has been, with this exception, uniformly good; and after the remarks the other day as to the good policy of keeping Irish soldiers in Ireland, I am not prepared to remove the regiment, even though some of the Irishmen in it may not appreciate the methods used by their countrymen.

"PRINCESS ALICE" CATASTROPHE—BURIAL EXPENSES OF SUFFERERS.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in view of the fact that the parish of Woolwich has been put to an expense of £1,200 on account of the burial of the persons who perished in the "Princess Alice," and that such expense was thrown upon that parish because the bodies were, in the interest of public decency and the public health, recovered from various parts of the river and brought to Woolwich, as a central point, for interment, Her Majesty's Government will grant a sum from public funds in order to recoup the parish referred to for the burden which has thus unjustly been imposed upon it?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: When I saw the hon. Member with a deputation on this subject some time ago I understood that he was about to introduce a Bill referring to the liability in these matters; but it is a new feature to propose that the Government ought, out of the public funds, to pay this charge, which really belonged to the locality. I have no authority to make such a payment, nor do I see that, whatever might be the question between the locality and the country, it was a charge which should come upon the general funds of the Exchequer.

RIVER THAMES — LIFE-PRESERVING APPARATUS ON PASSENGER STEAMERS.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, since the sinking of the "Princess Alice" steamboat, near Woolwich, in September 1878, whereby more than 700 people lost their lives, any additional means, and, if so, what, have been adopted by the owners of the river passenger steamers plying on the Thames to prevent similar losses of life in cases of the sudden sinking of these steamers; and, whether the owners have been advised by the Board of Trade to fit up the seats and benches on their vessels with cork cushions, or to have other similar buoyant apparatus such as has often been proposed for passenger vessels?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, he had ascertained that since the accident in question many precautions had been considered, and several had been adopted, and, notably the Thames and Channel Steamboat Company had now applied to all their steamers plying to Gravesend and below it air cases under the portable seats. He was glad to say that these precautions had already been the means of saving life. A vessel was run down in 1880 by a steamboat and the crew thrown into the water; but all were saved by the means of these appliances.

STATE OF IRELAND—DETENTION OF THE SCHOONER "WAVE" IN CORK HARBOUR.

MR. EWART asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he is aware that the schooner "Wave," from Gloucester, with a cargo of prepared timber and building materials, for the Church of Ireland Hall at Queen's College, Cork, has now lain at the Quay in Cork for three weeks unloaded because the mob by threats frighten away any labourers who begin to unload as well as carters who desire to draw away the goods; whether a guard of police has to be kept on board day and night for protection thereof; and, whether the Government intends to take any steps to enable the owners to enjoy their lawful and Constitutional rights?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the case as stated by the hon. Member was correct; but, at the present moment, the vessel was being unloaded and its cargo transported to its destination.

MR. HEALY asked if military waggons were being employed in the unloading of the vessel; and what was the reason of this assistance being given to a private individual?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, it was quite true that military waggons were being employed. It was thought absolutely necessary, in order to complete the work as quickly as possible and to prevent a serious breach of the peace.

MR. HEALY asked if waggons would be granted on the application of a private person?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the answer would depend on what means were thought necessary to avoid a breach of the peace.

Mr. Chamberlain

MERCANTILE MARINE — THE "CITY OF MECCA."

MR. ANDERSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If Her Majesty's Government has sent a Despatch to the Government of Portugal, demanding an arbitration of the "City of Mecca" case, on the ground that the Portuguese Courts had decided the case in contravention of the International Code of Sailing Rules, to the serious prejudice of British subjects; and, if he will lay upon the Table a Copy of the Despatch?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The Correspondence on the subject, which will shortly be laid on the Table, will show the steps which have been taken by Her Majesty's Government with regard to this case.

STATE OF IRELAND—"INTOLERANCE IN BALLYMENA."

MR. BELLINGHAM asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been directed to a leading article in the "Belfast Morning News," entitled "Intolerance in Ballymena," by which it appears that a party of peaceable excursionists were attacked by a mob who assailed them with stones and sticks; whether the statement is true; and, whether Her Majesty's Government can take any steps to protect law-abiding persons against lawless mobs?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that it was quite true that a party of excursionists had been attacked in the way described. Twelve persons were summoned for assault on the police and others, and the case was at once put into the hands of the sessional Crown Solicitor. Seven persons were convicted and sentenced to various terms of imprisonment, the case against four was dismissed, and one person was discharged with a caution. Of the seven convictions, five persons had appealed, and two had been sent to gaol.

WAYS AND MEANS—INLAND REVENUE —THE COLCLOUGH FRAUDS.

MR. HEALY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it was owing to the fault of the Controller of the Stamp Department, Dublin, that the vast Colclough frauds upon the Department and on the public, recently discovered, went on for so many years undetected; whether the question of relieving that officer from his appointment has been or is under consideration; whether it is the case that, prior to his appointment to this important post in Dublin, he was only a junior clerk in Somerset House; whether he was appointed to the former post over the heads of several competent men in the Department in Dublin, who were entitled by service to promotion; and, upon whose recommendation he got the post?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: I am informed that, in the opinion of the Board of Inland Revenue, no blame is attributable to the Controller at Dublin for the frauds recently discovered there. It has not been, and is not, in contemplation to remove him from his appointment. Prior to his appointment he was Assistant Controller. He was chosen for the office by the Board of Inland Revenue, who considered him the fittest man for it, and on the recommendation of his superior officers.

POOR LAW (IRELAND) — CLOGHEEN UNION — CHARGEABILITY OF AN ILLEGITIMATE CHILD.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the Irish Local Government Board have refused to grant a sworn inquiry into the case of a "Protest against the maintenance and chargeability of the illegitimate child of an Irish land-lord and its mother, a married woman, upon the rates of Clogheen Union;"

and, if so, why; and, is it true that the woman is about being removed from the Union at this moment to evade inquiry?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, with regard to this poor woman no sworn inquiry could be made by the Local Government Board, because there was no suspicion attached to any official of the Union or to any person under the jurisdiction of the Local Government Board; and, though he was not speaking with any knowledge of the fact, he did not suppose there was any charge against the Guardians. The woman and her child were admitted into the workhouse. The Local Government Board directed the attention of the Guardians to the provisions of the Act, which enabled them in certain circumstances to recover the cost of the maintenance of the persons relieved by them if the name of the putative father was ascertained; but, the woman having refused to make the necessary affidavit, the Guardians were unable to proceed. The Local Government Board had, of course, no power outside their jurisdiction.

SOUTH AFRICA — THE TRANSVAAL CONVENTION — THE PASS LAWS.

MR. CROPPER asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he will explain to the House the nature of the Pass Laws referred to in Article 14 of the Transvaal Convention as limiting the freedom of action of the native population in the Transvaal territory?

MR. COURTNEY: The present law of the Transvaal is contained in Sections 7 and 8 of law No. 6 of 1880, which continues in force under the Convention. Section 7 requires—

"Every foreign native entering any district of this Province to apply to the Landdrost of the district, or to such other officer as may be appointed for the purpose, for a pass, which request will be granted on payment of a fee of 1s."

The section also provides for the production of such a pass on demand by any burgher. Section 8 provides that every Native of the Transvaal desiring to travel from one district to another must apply for a pass, which must be given gratuitously if the Native has paid his hut tax.

INDIA—BERAR—SIR RICHARD MEADE AND SIR SALAR JUNG.

MR. RICHARD asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether his attention has been called to an article in the July number of the "Statesman," entitled the "Restitution of Berar," and to the statements in that article as to the conduct of the ex-British Resident, Sir Richard Meade, in forcing on the Nizam's Minister, Sir Salar Jung, as his colleague in the Regency, one Vikar-ool-Omra, an alleged enemy of that Minister and of the British Government; and whether the Government can state the reasons which dictated that appointment; whether he has observed the narrative in the same article of the conduct of the said ex-British Resident in supporting alleged spoliation and violent proceedings of Vikar-ool-Omra since his appointment; and, whether he will cause a full inquiry to be made by independent persons into the facts alleged in this article?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, it was perfectly impossible for him to give anything like a complete answer to the statements contained in the article, which he had seen, and which related to a very complicated matter. It was written with the avowed object of advocating a restitution of Berar to the Nizam. It contained a series of most violent attacks upon the conduct of the Government of India during the whole of the present century, and, indeed, during the whole of the past century, towards the Government of the Nizam. With regard to the specific point referred to in the Question—the conduct of the ex-British Resident, Sir Richard Meade, in the appointment of the Nawab Vikar-ool-Omra as co-Regent with Salar Jung, that appointment was made, not by Sir Richard Meade, but by the Government of India, whose proceedings were approved by the Secretary of State at the time. It was impossible for him to enter into an account of the reason of the appointment, which was the subject of a very full Report; but he might briefly say that the main object was to adhere to the spirit of the arrangement which was come to in 1869, he thought, when it was decided to associate with the Regent, who was a very distinguished representative of the official classes at Hyderabad—a representative of the Hyderabad nobility. Whether what was done was done rightly or wrongly, it was done undoubtedly by Sir Richard Meade, but not upon his responsibility, and he could not be held personally responsible for it. With regard to the alleged spoliation and violent proceedings of the Nawab Vikar-ool-Omra since his appointment, those allegations appeared to be made entirely on the foundation of a Memorial which had been presented to the Indian Government by nephews of Vikar-ool-Omra. He had never seen the Memorial. It was, no doubt, in the possession of the Government of India, and the Government of India would, if necessary, make a Report upon it. The article contained imputations which were very grave on the character of the ex-British Resident, Sir Richard Meade.

Mr. Richard

It charged him, in a manner scarcely disguised, with misconduct and actual corruption. Sir Richard Meade was a very distinguished officer, and hitherto of unblemished character. He was at present on leave, and had, practically, retired from the Indian Service. He was on the Continent, and this article had only just reached him. He had heard from him on the subject. He said that many of the statements contained in the article were falsehoods, and that others were gross misrepresentations. With regard to the charges against himself, he said he thought his proper course would be to place himself in the hands of the Government of India, desiring them to take such steps as they might deem proper to ascertain what grounds there were for the imputations that had been made against him. He had accordingly addressed the Government of India. It would be highly improper for him (the Marquess of Hartington) to take any steps in the matter until he knew what the views of the Government of India on the subject were.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR remarked, that the affairs of Hyderabad were very complicated, and very few individuals were acquainted with them; and he therefore begged the noble Marquess that Papers be laid before the House giving a distinct statement of the whole transaction since 1854 relating to the Berar and Raichore Doab territories temporarily handed over to the care of the Indian Government. It was equally for the honour of the country and of individuals that this should be done, and the bad practice of concealment departed from.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, it was impossible for him, without Notice, to say what Papers could be laid on the Table. There were a great many Papers; but many of them were of so extremely confidential a character that he had no hesitation in saying it would be impossible to lay them on the Table.

WEST INDIAN ISLANDS—THE BAHAMAS—FINANCE.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he is aware that great dissatisfaction has been caused in the Bahamas by the withdrawal from the Colony of a fund accumulated from sales and rents of waste lands and other Crown pro-party there; whether it is not the fact that a Despatch of Earl Grey's of 9th September 1851 (paragraph 6), had assured the Colonists that the fund in question was to be administered by the Crown only as trustee for the Colony; and, whether the recent withdrawal means a change in the policy which, since that Despatch, had been always adhered to?

MR. COURTNEY: We have had no official information that any dissatisfaction existed in the Bahamas on the subject; but a copy of The Nassau Times has reached the Colonial Office complaining of the withdrawal of the fund, and expressing a fear that it had been absorbed into the Imperial Treasury, the exigencies of which the writer recognizes. There is, of course, no foundation for this suggestion. The balance in the Colonial Bank appeared unduly large, and there were no securities in the Colony in which it could be invested, and accordingly it was ordered that £1,700 should be remitted to the agents of the Crown Colonies for investment in Colonial securities. The trusts of the fund remain absolutely unchanged.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND)
ACT, 1881—GUN LICENCES.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY (for Mr. O'SULLIVAN) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is true that several respectable farmers in the districts of Glin and also of Newcastle West, county Limerick, have been refused licence to keep arms, notwithstanding the fact that they were recommended by magistrates and other gentlemen who knew them; and, if so, to know why it was that such persons were refused a right which some of them enjoyed for over twenty years?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the magistrates in both of these places had informed him that they had not in any instance refused a licence when a proper certificate signed by magistrates was produced.

MAJOR NOLAN asked the right hon. Gentleman, If he is aware that one shilling is charged for each of the printed forms on which a licence to carry arms is given; and, if he will give directions that Petty Sessions clerks and others should sell these forms for a penny, or such other sum as will cover the cost of paper and printing?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the printed forms of licences were granted by officers appointed by the Lord Lieutenant for the purpose. The Petty Sessions clerks had nothing to do with the granting of them. If, however, an applicant for a licence employed a Petty Sessions clerk to fill up any form, it was his own business. The Petty Sessions clerk, of course, might agree with the applicant to do so, and to be paid for doing so such sum as the applicant might be willing to pay.

MAJOR NOLAN said, these forms could only be procured from Petty Sessions clerks on payment of 1s.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would make inquiries into the matter. He was informed that these forms could be obtained from the licensing officers—"For how much?"—for nothing.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he thought that fact ought to be made known. Several persons had paid 1s.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the printed forms were supplied for nothing. Petty Sessions clerks had no right to do anything in the matter unless applicants employed them to fill up the forms.

MR. MACFARLANE inquired if these forms could be supplied by the police?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: No.

POST OFFICE (TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT)—THE WEATHER FORECASTS.

MAJOR NOLAN asked the Postmaster General, If he would direct that during harvest and sowing times the weather forecasts of the Meteorological Department should be published at those telegraph offices which are situated in places at more than two hours' distance from the office of publication of a daily paper?

MR. FAWCETT, in reply, reminded the House that he answered a similar Question upon this subject on Tuesday. He was unable, for the reasons then given, to comply with the request of the hon. and gallant Member. Those weather forecasts might be supplied at a very small cost to villages and towns combining together for the purpose of obtaining the benefit of them.

POST OFFICE (TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT)—GREENWICH TIME.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY asked, Whether Greenwich time was not telegraphed to the Telegraph offices?

Mr. FAWCETT: Only for the information of the offices. When wanted for publication I believe these telegrams have to be paid for; but I will make inquiry.

ARMY ORGANIZATION—THE 28th REGIMENT.

COLONEL NORTH asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the 28th Regiment will be permitted to continue to wear the back-plate with the No. 28 worn at the back of the helmet, a distinction conferred upon the Regiment for their conspicuous gallantry at the Battle of Alexandria, and which has been worn by them for the last eighty years?

Mr. CHILDERS: The 28th Regiment is now the 1st Battalion of the Gloucestershire Regiment, and it will be allowed, in commemoration of their remarkable feat at the Battle of Alexandria, when they repelled charges in front and rear at the same time, to wear the regimental badge, the Sphinx, on the back of the helmets, where the number has hitherto been worn.

THE PATENT MUSEUM—GIFTS OF MODELS OF INVENTIONS.

Mr. HINDE PALMER (for Mr. A. GREY) asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is not the case that the Superintendent of the Patent Museum is obliged frequently to refuse valuable gifts of models of inventions offered to the Nation, owing to want of space in which either to store or exhibit them; whether it is not also the case that the Patent Commissioners, in the Report which they present annually to Parliament, specially invite the public to offer to the Superintendent of the Museum, as gifts or otherwise, models of inventions; and, whether he will grant a Return, specifying the gifts which have been offered to the Nation, and which have been refused by the Superintendent of the Museum by reason of want of room?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, he was glad to say that the Question appeared to be based on incorrect information, because he learned from the Patent Office that during the past nine years there had only been six refusals of inventions offered to it, and that of these only one was based on the want of space, and even in that case there were other considerations which had to be taken into account. The remaining five were declined because they were not likely to be interesting or useful. Under these circumstances, he thought the hon. Member would not press for the Return referred to.

CHARTERS OF THE CITY OF WATERFORD—THE RIVER SUIR.

Mr. LEAMY asked the President of the Board of Trade, If he is aware that by several Royal Charters, commencing in the time of King John down to and including the Charter granted by King Charles the Second, known as the Great Charter of the City of Waterford, the foreshore of the River Suir, extending from high water mark to low water mark, was granted and confirmed to the Corporation of Waterford for ever; if it is true that the Board of Trade has lately demanded from the Waterford Harbour Commissioners, and from the Waterford and Limerick Railway Company, sums of money for permission to erect buildings, piers, &c. on said foreshore; and, if so, whether he will direct that in future no such interference with the rights of the Corporation of Waterford shall be made by the Board of Trade?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, he was aware that the several Royal Charters referred in the Question of the hon. Member were alleged to have been granted and confirmed. It was also true that the Board of Trade asked for sums of money for permission to erect buildings on the foreshore. The sums they asked for were merely nominal considerations in order to preserve rights which the Board of Trade claimed on behalf of the Crown. The Question about the Waterford and Limerick Railway Act was a legal one upon which he could give no opinion.

CUSTOMS—COFFEE AND CHICORY.

Mr. BARRAN asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he is aware that under the Customs regulations it is prohibited to import into or to transmit from this Country to the British Colonies or the United States of America coffee mixed with chicory as an article of trade; and, if such be the case, whether he can take any steps to remove the restriction, now that chicory pays the same Duty as coffee?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH : As this Question relates to Customs regulations I have to answer it on behalf of the Treasury. It is the fact that the regulations do not permit the importation into, or the exportation from, this country of mixtures of ground coffee and chicory. This prohibition has been maintained for statistical purposes which are unaffected by the fact that the duty on coffee and on chicory is the same. But the Board of Trade has, at the instigation of my hon. Friend, made a representation to the Treasury on the subject, which will be carefully considered.

RAILWAYS—CONTINUOUS BRAKES.

MR. LEA asked the President of the Board of Trade, If it is correct that, according to the last Returns of the Board of Trade, only eleven per cent. of passenger carriages throughout the United Kingdom were fitted with automatic continuous brakes in conformity with the requirements of the Board, as prescribed in their circular dated 30th August 1877; if it is correct that, at present, only seven of the ninety Railway Companies have adopted brakes in conformity with those requirements; and, if so, whether any steps are being taken in this direction by the remaining Companies?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, the statement contained in the first two paragraphs of the Question were correct. As to the third paragraph, he might state that, within the last few weeks, there had been meetings of the Chairmen of the leading Railway Companies, and he understood that negotiations were in progress for the adoption of continuous brakes such as had been recommended by the Board of Trade, and he hoped that progress might be made in the matter.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—TECHNICAL INSTRUCTION.

MR. LEWIS FRY asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the spread of technical knowledge in foreign countries will be directed to extend their inquiries to the technical instruction which may be given to women in any countries they may visit, and particularly to such institutions as the technical school for women established in the Rue du Seine and the Rue de Laval in Paris, the "Lette Verein" in Berlin, and other similar institutions?

MR. MUNDELLA : The Royal Commission will inquire into technical instruction in its relation to industry, irrespective of whether it is given to men or women. And, no doubt, the particular institutions referred to in the Question of the hon. Member will come under their notice.

ARMY—WIDOWS OF NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the widow and children of Sergeant Magor Lunny, of A Troop, 1st Dragoon Guards, who was killed at Lang's Neck, under Major Brownlow, who has recommended these people to be assisted on account of the bravery of the late Sergeant Major, are to receive any compensation from the Military authorities?

MR. CHILDERS : In reply to the hon. Member I have to state that under a Regulation which, with the concurrence of the Treasury, I made during the present year, widows of non-commissioned officers and men who are killed or die of wounds receive a gratuity of a year's pay. Before this they could receive nothing. Mrs. Lunny will accordingly receive this gratuity, which is payable in four quarterly instalments. The subject of pensions to the widows of soldiers and sailors killed in action will be considered by Her Majesty's Government after the passing of the Patriotic Fund Bill now before Parliament.

MR. HEALY : Will this Regulation be retrospective?

MR. CHILDERS : That is a delicate question, which I would rather not answer off-hand.

LAW AND JUSTICE—MIDDLESEX REGISTRY.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether any complaints have reached him as to the charges made at the Middlesex Registry, and as to the officials there compelling parties to attend in Great James Street to be sworn to memorials, thus causing great inconvenience and delay; whether affidavits sworn before a Commissioner are not received in the Supreme Court; and whether there is any reason, except one connected with fees, why the Middlesex Registry should not do in like manner; and, whether he will make arrangements for the scale of fees authorized to be charged at the Middlesex Registry being placed on the back of the tickets given on deeds left for registry, and for their being affixed in the Registry; as well as for the execution of deeds and memorials being deposited to before a Commissioner in the same manner as affidavits are sworn in causes in the Supreme Court of Judicature, and for the lengths of memorials being marked on them when left for registry?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, the Middlesex Registry Office was not one over which he had the slightest control, nor was he officially connected with it. But the Question seemed to point to practical inconvenience existing, and he would endeavour to find out its cause. The reason why affidavits sworn before a Commissioner could not be received at the Middlesex Registry was because under the statute of Anne creating the office it was necessary that affidavits should be made in the presence of the Registrar or a Master in Chancery, and any alteration in that respect must be made by statute. As to the latter part of the Question, by the statute of Anne the Lord Chief Justice had power to make certain regulations; and if the hon. Member would communicate to him any matters of practical inconvenience which arose, they would be forwarded to the proper quarter.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—WORKHOUSE NATIONAL SCHOOLS.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any steps can be taken to extend to the Workhouse National Schools, and to the teachers in those Schools, the benefits of the results system, in cases where the Guardians have neglected to do so?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that no steps of the nature referred to in the Question of the hon. Member had been taken. Without fresh grounds it was not an easy matter for legislation. He was not surprised at the dissatisfaction expressed by the officials of such schools. Workhouse schools, however, were not under the control of the Board of Education, and it rested with the Guardians to pay by results or not.

ARMY ORGANIZATION—QUARTERMASTERS.

COLONEL ALEXANDER asked the Secretary of State for War, If he would explain why, notwithstanding the unconditional promise that Quartermasters, on the completion of ten years' service as such, should receive the rank of Captain, that rank is still withheld from them?

MR. CHILDERS: I really am surprised that the hon. and gallant Member should ask me this Question, and in terms implying that I would break my word, when I distinctly told him, as recently as the 14th of July, that these officers would be given the rank of captain as soon as the Reports on them had been received and considered.

COLONEL ALEXANDER: What Reports?

MR. CHILDERS: The hon. and gallant Gentleman, as commander of a regiment, must know what the regimental Reports are. I have nothing to add to that answer, which I think was clear enough, except that the commissions will be dated the 1st of July.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—HIGHWORTH SCHOOL BOARD.

MR. LONG asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether the Education Department have refused to lower the Standard prescribed by the bye-laws for the parish of Highworth, in the Swindon Union, for total exemption from school attendance, so as to bring the same in uniformity with the Standards sanctioned by the Department for ten other Parish and School Boards in the same Union, notwithstanding the strong and urgent representations made by the Magistrates, Ratepayers, and School Attendance Committee to the effect that the Fifth Standard pressed severely on the agricultural classes, and was, practically, cruel and unjust if enforced; and, if this be so, how he reconciles the facts with the statement he made on July 8th that the Department were doing all they could to secure uniform Standards?

MR. MUNDELLA: It is quite true that the Department has repeatedly re-refused to lower the Standard of total exemption from the fifth to the fourth in the parish of Highworth. That parish, in the year 1878, voluntarily passed bye-laws with Standard 3 for partial and Standard 5 for total exemption. These bye-laws were settled, after full discussion, at a meeting of the ratepayers of the parish; and this Resolution was supported, even after remonstrance, by three-fourths of the rateable value of the parish. But I regret to say that the School Attendance Committee and the magistrates have persistently refused to enforce them. Between January, 1879, and May, 1880, 200 cases of irregularity were reported; but proceedings against parents were only taken in five cases. Again and again the Department pointed out to the local authorities that they were neglecting their duty, and even threatened to declare them in default; and, in consequence of their persistent neglect, the local committee in Highworth resigned office in December, 1879. Highworth is a town of 3,000 inhabitants, and, according to the vicar of the parish and the managers of the schools, there is no reason why the Fifth Standard should not be maintained; and this view is confirmed by Her Majesty's Inspector, who has specially inquired into the subject. In this case the Department is supporting the parishioners of Highworth against a reactionary local authority and reluctant magistracy. In Swindon the Standards are 5 and 4.

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

THE NEW FRENCH GENERAL TARIFF.

VISCOUNT SANDON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he can state how soon the translation of the new French Tariff, ordered on July 6th, and the first portion of the Return ordered on April 6th, showing the increase or decrease in the Duties leviable on the leading articles of British produce and manufacture, in the years 1860—1870, 1873, and 1880, by the principal countries of the world and by the British Colonies, will be in the hands of honourable Members?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, that the first Return in question was laid on the Table on Tuesday. The second Return was a very difficult one to prepare, involving much time and labour, and it was impossible to intrust it to ordinary clerks. It had to be very carefully revised by the superior clerks of the Department. There were 70 or 80 pages of it in type, however, and he proposed to present it to the House as soon as it was received.

ROYAL UNIVERSITY OF IRELAND— UNIVERSITY WORK.

MR. DAWSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to the Report of the President of Galway College and to the strong advocacy therein contained of the retention of teaching as a part of University work; and, whether the New Royal University, making no provision for teaching, leaves the great mass of the Irish people without any provision for academic training, whilst a minority will have the Queen's Colleges and Trinity College to supply to them that great advantage?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the hon. Gentleman had asked the same Question yesterday. The hon. Gentleman knew what the Bill was as well as any hon. Member. If he would read the Bill he would see that its object was that the University should be an examining rather than a training body. He did not know whether the object of the Question was to obtain an expression of opinion from him on the subject, and he did not see how his opinion was of any value in the circumstances; but he might state that, though the Universities ought to be as much as possible training bodies, he really saw no advantage in asking a Question which had really reference to the Bill that had passed.

MR. DAWSON drew satisfaction from the fact that his Question had extracted from an official of the Government the expression of the opinion that the University ought to be a training rather than an examining institution.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Senate of the Royal University of Ireland has done anything to meet the objection taken in his letter of July 22nd last, that their scheme has been framed so that the prizes for students "are not limited by either a fixed numerical proportion or a defined standard of attainment;" and, whether the omission of the word "fellowship" from the letter of July 27th 1881, from the secretaries of the Royal University, means that the Senate do not intend to provide any fellowships under the grant now proposed to be made to the Royal University?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he had no further communication from the Senate; but it would be easily seen from their letter what the sum appropriated to prizes was. He calculated the expenses at £4,000, the expenses for Professors and Examiners at £8,000, and the remainder of the £20,000 went for prizes. The omission of the word "fellowship" from the latter paragraph of the correspondence was due to the fact that it was really included in a previous paragraph.

THE PARLIAMENTARY OATH—LEGISLATION.

MR. THOMASSON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, during the Recess, the Government will consider as to the introduction of a Bill to allow every legally elected Member to take his seat, whether he be or be not willing to take the oath?

MR. GLADSTONE: So far as this Question may have reference—I know not whether it has—to the case of the hon. Member for Northampton, I would refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave the other day. It was in general terms; but it gave a perfectly distinct intimation of the intention of the Government. If it is a question of the alteration of the law with regard to Parliamentary Oaths on general grounds of policy, the decision would necessarily be reserved until the time when Her Majesty's Government were in a position to consider what measures they should present to Parliament in the next Session.

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE (NEGOTIATIONS).

VISCOUNT SANDON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will arrange that, during the forthcoming final negotiations respecting the French Treaty, which are to take place at Paris, representatives of the Associations and Societies connected with the principal trades which will be affected by the Treaty shall be present in Paris during the negotiations of the High Commission, so as to assist the Commission with their practical knowledge of the matters under negotiation; and, whether he will direct that there should be laid upon the Table, before the close of the Session, a copy of all the official correspondence between the Board of Trade, the Foreign Office, and the Royal Commission for the Commercial Treaty, and any persons, firms, and commercial associations with whom the Government has been in correspondence, together with any circular or notification which has been issued by the Royal Commission?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am afraid I must answer the Question of the noble Lord with some reserve, because it assumes that negotiations respecting the French Treaty are to take place at Paris. That is a matter on which no decision has yet been come to, and which really depends upon the correspondence now going on, and, in fact, upon declarations which may, perhaps, be obtained from the Government of France. Then, with regard to securing that Representatives of Associations and Societies shall be present in Paris, the fullest notice and knowledge will be given to them, as has been the case at the previous stages of the negotiations, in order that they may exercise their discretion on the matter. They will have all the opportunities which they have enjoyed while the negotiations were going on in England. As to the latter part of the Question, in regard to the production of all the official Correspondence, and also of the correspondence with firms and commercial Associations, I have to say that it is the intention and the desire of the Government to present the official Correspondence; but there are parts of it with respect to which we are under the limitation of having to apply abroad for permission to do so. I cannot, therefore, give a pledge that it will be done; but, as far as it depends upon us, it will be produced. As to the correspondence of private parties, I cannot give such an absolute pledge—first, because it is very bulky; and, in the second place, because private parties who communicated information of very material importance made it a condition that it should not be made public.

VISCOUNT SANDON: Will the official Papers be presented before the end of the Session, or before the negotiations are resumed?

MR. GLADSTONE: It would hardly be wise to give a positive pledge as to that. The best pledge I can give is that the official Correspondence, and whatever we can lay on the Table, shall be produced at the very earliest moment that we are able to do so.

MR. RITCHIE said, he intended to bring forward the Motion of which he had given Notice on this subject to-morrow, and he appealed to the hon. Members for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) and Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver) to give way in favour of a question of such pressing importance. He understood that the hon. Member for Eye was willing to give way.

MR. MAC IVER said, that, so far as he was concerned, he would not like to stand in the way of a discussion in regard to the present position of our commercial relations with France, and, therefore, very willingly gave place; but that he would like to make an appeal to his hon. Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) to add to his Resolution words such as would have the effect of declaring that no Commercial Treaty should be entered into which allowed France to continue, whether by a surtaxe d'entrepôt or other means, to place the importation of foreign produce via ports in Great Britain or Ireland at special disadvantage as compared with importations direct.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS— THE NAVY ESTIMATES.

In reply to Sir JOHN HAY,

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the Navy Estimates would be taken to-morrow, in case the Government were not able to proceed with them to-night; but he was sorry to say he understood that there would be an amount of Business to be got through before going into Supply to-morrow.

WEST INDIES—DEMERARA—DEFALCATIONS IN THE ADMINISTRATOR GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he has received any information about a Resolution proposed in the Court of Policy at Demerara praying for an independent inquiry into the recent defalcations in the Administrator General's Department; and, whether he will take steps to secure that the inquiry now proceeding shall be thoroughly independent and searching in its character, by not allowing any of the indirectly implicated officials to take part in it?

MR. COURTNEY: No official information on the subject has been received at the Colonial Office; but from the Reports in the Colonial newspapers it appears that a Resolution to the effect stated by the hon. Member was proposed in the Court of Policy, but was either withdrawn or ruled to be out of order. The inquiry referred to in the second part of the hon. Member's Question is completed; but my noble Friend the Secretary of State proposes to have another and independent inquiry.

WEST INDIES—JAMAICA.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Report of the Civil Service Inquiry in Jamaica has been received; and, if so, whether he will lay it upon the Table before the House rises?

MR. COURTNEY: The last portion of the Report, which is very voluminous, has only recently been received, and it has not yet been possible to consider it, or to decide whether there will be any advantage in publishing it.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o o o—

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.

CONSIDERATION OF LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

[THIRD NIGHT.]

Lords Amendments further considered.

Page 16, lines 1 and 2, leave out ("held by occupying tenants and"), the next Amendment, agreed to.

Page 16, line 9, leave out from ("provided") to ("that") in line 14, the next Amendment, read a second time.

MR. GLADSTONE moved to disagree with the Amendment. The words which he proposed to re-insert were—

"Provided that at the expiration of such existing leases the lessees shall be deemed to be tenants of present ordinary tenancies, from year to year, at the rents and subject to the conditions of their leases respectively, so far as such conditions are applicable to tenancies from year to year; and provided also that."

The case stood thus—on consideration it appeared to the Government that though it was quite right that the character of present tenant should attach to the lessee at the close of the lease, subject to a limitation mentioned when they discussed the matter, yet there was no reason in the world why the present tenant should not have his lease fairly secured to him, and that he should be free from further litigation at the instance of the landlord; and they, therefore, proposed that the lease should serve as the first statutory term.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the said Amendment."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE contended that when a lease had been granted it had been granted usually on the understanding that it was for a certain period; that the terms were agreed on by both parties; and that it was a part of the bargain that, at the expiration of the term, the property would revert to the landlord.

MR. GLADSTONE said, this was the correct English construction of a lease, but it was not the Irish construction, which was totally different. In order to show how different it was, he would refer to the Ulster Tenant Right Bill which was brought in just before the General Election by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Macartney), and approved by the right hon. Gentleman. In the 3rd clause of that Bill it was provided—

"That whenever the lease of any holding forming part of any estate in Ulster on which estate the Ulster tenant right custom had prevailed should terminate, the person or persons having a beneficiary interest in the estate should be entitled to resume the property as if he or they were in the possession of a tenancy-at-will."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, there was not the slightest analogy between the Bill referred to by the Prime Minister and the Bill now before the House. He was perfectly certain the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell) would not quote that Bill in support of the provisions of the Bill now under consideration. Tenant right in Ulster was absolutely inseparable from the soil, and it was a perfectly different thing from what was now proposed. Under a lease in Ulster the landlord if he went to turn the tenant out should, first of all, pay him for the tenant right. Under this Bill, which was to apply to parts where there was no such custom as that which prevailed in Ulster, the landlord was to be prevented from doing that which was the essence of his lease. He hoped the House would not be deluded by the argument used by the Prime Minister.

VISCOUNT LYMINGTON said, he dissented from this Amendment on the very strong grounds of the practical and accepted view of the matter in Ireland. On the property with which he was connected it had long been the custom to grant to agricultural tenants leases for 31 years. In some cases the families of those tenants had been on the same farms for 200 years, and there existed among those men ingrained and conscious expectations that on the expiration of the lease their farms would be re-valued for rent, and that, subject to their accepting that re-valuation, they would be allowed to retain their farms. Nor was that other than natural. To a nature far less susceptible of such feelings than the Celt the pang would be bitter and the separation cruel from a home endeared to him as the result of his labour and capital, and around which had intertwined themselves many kindly and affectionate associations. But apart from those considerations of sentiment, the leaseholders were possessed, together with all Irish occupiers, with that living tradition of possessory right which, to use the language of the Bessborough Commission, had survived to them through all vicissitudes, and in despite of the seeming or real veto of the law. He dissented lastly from this Amendment on the ground of policy. The class of large leaseholders were not only the best and most enterprising farmers, but possessed the strongest and most efficacious means for influencing and controlling public opinion. The Bill aimed at strengthening and securing the rights by extending the interests of property; and he sincerely trusted that that great legislative experiment might not be deprived of a fair trial for fulfilling its great object.

MR. GIBSON pointed out that the noble Lord (Viscount Lympington) had fallen into the same mistake as the Prime Minister. As the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) had pointed out, the two questions were as different as day from darkness. No one asked to prejudicially affect the Ulster Custom or any usage analogous to tenant right outside Ulster, and the Amendment of the Lords left untouched the provision in the centre of the clause relating to "the Ulster custom, or usage analogous thereto." He would remind the House of the real way in which the Lords asked to maintain the clause. Their Lordships only sought to set right an afterthought of the Government. On all the 22 drafts and revisions that this Bill went through—

MR. GLADSTONE: It never did.

MR. GIBSON: Well, 20.

MR. GLADSTONE: No, not right.

MR. GIBSON: Well, in all the numerous revisions—so numerous that they could not be counted—the Ministers never for a moment dreamt of presenting to Parliament as their first deliberate proposal that there should be any tampering with existing leases. It was not until the Bill had advanced to a considerable stage in Committee, and not until after the 29th of June, that it occurred to the Prime Minister that he would get the Attorney General for Ireland to put that Amendment on the Paper. [MR. GLADSTONE dissented.] He (Mr. Gibson) had heard the Prime Minister administer a grave rebuke to an hon. Member on that side of the House for shaking his head; but there was no one who could more resolutely convey his opinion in that manner than the right hon. Gentleman himself.

MR. GLADSTONE: On matters of fact. When an opinion is ascribed to me that I have not expressed, I take the liberty of indicating my dissent in that manner.

MR. GIBSON said, he was ready to accept any correction from the Prime Minister, whether by word or suggestion. [MR. WARTON: Or gesture.] Up to that time they had never stated that they intended to make any change in their original proposal. The House could not but clearly recognize that the Amendment merely sought to replace the Bill in the position in which it was first introduced to the House, and which was retained until June 29. What was the Amendment now sought to be rejected, and what were the words to be re-instated by the Government? Everyone knew that every lease contained a clause that at its expiration the lessee should surrender; and that was not only contained in every lease, but by an Act of Parliament, for which some of the present Ministry were responsible, passed in 1860, a covenant to surrender at the end of the tenancy was to be presumed. The Amendment of the Government proposed in general terms that with respect to all leases, whether they were made before or after 1870, whether the rent was high or low, the landlord harsh or indulgent, the tenant improving or the reverse, at its termination, instead of the landlord being able to resume possession, he should continue, whether he liked it or not, a tenant who could bring him into Court and get a term of 15 years renewable as often as he pleased. If that was not a very substantial innovation on the original proposition of the Government all he could say was that it would appear to be so to any casual observer. The noble Lord (Viscount Lynton) had referred to property with which he was connected; but that was one of the properties in Ireland where a usage analogous to the Ulster Custom prevailed. The Prime Minister had quoted a clause from the Bill in reference to that which for the first time became a serious moot point in Ulster after the Act of 1870. Things got on smoothly until then, when there arose a great deal of anxiety and confusion as to whether tenant right at the expiration of a lease was destroyed or not. To clear up that point a Bill was brought in on the Conservative side of the House, and assented to by a very substantial portion of the House; but this Amendment did not seek, in the slightest degree, to confine itself to Ulster or to places where a similar custom prevailed. The argument of the Prime Minister was that leases in Ireland were different from leases in England—in other words, that agreements containing the same words and executed in the same solemn manner were to be interpreted differently in both countries. Surely the proposition need only be stated to show its utter absurdity. The Prime Minister argued that an Irish lease did not mean what it said, but something else—in other words, read in the light of present events, it meant that a man, after having made a covenant to give up possession, was not to give up possession. He (Mr. Gibson) was disposed to think that, although second and third thoughts were sometimes wiser than first ones, yet in this case he believed the earlier opinion of the Government had been most considered; and the Amendment of the Lords was in accordance with the Bill as originally introduced.

[Third Night.]

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, this matter had been already fully discussed in Committee, and he had been in hopes that it might at this stage have been disposed of without much further debate. No arguments had been adduced in "another place" against what the Government had done and what the House had sanctioned. His right hon. and learned Friend said that the first word on the subject was heard on the 29th of June. Did his right hon. and learned Friend forget, or was he so inattentive as not to have heard, the speech of the Prime Minister on the 16th of May? In that speech his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said—

"In the same way, another bye question which we have considered, and the result of which consideration appears in the Bill—but it may be worthy, notwithstanding, of future consideration—is the question for current leases. That also is evidently a question which, in my opinion, ought to be reserved for the Committee on the Bill."—[3 Hansard, cclxi. 590.]

His right hon. and learned Friend was—he did not like to use a stronger word—at least inaccurate.

MR. GIBSON said, that he fixed the 29th of June because on that day the Prime Minister, in dealing with an Amendment of the hon. Member for Wicklow (Mr. W. J. Corbet), said that the Government would not be parties to re-opening the covenants in a lease.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, there again his right hon. and learned Friend was quite inaccurate, for the Amendment he referred to raised a wholly different question. It was not the same Amendment. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Wicklow was one which proposed to empower the Court to alter the rent payable under a lease, leaving the other obligations of the lease untouched. He (Mr. LAW) could see no reason for making any difference between one part of the country and another, and the Government had acted on what they believed to be the general sentiment of Ireland as well as, to a great extent, of this country also. If the landlords could not get back their property in one part of Ireland without paying full compensation for the tenant right, he saw no reason why there should be a different practice in another part of the country. In and out of Ulster leases were regarded as documents fixing rents for certain specified times, and this was the contemplation of both parties at the time when leases were made. He could not see that a tenant holding from year to year for a lengthened period had any better right to be regarded as a present tenant than another who had held for, perhaps, a much shorter period, but whose tenancy had been under the conditions of a lease. It seemed to him to be not only unfair, but also impolitic, to preserve in one part of the country a custom which was denied to another, and which was, as he believed, based on the sentiment and habits of the great majority of the people of Ireland.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he thought the Prime Minister had been very much influenced in this matter by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell). In his (Sir Walter B. Barttelot's) own opinion, this was the most dangerous proposal in the whole Bill. It absolutely took away the property of one man and handed it deliberately to another. It stood to reason that landlords would not turn out tenants who had done their duty by their holdings; but no one could, in common justice or common sense, contend that a landlord should not have the power to resume possession of his property when the tenancy—that was to say, the lease—had expired in due course of law. No matter what could be said to the contrary, he could only regard this particular provision in the Bill as one conferring upon all tenants in Ireland perpetuity of tenure, and, as such, he believed it would be as bad in practice as it was mischievous in principle. If the Amendment was struck out, he hoped the other House of Parliament would re-insert it, notwithstanding whatever consequences might arise. This was one of those points for which they had no absolute reason assigned by the Government for disagreeing with the Lords' Amendments; and as it was against common sense and justice to strike it out he hoped it would be maintained.

MR. GÖSCHEN: The hon. and gallant Gentleman who has just spoken has said that this is one of the most dangerous clauses in the Bill. I think both sides will admit it is one of the most important clauses of the Bill; and, being so, it is one with regard to which this House should be exceedingly careful what steps it takes, and I trust the House will forgive me if, for a moment, I state the reason why I shall vote with the Government on this clause. I consider it is one of the most important clauses in the Bill, and it is one on which Her Majesty's Government is certainly not likely to give way. I do not know whether the other House are likely to give way; but this House may, I am sure, take for granted that Her Majesty's Government will stand by their resolution to disagree with the Lords with regard to this clause. That being so, I think every Member of the House ought to ask himself what is the result of any vote he would like to give, and I ask myself this question. If hon. Members opposite should have a majority on this question, is it not certain the House of Lords will stand by their Amendment, and that the result will be the loss of the Bill? I am not prepared for such a calamity, for I think it would be a calamity to the country under existing circumstances. The remarks I have made do not only apply to the present clause, but to other important clauses of the Bill. The time for mere protest has gone by; we have now got to take a practical view of the situation, and that appears to be this—do we desire this Bill should pass? [Mr. WARTON: No!] I think the unanimity of the House is proved by there being, in fact, only one dissentient; and it strikes me there is no Party in this House, or the other House, which does not wish to pass this Bill; and I think it the duty even of hon. Members who may not entirely agree with the Government, or who may not agree with a particular clause in the Bill, nevertheless to ask themselves what is the reasonable course to adopt, and whether they will give such votes as will imperil the whole of the Bill. It strikes me that this is a perfectly fair and candid view to take of the situation. It is perfectly fair to ask ourselves whether we are so determined in favour of any particular Amendment, and against the proposal of the Government, that we would wish to encourage the Lords to take a course that would imperil the Bill. Though we may differ in some points, it appears to me to be a practical course now not only to look at a particular Amendment but to the fate of the of the Bill; and I trust there are few who will encourage the Lords to take any action which might imperil the whole passing of the Bill.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, after the somewhat extraordinary speech which they had just listened to, he must trespass upon the time of the House for a few minutes. The argument of the right hon. Gentleman practically amounted to this—that hon. Members in that House were to give no expression in future to their opinions—that debate in future was to be useless whenever the Government stated that they intended to strike out any of the Lords' Amendments to a Bill. In the opinion, therefore, of the right hon. Gentleman, that House was bound to endorse the opinion of the Government without discussion or comment. The right hon. Gentleman said he should not vote against the Government on this particular Amendment, because if there were a majority against them the Lords would insist on retaining it. But if the Government were defeated the Lords would have nothing further to do with the Amendment. [Mr. GOSCHEN: Then the Bill would drop.] He could not believe for a moment that the Government would drop the Bill if they were defeated on this point. If a Minister would get up and say that if the Government were beaten on any particular point in the Bill they would drop it altogether, the argument of the right hon. Gentleman would apply; but he (Sir R. Assheton Cross) could not conceive any Minister making such a statement. The provision which the Lords had amended was not in the Bill as it was originally drawn; and that being so, he should like to see what position the Government would be in if they appealed to the country. He, for one, should certainly not be intimidated, on account either of the fate of the Government or the fate of the Bill, from giving his vote or opinion on any point that might arise in the course of these discussions, as he thought every independent Member ought to do.

MR. H. R. BRAND remarked, that after what had passed he felt bound to say that he intended to vote with the Government, because he believed that the Government were in the right. The hon. and gallant Member opposite (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) had said that the paragraph in question introduced a most dangerous principle into the Bill. He did not admit that, and he put it to the plain test if it was just in Ulster it was equally just in the rest of Ireland, and it had been admitted by the Leader of the Opposition that it was just in Ulster; therefore, the simple question was whether tenant right existed in the rest of Ireland as in Ulster. The original blot in the Bill, as he considered it, was the exclusion of the leaseholders from the Bill, because by that exclusion a large number of tenants, not differing in point of character from other tenants, would have been deprived of the advantages of the measure. He had voted, though in no hostile spirit to the Government, in favour of an Amendment to the Bill for excluding tenants of £100 valuation and upwards from the 7th clause of the Bill, but that was a totally different thing, because it was upon the principle that these tenants were able to take care of themselves; whereas the leaseholders affected by the clause were small as well as large tenants. The Bill, roughly speaking, extended the Ulster Custom throughout the rest of Ireland; and he contended they would be doing right by following the well-known custom in Ulster—that was to say, that the tenant right existed at the end of the lease. With regard to the question of a breach of faith of the Land Act of 1870, his idea was that the breach of faith had rather been on the part of some landlords who had forced leases upon the tenants. There was evidence before the Commissioners to show that there were many cases in which these leases had been forced upon tenants, and he quoted from the evidence—not of a tenant farmer, but of a land agent—to show that the object of this was to get rid of the tenant's claim for compensation against his landlord. He should be sorry to see any Amendment carried in this Bill which was vital to its principle or which would injure its prospects of success; and it was because he believed that the Lords' Amendment would injure the prospects of success of the measure that he should vote against it. He believed it would deprive some of the small tenants of Ireland of the safeguard which they required against having their rents raised and raised again in proportion to the energy and skill which they had shown in conducting their leases.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he thought that Her Majesty's Government might congratulate themselves upon at length receiving unqualified support from many of their Friends below the Gangway, who had hitherto favoured them with an excess of candid criticism. If the hon. Member who had last spoken thought that the Government were right, the right hon. Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) thought that they were wrong, his view being that hon. Members in that House should vote against their consciences, lest any noble Lord in the other House of Parliament should have the courage to vote according to his own. On what theory of Parliamentary government did the right hon. Gentleman go? Was it tolerable that the threat should be held out to them and to noble Lords in "another place" that any alteration which the Government, in a fit of petulance, should refuse to accept, might cause them to drop the Bill and throw the responsibility on Members of the Opposition or on the other House? Parliamentary government could not possibly be carried on on such conditions. If neither Members of that House nor Members of the other House were to introduce Amendments on the Bill which modified it in some of its most pernicious features without being coerced by the threat that the Government would drop the measure the privileges of both Houses were in danger.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, he should certainly not base his support of the Government on the grounds put by the right hon. Member for Ripon. He supported the proposal contained in this clause because he believed it to be just in itself and to be a very important step towards abolishing the distinction which he had always believed to be an invidious and unhappy one between Ulster and the rest of Ireland. He also supported it because it recognized and gave effect to the practice and sentiment which obtained in Ireland on the subject. In Ulster there had been, in some respects, a sturdier race than in the rest of Ireland. ["No, no!"] Yes, in many respects; and a race which had also been favoured in former days by the Government of this country for many reasons—the matter of religion amongst others—special favours and protection had been extended to them; and what was the result? Why, that a powerful public opinion rose up in Ulster, of which the custom was merely an expression. That was the origin and meaning of the Ulster Custom, and he hoped this invidious distinction would be removed. The landlord wanted to have a tenant who would pay him rent. At the end of the lease the tenant would either take a lease of his holding or continue as an overholding tenant, in which case he would be a tenant from year to year. There were a number of leases of which only two or three years remained unexpired. On one side of the hedge they would have a number of tenants whose leases had expired, it might be a few days or a year after the Bill came into operation, with utterly different rights and inferior rights; and on the other side they would have tenants who, in other respects, were exactly in the same position with different and higher rights. That would be simply intolerable. He hoped the Government would stand by the clause.

MR. GREGORY said, all that a covenant did was to impose a personal liability on the tenant. If he did not give up possession on the termination of the lease, but continued to hold over, he was merely a tenant from year to year.

MR. MACDONALD said, he should not have risen to take any part in this debate if it had not been for the remark of the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) that he hoped the Lords would stand upon their rights, and would restore the Amendment if it were rejected. If the hon. and gallant Gentleman was prepared to give that advice to his Friends to try conclusions, he, for one, as representing a popular constituency, was perfectly willing to do the same, with this conviction—that there was a “beyond” to which the Government could refer, and in referring to which they would have a voice so strong that no irresponsible Party in the State would be able to defy the opinions of that House, which had been sitting for nearly six months considering this important question. He would be the last person to excite irritation upon this question; but the irritation in this instance had come from the other side. A few days ago he addressed from 20,000 to 40,000 men, whose opinion was clearly in favour of this Bill. If the House of Lords chose to insist on their alterations in the Bill, the country would know what they were about. If necessary, he hoped the Prime Minister would appeal to the country with reference to the Bill, feeling assured that the country would answer that appeal by saying in a manner that could not be mistaken that the Bill must pass. Should they still reject the Bill then their existence must be dealt with.

Question put.

The House divided: — Ayes 254; Noes 125: Majority 129.—(Div. List, No. 376.)

Lords' Amendment disagreed with.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) moved, in page 16, line 10, after “lessees,” to insert “if bonâ fide in the occupation of their holdings.”

Amendment agreed to.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) moved, in line 13, after the words “year to year,” to insert—

“But this provision shall not apply where a reversionary lease of the holding has been bonâ fide made before the passing of the Act,” in order to meet the case of a reversionary lease.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. GLADSTONE said, there was another case in which the Government thought it equitable to provide for the landlord's power—namely, the case where he had a bonâ fide desire to resume the holding, not for the purpose of letting, but for his personal use and occupation. He accordingly proposed, in page 16, line 14, after the word “that,” to insert the words—

“Where it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Court that the landlord desires to resume the holding for the bonâ fide purpose of occupying the same, the Court may authorise him to resume the same accordingly, in the manner and on the terms provided by the fifth section of this Act with respect to resumption of a holding by a landlord.”

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. GIBSON said, as far he understood the reference which was made, it was this—that on the termination of a lease the landlord might be permitted by the Court to resume possession of the holding if the landlord was willing to pay the full amount that the Court awarded against him.

[Third Night.]

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW): The full amount of the compensation of the tenant.

MR. PARNELL said, the adoption of the Amendment would create a very great feeling of uncertainty in the minds of tenants in Ireland as to what would become of them on the termination of their leases—an uncertainty which would tend almost necessarily to induce a tenant holding a farm on lease to run the farm out before the expiration of his tenancy as much as possible. The direction of the Amendment was simply this—it told the tenant—“If you improve your farm, and make it a desirable farm for your landlord to cultivate at the end of your lease, it is exceedingly probable that your landlord will so desire to cultivate it.” They knew that some of the greatest past hardships in connection with Irish land tenure arose from the wholesale clearance of good and fertile land, which the landlords, in the words of this Amendment, had bond fide desired to enter into the occupation of themselves. In many of the best counties of Ireland—in Wexford, Kilkenny, and in some parts of the county Waterford—the landlords under the present law were clearing their estates by the action of the Emergency Committee and entering into the occupation of those estates themselves, and cultivating them. He thought they ought to resist most strenuously the direction and general bearing of this Amendment, which could not fail to be of a most disastrous character. He trusted the Government would reconsider this matter, and not, by a retrograde step of this kind, introduce an element of uncertainty into the minds of the tenants holding under leasehold tenure as to what their position would be, or could be, at the expiration of their term.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he had been content to rest this on the general equity of the case. He hoped that the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell) would not prosecute his objection, because really, in the first place, this was evidently a limited question. He could not join in the apprehension that the Irish landlords were so differently minded from other landlords that they were likely to undertake a general operation for the purpose of getting farms into their own hands; that that which was the perfect horror of every other landlord, of getting farms thrown on their hands, except in certain exceptional circumstances, would become the delight and the passion of landlords of Ireland. If the hon. Member were right in his supposition that this provision would induce tenants to run out their farms in the last year of their leases, that would be a very strong objection; but it was evident that every man who thus exhausted his land would destroy or whittle away his compensation; for according to the condition of the farm at the termination of his occupancy would be the amount of compensation awarded to him. He hoped the House would be allowed to pass the Amendment.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR remarked, that the Prime Minister had now taken to patting the Irish landlords on the back; but his whole Bill was based on the great difference between them and English landlords. He knew many cases in which landlords were very anxious to get back farms. The right hon. Gentleman clearly did not appreciate the importance of his own Amendment.

MR. MACFARLANE regretted the Amendment by the Prime Minister, in the interest of the 100,000 leaseholders in Ireland, and the uncertainty it would throw them into. But they might as well attempt to move a stone wall by words as move the Prime Minister.

MR. GIVAN said, he had a very strong objection to the Amendment. It would unsettle the whole of the leaseholders of the country. What security would the Court have that the landlord wanted the holding for a bond fide purpose? The whole principle of the proposal was bad, and he should have great pleasure in voting against it.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, the effect of the Amendment had been exaggerated. He pointed out that already they were going to trust to the Court for a variety of things. The Bill reposed confidence in the Court, and no resumption could be had unless the Court were agreed that the farm was bond fide required by the landlord for his own occupation. There were a great many cases in which no human mind could ever consider a landlord wanting it for his own purposes of occupation; and it was a reasonable thing that a landlord, having given a lease of his land many years ago, should have the power of resuming it at the termination of the lease if he wanted it for personal occupation.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, the Amendment would have a most injurious effect. It would only tend to clear the tenants from the farms of Ireland. It placed another facility for doing this in the landlords' hands. The Prime Minister had said that the landlords of Ireland had been tried and acquitted; but if they had, it had been by a jury of landlords. The people of Ireland had no confidence in the landlords, and there would be no peace in Ireland until the Irish landlord had followed the dodo.

MR. P. MARTIN said, he thought that it was the duty of Irish Members to oppose the Amendment. Its practical tendency plainly was to encourage and facilitate landlords in resuming possession of their tenants' holdings in order to add them to their grazing tracts, which already were too widely extended, and had caused so much suffering and distress in many parts of Ireland. When possession had been taken there was nothing in the provisions of the Bill to prevent the landlord from re-letting the lands under what was known as a grazing contract. His hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork had done right in calling attention to the evils which had resulted from clearances. He remembered in county Meath, when ejectment after ejectment took place, where the tenants were willing and able to pay fair rents, simply for the purpose of clearances. The effect of the Amendment would be most disastrous. The professed object of the Bill was to give increased security to the general body of Irish tenants and prevent eviction. It was unfortunate that the Prime Minister should now propose to disfigure the fair promise of the measure by the present provision. He felt convinced that in Ireland the insertion of the clause would, by the farming class, be received with the greatest alarm and distrust.

MR. DAWSON said, that it had never occurred to him that a new danger should come from the Government. He knew from his own experience that so anxious were landlords in Ireland to get the land into their own hands that they resumed possession even at their own loss. The Amendment would be disastrous, not only to the people of Ireland, but to the Empire, as preventing the full development of the resources of Ireland.

MR. HOPWOOD, as an English Member, regretted the introduction of the Amendments. It would only be applicable in a few cases, and it was a pity that for the sake of these cases they should make every leasehold tenant in Ireland shake in his shoes, lest at the termination of his lease his land should be resumed by the landlord. He appealed to the Prime Minister to withdraw it.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said, he thought a great deal of the argument against the Amendment was not to the point; but really the Amendment would only remove an obvious injustice to landlords.

MR. SHAW said, it would suit many landlords to clear away 700 or 800 acres to make a good grazing or tillage farm of the land. At the same time, he did not think there was any great danger, as a general rule; because he was sure that under this Bill the aim of landlords would be to get good tenants and keep them. The Amendment, he suggested, might be so modified as to prevent any great danger. There was an injustice in saying to the landlord that he would not get his land under any circumstances at the termination of a lease; but the Amendment might be more defined by saying he might have the land for himself, or some member of his family, to reside in or for a home farm, which would not be unreasonable at all. But he further suggested that if the landlord sub-let a farm so acquired after four or five years, and the man coming in were to be considered a future tenant, then that would lead to injustice.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, the Amendments made by the Lords were bad enough; but it took them by surprise to find the Government proposing such an objectionable one as the present. It would give the landlords who desired it the power of turning holdings into grazing farms. If this Amendment were insisted upon, the Bill would be a message of dissatisfaction instead of a message of peace.

MR. SYNAN said, the Government no doubt had this excuse, that they had inserted the Amendment in order to carry the whole clause through the other House. It was a clause the object of which was to oil the machinery of the two Houses; but when the House of Lords had not proposed the Amendment, he thought the Government might have left it alone. As the Amendment was now framed, the Court would have no power of inquiring into the reasons why the landlord was led to resume possession. If the Government desired to pass the Amendment without difficulty, it would be well to provide that the objects for which the occupation was required should be stated to the Court.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, that where a man had agreed to resume his property he should have the power to do so. They must be prepared to give up something. [Mr. HEALY: Why?] He thought it would only be an act of justice to have some such clause in the Bill; and it should be remembered that the man who resumed his property would have to pay a heavy penalty by way of compensation to the tenant. He thought if the right of resumption were restricted to the purposes of residential occupation that would meet the case. Hon. Members opposite talked about grazing farms; but they ought to know that they were made before the passing of the Land Act of 1870. He suggested the addition to the Amendment of such words as these—

“If the landlord wishes to resume the farm bond fide for the purpose of residential occupation, or for the purpose of a home farm, provided always that if he re-let the farm within 15 years the tenant shall be a present tenant.”

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he hoped that on this occasion the Government would pay the House the respect of adhering to their own Amendment. If they did so it would be the first time during this Bill that they had stuck to any one of their proposals; but he saw that the Attorney General and the Prime Minister were already consulting with the view of reducing the Amendment to a nullity.

MR. HEALY said, the hon. Member (Mr. Mitchell Henry) reminded him of the unjust steward who was told to make friends among the mammon of iniquity. When rejected by the tenant farmers of Galway the hon. Member would be received into those everlasting dwellings on the other side of the House. Mr. John Mitchel had advised those who were evicted by their landlord to shoot him like a dog—[“Oh!”]—stay, he had not finished; if they could not catch the landlord, they should shoot the agent, and if they could not catch the agent, they should shoot the bailiff, and if they could, they should shoot all three. He referred to that statement merely to show how eviction was regarded by some persons in Ireland, because what the Government called “resumption” would be looked upon as “eviction” in Ireland. If the Government really desired to put a stop to agrarian passion and strife in Ireland, they should give the tenant ease of mind and peace of heart, otherwise this Irish question would haunt them and their successors for years to come. He advised the Government to let the Lords do their own dirty work; and if this Amendment was to be inserted at all, the Government should have allowed it to be put into the Bill by the hereditary enemies of the Irish people across the Lobby. [“Oh!” “Order!”]

SIR HENRY TYLER: I rise to Order. I wish to ask, Sir—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is speaking in terms of disrespect of the Members of the other House of Parliament. He has no right to speak of the Members of the other House of Parliament as the hereditary enemies of the Irish people.

MR. HEALY (resuming) said, he did not know that in so saying he was transgressing Parliamentary rule, and he therefore asked to withdraw the expression to which exception had been taken. He had warned the Government of the feelings which prevailed in Ireland with regard to these evictions, and he asked them to leave such Amendments as this to the Lords. He did not believe their Lordships were a very courageous body. [“Order!”] He did not think that was an offensive expression. He meant politically courageous, of course. If they were so they would have thrown out this Bill; but they knew very well the dangers that would arise out of leaving this question unsettled. Let the House send the clause back as it originally stood, and let their Lordships again try their hand at carving it. The Irish Members intended to amend the proposal of the Government in various ways, and if the process took some time it was not their fault. He would move to leave out subsequently the word

"occupying" and insert "residing on."

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN remarked, that if the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) would embody in the Amendment the excellent principles he had just enunciated many hon. Members near him would support him. He could not say whether the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) had given a correct quotation of the remarks of the late Mr. Mitchel. ["Question!"] The hon. Member for the City of Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) cried "Question!" but there was no one who spoke with less relevancy to the Question under debate than the hon. Member, who always tried to glorify himself. Whether the quotation was correct or not, he contended that no Member of that House had a right to quote such remarks unless with the intention of repudiating them. The hon. Member and his Friends might fairly claim to be, in a great degree, leaders of the Irish people. If they were so their words ought to be measured. Although the Irish Members were anxious in every way, whether by this Bill or otherwise, to improve the wretched condition of the Irish people, and to improve them morally, yet he trusted there were yet Irish Gentlemen amongst them who would regard, even with greater fervour, and as a greater improvement, the protection in Ireland of the principles of order, of religion, and of morality. He therefore regretted that it was necessary for an Irish Member to have to get up in his place and repudiate the expressions contained in the quotation to which reference had been made.

MR. DALY warned the Government if the Amendment were sent to the House of Lords as an expression of the opinion of the House of Commons, they would do more mischief than they could possibly imagine. The adoption of the Amendment would lead to a violent agitation, and would be the means of creating a profound mistrust amongst the Irish people. They should remember that the Act of 1870 was rendered a failure by giving way to the Amendments of the Lords.

MR. LALOR reminded the House that the alterations weakly consented to in the Act of 1870 were, in a certain sense, the cause of the present Bill.

MR. MAURICE BROOKS said, he thought he had been found voting with the Government in every division that had taken place on this Bill; but if the present Amendment were carried to a division without modification, he regretted to say that he would not be found voting with the Government on this occasion. If the Amendment were carried, it would amount to an emasculation of the Bill. It would carry terror and alarm to every occupier of land who had the expectation in the future of becoming an owner, and it would result in the efforts for the pacification of Ireland becoming a miserable failure.

MR. MACARTNEY said, it was very important that hon. Members had not got the Amendment proposed before them; but, so far as he could understand it, it amounted to this—the Government proposed at the termination of a lease that the landlord should be entitled to resume occupation of the holding of his tenant on paying a certain sum.

MR. GLADSTONE: For purposes of his own occupation.

MR. MACARTNEY said, so he understood it. The landlord must either reside on it, or convert the holding into a park. [An hon. MEMBER: Turn it into a grazing farm.] Why should a landlord not be allowed to graze cattle on his own property? Why, at present, a very large class of persons in Ireland obtained their living by breeding and selling cattle. They could not live on farm produce alone, and there were no manufactures at which they could get employment, so, therefore, the cattle trade was an important one. If the landlord wanted land to add to his holding, say a small portion, he should be allowed to have it; but if he wanted the land to turn it into a grazing farm, he (Mr. Macartney) thought he should not be allowed to do so. He thought that the suggestion of the hon. Member for the County of Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), limiting the right of resumption to cases where the landlord wanted the holding for residential purposes or for occupation by himself or his family, would meet the difficulty. Unless the Motion were modified in this direction he should vote against the Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he thought that many Members who had spoken scarcely appreciated practical work of this kind. If a landlord, at the termination of a lease, desired to resume the holding under the present state of the law he might do so. The Government interfered, and gave expression to what was the almost universal custom of the Irish people. But, on the other hand, they must regard the case from another point of view, and do substantial justice to the landlord also. If the landlord wanted the land for his own occupation, either to live upon or to cultivate, or to provide a residence for a member of his family, he thought the landlord should have the right to resume possession. He must, however, in that case satisfy the Court by such evidence as would convince them that he required the land bond fide for this purpose, and before he obtained it he must pay the full value of the tenancy as a present tenancy. The Court, indeed, would probably award not only the bare value of the holding, but also, regarding the case as one of constrained sale, would give something additional on that account. Under these circumstances, he did not think much alarm need be felt as to this resumption becoming a very prevalent practice, nor could the provision do any real injury, as it would only apply when the landlord could satisfy the Court that he would not re-let again. He saw, however, no objection to give a material guarantee in this respect by providing that, if a landlord re-let at any time within 15 years, the tenant so taking it should do so with all the incidents of a present tenancy. [Mr. HEALY: No good at all.] He hoped the House would acquiesce in this, and he therefore proposed to modify the Amendment by inserting the following words after the first word "same" in the Amendment:—

[Third Night.]

"As a residence for himself or as a home farm in connection with his residence, or for the purpose of providing a residence for some Member of his family."

It could scarcely be called an Amendment, for it was an alteration which had been anticipated by the Government from the beginning.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, after the first word "same," to insert the words—

"As a residence for himself or as a home farm in connection with his residence, or for the purpose of providing a residence for some member of his family."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

The Attorney General for Ireland

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted in the said proposed Amendment."

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I cannot help thinking, Sir, that the proceedings of this evening have been of a very remarkable and instructive character. Do let me ask the House to consider for a moment what it is that we are supposed to have been doing this evening. The Bill was passed with considerable labour and with great care by this House, after many weeks' discussion. It was sent up to the Lords, who, in the exercise of their Constitutional right and duty, returned it to us with certain Amendments. Those Amendments are, as we must presume, the fruit of the judgment which the House of Lords have independently passed on the various provisions on which they have made the Amendments. This House has now to exercise its independent judgment on those Amendments, and to accept them or reject them as it may think fit. In all that we have a very proper specimen of the working of the Constitutional system as between the two Chambers. But consider what we have been engaged in for the last half hour or hour. The Amendment which you, Sir, have now put from the Chair is, I presume, an important one in the opinion of the framers of the Bill, and we have every reason to suppose that a majority of this House will accept that Amendment. But if the Lords had made no Amendment in this clause, could you have proposed anything of the sort? Not at all. This House had parted with the clause, and had sent it to the House of Lords in a shape that was considered conclusive. If the Lords had let it pass you would not have had any opportunity of making any other alterations in it. We are proceeding on very delicate ground, and on a most important subject matter. We are undertaking to execute a task which for magnitude and importance has never been surpassed in this or any other country. We are not attempting to modify the relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland by alterations of the law which are to be carried out by ordinary tribunals, according to the ordinary principles of law; but we are undertaking to put into the hands of a newly constituted Court the duty of re-casting and re-modelling the social relations of the great classes interested in this matter. Moreover, we are laying down the principles on which the new Court is to act, and we have, at least, a right to say that those principles should be brought before us by the Government in a duly considered and carefully prepared state. When the Bill was introduced criticisms were made on the insufficient way in which the leaseholders were dealt with. What happened? The Prime Minister said the Government would consider this matter and make other provisions. That statement was made as long ago as the 16th of May. The Government had ample time for consideration. They brought forward proposals, changes were made in them, and they were adopted. Even they were adopted, much too often, on a sudden and with little notice. But now, at the last stage, I may say at the twelfth hour, they come forward with proposals in manuscript, which they have a difficulty in making us understand, and which, after they have made us understand them, they are prepared to modify. All that would be serious enough if the House were in an ordinary condition. But the House is not. We have had a most significant speech from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen), who has been absent from England for some time. [An hon. Member: Orienté!] Well, I may say of the right hon. Gentleman—" Il ne peut pas s'orienter "—he can hardly find his own position. But he has the great consolation that, at all events, one thing is clear—namely, that it is his duty to stand by the Government. He said it was the duty, and had been the practice of others, to subordinate their own opinion to the decision of the Government. It is very important to bear that in mind. We are carrying on a Constitutional discussion with the House of Lords, as to whether this is a measure proper to be adopted. If this is to be a fair contention, in which the opinions of this House, as expressed in the clause they sent up, are to be understood as the independent opinion of this House, that is one thing; but if they are not to be so understood, but as the expression of the opinion of the Government reluctantly adopted and apologized for by no inconsiderable number, I suspect, of their supporters, what are we to suppose will be the opinion of the House of Lords on the decisions we send up?

If anything were wanted to rather confirm the House of Lords in any decision they may arrive at in holding their own and in exercising their own judgment, it would be such language as that which has been held by the right hon. Gentleman, who has shaken and diminished the authority of the vote and proceedings of this House. He told us that Members on that side were, to a very considerable extent, not independent Members of this House; but that this is their way of expressing their confidence in the Government. The right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite shakes his head, which means, I suppose, that he denies the fact. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. Law): The statement.] At all events, let me remind the House of the remarkable observation in the beginning of the right hon. Member for Ripon's speech, that if a majority of this House were to agree with the House of Lords the Bill would be lost. That was the most extraordinary language I have ever heard. I quite understand that if the House of Lords disagree with the House of Commons the Bill will be lost; but if the House of Lords lays down certain opinions, and the House of Commons agrees to them, it is absurd to say that the Bill must be lost. I presume the right hon. Gentleman is more or less in the confidence of the Government, and can form a fair judgment of the state of mind of the Government; and if there is any meaning in the statement it comes to this—that he is of opinion that if a change were adopted in the Bill against the wish of the Government, the Prime Minister and his Colleagues would throw the Bill up. That would be a most extraordinary proceeding, more extraordinary even than many of the circumstances that we have already seen. That the Government should throw up the measure because a clause which is not in the original Bill is not adopted is certainly odd; and I can only imagine that the right hon. Gentleman does not mean all that his words convey. I do not believe there can be any doubt in the minds of the great majority of the House that it is our duty to exercise an independent judgment on the proposals submitted to us, while giving all proper respect, of course, to those who have prepared the Bill. I think it is most unwise—most indecent, I may say—that we should, at this stage of the proceedings, begin offering threats to the House of Lords. I do not wish to speak of the disrespectful language used by the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), for which you, Sir, called him to Order; but the hon. Member used other language, for which he was not called to Order, and I rejoiced to see the hon. Baronet the Member for the King's County (Sir Patrick O'Brien) rise in his place and denounce him with indignation. I should, however, have been glad to have heard something of the same sort from some Member of the Government in regard to language such as has been used by the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald). That hon. Member took occasion to say that if the House of Lords chose to make any alteration in this Bill against the will of the large majority and the Government, the country would know what they were about; and, in fact, held out threats which, I must say, it is not within the Constitutional right of any Member of this House to hold. I feel that I owe an apology to the House for occupying their time; but it was not we who began the waste of time. I have sat here and listened to the language which has been used, and I feel assured that the House understands the grounds on which I felt it necessary to go beyond the question.

MR. GLADSTONE: I will make one or two observations before I come to the main matter before us. The right hon. Gentleman complains that Members of the Government have not expressed their disapproval of the words spoken by the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy). Well, we have much upon our hands, and I, for my part, share the sentiments universal in the House—and I indicated my sentiments in a marked manner often taken notice of on other occasions—when I cheered the expressions of the hon. Gentleman (Sir Patrick O'Brien), who, much to his own honour, reprobated those extraordinary sentiments which, for his own sake, I hope the hon. Member for Wexford will express his regret at having made. I am obliged to say, having disposed of that, it was the only sentence in the lengthened speech of the right hon. Gentleman for which I feel the slightest sympathy. The right hon. Gentleman, at the time he states he is extremely anxious to expedite proceedings on this Bill, comes and addresses us for nearly half-an-hour. [Cries of "Quarter of an hour!"] Take it any way you like, I speak, perhaps, more according to the impressions produced. But the right hon. Gentleman at this period, when time is so precious, and when he is so very anxious to expedite our proceedings, rose and made this certainly rather lengthened speech for the period of the discussion, without saying one single word on the Amendment before the House. Of course, he is entitled to take every opportunity he may think fit of exposing the misconduct or weakness of the Government, or of dealing with their actions in any way that may prove useful to himself as a Party Leader; but do not let us hear from him or those whom he leads after this of their great anxiety to expedite the proceedings of this Bill. What is the speech of the right hon. Gentleman? He complains of threats to the House of Lords. He says that threats were begun from this side of the House by the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald); but he entirely forgets that the speech of the hon. Member for Stafford—which I did not in any manner encourage—was expressly and avowedly in answer to the threat of the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), who had preceded him in the debate; and after that the right hon. Gentleman rose, not to speak on the Amendment before us, not to enlighten us in the slightest degree by any contribution towards a just settlement of a most difficult subject; but he is so misled by the keenness of his Party zeal that he forgets the facts of this evening's discussion, and states that the threatening of the House of Lords was begun on this side of the House, when it was simply a reply to the boast of the hon. and gallant Gentleman for the expression of his fervid desire that the House of Lords would continue to persist in opposition to the wishes of this House. The right hon. Gentleman has attacked my right hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Goschen)—a rather singular proceeding. The speech of my right hon. Friend might well have justified remark; but I think that remark ought to have been offered when the speech was delivered.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I had spoken, and was not entitled to speak again.

Sir Stafford Northcote

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not know in what manner it was justified as an introduction in a debate which has nothing to do with the matter. But he says that he founds upon this speech the belief that the proposals of the Government are reluctantly adopted by a great number of our Friends. I do not think we have had evidence of that. Is the reluctant adoption of certain opinions confined to this side of the House? When the division was taken on the second reading of this Bill it was supposed that the resolution to divide was reluctantly adopted by you who sit on that (the Opposition) side of the House; but what is worst of all is that the supposition was that it was very reluctantly adopted by the right hon. Gentleman himself. But the courage of the Party opposite was such that they divided valiantly against the second reading in the House where they knew their division could not have the smallest effect; and in the House where they knew that if they divided against the second reading the Bill would have been thrown out, there their courage failed them. The chivalry of the minority of this House was not reflected in the action of the majority of the other. What has the right hon. Gentleman shown in that lengthened disquisition? I fully admit that he has demonstrated two things. One of them was that it is conceivable that upon some point or other the House of Lords may make a suggestion of some importance in the Bill, for he said that if it had not been for the act of the House of Lords we should not have heard of this Amendment. Quite true; but some wrong act of the House of Lords might suggest some right act to the House of Commons. The right hon. Gentleman went further, and said it is a very hard case that the Government did not make this proposal long ago, and were even now changing their proposal. In fact, the right hon. Gentleman succeeded in showing that the Government are not omniscient; that the Government do not at a moment's notice acquire a full and thorough knowledge of every point that they discuss in this Bill; that new points will open up from time to time; and that no amount of care can make you independent of the immense advantages of honest and thorough discussion in this House. That is the case. We do accept suggestions, and, moreover, we are not ashamed of it. We intend to do our best to make this Bill a perfect Bill; but it may be that we shall not make it a perfect Bill with all our efforts, and with all the aid we have derived from the discussion to-night, but not from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman; it may be that there will still remain some error, some imperfection in the provisions on which we are now engaged. There was a sentence in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman with which I could not help concurring, when he said that this question was one of the most difficult ever brought before Parliament. It is one of the most difficult. We are endeavouring to arrange by legislation a multitude of transactions which would have been infinitely better provided for, if our happy destiny had permitted it, by the free action of the respective interests of the different members of the community. But I have always pointed out that the one fundamental condition and recommendation which lies at the root of all that is most difficult and exceptional in our Bill is the recommendation of the Duke of Richmond's Commission, that Parliament should interfere to check the free action of supply and demand. I now come—and I must apologize to the right hon. Gentleman for doing anything so extraordinary as saying a word bearing on the Question before the House—to the Amendment. We might have been contented with rejecting, as we thought, a very injurious Amendment of the House of Lords; but that Amendment produces upon our minds a sense of our duty in rejecting that Amendment to examine as carefully as we can the state of the enactment that the House of Commons made. We did think that in certain points of secondary importance and extent, it did not entirely come up to the demands of justice. We therefore proposed one Amendment which passed without comment, and another to resumption at the end of the lease. We are very glad to do what we can to improve our own Amendment, and we are not ashamed to do so. We should have been much better pleased with ourselves if we had presented an Amendment verbally perfect; but being imperfect, we are better pleased to make it perfect, and to stand the small fire and small shot of hon. Gentlemen opposite—it certainly requires no iron-clad to resist them—than to ask the House to pass anything which is less perfect than we can make it. Under these circumstances, it appears to us that this Amendment, as amended by the proposal of my right hon. and learned Friend, will satisfy a demand not very wide, not very large, that has been justly recognized by my two hon. Friends below the Gangway who represent Irish constituencies, and which has in it the element of equity. I trust the words proposed will have that effect, and will be accepted.

MR. CHAPLIN: The right hon. Gentleman has just informed us that whatever may happen this will not be a perfect measure. That was a totally unnecessary piece of information. So far as I am concerned, I am more and more convinced that the measure is the most pernicious and iniquitous ever submitted to Parliament, and its effect will be, sooner or later, to extinguish both the Irish landlords and their property, and ultimately to lead to the separation of Ireland from England. If by any means I can devise a mortal blow at a measure of this nature, I shall adopt them with gladness, and without a moment's hesitation. I rise, however, to repudiate the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman, for I know not how many times—[Mr. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] —and that is that the foundation of this Bill rests on the Duke of Richmond's Commission. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Part.] For the twentieth time I repudiate his conclusion as absolutely without the smallest foundation; and I cannot conceal my astonishment that the right hon. Gentleman should appear in the character of a disreputable parent who goes up to a stranger in the street and says, "Please hold my baby for a moment," and then disappears round the corner. I am positively shocked at seeing the right hon. Gentleman assume this character. The wretched bantling belongs to the right hon. Gentleman, and he must bring it up in the best way he can; and if he attempts to foist it upon us, it will not be the Irish Members, but the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire, who will be obliged to go into Court for damages. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition showed a wise discretion in not dealing with this Amendment. The Government are always introducing Amendments and withdrawing them immediately afterwards, so that it is difficult to know what they intend.

MR. GOSCHEN: I shall not detain the House for more than a few moments in replying to the attack made upon me by the right hon. Gentleman who has now left the House without an answer. I should be sorry to take up the time of the House with a personal explanation. I tried to express myself in the very fewest words, and I seem to have been misinterpreted by the Leader of the Opposition. What I said was this—and what I wish to make clear is this—that any votes given at the present stage of the Bill in favour of the Lords' Amendments are a distinct appeal to the Lords to stand by those Amendments, unless the proceeding is a sham proceeding—unless it is a sham fight upon which the Opposition are at this moment engaged; and there are not wanting symptoms that this is a sham fight. We see that they are fighting with their forces on a peace footing. We do not see that they have summoned all the forces which generally claim or disclaim the Leadership of the right hon. Gentleman. There appears to me to be a great deal of sham in the opposition which is being offered by hon. Gentlemen opposite, and in the support given to the Lords' Amendments. Either they mean business or not. [An hon. MEMBER: Business.] They mean business. ["Hear, hear!"] They wish that the Lords should stand by their Amendments. [Cheers.] Then that shows the prudence of the remarks which I made, because I believe that, holding the same views that are held by the great majority of both sides of the House, it would be a great calamity if the Bill should be lost; and if the Lords stand by their Amendments, and the majority of the House of Commons stand by their Amendments, the Bill will be lost. That is my point; and therefore I wish, so far as my humble vote is concerned, to give no encouragement to the House of Lords to stand by their Amendments, which would be fatal to the Bill. I conceive that is a perfectly consistent, practical, and conscientious course to take. It is, I consider, more conscientious to refrain from making a call on the Lords than to make a call while in our hearts we hold the Lords will not stand by their Amendments. I believe many Members would regret deeply to see the calamity which would ensue—perhaps a division of the two Houses upon this subject. I regret that I have had to detain the House on this point. It would have been out of place for me to make a long speech on this or that Amendment. I expressed my conscientious view. I may have laid myself open to misrepresentation. That I can bear; but I was bound to clear up the misapprehension which the right hon. Gentleman entertained upon my speech.

MR. GIBSON: No one would have the slightest desire on either side of the House to make the suggestion that the right hon. Member for Ripon would either express or entertain a single unconscientious view. That was not suggested, and I should not have risen at all if he had satisfied himself with placing before the House a full explanation of his own position and of the words which he may have thought were ambiguous. But he has in the vindication of himself thought right to impute to the Opposition that they were not guided in their opposition by a sincere and earnest desire to discharge their Constitutional functions, but that they were going through what he ventured to call, hardly with propriety, a sham. On consideration, I think the right hon. Gentleman will see that that expression was hardly necessary in a speech made for his own vindication, and that it was applied entirely in an unwarrantable manner to those who, under great difficulties and disadvantages, and supported by a minority not easy to collect at this period of the Session, are discharging difficult but distinct Constitutional functions. My own deliberate view is that we should be all engaged in this part of our functions under a deep sense of high Constitutional responsibility—I know I am myself—and I, for one, have taken no part in the discussion of this measure unless so far as I was animated by a sincere and an earnest desire to discharge my Constitutional functions. I have given no vote in the House, and I am sure no hon. Member who has acted with me has given a vote, which I and they do not desire to see substantiated, and which does not represent our own sincere convictions in the matter. I believe that a true Constitutional view with regard to the consideration of the Lords' Amendments is this—that we should desire to consider them impartially and independently, and adopt those that commend themselves to our understanding and judgment, with a desire not to do violence to the Amendments submitted to us, and anxious also that from no part of the House—by suggestion, statement, or threat—should any words be used which might tend to misunderstandings that I am sure everyone wishes to avoid.

LORD ELCHO said, he regretted he had not had an opportunity of addressing the House on the second reading of the Bill. He had no wish to enter into the discussion to which the Amendment had given rise with regard to the conduct of the House of Peers, or still less the personal question raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon. The great difficulty of those who were opposed to the Bill was to bring home to the minds of people in England, and probably in Ireland too, what the real character of this measure was. The Amendment of the Government now did this in the most clear and distinct way. Before the Land Act of 1870 was passed an Irish proprietor was as free to deal with his land in Ireland as was the owner of Chatsworth or the owner of any estate, great or small, in England or Scotland, or the owner of house property, large or small, be it the Duke of Westminster or anyone else in London. After the Act of 1870 the Irish proprietor could not deal with his property as he had done previously, without paying, within certain limits, seven years' value of the holding to his tenant. That was the germ of the present legislation. The owners of land and houses in England and Scotland should know that this Bill was nothing more nor less than a Land Transfer Bill, without payment or compensation; and he defied the Attorney General for Ireland to dispute that fact. What was the present Amendment of the Government in plain English? Was its object to enable the owner of land in Ireland to get back his property without payment from the trammels of their Bill? Nothing of the kind. The property, which before the Act of 1870 was his and was as free as Chatsworth, the landowner was now to be allowed to buy back again from a man who had never bought it or paid for it. He asked his right hon. Friend the heir of Chatsworth (the Marquess of Hartington) whether that was not a truthful interpretation of that proposal? He was sick of hearing the Government talk of justice.

MR. SPEAKER requested the noble Lord to address himself to the Amendment before the House.

LORD ELOHO said, he was not surprised that, when he spoke of justice, the Speaker should think that he was not speaking to that Amendment. The Treasury Bench said the Amendment was brought forward in the interests of justice. Well, the Amendment was simply to enable a man to buy back land which, by the law of Ireland previously to the legislation of his right hon. Friend, was absolutely his own. He did not go into the question whether the Amendment upon the Amendment was a proper one. His only object was to try and point the moral—[An hon. MEMBER: And adorn a tale.]—and bring home to the people of this country what the Bill really was.

MR. DAWSON observed, that although the right hon. Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) expressed dissatisfaction from the Lords' Amendment, yet he had voted with his Party. That, he feared, was due to the Oriental imagination of the right hon. Gentleman. The Irish Members, he (Mr. Dawson) contended, were not warranted in giving the Amendment, even as it had been amended, their support. What, he asked, was a home farm, and of how many acres did it consist? He knew of a home farm of 2,000 acres, and if the owner could add 200 acres to it on the falling in of a lease, he would do so. Irish landlords, he believed, would be inclined, not for the sake of the land itself only, but for the dominion which the possession of the land gave them, to add field to field and farm to farm. He might aptly say, altering a quotation—

“Field after field his rising raptures fill,
And still he sighs, for fields are wanted still.”

What right had the Government to deprive one set of residents of the land in order to promote residences for another class of persons who would be related to the landlords? It was not because a man was rich that he should be entitled to turn away tenants already on the land in order to build residences for his sisters, his cousins, and his aunts. No money compensation would satisfy men who had been deprived of their holdings in that way. As long as the tenant in occupation paid a fair rent, it ought not to be in the power of any landlord to turn him away.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the remarks of the hon. Member were, no doubt, exciting and poetic; but it was only prosaic work to try to get on with the business. He would now appeal to the House whether it had not dealt with this matter fully? The Government proposed what appeared to them a practical, proper, and just arrangement between both parties, and they could not expect to give complete satisfaction on either side. The only question that remained was whether the House might not now proceed to a division.

MR. R. N. FOWLER rose in consequence of the remark made by the right hon. Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen), that the Opposition were fighting a “sham” fight. Although the normal majority which the Government possessed was 155, in no division which had been taken during these Amendments had their majority been equal to that number. He wished to remind the House that many hon. Gentlemen had paired, and pairs told more against the minority than the majority. Under these circumstances, he put it to his right hon. Friend opposite whether he was justified in his observation that that was a sham fight? For himself, he believed this to be a Bill of Confiscation, and his last vote, like his first, would be given against it.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR maintained that if there were any delay in the progress of the Bill it was entirely the fault of the Government, who had brought forward an Amendment which nobody cared for and which was wholly unnecessary. Owing to the rather malleable character of the Government, he had some hope that they would still further amend their Amendments. He would ask the Attorney General for Ireland what was meant by a home farm? He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had consulted several authorities on the subject, and was told that in Scotland it meant a farm of 1,000 acres. Supposing it only meant 100 acres, that would place it in the power of the landlord to turn away 10 families occupying farms of 10 acres a-piece. If the estate amounted to 200 acres, the landlord would be empowered to turn out 20 families holding 10 acres each. It was most unfair, too, that while the tenant should be forbidden to build a second house for his use, the landlord should be able to provide additional accommodation not only for himself, but for, it might be, 10 of his sons and five of his daughters. He would remind the Government that if they wished for a long lease of power, the best thing they could do would be to bring in a Bill next Session to abolish the House of Lords, instead of getting themselves into a quagmire by altering the Rules of the House of Commons.

SIR HENRY TYLER wished to protest against the expression of the right hon. Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen), that they were engaged in a sham contest. Their feelings in this matter were anything but a sham; they had a most profound dislike to and distrust of the Bill. But there were a good many shams in connection with it. They were now told that contract in Ireland was a sham; but if this Bill passed into law the greatest sham of all would be the Irish landlord, who would be a sham landlord with a sham property. He could only account for the right hon. Gentleman's views and expressions by remembering that he had only recently come from Constantinople, and had there imbibed ideas which were not in accordance with the sympathies of this House.

MR. LALOR said, he felt it to be his duty to be present to support the Government in their disagreement to the Lords' Amendments; but it had never occurred to him that the Government themselves would introduce so injurious an Amendment as this into the Bill. He had no doubt it had been honestly intended as a message of peace to Ireland; but this Amendment, if carried, would place the leaseholders of Ireland, who had done nothing to deserve such treatment, in the most unfortunate position. The Government, by this Amendment, would drive this class—the most intelligent and patient in Ireland—into the camp of the Land League, and make them perpetrators of agitation.

MR. BURLASE: I will promise to stand but one moment between this House and the division. I cannot say of myself, as the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire said of himself, that he had stated the same thing over and over again 20 times in the House during these debates, for this is the first time I have intruded my voice on the House since the beginning of the long discussions on this most important measure. I have to say this, however—that, strenuously and strictly as I have supported Her Majesty's Government from the beginning of this question up to this period, I come now across a state of things in which I am bound to hesitate. I find we are going to take the same sort of steps as were taken with the Bill of 1870. I find we are going in for compromise in order to get this matter through. Her Majesty's Government, with such a majority as no Prime Minister has had for very many years, are condescending to a compromise. The compromise we are asked to accept is, I think, dangerous to the principle of the Bill. It is doing what in the last division we professed our intention to avoid—the separation of Ireland into two parts, and the division of Ulster from the rest of Ireland. I have promised to stand only one moment on the floor of the House, and I will close by saying this. I cannot vote with Her Majesty's Government, and I will not vote against them; but, meanwhile, I believe that this compromise, like compromises in general, will leave behind it an amount of unsatisfied principle from which, some day or other, mischief is certain to accrue.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he hoped the Government would withdraw from the position which they had taken up. There was nothing to prevent a landlord from turning his whole estate into a "home farm." One case of a landlord doing so would spread alarm through a whole country side. One case was given by a noble Lord to support the Lords' view of the question, which required a combination of circumstances which he had himself never ventured on in framing a work of fiction. A family got ill, and let their mansion house, and 20 years afterwards, towards the end of the term for which they had let it, they all got well again and wanted to resume. He hoped the Government would stand by their Bill as it was.

MR. O'KELLY said, he thought the Government ought to give them fuller information as to what was meant by a "home farm." What was to prevent a landlord resuming possession of farm after farm until he had the whole of his estate in his own hands? Until the

[Third Night.]

Government gave them some assurance as to the operation of the Amendment, he thought the Irish Party would be justified in resisting it most strenuously, and, if necessary, moving the adjournment of the House, in order to give the Government time to reflect.

MR. REDMOND wished the Solicitor General for Ireland would give a definition of "home farm." He (Mr. Redmond) knew of an instance in the county of Wexford where the landlord had resumed possession of holding after holding until the whole estate was in his hands. If, under the Amendment, such process as that were possible, the Amendment was most undesirable, and Irish Representatives were bound to resist it to the utmost of their power.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, he was not at any loss to know what a home farm meant, and he did not think the Court would be at any loss to understand the phrase; but, unfortunately, its meaning was not comprehended in more than half-a-dozen places in Ireland. For his own part, he was against resumption under any circumstances, and regretted the course taken by the Government; but, in meeting the objection taken by the hon. Member for Galway, the Government had gone a long way to mitigate the effect of the Amendment. He only wished that the Government had never thought of the Amendment, and that they would take it back. It was a well-known fact that some Irish landlords loved dominion more than money—that they would be satisfied to be out of pocket in order to clear off the population and have the lands in their own hands. Irish Members had been charged with not dissociating themselves with words which had fallen from his hon. Friend (Mr. Healy). He felt that in times past Irish Members had been too fond of "dissociating" themselves from one another, and, perhaps, were still so; but, challenged as they had been, he could not in candour refrain from saying, in the presence of his hon. Friends, that he heard with grief and, indeed, with intense pain, his hon. Friend use that quotation as to the shooting of landlords and bailiffs. He had the pleasure of knowing personally Mr. John Mitchell, and he knew, as many others knew who were acquainted with him, that he had a North of Ireland Presbyterian bitterness of expression; but, while he should say nothing that would cast a reflection upon the name of John Mitchell, he should, in justice to his own principles and character, say that if any Irishman in his hearing in Ireland now uttered such exhortations to shoot landlords, and if they could not shoot landlords, to shoot their agents or bailiffs, he should heartily regret that he voted in the House for the abolition of capital punishment.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that the Government had over and over again been appealed to to limit the power which their Amendment would give to Irish landlords to resume possession of the holdings of tens of thousands of leaseholders. They had, however, remained dumb. The Premier had stated long ago that he would gladly listen to suggestions coming from any part of the House; but on this occasion the right hon. Gentleman was deaf, not only to the suggestion, but also to the entreaties of the Irish Members. In order to give the Government an opportunity of expressing their final decision, he begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. BIGGAR said, he would cordially second the proposition. The Government were bound to give a definition of the term.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. O'Donnell.)

MR. GLADSTONE: I should have thought that this Motion on the eighth month of the Session, and on the 11th of August, would have been about the last resort of any hon. Member. The Government will not, either directly or indirectly, be a tool for furthering such purposes. We have, on the part of the Government, fully explained everything that we have to say upon this matter, and the pretended opportunity offered us of explanation is an opportunity which shall not be used by us. We have no more to say on the matter, and I hope the House will at once pass judgment upon the Motion.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, that Her Majesty's Government had nobody to thank but themselves for the present difficulty. This was the third Amendment since this Bill came from the House of Lords which the Government had practically abandoned in the face of a certain amount of opposition. ["Oh!"] He knew his reminiscences were most disagreeable to hon. Members opposite; he was sure the Government would appreciate their impatience and the method of interruption adopted by the Radical Party and the friends of liberty. In the protracted discussion on the Emigration Question, the Irish Party adopted an attitude of firm opposition; more than once they resorted to the manœuvre now resorted to by the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), and the result was they were eminently successful in their efforts, for they reduced the Emigration Clauses to a perfect farce. To-night the Attorney General for Ireland had come down with an Amendment which had evidently been carefully prepared out of the House on consultation with his Party; there was every reason to believe it was the result of mature deliberation; and yet the Government, on the opposition of the Irish Party—he attributed the result to the firm attitude of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy)—mutilated and reduced their Amendment so as to make it a piece of imposture. The Irish Party were naturally of opinion that if they persisted in their opposition the remaining traces of this imposture would disappear. He could not be surprised at that, considering also the manner in which the Prime Minister had thought proper to reply to the Leader of the Opposition. No doubt, the answer was exceedingly amusing to the House at a moment when they were carried away by the eloquence of the Prime Minister; but throughout his 15 years' experience in the House he had never heard anything, not even in the speeches which had fallen from the hon. Member for Wexford, or from any of those Irish Members who were celebrated for the character and violence of their invective, to equal the insulting language—the language of studied insult—which the Prime Minister had thought it consistent with his dignity to address to the right hon. Gentleman. Because the right hon. Baronet had addressed a dignified remonstrance to the Government on their wavering conduct, the Prime Minister had drawn upon the whole vocabulary of abuse which belonged to him. If the right hon. Gentleman met the Amendments of the House of Lords in the spirit in which he answered the Leader of the Opposition, it was clear that all debate in opposition to the Government had become worse than useless. Although the Motion of the hon. Member for Dungarvan was inopportune at this period of the Session, and could lead to no useful result, he was bound to say that the way in which the Government had dealt with the Amendments of the House of Lords showed that it might not be inadvisable that the Government should have time to retreat from the position they had taken up.

MR. PARNELL said, that in asking his hon. Friend the Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) to withdraw his Motion, he desired to indicate the course which he and his Friends intended to follow. With reference to the Amendments proposed by the Government on their own Amendment, as these were distinctly of a limiting description he should vote for them. At the same time, he and those with whom he acted would think it necessary to divide the House afterwards on the Amendment itself.

MR. HEALY said, he had expected the Government would have given some explanation of the term "home farm," which they never heard of until they came to the Definition Clause. No wonder they were suspicious, because it was introduced at the request of the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. H. R. Brand). What they were afraid of was grazing or grass; it was not too much to ask that the "home farm" should not consist entirely of grazing land. He would be prepared to withdraw the 100 acres' limit, if the Government would give an assurance that there should be so many acres of tillage. He would not complain if the landlord wanted the land for his own purposes. And now he wished to say a word on another subject. The hon. Member for the King's County (Sir Patrick O'Brien) thought fit to make some comment upon a remark of his. He remembered very well reading in the newspapers two years ago how the hon. Member for the King's County called the hon. Member for Carlow, then Member for Tipperary (Mr. Gray), something which he could not repeat because it would be un-Parliamentary; he would only say that it began with a "d" and ended with "fool." ["Question!"] The hon.

[Third Night.]

Alderman (Mr. Alderman Lawrence) cried "Question!" Well, he believed Dr. Johnson once said he could supply a man with argument, but could not supply him with brains. The hon. Member for the King's County said that the words he had applied to the hon. Member for Carlow were only a quotation. [Sir PATRICK O'BRIEN: Hear, hear!] The hon. and learned Member for Meath (Mr. A. M. Sullivan), in the exercise of his discretion, had thought fit to get up and denounce him. The hon. and learned Member referred to the quotation which he affected to make from Mitchell so as to throw doubt upon his bond fides. The hon. and learned Member was perfectly at liberty to do so; but it did not become Irish Members to come down to that House — ["Question!"]. He could understand an hon. Member crying "Question!" when he knew how he should finish the sentence; but if he did not know, it was somewhat unusual even for an Alderman to cry "Question!"

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE rose, amid cries of "Order!" and said that he had not uttered a word.

MR. HEALY said, that for English opinion or for the opinion of the House of Commons it was the right and the duty of an Irish Member not to care one pin. He came there in the exercise of his functions as an Irish Representative to express his opinions, and as long as he had the approval of his constituency, and he had the right of the House, he should continue to utter them. He believed that everything he had said or done had received the full approval of his constituents, and therefore it was not for the hon. and learned Member for Meath to get up and pose as a disclaimer. They knew that the hon. and learned Member for Meath was not a man of blood. For his own part, like the fop described by Hotspur, he might regret that villainous saltpetre, which had laid many a tall fellow low, had ever been digged out of the bowels of the innocent earth; but he had never been an advocate of the "single drop of blood" theory.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN, said, his hon. Friend said that an Irish Member in that House should think only of the opinion of his constituency, and not care a pin for the opinion of hon. Members of that House or for English opinion. But he (Mr. Sullivan), who held the doctrine that a Member of the Irish Party was not an individual fighting for his own hand, that the Irish Party were bound to act together for good or ill, and that they might by their language hurt one another or their country, must recollect that language like that of his hon. Friend might reflect upon and stain his Party more than an individual. He would tell his hon. Friend (Mr. Healy) that he belonged to an organization called the Land League, which cared a great deal for the opinion of the people of England, for it was now appealing to that opinion, and he (Mr. A. M. Sullivan) hoped not in vain. He would tell his hon. Friend, too, that he was bound to care for the opinion of that House, the opinion of England, and the opinion of the world, fighting, as he believed he was, for a just cause. He never reflected upon or denounced his hon. Friend or his Colleagues for what they said upon their own responsibility; but he must be allowed to say that while he belonged to a Party which might be affected by the utterances of any one of them, he would not sit silent, even if it cost him his seat, with all the honours that could be conferred upon him, nor would he be held accountable for doctrines which might be interpreted as an encouragement to shoot landlords. His hon. Friend did not mean what he had said—he could not have meant it. He had said that he was not an advocate of one drop of blood; but he had not told the House that what he meant by that was that he would like to shed his own blood in fighting for his country's rights, but that he was not in favour of cowardly assassination.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked whether he understood the Government to assent to the modification suggested by the hon. Member for Wexford? He understood the Prime Minister to assent to it.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he could not consider anything a "home farm" which would be a mere aggregation of land used for grazing purposes.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question, "That those words be there inserted in the said proposed Amendment," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, by adding at the end thereof the words—

"Provided always, That if the holding so resumed shall be at any time within fifteen years after such resumption relet to a tenant, the same shall be subject, from and after the time of its being so relet, to all the provisions of this Act which are applicable to present tenancies."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Main Question, "That those words be there added," put, and agreed to.

MR. HEALY asked whether the Prime Minister would allow an addition to the Amendment in order to define a home farm as consisting partly of tillage and partly of pasturage?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he did not think it necessary to insert an explanation of a phrase that he had no doubt of the meaning of.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY suggested that in the House of Lords the Government might insert the words "for mixed agriculture."

Amendment, as amended, put.

Question put,

"That the words 'where it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Court that the landlord desires to resume the holding for the bona fide purpose of occupying the same as a residence for himself or as a home farm in connection with his residence, or for the purpose of providing a residence for some member of his family, the Court may authorise him to resume the same accordingly, in the manner and on the terms provided by the fifth section of this Act with respect to resumption of a holding by a landlord: Provided always, That if the holding so resumed shall be at any time within fifteen years after such resumption relet to a tenant, the same shall be subject, from and after the time of its being so relet, to all the provisions of this Act which are applicable to present tenancies,' be there inserted."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

Amendment in page 16, line 24, to leave out lines 24 to 36, the next Amendment, read a second time.

MR. GLADSTONE moved that the House disagree with the Amendment. The question to which it related had been very largely considered in that House, and it was a simple one. He would not repeat the argument, but would only indicate what the question was. The general law was sufficient to deal with cases of fraud in regard to leases. A case came before them, however, which was not a case of fraud, but a peculiar case arising under the Act of 1870. By that Act they gave inducements to tenants and landlords to enter into leases, on the supposition entertained by the Legislature that these powers would be used in the spirit in which they were given. It had, however, been proved that in certain cases they were not so used; and, consequently, the Government proposed to extend that principle of the law which quashed a lease in case of fraud to cases where leases had been made according to the terms of that portion of the clause which the Lords had struck out. The first of those conditions was where a lease had been procured by the threat of the landlord, or undue influence; and the second condition was that the terms of the lease so procured were, at the time of such acceptance, unreasonable or unfair to the tenant. These were the points which the Government proposed to support, so as to give the Court in such cases the power of quashing the lease.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he hoped it would not be necessary to renew the discussion upon this matter; but, at the same time, it would be necessary for him and his hon. Friends to protest against the re-introduction of the words which the Lords had struck out, and to which they objected when originally inserted. Nobody could desire to support any case of unjust or unreasonably pressure by a landlord; but if it were proposed to deal with such a case by the ordinary principles of equity the difficulty would not arise. They must adhere to their views as expressed in Committee, and oppose the Motion.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 247; Noes 118: Majority 134.—(Div. List, No. 378.)

On the Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND, the following Lords' Amendment was agreed to. After Clause 22, insert Clause (C):—

(Power to limited owner to sell holding and leave one-fourth of price of holding on mortgage.)

"A landlord of a holding, being a limited owner as defined by the twenty-sixth section of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, may by agreement, subject to the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts (except so much of the same as relates to the purchase of lands otherwise than by agreement), sell and convey such holding to the tenant, and may exercise to the same extent as if he were an absolute owner the power of permitting any sum not exceeding one fourth in amount of the price which the tenant may pay as purchase money, to remain as a charge upon such holding secured by a mortgage, and in case of any advance being made by the Land Commission under the provisions of this Act to the tenant for the purchase of such holding, any such mortgage shall be subject to any charge in favour of the Land Commission for securing such advance, and any such mortgage and the principal moneys secured thereby shall be deemed to be part of the purchase money or compensation payable in respect of the purchase of such holding, and shall be dealt with accordingly in manner provided by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts; and in the construction of the said Acts for the purposes of this section the expression 'the Special Act' shall be construed to mean this Act, and the expression 'the promoters of the undertaking' shall be construed to mean the tenant."

Page 19, line 12, leave out from ("who") to ("pay") in line 14, the next Amendment, read a second time.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he would propose certain words which would substitute for the removal of the condition of three-fourths a relaxation of that condition. He would read the words shortly. He could not propose this Amendment without stating that he regarded the Lords' Amendment, on a ground apart from the merits of the Amendment, with very great jealousy indeed as an act done by the House of Lords. He could not presume to blame them; but he must say he looked with great jealousy upon an act done by the House of Lords which derogated very considerably from the exclusive privilege of the House of Commons with regard to the expenditure of public money. Still, as he understood the authorities of the House were not prepared to say that the Amendment was beyond their powers, it was their duty to deal with it equitably upon the merits. As the House of Lords had struck out the limitation of three-fourths, the effect was to leave the amount of money to be expended entirely at the discretion of the Commissioners. The Government were not prepared to place the strings of the public purse in the hands of the Commission in that way. A point was raised which seemed to have some reason in it. It was said that there might be cases of villages or estates where it was hardly to be expected or desired that many of the villagers should become purchasers of their holdings. This was a matter in which the discretion of the responsible Government might fairly be introduced. He therefore proposed to restore the three-fourths limitation, and to add the words—

"The condition as to three-fourths of the number of tenants may be relaxed on special grounds with the consent of the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, but so that in no case less than half the number of tenants shall be able and willing to purchase."

Lords' Amendment disagreed to; Amendment (Mr. Gladstone) agreed to.

Page 24, line 25, after ("any") insert ("state or colony or"), the next Amendment, agreed to.

Page 25, leave out subsections (1) and (2) of Clause 31,—the next Amendment, disagreed to.

The following Amendments were agreed to :—

("All three commissioners sitting together, except in the case of the illness or unavoidable absence of any one commissioner, when any such case may be heard by two commissioners sitting together; provided that neither of such two commissioners be the commissioner before whom the case was originally heard.")

Line 21, leave out ("number of.") Transpose Clauses 44 and 45.

Page 31, line 1, after ("may") insert—

("In case it thinks fit, permit any party aggrieved by the decision of the Land Commission in any proceedings to appeal in respect of any matter arising in such proceedings to Her Majesty's Court of Appeal in Ireland, and may.")

—the next Amendment, read a second time.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) moved that the Amendment be disagreed to.

MR. GIBSON expressed his surprise at the Government proposing to disagree with so reasonable and just a provision, especially as he understood it was accepted by the Representatives of the Government in the other House.

Lords' Amendment disagreed to.

Page 31, line 7, after ("such") insert ("matter or"), the next Amendment, disagreed to.

The following Amendments were agreed to :—

judice to the validity of any proceedings which may in the meantime have been taken under the same.")

Page 34, Transpose Clause 53 to follow Clause 56.

("Where the tenant sublets part of his holding with the consent of his landlord, he shall, notwithstanding such subletting, be deemed, for the purposes of this Act, to be still in occupation of the holding"),

—the next Amendment, read a second time.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) moved that the House do agree with the Lords' Amendment.

Lords' Amendment agreed to.

Page 37, line 31, leave out from ("Act") to ("and") in line 34, the next Amendment, disagreed to.

Page 38, line 4, leave out from ("which") to the end of the paragraph, and insert—

At the end of Clause 56 add as a new sub section—

(9.) "Any 'glebe' as defined by the Act of thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth Victoria, chapter forty-two, which now is or hereafter shall be held or occupied by any 'ecclesiastical persons' as by the same Act defined, and no such ecclesiastical person shall in respect of such 'glebe' be entitled to make any claim for compensation under any of the provisions of 'The Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870,' or of this Act,"

—the next Amendment, agreed to.

Amendment in page 39, to leave out lines 22 to 30, the next Amendment, read a second time.

[Third Night.]

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) moved that the House disagree with the Amendment. He also proposed to amend the original provision of the Bill by extending it to all legal proceedings on the understanding that the Court should only act upon it in cases in which there would be a probability that the judicial rent would be fixed within a reasonable time—say, three months. He proposed to disagree with the Lords' Amendment, which struck out the clause altogether, and then he would move to amend the clause by the insertion of words which would provide that the Court, if satisfied that the judicial rent would be fixed in a reasonable time, not exceeding three calendar months, should make an order to stay execution until the termination of proceedings for fixing the judicial rent. He now, therefore, in the first place, moved that the House disagree with the Lords in their Amendment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the said proposed Amendment."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

MR. GIBSON said, the history of the clause was rather peculiar. The clause itself was not included in the original proposals of the Government, nor was it hinted at even in the most enigmatical form by the Prime Minister on the second reading, nor was it suggested in the lengthened discussions which took place in Committee, or mentioned in any stage of the Report up to the last day. It was then that the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) got up and proposed it, and the hon. Member certainly appeared to have some confidence that it would be accepted—because, in a very marvellous way, and with remarkable rapidity, it was accepted by Her Majesty's Government. There was, however, this extraordinary incident. The Prime Minister stated that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland would later on, if the matter were postponed, make himself answerable for the Amendment that would be proposed. But when they came to the clause that was not done; but the hon. Member for the City of Cork proposed words that were agreeable to the Government. Thus, in reality, it was an Amendment arranged between the hon. Member for the City of Cork and the Government. [Mr. GLADSTONE: In the House.] He did not think the Prime Minister would question the accuracy of what he was now stating. This occurred, not at an early stage of the Report, but at the very last stage. And what was now the character of the change proposed? It was a change which affected every creditor of every tenant in Ireland, introduced into an Act of Parliament which purported only to deal with landlords and tenants in relation to land and rent, and it was done without notice to any one of the parties who were affected by the transaction. This was a very serious change; and although the matter had been discussed in the other House, he could not say it was argued, and certainly it was not defended by the Government in that House. The Government ought, if they then intended to expand or alter their Amendment, to have given some intimation in the House of Lords of what they were going to do. But now, at the present stage, without notice, the Government sought to affect another class who had by bankruptcy taken proceedings against the property of the tenant. If the Government now intended to interfere with the action of a creditor who had by his activity obtained a right of proceeding in bankruptcy, why did they not give an earlier intimation of their intention? He wished to know what was the justification for the clause at all in its present shape, and why it had been introduced? Was it not a mere afterthought to endeavour to pacify the hon. Member for the City of Cork? To use a common but familiar expression, was it not an endeavour to "square" the Land League. They all knew that one of the most frequent utterances in reference to the Bill had been that if it passed no rent need be paid until a judicial rent was fixed, and this clause would be pointed out as the machinery by which that result would be accomplished. Was it reasonable that in an Act which purported only to regulate the acts of a landlord and tenant in reference to land to interfere with the action of a creditor? In the first instance it was proposed that the clause should apply to the landlord only, other creditors being left free. It was then extended to all creditors; and he ventured to think that the further expansion it had received was one that would not stand the test of argument. The last proposal was to extend the clause to proceedings in bankruptcy, and what would be the result? If a tenant became bankrupt his interest in the farm passed to his assignees; but the clause in the shape in which it now appeared would seem to regard only the tenant's interest. His right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General said the first Amendment was an Amendment in the substance of the clause and an amplification of it, but that the second Amendment was more or less of a formal or verbal character. In other words, in the process of giving "bit about," his right hon. and learned Friend proposed to give the substance to the hon. Member for the City of Cork, and then to add something else which should have the appearance of not going quite so far. His right hon. and learned Friend did not himself appear to think that the second Amendment amounted to very much. But if the Court did its duty it was, to a certain extent, a substantial change; and he should be glad to know if the Government would carry out their proposition as to putting in plain terms on the face of the Amendment that one of the conditions should be the payment of or security for the whole or such part of the debt as to the Court might seem just? It was only reasonable, when they arrested the action of a creditor who by his diligence had obtained judgment, and when they proposed to anticipate that diligence, that there should be a test of bond fides, so as to prevent any injustice being done, and that they should compel the debtor to give a guarantee of his bond fides and to pay the whole or such substantial part of the debt as to the Court might appear to be just. He believed that the proposal of the Government would do more to wreck the Bill for which they were responsible than anything else. The great rock ahead of the Bill, as everybody knew, was the danger of litigation. They were holding out a premium to litigation, which it would be nearly impossible for the tenants of Ireland to resist, because, whenever a tenant found himself in difficulties, and whenever a man had a judgment against him, his first step would be to tie up the hands of his creditor, by involving himself and his landlord in litigation. In other words, they did not allow the clause to operate, except where there was litigation; and the conditions they were imposing were conditions which might wreck, or seriously interfere with, the entire operation of the Bill. He could not avoid the suspicion that the course of the Government in reference to the clause had been considerably influenced by the earlier proceedings of the evening. He remembered when the clause originally came on that it was scarcely adopted or defended by the Government. The Prime Minister had nothing to say to it. He gave the ægis of his presence and the distinction of his silence to the transaction; but he (Mr. Gibson) thought he was justified in saying that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister left the difficult and ungrateful task of defending the proposal to the adroitness of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, because anything that could relieve the right hon. Gentleman of any of his difficulties in Ireland it would be more than human to expect the right hon. Gentleman to resist. Accordingly, if any course could be suggested to the right hon. Gentleman by which processes could be suspended during the remainder of the term of his Chief Secretaryship, he had very little doubt that the right hon. Gentleman—he would not say as a politician or as a statesman—would listen—he would be more than human if he did not—with a certain amount of sympathy to the proposal. That being the case, the Government had an active, an intelligent, and a silent majority to support them. [Ministerial cheers.] He admitted that occasionally the majority were not silent—that they applauded with great animation anything which indicated their extreme confidence in their Leaders. Now, a Liberal, speaking of a similar Conservative majority, would call it mechanical. But he never used hard names. He preferred to say that in the closing days of the Session the minority laboured under a difficulty to bring up their men, the only effect of their presence being to enable them to register a protest; while Her Majesty's Ministers were always able to overwhelm the Opposition by bringing up a compact body of enthusiastic supporters, ready at all times to show their allegiance to the Ministers of the day, and who, though not a mechanical, were certainly a devoted, majority.

[Third Night.]

MR. W. E. FORSTER (who was indistinctly heard): I must say a word on one or two of the remarks which have fallen from the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson). He has thought fit to make charges against Her Majesty's Government in which he has altogether misrepresented their intentions. I understood the right hon. and learned Gentleman to say that the acceptance by the Government of the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) was intended to "square" the Land League. I state again, as I said before, that we thought it would be an advantage in the case of a rack-renting landlord or an unfair creditor that he should not be able to prevent a tenant who was his debtor from obtaining the fixing of a fair rent before he was deprived of his holding. It was in order to guard against that danger, and to give full effect to the proceedings authorized under sub-section 3 of Clause 12, in the case of an ejectment directed by the County Court or one of the Superior Courts, that we accepted the Amendment. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, not content with making that charge, makes another—namely, that the Amendment, instead of having received due consideration, was adopted suddenly this evening, in defiance of what had passed in previous debates. Now, I really think that these charges are most unfair, and that it is hardly in accordance with the common conduct of Business on both sides of the House that that kind of charge should be made. We propose to deal with the question, because we really wish to enable the tenant to obtain a judicial rent, and we have accepted the Amendment in order that he shall obtain at once a limit of time within which the judicial rent shall be fixed. I trust that the House will be prepared now to arrive at a decision upon the question, as it has now been fully debated.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, he wished to point out to the Government that while he felt it to be quite unreasonable that the creditor should be obliged to wait for an indefinite time, to tie down the tenant to a period if three months and no more would on many cases preclude the tenant from obtaining that fair equity to which he was entitled. He thought the Government, in order to carry out their own views, should make the clause run in these terms—

"The Court should stay the proceedings for such reasonable period of time as, in the opinion of the Court, may enable the tenant, by due diligence on his part, to obtain from the Court a degree fixing the judicial rent."

He would not object to a provision requiring the tenant to exert himself in order to obtain a judicial rent, so that no delay should be occasioned by his inaction; but if the tenant did use due diligence, then he should not be prevented from obtaining the ear of the Court. Unless some such words as those he suggested were inserted, and if the hard-and-fast line of three months were adopted, the acceptance of the Amendment would really make it worth very little to the tenantry of Ireland. He quite agreed that the tenant should not be allowed to lie on his oars in order to defeat the creditor, but that he should exert himself in order to obtain the fixing of a judicial rent.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA (who spoke amid considerable interruption, which prevented many of his observations from being heard) was understood to say that the acceptance of a limit of three months would be most unsatisfactory to the Irish Members on that side of the House. The clause, as he regarded it, was intended to guard the tenant who had been suffering from rack rent, and who had paid a rack rent for a number of years, and had thereby become embarrassed in his circumstances, from being suddenly pounced upon by his landlord, and to enable him to set up his interest in the tenant right, in order to get a judicial rent fixed. It was quite obvious that the tenant's right should be fixed by a judicial rent, with a clear understanding as to whether he had been subjected to a rack rent or not. The right of the tenant should not be sold except under such circumstances as would enable the tenant to receive the full value of it.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 225; Noes 113: Majority 112.—(Div. List, No. 379.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) proposed to amend the original clause by the insertion of the word "proceedings" after "action" in two places.

Amendment agreed to.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) moved, in the words so restored, in page 29, line 26, after the word "pending," to insert the words—

"If satisfied that such judicial rent will be fixed within a reasonable time, not exceeding in any case three months."

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. PARNELL said, he was sorry that the Government had moved to fix a limit which, in his opinion, in a majority of cases, would render the clause practically useless and illusory. He agreed to the fullest extent that if the proceedings for fixing a judicial rent were to be indefinitely delayed, it would be unreasonable to ask the landlord or other creditor to wait for his money. But he would submit that, on the other hand, they should seek a mean in the matter, and instead of fixing a narrow limit of three months, which was much too small for the purpose in view, that they should leave the limit to the discretion of the Court. Under the clause, as it now stood, the Court was unduly fettered in a way that was open to much criticism, because it was provided in the Bill that the Court might stay the writ of execution until the termination of the proceedings to fix a judicial rent. That might be for a very long time, and he quite agreed that some incentive should be held out in the clause to hasten his proceedings, and to use all due diligence in order to obtain the fixing of the judicial rent. He might follow the analogy presented by the 12th clause—namely, that there should be no limit inserted whatever—because by the 12th clause they gave power to the Court to stay actions for ejectment for non-payment of rent, whereas by the present clause they sought now to prescribe a narrow limit of three months. What he wished chiefly to provide in this case was that where the tenant, owing to having got into difficulties, was unable to pay his rent, and applied to the Court to fix a judicial rent, with a view to being enabled to sell his interest in the holding, when that judicial rent was fixed the proceedings should be stayed, in order to enable him to realize his assets to the fullest extent, because it was manifest that until a judicial rent was ascertained it would be impossible for the tenant to know what to ask for his interest in the holding, or for a future buyer to know what to give him. He did not wish so much to protect the tenant who was able to pay his rent; but his only object was to protect the tenant who was unable to pay his rent, and to enable him to sell his interest—in point of fact, to prevent the sale of his interest by the landlord, for arrears of rent, until the nature of the tenant's assets should have been fixed by the Court. That was all he asked, and he submitted that with regard to proceedings of this character it was absurd to fix a limit of three months, which, in the very nature of the case, must be wholly inadequate. He admitted that in some cases three months would be amply sufficient; but he would leave it open to the Court to extend the time beyond three months, or even make it less than three months, if necessary. He asked the Government, instead of hampering the Court with a limit, to agree to an Amendment which he proposed to move later down in the clause, and which, although of a simple character, would, he thought, meet all the circumstances of the cases. He would propose, after the word "conditions," in line 27, to add the words "and for such period." If some such Amendment were not adopted, the proposal of the Government would be worthless.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, the Amendment of his right hon. and learned Friend was to fix a limit of three months, and the conclusion the Government had arrived at was that it was only reasonable and right that there should be a limit of time, or otherwise considerable danger would be incurred. He would point out at once what the danger was. There could be no doubt that if they had a case in which a tenancy was about to be sold, it would be for the interest of the tenant, and of the creditor also, that a judicial rent should be fixed, and that the sale should be stayed for a reasonable time until the judicial rent was fixed. But if there was great delay in fixing a judicial rent, the advantage might be too dearly purchased, because it would be purchased at the risk of sacrificing the interests of the creditor.

[Third Night.]

There was, consequently, this great danger, that if they did not fix a limited period, they might commit injustice to the creditor by delaying to an indefinite time the payment of the money due; and next, that they would give an inducement to the tenants to go into Court to have a judicial rent fixed merely for the purpose of so filling the Court with applications that the proceedings of the Court would be necessarily delayed, and the creditor would be kept out of his money for an indefinite period. By allowing any delay in the sale until a judicial rent was fixed there would certainly be an inducement, by making a number of applications, to interpose an artificial delay between a debtor and his creditor, the real object being not to get a judicial rent fixed, but to delay the payment of debts. That, he thought, everyone would feel to be an injustice, and it was against such a danger that the Government were anxious to guard. For that reason, they had proposed a limit of three months.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN confessed that he was entirely taken by surprise to find the Government adhering to the hard-and-fast line of three months. The argument of the hon. and learned Solicitor General amounted to this—that if a tenant had made an application to the Court for the fixing of a fair rent, other persons might perhaps, without any privity on his part, crowd the Court with similar applications, and he was to suffer in consequence. He had never before heard such a doctrine laid down. What he contended for was the bond fides of the application, and if the tenant used due diligence, he did not see why he should be damnified. It was most unreasonable that the tenant should be injured for that which was no fault of his own. If the tenant had an equity, why should the Legislature deprive him of that equity for that which was no fault whatever on his part? In most cases a period of three months would afford abundance of time; but he contended that the question of the absolute limit was one which ought to be left to the discretion of the Court, which should have full power to take care that the tenant was not injured. The Irish Members were as anxious as anyone to checkmate and render impossible any trickery on the part of the tenant for the purpose of postponing a decision; but that would be effectually done by the clause without fixing a limit of three months. The Court should be allowed to judge whether the application was bond fide or not, and should be able to say to a tenant—"You have not used due diligence, and we will not even give you three months." Under these circumstances, he asked the Government not to adhere to the limit of three months, which might be made to work a most grievous injury to the tenant. This was the last Amendment that would come before the House of Commons, and he appealed to Her Majesty's Government not to let their last act in connection with the Bill—which he believed would be one of blessing to his countrymen—to be an ungracious one. He earnestly appealed to them not to let the last act of a four or five months' discussion be one of difference with the Irish Members, and he strongly entreated them to make the concession asked of them. He was not wedded to an exact phraseology of the clause; but he appealed simply for justice to the tenant, and he asked the Prime Minister to meet the Irish Members a little more reasonably in this matter than he had yet indicated.

MR. GRAY said, he thought the Amendment would be quite useless if the limit of three months were retained in it. He failed to see upon what principle the Government had arrived at the period of three months. He would take the instance referred to by the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that a number of applications might be made within a week of the passing of the Act for the fixing of a judicial rent; but had they any reason to believe that the Commission would be constituted, and in full working order, and capable of fixing judicial rents within three months of the passing of the Act? If not, the people who applied within a week of the passing of the Act would have their interests swept away, not on account of any fault of their own, or any negligence on their part, but because the Commission had not been able to get itself into working order within the time named by the right hon. and learned Gentleman himself. If they proposed any limitation, based on the default of the tenant, in any shape or form, that would be perfectly right; but they proposed a limitation, and gave the tenant no means whatever of escaping from it. He might use all due diligence; he might make his application on the very day after the Act passed; but, owing to some delay in a Governmental Department, or some other circumstance over which he had no control, the right which it was professed to give him would be taken away. The Bill, therefore, was only holding out hopes which might mislead him. It would be more straightforward to cancel the Amendment altogether than propose the clause in its present shape, because he believed the Court would be blocked by the number of applications which would be made to it. It would not be the Land Court which would have to decide the matter, but the Superior Courts of the country; and surely they could be trusted in such a case. If the anticipation of the right hon. and learned Gentleman were to come true, it would only show that every man who applied in this way would apply under the Act, and would facilitate the working of the Act by getting a judicial rent fixed. It was scarcely reasonable to assume that men would run the risk of having a higher than a judicial rent fixed for the purpose of escaping from a debt that they would be ultimately bound to pay. Unless some modification of the proposal of the Government were made, it would be better to cancel the Amendment altogether.

MR. DALY agreed with the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray) that the acceptance of the Amendment as it at present stood would not do good. To his mind, they should allow the Court, in extreme cases, where the tenant had made a bond fide application at the earliest possible time, and, through no fault of his own, had been unable to proceed to settle before three months, to permit proceedings to be taken. He would propose that the tenant should have six months allowed him; and they must bear in mind that by giving this time they would not be holding out any inducement to the tenants to cause delay, because the power of extending the time would be given to the Court. He would move that the word "six" be substituted for the word "three" in the proposed Amendment.

MR. GIVAN said, he thought the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) should be accepted. The practice of the County Court Judges was to hold their sittings quarterly, but not at even intervals of three months. The terms were at Hilary, Easter, Summer, and October, and the interval between the Summer and October terms was always four months—namely, from the 1st of June to the 1st of October. Therefore, supposing the tenant had to bring his action in the County Court, it might be impossible for him to have his rent fixed within the necessary three months. It would thus be evident that if the Commissioners adopted the same procedure as the County Court Judges with regard to the holding of Sessions, an injustice must fall on the tenant. He thought this hard-and-fast rule should not be adhered to by the Government, and he would strongly recommend the Prime Minister to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork.

MR. CALLAN said, the Government would relieve the minds of the people of Ireland, and at the same time get out of this difficulty, if they declared it to be their intention to appoint a large number of Assistant Commissioners to facilitate the progress of this business. That would satisfy a large number of gentlemen out in the Lobby who were anxious to get the appointments, as well as Members of the House and the Irish people generally.

MR. DALY rose to a point of Order. The Speaker did not seem to have caught the fact that he had moved an Amendment.

MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Member move an Amendment on this Amendment?

MR. DALY: Yes, if satisfied that such judicial rent would be fixed in a reasonable time "not exceeding three months." My Amendment is to leave out the word "three" and substitute the word "six."

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, by leaving out the word "three," and inserting the word "six,"—(Mr. Daly,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the word "three" stand part of the proposed Amendment."

MR. GLADSTONE: I cannot assent to the Amendment that has been moved. In this case it is said that it is hard a tenant should suffer in consequence of what might be the fault of others; but then it must be borne in mind that in certain quarters demands would be made not to pay the rent in consequence of the delay held out to them by this Amendment in regard to getting the judicial rent fixed. I cannot admit the danger will arise, on the other hand, in the degree which has been stated by some hon. Gentlemen opposite. The tenant would not go into Court were he afraid the rent would be raised, but only if he expected it would be lowered. In a great many cases, no doubt, he will go into Court expecting it to be lowered, when his expectations will not be realized. He may be tempted to go into Court simply because of the prospect held out to him by the judicial rent; but, on the other hand, the judicial rent may be something with which to satisfy the claims of his creditors. We agree in principle with the statement of the hon. Member for Cork City, that hardship to the landlords might result from the misjudgment of a great many tenants, when temptation was held out to them to apply for a judicial rent, in consequence of a certain amount of delay they may conceive they were likely to obtain. On this account we cannot agree to a prolongation of the term.

MR. O'DONNELL said, the right hon. Gentleman seemed to be seized with an inexplicable fear of the operations of his own Court. Suppose there was a certain temptation held out to some tenants, did not the Court hold out the temptation to the very worst class of landlords so to delay the progress of the suits for fixing a just rent that sufficient time and opportunity might not be afforded to the tenant to sell out? He thought there was just as much likelihood that injustice would be committed on the one side as on the other; and, in face of the certainty that great injustice would be done to many tenants if insufficient time were allowed them to prosecute their just claims, he could not see how the House could refuse the application of the Irish Members.

MR. DAWSON said, he did not think the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had answered the question put by the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Givan). It might be a legal point that the right hon. Gentleman could not answer; but, if that were so, the Attorney General was by his side, and through him he would be able to answer. It had been pointed out that for more than three months the Court might be prevented from going into a case. In answer to the hon. Member for Monaghan, the right hon. Gentleman surely should say that where four months elapsed the tenant should not lose all benefit of the clause.

MR. REDMOND said, the words "six months" followed the words "not exceeding." Therefore, it was a question in the discretion of the Court whether proceedings should be stayed for more than three months or less. The Amendment would not fix a hard-and-fast line.

Question put.

The House divided: — Ayes 223; Noes 65: Majority 158. — (Div. List, No. 380.)

Amendment again proposed to the words so restored,

In page 39, line 26, after the word "pending," to insert "if satisfied that such judicial rent will be fixed within a reasonable time, not exceeding in any case three months."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he thought he and his hon. Friends would not be discharging their duty if they allowed this clause, as amended, to be put without making a much more strenuous and serious and prolonged struggle. He scarcely could believe that the Government knew the meaning of their Amendment. According to sub-section 3 of Clause 12, a landlord who was proceeding by ejectment was bound to stay the proceedings until the termination of an application for the fixing of a judicial rent. There were two Courts—that to which the tenant could go for a judicial rent, and the Court to which application could be made to stay proceedings. How could the Court which was to stay proceedings have official knowledge of what had been done by the Court dealing with a judicial rent? He did not wish to offer any obstructive opposition, and, therefore, he would not move the adjournment of the debate, though he thought the importance of the question would have justified that course. He only desired to mark his sense of the action of the Government, and he hoped his hon. Friend would persist in his opposition until the Amendment was a little more amended.

Mr. Gladstone

MR. DAWSON said, he thought the Amendment a departure from Clause 12.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN complained that he and his hon. Friends had had no assistance in this matter from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), at whose instance the scope of this Amendment was enlarged on a former occasion. The Government proposed to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) as to the landlords, when the right hon. and learned Gentleman pointed out that it would be only half effectual as long as other creditors were allowed to proceed. For that service they would never cease to be grateful to the right hon. and learned Gentleman — [Laughter]—though they believed he had been taken to task by his own Friends. The credit was due to him, and not to the hon. Member for Cork. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) thought they had not fought the matter strenuously enough. He himself felt very strongly upon it, but he hoped at this stage they would not be wanting in dignity in their opposition.

MR. GIBSON said, he was delighted to get gratitude from any quarter of the House, but he must repudiate the smallest responsibility in this matter.

MR. O'DONNELL protested earnestly against the manner in which the Government had yielded to pressure—which could hardly be called worthy pressure—and had withdrawn the most just concession which they originally made. This limitation of three months would practically destroy the effect of the concession, and would render it purely nominal and nugatory; and the Government might as well understand from the Irish Party that they recognized what the Government had done, and that notwithstanding all the magnificent language of their supporters with regard to the rights of the people they had yielded on a matter of the first importance to the Irish people. It would be more manly to strike out the concession altogether, for it was perfectly worthless as it stood. It was only another proof that the Government had come to their conclusion without regard to the Party which represented the Irish tenantry; and he was sorry that a larger number of that Party did not feel that the first consideration on this matter was not exactly the dignity of the Government, but the necessary defence of the Irish tenantry. This was a sop to the noble incorrigibles and irreconcilables in “another place,” and to them the interests of the Irish people were being sacrificed.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 210; Noes 34: Majority 176.—(Div. List, No. 381.)

MR. PARNELL said, he had another Amendment to move, which would give the Government a last chance of acting in a straightforward manner—a manner which he begged to say they had not adopted in the way in which they had met the Amendments of the House of Lords. He thought it would have been far more straightforward if the Government had adopted the Lords' Amendments, rather than have sought to carry out the objects of the Lords in a disguised fashion. That was what had happened. The Government appeared to have been afraid to adopt the Amendments of the Lords in a straightforward fashion, and they had sought, in a roundabout way, and in a disguised fashion, to carry out the object of the Lords in the rejection of the last part of this clause. He thought, after the strong expression of opinion given by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, a different course might have been pursued. The provisions of the clause, as they stood, were at present not worth anything; and, for his part, he would prefer to see them cut out of the Bill altogether, than that it should be supposed that the Government had made any concession in the matter. The concession was perfectly worthless, and he made the Government a present of it. He begged to move, after the word “months,” to add the words—

“And if satisfied that, although such judicial rent cannot be fixed within such period of three months, said inability has arisen from no collusion or default on the part of the tenant, and that such rent can be fixed within any further reasonable period.”

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, he was reluctant to take part in any prolonged discussion of the Amendment; but he must point out that the advantages which the Government intended to give would be illusory. It was perfectly clear that upon a full consideration of the clause, as amended, it would be found that, in effect, it conferred no advantages upon the tenant at all. In the first place, he would remind the House that this was a question not of the Court absolutely saying that the proceedings should be stayed, but simply of giving to the Court a discretion as to the period during which the proceedings might be stayed. It must be recollected that already the Court might impose restrictions as to the limit of time, and certain other conditions, such as requiring security to be given, and so forth. The hon. Member for the county of Monaghan (Mr. Givan), who had himself had great practical experience, having himself been a practising solicitor in the Quarter Sessions Courts, had pointed out that it was utterly impossible, in the course of three months, to deal with the question of rent at all. But the application to stay proceedings was to be made to the Court in which the proceedings were pending, and that might be the Court of Quarter Sessions.

MR. GIBSON: No, my hon. and learned Friend is mistaken.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL: Why not?

MR. GIBSON: It must be made in one of the Superior Courts.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL believed that his right hon. and learned Friend was correct; but what was to be the judgment of the Court? It would not be a question of which the Court had any judicial cognizance. But, within very narrow limits, it would be called upon to exercise a judicial discretion with reference to what another Court, of which they knew nothing, might do as to the fixing of a judicial rent. He would point out that a close analogy prevailed between Section 13 of the Bill, as it was returned from the House of Lords, and Section 12, as it was sent up by the House of Commons, and the present section in regard to the question of staying the proceedings. For all practical purposes, there was a true and close analogy between the two cases. Section 13 dealt with the question of proceedings in an ejectment for the recovery of possession of a holding, and it provided that the Court should have power to stay the proceedings in ejectment at its discretion, and on such terms and conditions as it might think right to impose, until the judicial rent should be determined. What was the subject-matter of the present section? It was a proceeding, not in a matter of ejectment, but under a fi fa, in compliance with the judgment of a Superior Court. It sought to realize the judgment by the sale of the tenant's interest in the holding, which would be just as effectual, so far as the tenant was concerned, as an ejectment, or even more so, because in the one case there would be a period of six months for redemption, whereas in the other the period was to be for the discretion of the Court to determine. Why a hard-and-fast line of three months should be now drawn, he was at a loss to imagine. He fully admitted that the Bill, as it stood, was a valuable Bill in the interests of the tenant; but it also gave full security to the landlord whenever the tenant's interest was sold. By Clause 1, in sub-section 16, every charge and claim the landlord had for rent, or damage, or breach of contract, was made a first charge upon the proceeds of the sale. He was exceedingly sorry that this matter had not been thought out more carefully by the Government in order to see what the result would be, and he was afraid that the clause very much diminished the advantages which the Bill professed to give.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) remarked, that his hon. and learned Friend was very much mistaken in the inference he had drawn that the question had not been carefully considered by the Government. It had, indeed, been very carefully considered. But it must be recollected that there might be a creditor who was not the landlord, and who had no connection with the landlord—an ordinary creditor who simply wanted his money. The debtor who owed the money found himself unable to discharge the debt, and if the creditor obtained judgment, an execution might sweep away all the debtor's chattels without affecting the tenancy at all. His hon. Friend the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Givan) stated that the Sessions only sat at particular seasons of the year, with an interval in one season of four months, and contended that the limitation it was proposed to fix in the clause would render it valueless, because three months would not bring them to anything like the time of the Court's sitting. But the question was not one between a July and an October Sessions; and the difficulty suggested did not, in fact, arise at all. The argument of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell) pointed to an application to a Superior Court in which a case was pending, and his hon. and learned Friend asked—"What can the Court know as to what is going on in the Inferior Court, by which the judicial rent is to be fixed?" He presumed the Superior Court would act upon sworn evidence, and would have full capacity to form a judgment as to what amount of judicial rent would be fixed; at any rate, that was a difficulty which must be encountered in any form of the clause. Therefore, he did not see that there was much force in the argument of his hon. and learned Friend, and they must trust that the Court, instead of knowing nothing of the merits of the case, would be supplied with full information. His hon. and learned Friend however, in the same breath, asked that the Court above should be capable of extending the period of time as long as it deemed reasonable; but, according to the argument of his hon. and learned Friend, he (the Attorney General for Ireland) did not see how the Court could measure the reasonableness of the application if it was true, as his hon. and learned Friend alleged, that it could know nothing about the merits of the case. There was no analogy between a case where the tenant had prima facie a right to have a judicial rent fixed and to claim a statutory term, and in which the landlord, nevertheless, desired to take possession of the holding, and the case of an outside creditor who simply required to recover a debt—a shopkeeper, for instance. It would be unfair to ask such a creditor to postpone his rights indefinitely. The Government thought that three months would be a reasonable time. In the first place, they had made provision to protect the interest of the tenant, and now they felt they were bound also to guard the interests and rights of outside creditors. Under these circumstances, Her Majesty's Government were unable to accept the Amendment.

MR. CALLAN said, he was sorry that the right hon. and learned Attorney General, who appeared to have listened attentively to the speeches of the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Givan) and the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell), had not paid the same attention to the Amendment itself, which said that it should be through no default of the tenant that the inability had arisen. It might be through the default of the Government. Suppose, for instance, that there was a dispute between the Irish Office and the Treasury upon such a question as that of salaries, and the Commission found itself unable to get into working order. The House had no assurance yet as to when the Commissioners would be appointed and be able to proceed with the work. All they knew was that the Commissioners were to be appointed before the end of the year, and long before the month of November there might be applications to the Court to fix a judicial rent. He considered the Bill, as a whole, a grand measure; but this Amendment of the Government made the clause nothing better than a miserable sham.

MR. DALY said, it was in the interest of the creditors, other than the landlord, that the Amendment proposed by his hon. Colleague (Mr. Parnell) should be adopted. If a shopkeeper or a trader of any kind could not get what was due to him by the tenant, he could not sell the property of the tenant if there was rent due to the landlord. A man had a right to claim a judicial rent for his holding; but it was proper that the suggestion of his hon. Friend should be accepted, because it enabled, within reasonable limits, and subject always to the judgment of the Court, the assets realizable by the tenant to be appropriated for the benefit of the whole of the tenant. The Amendment of the hon. Gentleman did bona fide justice to all parties, and the position taken by the Government in regard to it was untenable from beginning to end. He trusted the small modicum of justice contained in the Amendment would not be denied the Irish people.

MR. STOREY said, the aspect of the two Front Benches did not hold out to them much prospect of justice being done in this matter. What was meant by the emptiness of the Opposition Front Bench? Right hon. Gentlemen who usually occupied that Bench recognized that the Amendment which had been put into the clause by the Members of the Government was an Amendment which, practically, carried out all they desired. He held some old-fashioned notions against interfering with the bond fide collection of honest debts, and therefore he did not disagree with the Lords' Amendment so far as ordinary traders were concerned; but the section of the clause which was put in at the instance of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) was not meant by him to have relation to the ordinary creditor, but to deal with the landlord—it was against the landlord it was mainly directed, and very properly so. The ordinary creditors had no object in forcing on actions against the tenant so as to evict them; their interest, on the contrary, rested in waiting until the debt could be paid. But the object of the landlords, or the object of certain landlords at any rate, was to use the powers of the Bill in a way that would rid them of their tenants. The Government recognized this, and in Clause 12 they provided against it. Why did the Government do that? Because they recognized that the object of the landlord, although ostensibly to get his rent, was really to get rid of the tenant and get hold of the farm. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland would not deny that this was the case, because, when it was pointed out by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) that he had not provided for all the methods the landlord might adopt to get rid of the tenant, he frankly admitted he thought they had done so, and said if they had not they would immediately accept the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman, in order to shut all the doors by which a landlord might, while ostensibly seeking to get his rent, clear his estate. What was the position now? Under Clause 12, which the Chief Secretary for Ireland had thought covered all the possible chances of the landlord clearing the tenants from their holdings, the Court had power to suspend the action of the landlord until the statutory term and judicial rent were fixed. What did the hon. Member for the City of Cork ask? Simply this—that if the landlord, instead of taking the front-door, should take the back-door, which the Chief Secretary for Ireland had forgotten altogether—if the landlord used the back-way for the purpose of effecting his object, the Government should place the same difficulties in his way. The Government could not defend the position they assumed. The Attorney General for Ireland did not defend it; and if any hon. Gentleman was so disposed, he (Mr. Storey) would ask him what answer could be made to his contention that, if it was fair and just to prevent a landlord from clearing his estate in one way, it was equally just and right to beset him with obstacles if he adopted another mode of securing the same end? He had been a pretty steady supporter of the Government throughout all the discussions of the Bill; but while it had been his duty on some occasions to vote against the Government and in favour of widening the scope of the measure, he must recognize the general and conspicuous fairness with which the objections raised by the Members from Ireland had been met by the Occupants of the Treasury Bench. He appealed to them not to commit a lasting injustice to-night. If they did not accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork, they would allow the Bill to pass with a manifest injustice upon the face of it, because, under one of its clauses, Irish landlords might achieve an object which the majority of the House did not desire to see accomplished—namely, the clearing of estates.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would not go over the arguments advanced by his hon. Friend (Mr. Storey). Ordinary creditors were not in the same position as the landlord, and the Government had endeavoured to meet their case as far as they could.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN shared the opinion of the hon. Member (Mr. Storey), that the satisfaction of the Front Opposition Bench in this matter was evident. They had gone to bed, leaving Her Majesty's Ministers to look after their interests; they had departed, leaving the worthy Alderman (Mr. R. N. Fowler) in charge. He was sorry the Government had made up their minds not to yield on this occasion, because he felt that the operation of the clause would be in many cases to defeat the equities of the Irish tenant.

MR. O'DONNELL said, the Government affected very deep interest for the general creditors of the Irish tenant. Too much stress could not be laid on the fact that, in placing in the hands of the landlords the power of turning out the tenant before the Court had an opportunity of fixing the judicial rent, the

Mr. Storey

Government, while imagining they were supporting the rights of the creditors in general, were really sacrificing those rights. As the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) had pointed out, it was not to the interest of ordinary creditors to force the property of the tenant into the market. The moment a judicial rent was fixed upon the over-rented holdings the tenant right would go up immediately, and the assets with which the claims of the general creditors would be satisfied would be increased. It was to the interest of the general creditor to give ample time in which the tenant could meet his debts, while it was to the interest of the grasping landlord to sell out the tenant and get the property finally and entirely into his own hands. The Government had entirely forgotten that such was the misery of Irish tenants that they had had to introduce in the Bill a clause facilitating the payment of arrears. Was it not the fact that there were some 250,000 tenants in Ireland so hopelessly in arrear, owing to the recent bad seasons, that if the full force of the law were used against them they must completely fail to pay their debts, and that they would consequently be exposed to be turned out under the operation of the clause, as it had now been transformed by Her Majesty's Government? Did they not know that the landlord party regarded this Bill as the commencement of a new era of just rents, and therefore, practically, the death of landlordism in Ireland? Was it not a fact that from the time this Bill came into operation the landlords in Ireland would be practically little more than rent-chargers on their estates? When the tenants had their rights, the power of the landlords over their estates, as they and their forefathers had understood it for generations, would be gone for ever. This was their last chance, and they had a perfect right to do all in their power to protect their interests. If they did not take advantage of this opportunity, it would be their own loss, for they would never have such another. Did hon. Members not know that the landlords had a powerful organization, and that hundreds and thousands of pounds had been subscribed for the purpose of furthering the objects of the Emergency Committee. And was it not equally well known that this Committee had shown great energy whilst working even in the face of that larger organization the Land League? Did they not know that more money would be subscribed for the purpose of obtaining writs against tenants in arrear who were unable to pay their debts? Did they not know that from one end of Ireland to another tens of thousands of the tenants of Ireland were menaced by the substitution of this clause for that to which the Government originally pledged themselves to complete and final exclusion, not only from the benefits of the Bill, but from the very possession of their holdings? Under this clause, which the weakness and foolishness and reversal of good faith of the Government were now forcing on the Irish Members and the Irish people, all the good which would be effected by the rest of the Bill would be undone. As the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) had said, what was the use of shutting up the front door by which the landlord could get into possession of the tenant's property, if they left open the side-door and the back-door through which he could just as easily enter? It was true that until recently the landlords were not disposed to make use of the writ of fi fa against the tenants, and had preferred to act on writs of ejectment. The Courts, however, were of opinion that actions for ejectment should be stayed until the Bill had had a fair opportunity of working; but that only threw back the whole landlord body on the other alternative—one which was still more efficient than action for ejectment would be under ordinary circumstances. Of course, applications for writs of fi fa would be carried into the Superior Courts. Of course, the landlords would not allow themselves to be robbed, as they, from their point of view, believed they were being robbed, under the remedial Bill of the Government. They would use every legal means in their power to protect themselves; and why should they not? They would use writs of fi fa to clear the tenants off the land before there had been a legal rent fixed, and before the assets of the tenant had risen in value—before it would be incumbent on the landlord, before he could clear out the tenant, to pay a very heavy price indeed for the goodwill of his farm. It would be the worst landlords who would be benefitted by the opportunity the Government offered them. The bad landlords, who had reduced the tenant right on their estates to a merely nominal value—who had reduced the tenant's right to zero—would be the persons who would enter without any trouble under a writ of fi fa on the tenant's property. The tenant's assets would be so small that they would be all swallowed up; but it would be quite different if they gave the tenant time to acquire a sound and solid position under the Bill. They must take all these circumstances into consideration—that this was the last chance of the landlords; that many of them were, from their point of view, justly irritated, believing that they recognized in the measure the final extinction of proprietorial rights, as they had enjoyed them for generations, and that the landlords considered that they owed less than nothing to the existing tenants, and that they had been most unjustly treated by the tenants and the tenants' organization. He did not enter into the landlord's point of view; but it was notorious in the House that the proprietorial classes did entertain this view as to the tenants and the tenants' organization. It would be seen, then, that the landlords must use the opportunity afforded by the Government in lieu of all the other opportunities taken away from them. It was, he maintained, simply useless and futile to close against the landlords two or three doors when they left open others through which the whole party could advance with perfect security.

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out that the hon. Member is using precisely the same arguments over and over again, and that he is, therefore, trifling with the House.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he had no wish to trifle with the House, but only desired to make good the charge that Her Majesty's Government were trifling with the Irish tenantry. He was defending the interests of his own people, which were threatened with serious injury through the feebleness and weakness and breaking of faith Her Majesty's Government had been guilty of. He and his Friends had been sent there to defend the interests of the Irish people. Only a few days ago they left these interests, with confidence, in the hands of Her Majesty's Government; but that confidence had been betrayed, and the Government had handed over the Irish people, under cover of a most illusory and worthless Amendment, to their greatest enemy. He did not believe—he did not wish to believe—that the Prime Minister had fully realized the importance of his action. The right hon. Gentleman had not seen the importance of the point—he had never discovered it himself—and it required the Irish Party—the Leader of the Irish Party—to point out this vast gap in the Bill. He (Mr. O'Donnell) believed that at the time the right hon. Gentleman left the House he did not see this gap. The right hon. Gentleman had gone away, and, seemingly, had left no power of altering or accepting any proposal. It would, therefore, be advisable, under the circumstances, for them to adjourn the debate to give the Cabinet an opportunity of meeting to consider the question. The Cabinet would find itself face to face with a question the magnitude of which they did not yet realize; and it seemed to him that it would be much better, instead of taking part in a discussion without having any power to accept Amendments or alter the policy of the Prime Minister, to adjourn the debate in order to have an opportunity of considering this grave issue which they provoked, and in the face of which they—the Irish Members—dared not refuse to do their duty. No Irish Member would falter on this point. None of them would be able to face their constituents unless they made the most strenuous opposition to the treacherous conduct of the Government.

MR. DAWSON said, the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law) had tried to trace an analogy where none existed, and had denied another analogy which was patent to all. The value of chattels might be easily ascertained, and the goods sold; but this was not the case with a tenancy. There was no analogy between the two kinds of property; but the right hon. and learned Gentleman had denied an analogy between the clause and the provision it was now sought to pass, which analogy was palpable. They prevented during the trial of the value of a tenancy the landlord, or anyone else, from coming in to determine that tenancy. They made them wait for the decision of the Court; but in this provision they opened a retreat—they put into the cup—as they always did when they gave anything to Ireland —something which poisoned all. They always left something to poison the message of peace they sent to Ireland. The principle of give and take which was now being practised was not creditable to this great Government. First they gave a thing to Ireland and then they took it back. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright) had on one occasion condemned this practice, declaring that there was nothing which so much offended the people as taking back with one hand what they had given with the other. Did the Government think they had a right to practice this upon Ireland when they knew, on the authority of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, that it would not be submitted to in England? They had expected from the other House a meddling with the Bill, a deterioration of its principles, and a want of appreciation of its effects; but they had not expected it from the Prime Minister and the Occupants of the front Ministerial Bench. The Bill as originally framed would have brought about a great revolution, and after it had been amended in the House of Commons it would have brought about a still greater and more beneficial revolution; and he was very sorry that at the last hour they should advise the opening of a door through which the landlords would escape in crowds.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, this was another specimen of that which had been called putting down the foot on the part of the Government. Let it be known, therefore, that they were putting the foot down upon Irish opinion—upon the Irish people. Let it be considered how Irish opinion had been declared on this subject to-night—how the Irish Members had acted and voted. It would be found that the Irish Members were almost unanimously opposed to the clause brought forward by the Prime Minister. He (Mr. T. D. Sullivan) was very sorry that such a large measure as this should have such a nasty ending. The head and body of this Bill might be the head and body of a lion, but the Government were now attaching to the carcase a very ridiculous caudal appendage. He should call it the tail of a little cur, only that there was a sting in it which was a thing not to be found in the tail of a puppy. This clause went far towards marring the efficacy of the whole measure. It struck down the hopes of the Irish people, and it would go a great way in the future towards creating, not peace and contentment, but disappointment and strife. It was for these strong and sufficient reasons that they (the Irish Members) at this late hour of the night, and at the very end of this important measure, took the stand they were now taking. It was for no light consideration that the Irish Members were adopting their present course. It was from no wish to delay other Business—[“Oh!”] No; it was nothing of the kind. It was no pleasure to the Irish Members to prolong these discussions. It was no pleasure to them to sit up until a late hour putting forward opinions which they knew were not agreeable to Members of the House. But they were acting here under a strong sense of duty and of the obligations imposed on them, and with the knowledge that behind them was Ireland, who was watching the fate of this measure with great anxiety, and who would murmur very loudly if this mischievous addendum were allowed to be put at the end of the Bill. And if this measure was intended to be, as it no doubt was intended to be, a message of peace to Ireland, what a pity it was that, at the very last moment, this declaration of war should be put into the very last words of the measure. He believed that if the Prime Minister had heard the arguments against the Amendment he would have given way, or made some concession. On many occasions during the discussion of this Bill the Prime Minister had weighed and considered arguments which were put before him, and he did not think it unreasonable to suppose that he would have impartially given his mind to the arguments against this Amendment. He thought it would be only fair to the Prime Minister, fair to the measure, and fair to the Irish nation, that the Prime Minister should have an opportunity of hearing the arguments; and for that reason he would move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Debate be now adjourned.”
—(Mr T. D. Sullivan.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I cannot for a moment assent to the Motion. The hon. Member wishes to give the Prime Minister an opportunity again to consider this matter. The Prime Minister has considered it. The arguments have been already stated, and he answered them in one of the speeches he made. But I must bring before the House that the question of adjournment to-night is not a mere question of the convenience of this House or of Members at this late period of the Session. It is a matter of critical importance to the fate of this Bill. If we adjourn now, I am not going beyond the truth in saying that the Bill will be endangered, and I must call upon hon. Members who wish to make the Bill secure to support us in getting through the Bill to-night.

[Third Night.]

MR. STOREY said, he thought that if the Government were now in a little difficulty they had themselves to blame. He was so new a Member that he did not expect that the Chief Secretary would answer his arguments; but he did expect that he or someone else would have answered the arguments of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell) and others. He was not so foolish as to think that the Chief Secretary had attempted to answer what he had said; but he thought that if the right hon. Gentleman had shown more courtesy, and had taken the trouble to answer him, the House would have been nearer the end of the matter than they now were. What had the Government done? They had not attempted to answer the arguments; they had simply said—"We cannot agree." Well, that was not the way to get anything settled in this House, or anywhere else. He would not address the Chief Secretary again; but he would put to the Attorney General for Ireland, whose courtesy he was willing to admit, a consideration which weighed with him at present sufficiently to induce him to vote against the Government. Was it not his purpose in Clause 12 to prevent the landlord from taking advantage of the Bill in order to resume possession of his holding during the six months? Hon. Gentlemen might complain of his reading that clause, but they had probably never read it themselves; and, as a Radical Member, he would take the liberty of saying that some hon. Gentlemen had told him they had never read the Bill.

Mr. W. E. Forster

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Member that the adjournment is the Question before the House.

MR. STOREY said, he was about to read that portion of the clause to which he was referring. It read thus—

"Where any proceedings for compelling the tenant of a present tenancy to quit his holding shall have taken place before or after an application to fix a judicial rent and shall be pending before such application is disposed of, the Court before which such proceedings are pending shall have power, on such terms and conditions as the Court may direct, to postpone or suspend such proceedings until the termination of the proceedings on the application for such judicial rent."

He would ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether the purpose of that was not to prevent the landlord from taking advantage of the Bill to get possession of his holding and clear the tenant off? [THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW): Yes.] Well, it was now simply asked that the Court should have the same power if the landlord proceeded by action to recover his rent. At the present moment, if three months and a day had elapsed the landlord could proceed with his action and get a judgment, clear the tenant off the land and resume possession—the very thing that hon. Members from Ireland and he himself did not want to see. Why, if the Court had power in the one case, under Clause 12, to suspend the action of the landlord, should the Court not have the same power in a precisely similar case under the last clause? The right hon. and learned Gentleman said there were other people to consider besides the landlords—there were the other creditors. He was willing to admit that; but he was now dealing with the landlords. Did not the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree that the creditors had no interest to press the tenant; but the landlord had? If a landlord wanted to get possession of his holding, he had an interest to press the tenant, and to take advantage of the law. That being so, so far as the landlord was concerned, why, if the Court was to have power to suspend the action of the landlord in the one case, should it not have power to suspend his action in the other case under the last clause? If he could get a satisfactory answer to that, he should be content.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he would endeavour to answer the question, though he thought that he had already done so. In this particular clause it was proposed to stay the proceedings of any creditor—not the landlord merely, but every creditor—but the rights of an ordinary creditor could not be interfered with beyond a certain point without gross injustice. The landlord could not be dealt with alone, because then the other creditors would come in and sweep everything away. Therefore, in this matter of restricting the execution of a writ under the order of the Court, it was necessary to make provision for the protection of all parties who might be concerned. It by no means followed that the execution creditor, be he landlord or merchant, derived any advantage, beyond getting perhaps the amount of his debt. The landlord, like any other execution creditor, might no doubt buy the farm, and if he did the tenancy would be at an end. But if any ordinary creditor or other person than the landlord bought the holding, such person would be a present tenant.

MR. STOREY said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had not answered one point.

MR. SPEAKER: The Question before the House is the adjournment of the debate. The hon. Gentleman cannot enlarge upon the Main Question; and he is certainly not entitled to make a second speech.

MR. PARNELL said, he thought the excuse which the Government now made for not making this provision as large as the provision in the 12th clause was really no excuse at all. He did not ask that the other creditors should be given the advantage of this clause; that was a proposal which was interpolated at the suggestion of the Front Opposition Bench, and not by the Irish Members. They did not think there was any necessity for protecting the tenant against the other creditors, because the other creditors were not pressing the tenant. It was the landlord who pressed the tenant; but other creditors were not doing that in any excessive manner, and there was no reason why the clause should apply to other creditors. He should have been glad if a provision could have been introduced exempting the tenant from other creditors, and only referring to the landlord; and it was certainly rather hard and unfair on the part of the Government, who had themselves introduced this modification in the clause, to treat that as a reason for limiting it so injuriously and unjustly as to deprive it of all beneficial effect. He did think the request of the hon. Member (Mr. T. D. Sullivan) that the debate should be adjourned to see whether the Prime Minister would not consent to a modification in this respect was reasonable; and he did think the Chief Secretary had adopted a very exaggerated estimate of the matter when he said the Bill would be lost by the adjournment of the debate. None of them desired that the Bill should be lost; that would be a great calamity. But he was sure the right hon. Gentleman had exaggerated the danger. If the Government did not agree to what was asked, the landlords, undoubtedly, could if they pleased—he did not say they would, but a good many of them were pleasing at the present moment—in many cases, probably in thousands of cases, where the tenants were bond fide unable to pay their rent, ride a coach-and-four through this Bill, against the tenant whose interest was designedly so guarded by the 12th clause. Under these circumstances, were the Irish Members not justified, where an Amendment was introduced at the last moment into this saving clause upon which the interests of thousands of tenants were imperilled, and thousands might fail to get the benefit of the Bill—were they not justified in all fairness in asking that some further time should be given for the Prime Minister to consider the Amendment?

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR confessed that he would not proceed any further in hostility to this Bill, if the Chief Secretary's statement that it would be imperilled by another day's delay was well-founded; but the right hon. Gentleman had not given any reasons for the statement. He believed "another place" was supposed to be still sitting; but it was now 20 minutes to 3, and he thought it would be better to send the Members of "another place" home—

MR. SPEAKER: I must call upon the hon. Member to address himself to the House and to the Question.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he was endeavouring to show the relation between the present stage of this Bill and "another place," upon which the right hon. Gentleman founded his argument

[Third Night.]

It was a very small question in proportion to the size of the Bill; but it could not be called a small question, though it might appear so to persons ignorant of Ireland, that a provision should be passed which injuriously affected hundreds of thousands of people. To those people this was a question of life and death, and the Irish Members, as their Representatives, were bound to defend their interests persistently as long as they could. The point at issue between the Government and the Irish Members was this—the Irish Members wanted to have another day for the consideration of the Bill, but the Government refused to give a day, on the ground that it might imperil the passing of the measure. Why did they refuse to allow one day more for the discussion of a Bill which seriously affected the fate of 100,000 tenants? He had certainly failed to hear a single argument from the right hon. and learned Attorney General which was an effective reply to the speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey). The Government admitted that the tenant right might be destroyed by rack-renting, and they gave power to the tenant to go into Court in order to get rid of such rack rents. It was admitted that the tenant right in many districts, owing to the pressure of the times, had been brought down to zero. But in the face of the fact that the tenant right had been nearly destroyed by the existing distress, and that the farms were rack-rented, it was desired to force the tenant into the market with a tenant right that was unsaleable. When the Solicitor General for Ireland first heard of this Amendment, nothing could exceed the eulogium he passed upon it. The hon. and learned Gentleman declared that if some such provision were not passed the tenants would not start fair. That was the real question—whether the tenant was to start fair, or whether the landlords were to have an opportunity of making a clearance of a large number of them? He had sat up in that House all night for the sole purpose of obtaining from the Government another day for the discussion of a question which was really not of first-rate importance, and he had seen the Business of the country obstructed hour after hour on account of some petty dispute between the Treasury Bench and the Front Opposition Bench. Yet the Irish Members were blamed because they proposed to do the same thing in the interests of 100,000 tenants of Ireland who were demanding this concession. If they wished to discredit their Government, and to increase the suspicion with which it was regarded by a large section of the people in Ireland, they could not accomplish that object better than by the stubborn, surly, and impassioned opposition they were giving to this proposal.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he was not one of those who wanted to delay the progress of the Bill. He thought he had given a proof of his sincerity in that respect in having refrained from taking part in these discussions except on a very few occasions, and then in the briefest manner. His wish and desire were that the Bill should pass, and in the speediest manner possible. He should feel inclined to refrain from saying anything now, if it were not that he wanted to have it explained to the House by some other Member than the Chief Secretary for Ireland how the delay of another day in the consideration of the Bill must endanger its passing. Let them draw the reason from its mysterious darkness, and know what it was in clear and explicit terms. Was it supposed that some other body of persons—a body co-equal in every respect in the Legislature with the House of Commons—was it supposed that they would not remain one day longer in order to pass this great measure, and that if it were delayed for another 12 hours, out of petulance, they would say—"You have kept us so long, and we are so weary, that we will not pass your Bill at all." If the threat of the right hon. Gentleman did not mean this, what did it mean? What was the mysterious and fatal influence which was to be brought to bear in throwing out the Bill if the discussion of it were delayed for 12 hours longer? He doubted whether there could be any real danger of the kind; but, if there were, he would say—"Let the Bill go back to the Lords, even with the remarkable defects which have been so lately and so suddenly introduced into it."

MR. BIGGAR said, that in the interest of the Government themselves he would support the Motion for the adjournment of the debate. They must know that the practical effect of the non-consideration of this Amendment would be that the Bill would pass with this limit of three months in it, and it would give full power to the grasping and tyrannical landlords of Ireland to enforce ejectments, to sell the interests of their tenants, and to raise a fresh crop of disorder in Ireland. Moreover, the Bill, when it became law, would be thoroughly discredited at the very commencement. He was convinced that Her Majesty's Government did not wish the Bill to be considered a failure within six months of its having been passed into law. They would probably desire that the Bill at least should have the appearance of success. They would hardly wish that a new Act should be required next year to amend the Land Law of Ireland; but their hope was that the present measure would last, at any rate, during the lifetime of the present Parliament. The practical effect of passing the Bill in its present shape, without the Prime Minister having an opportunity of considering this Amendment, must be that in the nature of things it would be a total failure. It was beyond the bounds of possibility that a revision of a large portion of the rents in Ireland could take place within three months. It could not be done, and the inevitable result would be the total failure of the measure. All that the Irish Members asked was that the Prime Minister, who was unfortunately absent, should have an opportunity of considering the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). They did not blame the right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench for refusing to accept an Amendment which the Prime Minister had not seen. They were probably justified in refusing to alter the clause in accordance with the wish of the Irish Members, because it might turn out that the Prime Minister would offer opposition to the Amendment; but as yet the right hon. Gentleman had had no opportunity of seeing the Amendment, and if the Irish Members were able to lay reasons in favour of the proposal before the right hon. Gentleman, there was no ground for assuming that the right hon. Gentleman might not to-morrow accept the Amendment which the hon. Member for the City of Cork had proposed. He could say this in behalf of his hon. Friends, that they would not to-morrow discuss the Amendment at any considerable length. What they were anxious to say in support of the proposal would, in point of fact, be stated by one or two hon. Members only, and the Prime Minister would then be left to form his own opinion of the Amendment from the facts laid before him. It was arbitrary and unreasonable on the part of the Friends of the Prime Minister to attempt to deprive the right hon. Gentleman of the opportunity of hearing the views of the Irish Members, and thus run the risk of marring the Bill. Although he (Mr. Biggar) entertained only a moderate opinion as to the importance and value of the Bill as a whole he should like to see it made as perfect as possible. He believed that the clause as it stood was of so mischievous a character that it was for the interest and credit of the Government, and also for the interest of the Irish farmers, that all parties should now agree to the adjournment of the debate, and give the Prime Minister an opportunity of coming to a decision upon the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) stated that the Prime Minister had not duly considered the Amendment. Now, the suggestion embodied in the Amendment was made by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) some time ago, and it was duly considered by the Prime Minister and discussed by those about him. The right hon. Gentleman had, therefore, fully considered the subject, and had made up his mind upon it. Hon. Members opposite would remember that the right hon. Gentleman had devoted an enormous amount of time and attention to this Bill. He was sure, however, that nothing could be more trying to the right hon. Gentleman than to find that the effect of his going away at the time he did—namely, 2 o'clock in the morning—to take necessary repose, had been to bring about an adjournment of the debate, and to delay the progress of the Bill for another day. He would, therefore, appeal to hon. Members opposite not to persist in the Motion for adjournment. The facts all lay in a small compass, and were already fully before the House. Nothing new could be added, and he would appeal to hon. Members to allow the consideration of the measure to be brought to a close.

[Third Night.]

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, it might be likely enough that the decision of the Government was irrevocably made; but he had foreseen what the sagacious and far-seeing Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) was at. The object of the right hon. and learned Member had been in the most "Jesuitical" manner—he used the phrase, notwithstanding that it was one which was directed against the religion he professed—to cut down the gift and concession which the Government had given in the clause. He failed to see why the same course should not have been followed in regard to this clause as had been followed in reference to Clause 12. The simple result of the Bill, as it now stood, was if the landlord proceeded against his tenant by way of ejectment he was unable to complete his designs within any specified time, whereas if he proceeded by way of fi fa he could do so in three months. The Government admitted that that was so, and because there might be other creditors the landlord was allowed under this clause to do what the Bill attempted to prevent under Clause 12. For his own part, he would be exceedingly pained indeed if it were thought possible that he desired to cast any reflection upon the Prime Minister for having left the House in order to obtain the repose of which he stood in need. He would not use the phrase employed by another hon. Member, that the right hon. Gentleman had "gone to his rest." He hoped that long and distant might be the day when the right hon. Gentleman would "go to his rest;" and, disassociating himself from anything that might have the appearance of obstructing the progress of the Bill, he (Mr. Sullivan) did hope that the Government would consent to adjourn the debate in order that there might be an opportunity of obtaining the views of the Prime Minister upon the Amendment.

MR. REDMOND said, he was quite sure that no Member on those Benches would deny the truth of the remarks of the hon. and learned Solicitor General (Sir Farrar Herschell) with regard to the Prime Minister. Everyone was prepared to admit that in the prolonged discussion which the Bill had undergone the Prime Minister had devoted immense ability and untiring industry to the consideration of the Bill, which entitled him to the respect of every Member of the House. Having said so much, he could only express his regret that any course of action the Irish Members could possibly take up was likely to be the means of creating annoyance or a feeling of regret in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman. But they were not to be governed in their action by any fear that the Prime Minister might to-morrow regret to find that the debate had been adjourned. They had seen reason to enter a strong protest against an Amendment which they believed would, to a large extent, destroy the value of the Bill, and accordingly they moved an Amendment of their own. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland told them that the passing of this Amendment might imperil the passing of the Bill. Now, he believed that the real fate of the Bill depended on the reception it would meet with in Ireland, and in that sense he believed that its fate, if endangered at all, would be endangered by the Amendments which at the last moment had been inserted in the measure. It was a matter of grave and serious importance, because it was a matter that affected every tenant in Ireland who owed rent to his landlord. In point of fact, it placed hundreds and thousands of men at the disposal of their landlords, and the Irish Members would be failing in their duty to those who sent them as their Representatives in Parliament if they did not enter the strongest protest against such a course. He thought they would not only be justified in protesting against the proposal, but that they would be amply justified in using all the Forms of the House in order to insist on the adjournment of the debate, or, failing them, to insist on the debate going on until the Prime Minister could come back to take part in the discussion. He was not making these observations in the sense of a menace; and, whether that course were adopted or not, the Irish Members would be justified in protesting in the most emphatic terms against the treachery with which they had been treated by the Government. This course was absolutely necessary in order to show those whose interests they represented that they had not been unmindful of their duty. It would also show to the Irish people that Irish Members who sat on the Benches opposite, and who professed so much regard for the interests of the Irish people when Irish votes were required at the last Election had, nevertheless, deserted the Irish people and supported Her Majesty's Government in a course which he (Mr. Redmond) believed to be not only unjust but treacherous. He hoped the hon. Member for the City of Cork would go to a division, and if it was deemed desirable by his Colleagues to emphasise their protest by taking any other course they would receive his hearty support.

MR. DAWSON strongly supported the Motion for adjourning the debate. He denied that the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) would impair the effect of the clause. On the contrary, it would simply restore that which, as the clause stood at present, was taken away from the tenants. They had asked that the debate should be adjourned; but, in answer, the Chief Secretary for Ireland had used arguments which were only fit for children, and not for a deliberate Assembly. The right hon. Gentleman told them that the Bill could not pass if it were delayed, and a terrible calamity would happen if it were not passed. He was as anxious that the Bill should pass as the right hon. Gentleman himself; but they considered they were only discharging their duty in the course they were pursuing, and they would not desist unless it was shown that by their course of action they were endangering the Bill.

MR. O'KELLY considered it would be well to adjourn until the Head of the Government could return to his place. No satisfactory answer had been made to the objections which had been advanced from the Irish Benches. The ground on which the Government had taken their stand was the benefit of ordinary creditors, as distinguished from the landlord; but it had been pointed out by many hon. Gentleman that ordinary creditors had no interest in fixing a sale of the tenant's interest, because if they did that they would lose their own property. If they sold the interest of the tenant before the judicial rent was fixed, they must sell the property out of which they hoped to get what was due to them. The creditors other than the landlord could have no possible interest in selling the tenant's interest; but the Government were trying to supply the landlord with a cheap method of getting possession of the tenant's property, under the impression that, in so doing, they were taking care of the interests of the general creditors.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 24; Noes 168: Majority 144.—(Div. List, No. 382.)

Original Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. HEALY said, his hon. Friends felt so keenly on this question that a large number of them considered they ought to insist upon an adjournment. He had not addressed the House on this subject up to the present, and he was bound to express the opinion that the Government were behaving exceedingly badly, and that their Bill would be damaged very considerably by the acceptance of their proposed Amendment. Irish Members had an undoubted right to complain when they found the Government proposing an Amendment which they knew must be vicious in its operation. Rather than see the Amendment accepted he would like the clause to be struck out of the Bill. That would please their Lordships, and it would please him and his hon. Friends. The tenant would have a better chance without the Amendment than with it; and if their Lordships disagreed with the Amendment as amended, he should certainly not grieve. The clause had lost all its salt; but, strongly as they felt in the matter, he did not see what they could hope to get by continuing the discussion, considering that the Government had broken the spirit of the promise which was conveyed in the original Amendment, and that the Prime Minister had left for his necessary rest. It was a very melancholy thing to walk in the Lobby, and see the House of Lords in full blow, and nobody in it. It was a spectacle which might even be of some interest to the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), who, last year, gave Notice of a Motion to abolish the Upper House altogether. He would really appeal to the Government whether the clause was worth retaining at all? They had far better have the thing struck out altogether; but do not let the Lords do it. They had done enough already. It would be far more honest on the part of the Government to strike the clause out altogether; let them tell the House that they would do it.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he had been surprised to see the course his countrymen had taken on this occasion. For four months they had been discussing this Bill. It was a measure of the first magnitude, and he believed if it passed it would be the wonder of the world. It had been asserted—and it had been said here to-night—that the landlords of Ireland resembled beasts of prey, prowling about to find victims for their oppression and cruelty. The Irish tenants, if the Bill passed, would have four courses before them. They would, first of all, be able to abide by the old system of entering into an agreement with the landlord; if they did not like that they could avail themselves of the Act of 1870; if that did not please them they could avail themselves of the advantages of the provisions of this Bill; and lastly, if they were dissatisfied with the other three courses, they could take the hint given them to-night, and shoot either the landlord, the agent, or the bailiff. If these were not a sufficient choice of methods of carrying out their views, he did not know what could be said for them. [“Question!”] The question was whether this Bill was not enough to satisfy any reasonable man? He contended that it was; and now, at the last moment, those who professed to be the most anxious to see the Bill carried out, opposed it in the most strenuous manner.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, that if his hon. Friends did not persist in this opposition some hours yet it was contrary to his expectation. He should have done so had he not been positively forbidden by the Leader of the Party to which he belonged. He trusted that it would go forth that at least a few of the Irish Members were determined to mark their sense of the treacherous action of Her Majesty's Government in this proposal. He saw in his place the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary (Sir William Harcourt). It was not many weeks ago since he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), at about the same hour as the present, had endeavoured to help the right hon. Gentleman against the opposition of a small party of 11 or 12 Scotch and English Members, who were engaged in opposing the passing of a Bill relating to Poor Removals, or something of that kind. He really did not know the name of the Bill, though he had voted on it. These 11 or 12 Members did not hesitate to divide, and divide again and again, lest the Bill, the principle of which they accepted, but the amendment of which they demanded, should be pushed through the House at an unreasonable hour in the morning. And yet, here was an Amendment which placed at the mercy of the meal-man, and the retail grocer, and the landlord, thousands of the tenants of Ireland, and the Irish Members had not grit enough to stay in the House any longer for the sake of protesting against the conduct of the Government. He wished the protest to continue, not because he hoped to succeed, but because he wanted to improve his position—[“Hear, hear!”]—he meant his moral position—[Laughter.]—he was very delighted to find that he was possessed of such a fund of humour as to be able to set the House in a roar at half past 3 o'clock in the morning. He wished to improve his moral position. Why, when the Bill came into operation, and the Amendment was put in force, and was attended with the bad results that his Friends and he prophesied for it, how much better would be their position with the Government if they were able to say that they (the Government) had carried this Amendment in spite of the vigorous and prolonged protest against it of the Irish Members? As to the Amendment itself, when the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister was last year bringing in his Disturbance Bill, one of the aptest and most convincing illustrations he brought forward in favour of the measure was taken from a letter of his friend Mr. Tuke. That gentleman had stated that in the North-West, West, and South of Ireland, where he had travelled amongst the people, he had found them in such a position that the tenant right for which they had given in some cases £40, and £50, and £60, a few years ago, was not worth a penny, owing to the depression of the times. There was not a cabin in Donegal—[“Question!”]—well, he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) pitied the intelligences, and he pitied the information of hon. Gentlemen who did not see the relevancy of what he was saying to the Amendment before the House. Mr. Tuke visited several of the cabins in

Donegal, and there he found poor men who had had a considerable amount of stock two or three years ago—a horse or two, two or three cows, some pigs, and a yard well stocked with fowl—

MR. SPEAKER: I must call on the hon. Member to address himself to the Amendment before the House. The Amendment before the House is that of the hon. Member for the City of Cork; and the hon. Member is not speaking to that.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he was sorry he had not been able to make the connection between his remarks and the Amendment clear to the House and to Mr. Speaker. The object of the Amendment, as he understood it, was to give the Court the right of conferring on the tenant a larger amount of time than three months against the sale of his tenant right; and he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) was endeavouring to show the justice of that proposal by pointing out that the tenant right, if sold now, in many cases would be utterly worthless, and that, therefore, it was necessary, in the interest of the tenant, that some time should be allowed him before the sale of his tenant right. In the case of many people in Donegal, Galway, and Mayo, they would simply be giving them Dead Sea fruit in giving this permission to sell their tenant right. When they were discussing the 5th clause of the Bill, which dealt with compensation for disturbance, the noble Lord the Member for Calne (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) got up in his place and proposed an Amendment, and someone defended the proposal of the Government on the ground that it was based on the fact that in many parts of Ireland the value of the tenant right had been reduced to zero. The Prime Minister declared that this view was in consonance with his own; therefore, according to the admission of the Government, the tenant right had been reduced to zero. And yet they would not allow the tenant time to get a fair value for his tenant right. The Under Secretary of State for the Colonies said something which he could not catch. Did the hon. Member pretend to say that this was not so? The hon. Member and his Friends should stand up in their places and say what they thought, and not indulge in unintelligible muttering. Let them take up the Evidence of the Bessborough Commission. They would find witnesses all over the country going up and saying—"I am owed £8,000 or £10,000." In some cases the mealmonger went up with that statement, declaring that he was owed £10,000 for meal—that was to say, for the first necessary of life. The people were obliged to have the meal or starve. This mealmonger, unless this Amendment were accepted, would be put in the position of being compelled to drive the tenants to sell an unsaleable tenant right to get his money for his meal. Unless the Amendment were accepted, it would not be a message of peace, but a message of war they would be sending to the Irish people—it would be a message to tell them that they would be turned out of their homes, and that the only refuge upon which they could rely was their own organization, which was independent of the Land Bill, the Government, or the English Parliament.

MR. O'DONNELL rose to address the House.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member has already spoken.

MR. O'DONNELL: I only spoke on the question of adjournment.

MR. SPEAKER: I think the hon. Member is mistaken.

Original Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The House divided:—Ayes 38; Noes 143: Majority 105.—(Div. List, No. 383.)

Other Amendments made to the words so restored.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Committee be appointed 'to draw up Reasons to be assigned to The Lords for disagreeing to the Amendments made by The Lords to the Bill:'—MR. GLADSTONE, MR. WILLIAM EDWARD FORSTER, MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND, MR. DODSON, MR. LEFEVRE, MR. SOLICITOR GENERAL, and MR. SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND:—Three to be the quorum."

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR wished, if he was in Order, to move an addition to the proposed names; or, if he could not do that, to move to omit one Member in order to insert the name of Mr. Parnell.

MR. SPEAKER: The proceeding is altogether formal. At the same time, the hon. Member is not in Order in proposing to add to the names, because I have already passed beyond that, having put the Question that three be a quorum.

MR. PARNELL: In any case, Mr. Speaker, I should refuse to serve.

Motion agreed to; Committee appointed: To withdraw immediately.

REASONS FOR DISAGREEING TO CERTAIN OF THE AMENDMENTS MADE BY THE LORDS TO THE LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.

The Commons disagree to the Amendments on page 1, lines 26 and 28, for the following Reason:

Because the failure to give the notice as prescribed may be accidental, and in no way prejudice the landlord, and it would be unjust to enable the landlord in such a case to require the court to declare the sale void.

The Commons disagree to the Amendment in page 2, line 16:

Because the insertion of these words is unnecessary.

The Commons disagree to the Amendments in page 2, lines 28 and 34, for the following Reasons:

(1.) Because the landlord has got value for his purchase in the increased rent which he must be assumed to have charged for the holding, or which in any case he may fairly charge in respect of the improvements, &c. thus acquired by him.

(2.) Because the tenant, out of whose purchase money the landlord would be reimbursed what he is supposed to have paid the previous tenant, received no benefit for and was in no way party to the transaction, and is as much entitled to retain his purchase money (which may represent little more than the value of improvements made by himself) as any other tenant who sells his tenancy.

The Commons disagree to the Amendment in page 4, line 25, for the following Reason:

Because it is unnecessary, the object being already provided for in the first clause of the Bill.

The Commons disagree to the Amendment in page 5, line 10, for the following Reasons:

(1.) Because it is desirable to define with precision the "persistent waste" which is to be a breach of the statutory condition.

(2.) Because it would be unjust to allow a landlord who, whilst the tenant is committing "waste," knowingly stands by without objecting to it, afterwards to insist on it as a breach of the statutory conditions, and proceed to compel the tenant to quit his holding accordingly.

(3.) Because the landlord will still retain all his other remedies for preventing any act of waste, and for recovering damages for it, if committed.

The Commons disagree to the Amendment in page 5, line 32, for the following Reason:

Because as such a tenant cannot register, and therefore cannot lawfully cut or remove any timber, though planted by himself or his predecessors, the addition of the Amendment nullifies the exception.

Mr. Speaker

The Commons disagree to the Amendment in page 5, line 34, for the following Reason:

Because the language of the Bill better describes the right to which the tenant is entitled by Statute (in affirmance of the common law in that respect).

The Commons disagree to the Amendment in page 5, lines 38 and 41, for the following Reasons:

(1.) Because the definition in the Statute referred to is objectionable, as including some and excluding other subjects of sport which ought not to be so included and excluded respectively.

(2.) Because it is desirable that the Statute should state expressly, and not by reference to another Statute, what subjects of sport are exclusively reserved to the landlord.

The Commons disagree to the Amendment in page 6, line 1, for the following Reason:

Because it would be unreasonable to make a trifling act of obstruction the breach of a statutory condition.

The Commons disagree to the Amendment in page 6, lines 3 and 4, for the following Reasons:

(1.) Because it is entirely superfluous; the landlord's property in the mines and other things there specified being wholly unaffected by the Bill.

(2.) Because the Amendment, in several respects, contradicts the previous part of the clause, and would prejudice the rights thereby secured to or recognised as vested in the tenant.

(3.) Because the Amendment, by providing that mines, &c. shall be deemed to be reserved to the landlord "during the continuance of a statutory term," would suggest doubts as to the landlord's property in them in cases where there was no such term.

The Commons disagree to the Amendment in page 6, line 8, for the following Reason:

Because the words are necessary for explaining the reference thereto in Clause 7.

The Commons disagree to the Amendments in page 6, lines 27 and 37, for the following Reason:

Because the existing provisions as to compensation for disturbance have been found to be insufficient.

The Commons disagree to the Amendment in page 8, line 15, for the following Reason:

Because the landlord can enforce an increase of rent without going to the court, and it is desirable that the tenant should have an opportunity of accepting the proposed increase, and thus getting a statutory term without the intervention of the court.

The Commons disagree to the Amendment in page 8, line 20, for the following Reason:

Because the words omitted recognise alike the rights of both landlord and tenant, and it is expedient to retain them as assuring the Irish tenant that his just interests will be respected.

The Commons disagree to the Amendment in page 8, line 23, for the following Reasons :

(1.) Because its object is fully provided by Clause 8 (Equities Clause).

(2.) Because it would be manifestly unjust that the tenant's application to fix a fair rent for his holding should be refused because one of his predecessors had committed some act of waste long since repaired.

The Commons disagree to the Amendment in page 8, line 35, for the following Reason :

Because it is desirable that the tenant should feel assured that during the first statutory term obtained through the court after the passing of the Act, he cannot be dispossessed except for breach of duty or for some public purpose; but the Commons propose to insert words excluding from this provision the case of present tenancies arising at the expiration of judicial leases and current leases respectively.

The Commons disagree to the Amendment in page 9, line 14, for the following Reason :

Because it is expedient to leave the matter to the judgment of the court, as there may be some cases in which the conduct of the landlord may have been such as to make it inequitable to refuse the tenant's application for a judicial rent.

The Commons disagree to the Amendment in page 9, line 39, for the following Reason :

Because by making the provision prospective, and only applicable to the second and subsequent revisions of rent, it suggests doubts as to whether the tenant's improvements may not be charged for in the first determination of fair rent; but the Commons propose to amend the words so reinstated, and as a consequential Amendment to add words to subsection 8 which will have the effect of securing the landlord against having his rent reduced in respect of improvements for which the tenant is no longer entitled to credit.

The Commons disagree to the Amendment in page 9, line 42, for the following Reason :

Because there are many cases in which the money so paid by the incoming tenant ought to be considered in determining what is a fair rent; for example in Ulster, where such payments may represent the real value of the tenant-right, or in other parts of Ireland where it may to a great extent, if not exclusively, represent the value of improvements thus purchased from his predecessor, and to credit for which the tenant is fairly entitled in any such inquiry.

The Commons disagree to the Amendment in page 11, line 12, for the Reason given for disagreeing to the Amendment in page 8, lines 20 and 21.

The Commons disagree to the Amendments in page 13, lines 31, 32, and 34, respectively, for the following Reason :

Because it would exclude from the benefit of the Act the occupying tenants of a mesne landlord holding by a terminable lease, which, being made without any restriction on the common law right of sub-letting, must be regarded as authorising the creation of the sub tenancies in question.

The Commons disagree to the Amendment in page 14, line 13, for the following Reason :

Because it would prevent the building of any labourers' cottages, even with the sanction of the court, unless the tenant's holding contained the full extent of tillage land specified, and it is expedient to leave some discretion to the court in this matter.

The Commons disagree to the Amendment in page 15, line 15, subsection 3, for the following Reason :

Because it is expedient to provide that for some time after the passing of the Act the right of pre-emption shall not be used to defeat the object of the Act by extinguishing present tenancies with the view of creating future tenancies in their stead.

The Commons disagree to the Amendment in page 16, lines 9 to 14, for the following Reason :

Because leases in Ireland are regarded by both landlord and tenant as little more than a fixing of the rent for the specified period, and restoration of the holding to the landlord at their expiration is not originally contemplated by either party; but the Commons propose to amend the words so reinstated in the Bill by inserting words excluding cases where reversionary leases have been already granted, and also providing for "resumption" as under the fifth clause of the Bill, if the landlord requires the holding for his own occupation.

The Commons disagree to the Amendment in page 16, lines 24 to 36, for the following Reason :

Because it is alleged that since the passing of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, leases containing unfair terms and provisions contrary to the meaning and spirit of that Act have been unfairly forced upon the tenants, and it is expedient that provision should be made to enable the court to set aside leases executed under such circumstances.

The Commons disagree to the Amendment in page 19, line 12, for the following Reason :

Because there may be on an estate a great number of small tenants who would be unable to purchase their holdings, which would thus be left on the hands of the Commissioners, whilst two-thirds of the whole rent might be payable by a few large tenants; but the Commons propose by a consequential Amendment to the Bill to provide that, under certain special circumstances, the rule requiring that three-fourths of the whole number of tenants shall be able and willing to purchase may be relaxed.

The Commons disagree to the Amendment in page 25, line 14, for the following Reason :

Because these subsections are required to ensure the proper administration of the public moneys placed at the disposal of the Commission.

The Commons disagree to the Amendments in page 31, lines 1 and 7, for the following Reason:

Because an appeal on any question of law is already provided for; and it is not expedient to permit an appeal on other questions, such as the amount of fair rent, the value of a holding, or the amount of damages awarded for breach of a statutory condition, or any matter left in the discretion of the court.

The Commons disagree to the Amendment in page 37, line 31, for the following Reason:

Because it is expedient to postpone for a short time the creation of future tenancies.

The Commons disagree to the Amendment in page 39, lines 22 to 30, for the following Reason:

Because it is expedient to provide that where a tenant is seeking to obtain a reduction of rent and statutory term through the intervention of the court, the sale of his tenancy at the suit of a creditor may, under special circumstances, be stayed for a short time, so that the true value of his tenancy may be realized; but the Commons propose to amend the words so reinstated by limiting the time for which the court can stay the process.

Reasons for disagreement to The Lords Amendments reported, and agreed to:—To be communicated to The Lords.

SOLENT NAVIGATION [EXPENSES].

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR complained of the arrangement of the Order Paper, pointing out that the Highways and Locomotives Act Amendment Bill and the Presumption of Life (Scotland) Bill had been omitted from the Order Paper yesterday. On some occasions this sort of thing might be very important, and he thought the Standing Order should be carefully observed in this respect. It might be a serious matter to a Member to have his Bill misplaced.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is quite mistaken. Bills have not been misplaced.

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of Expenses which may become payable by the Admiralty under the provisions of any Act of the present Session to make provision with respect to the Navigation of the Solent between the Isle of Wight and the Mainland, in the county of Hants.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

NAVY AND ARMY EXPENDITURE, 1879-80.

Committee to consider the Savings and Deficiencies upon the Grants for Navy and Army Services in the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, and the temporary sanction obtained from the Treasury by the Navy and Army Departments to Expenditure not provided for in the Grants for that year, upon Saturday.

Appropriation Accounts for the Navy and Army Departments, which were presented upon the 7th day of February last referred to the Committee.

House adjourned at a quarter after Four o'clock in the morning.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, he would take that opportunity of congratulating the noble Earl (Earl Beauchamp) upon having carried the measure to a successful issue. He trusted that during the Recess the noble Earl would consider the desirability of extending the application of the principles of the measure, so as to prevent the necessity of sending clergymen to prison for offences similar to those committed by Mr. Green.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 3^d accordingly, and passed, and sent to the Commons.

CONVEYANCING AND LAW OF PROPERTY BILL.

CONSIDERATION OF COMMONS AMENDMENTS.

Commons Amendments considered (according to order).

EARL CAIRNS said, that a great number of Amendments had been made in the other House; and, so far as the verbal Amendments were concerned, he readily assented to them. But there were certain Amendments to the Bill which proposed to leave out certain important clauses, from the operation of which he and others expected the greatest possible benefit, and which would have reduced very much the expense of conveyancing, to the saving of money which, as it seemed to him, was needlessly thrown away. As matters stood, the House was exhibited as advocating changes that would lead to economy, and the House of Commons had retained the sources of expense. At any other period of the Session he should have asked their Lordships to consider the matter more fully and to disagree with the House of Commons in those Amendments; but, at present, looking at the time, and that there was other important legislation before the House, that course would imperil the Bill, and, as it appeared to him in other respects to be exceedingly valuable, he should be sorry that any accident should befall it. With this protest, he asked their Lordships to agree to the Commons' Amendments.

Moved, "That this House doth agree with The Commons in their Amendments to the said Bill."—(The Earl Cairns.)

Motion agreed to.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.

CONSIDERATION OF COMMONS AMENDMENTS TO LORDS AMENDMENTS.

Commons Amendments to Lords Amendments, and Commons consequential Amendments, and Reasons for disagreeing to certain of the Lords Amendments considered (according to order).

On the Motion of The LORD PRIVY SEAL, the following Amendments disagreed to by the Commons:—In page 1, line 26, leave out from ("court") to ("declare") in line 28, and insert ("shall"); and in line 28, after ("void") insert ("if the landlord shall so require")—not insisted on.

On the Lords Amendment in page 2, line 5, amended by the Commons as follows:—In line 5, leave out ("be compensated") and insert ("compensation"); in line 8, insert ("and substantially maintained,") and after ("landlord") leave out the word ("or") and insert ("and"); and in line 9, insert ("made or acquired.")

Moved, "That this House doth agree to the Amendments made by the Commons in the said Amendment."—(The Lord Privy Seal.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he did not know whether the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) wished to assume the paternity of his own child; but, if not, he (the Marquess of Salisbury) would do so. The Amendment which the Commons had proposed to this Proviso, and which might be shortly described as an English-managed estate Amendment, was to some extent based on a reasonable principle—that was to say, they had no desire that estates which had been once equipped by the landlord, and from that time had been entirely abandoned to the tenant, should be treated as English-managed estates, because that would not be a just representation of the system of management that prevailed in this country. On the other hand, the words "substantially maintained" went a good deal too far, and would tend to exclude from the benefit of the provision estates which really had been managed on the English system, but in which the tenant might have done certain incidental repairs, or in which he might have repaired some particular improvements. A tenant might have constantly cleared out the end of a ditch—that was a permanent improvement; he had substantially attended to it, and not the landlord; and, therefore, that was no longer an English-managed estate and no longer to be excluded. If the Amendment of the Commons were adopted simply as it stood, the result would be that the provision to which their Lordships assented would become almost nugatory, and would, practically, not apply to the estates at which it was originally directed. He had therefore to move an Amendment which, at first sight, might not seem to be a large one, but which would, he thought, cover the distance between the view sustained by the Commons and that held by their Lordships. Instead of the words “substantially maintained” he proposed to insert “have been in the main upheld.” The difference between these two formulæ was this—“substantially maintained” would apply to each individual improvement. If one ditch was habitually maintained by the tenant under the words “substantially maintained,” the holding would no longer be an English-managed estate; but if they said that the generality of the improvements were to be maintained by the landlord, or, in other words, were to be “in the main upheld,” they established this principle—that where the majority of the improvements were sustained by the landlord it would be an English-managed estate, and excluded from the provisions of the clause. That corresponded exactly with the practical state of things on these English-managed estates. He moved that the Commons’ Amendment be amended by omitting the words “and substantially maintained,” and substituting “have in the main been upheld.”

Moved, To leave out the words (“and substantially maintained,”) and insert the words (“have in the main been upheld.”)—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

On question, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill?”

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that as he was responsible for the original proposal—indeed, he had no difficulty in assuming its paternity—he wished to say that the action of the other House with respect to it had convinced him that that House and the Government were prepared to consider the question fairly and candidly. Though he believed the original Amendment to be consistent with justice and common sense, he was bound to own that there were many persons who had a strong objection to it—on what ground he did not know, unless it were that they positively disliked to see landlords undertake the duty of managing their estates and the duty of making improvements. All except those who held that view acknowledged the Amendment to be a reasonable one. With respect to the words of the Amendment of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury), he was bound to say he could not see the distinction between the words “substantially maintained” and “in the main upheld.” He did not know what might be the judicial interpretation of the words “substantially maintained;” but he apprehended, on the other hand, that nobody could anticipate what might be the judicial interpretation of the words “in the main upheld.” When he asked his noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the words “substantially maintained” were intended to make the Amendment more strict or more loose, his noble Friend told him plainly that they were intended to make it less strict. He did not think, however, that the noble Marquess had given a fair example of a permanent improvement when he mentioned the clearing out of a ditch, because a ditch was a temporary and not a permanent improvement. What he (the Duke of Argyll) meant by permanent improvements were buildings, fences, and the main drainage of farms—that was what was called permanent improvements in England and Scotland. In his observations the noble Marquess referred to English-managed estates. But to that expression he (the Duke of Argyll) vehemently objected, because the Amendment referred, not to “estates,” but to “holdings” upon which the landlord had made all the permanent improvements. He had always maintained that it would be unfair to deprive a tenant of the benefit of his own improvements, because other tenants might have the improvements on their holdings made by the landlord. He earnestly trusted that the House would understand what he believed to be the immense difficulties surrounding this Amendment. Although the words “substantially maintained," strictly interpreted, excluded certain holdings which, in his view, ought to be included, yet this great consequence would follow—that every landlord in Ireland would know for the future by the decision of the Court how he was to improve his holding, so as to take advantage of this clause. He placed the greatest value on the concession made by the Government and the House of Commons, and he was prepared to accept the words "substantially maintained" as inserted by the Commons.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that, instead of his former Amendment, he would move that the words "substantially maintained" be left out in order to insert after "made," "or acquired," and have in the main been upheld."

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Moved, To leave out the words ("and substantially maintained") and insert the words ("or acquired.")—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

On question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill?"

LORD CARLINGFORD said, that the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) had altered the words of his Amendment, and, in doing so, seemed to have received a new light from some quarter with respect to the Bill. He did not know what the noble Marquess meant by "acquired."

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that the words "or acquired" were inserted by the House of Commons a few lines further on in the same clause. The addition of the words in question would meet the case of a man who had bought his land and paid too much for it, and where the improvements had been acquired.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, that the intention of the Government in inserting the words "substantially maintained" was that where a landlord had, or should have for the future, really and bona fide equipped and maintained a farm under the English system, the power of sale should be taken away from the tenant. But, having made that concession, the Government desired to make it a genuine case, such as had been contemplated throughout by his noble Friend the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll). He was not, at a moment's notice, prepared to accept the words "or acquired;" in fact, he could not see their significance in that connection. He believed that the first words the noble Marquess had proposed—"in the main upheld"—had the same scope as the words now in the clause, and he was willing to accept them.

Resolved in the negative.

On question, "That the words ("or acquired") be there inserted?"

Their Lordships divided:—Contents 144; Not-Contents 69: Majority 75.

Further Amendment made by inserting after the word ("acquired") the words ("and have been in the main upheld.")

On Commons Amendment to Lords Amendment, in line 9, to leave out "or"
 and insert "and."

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY invited the Government to give an explanation of it, as he could not understand how the landlord and his predecessor in title—say his grandfather—could have made an improvement conjointly, as the words required. He did not wish to quarrel with the grammar of Her Majesty's Government; but he must formally move the restoration of the word "or."

Moved, "That this House doth disagree with the Commons in the said Amendment."—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

LORD CARLINGFORD explained that the objection to the word "or" was that, if it were used, then if one of the predecessors of the landlord had made and maintained any improvements —no matter how long back—the tenancy would be excluded from the full benefit of the Bill, although the improvements might never since have been maintained by the landlord. The whole idea of the Government was to preserve the continuity of the improvements.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, the logical and grammatical blunder of the Government was not one into which it was likely the Court would fall; and, therefore, he must press the Motion.

Lords Amendment, in page 2, line 16, to insert ("or paid for"), to which the Commons have disagreed.

Moved, "That this House doth not insist on the said Amendment to which the Commons have disagreed."—(The Lord Privy Seal.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY asked for some intelligible reason for omitting the words. What was to happen in a case where the landlord had paid the tenant for the improvements he had made—was the landlord to have no value for improvements so made and paid for? If objection were taken to the insertion of the words at the place in question, he should insert them at some other place.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR explained that the word "made" met the case completely, because it comprehended all improvements effected by persons employed by the landlord, and who, of course, received payment for their labour.

On question? resolved in the affirmative.

Moved, In page 2, line 18, after ("title") to insert ("or have been paid for by the landlord or his predecessor in title."—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

On question?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR objected to the Amendment, as it was perfectly clear that the landlord had made the improvements, if he had paid for them.

LORD LECONFIELD stated that the Amendment would give more security to the improving landlords, and maintained that it would affect his own improvements.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY admitted that; but he considered the clause would be unsafe without the Amendment.

LORD CARLINGFORD refused to give way.

On the House being cleared for the division,

EARL GRANVILLE said, the Government would not give their Lordships the trouble of dividing.

Resolved in the affirmative.

Lords Amendment in page 2, line 28, to which the Commons have disagreed.

Moved, "That this House doth not insist on the said Amendment to which the Commons have disagreed."—(The Lord Privy Seal.)

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that, having moved it originally, he wished to say a few words on that Amendment, and he hoped he might be allowed to make a proposal with regard to it. He regretted it had not been agreed to, at least in a modified form, because he thought that the Bill as it stood did a wrong and an injustice for which this House ought to provide a remedy. He would simply read the clause of the Act of 1870 which provided for the purchase of the tenant right. It ran as follows:—

"Where a landlord has purchased or acquired, or shall hereafter purchase or acquire, the Ulster tenant right custom, such holding shall henceforth cease to be subject to the Ulster tenant right custom."

Many landlords might have been induced by that distinct guarantee on the part of the Legislature to free their holdings from the Ulster tenant right custom, and to expend considerable sums with that object. It might be said that the Bill did not subject these holdings to the Ulster Custom. This was literally and technically true; but it subjected them to the power of sale, which was the heart and soul of the Ulster Custom; and unless some provision were made to meet the case, there would be almost a breach of faith on the part of Parliament, for that money would be confiscated under the present Bill as it stood. The Amendment he had proposed, and which their Lordships adopted, was intended to obviate that hardship. The precise form of his Amendment was another matter. It was most desirable that that House should exhibit the virtue of promptitude in the transaction of Public Business; but he had some reason to complain of the haste with which the Bill had been passed through the Committee stage. Their Lordships had only had a few hours to consider the details of a most complicated measure, which underwent alteration, having been hacked about, and amended in every sort of way possible up to the last moment in the other House. Consequently, they had had little time to consider what would be the effect of particular words with regard to provisions of this kind. He was bound to admit that the House of Commons, in the Reasons they had given for disagreeing with his Amendment—namely, on the ground that cases of hardship might arise in which the occupying tenant, who was quite unconnected with the transaction between the former tenant and the landlord, might suffer—had hit a blot in the particular words he proposed to insert, for under them there would have been no possibility of the tenant selling the remainder of the tenant right, which might have been left to him after an increment of rent. It was also pointed out that by other parts of the Bill the object he had in view was provided for; but he still believed the Amendment to be necessary, though he was willing to put it in a modified form. The landlord, after buying the tenant right, might, no doubt, recoup himself by increment of rent; and, in that case, of course, there could be no question of repaying him for his outlay on the sale of the tenancy. He was not prepared, therefore, to insist on the particular words of his Amendment. If, however, the Government had wished to meet the case, they might easily have suggested, in “another place,” words which would have avoided the injustice that he desired to prevent. As they had not done so, he now moved to add, after the 1st paragraph of this 9th sub-section, these words—

“And where the holding is sold for the first time under the provisions of this Act, the landlord may apply to the Court to apportion to him such part, if any, of the purchase money as may seem to the Court to be just under all the circumstances of the case, and the Court may so apportion such part accordingly.”

He could not help thinking that his Amendment was really in accordance with the intentions of the Government. The words which he had suggested would give direction to the Court to consider the particular circumstances in reference to each case; and he could not help saying that unless Government adopted some such words there would be a positive breach of faith on the part of the Government to those individuals who had purchased the tenant right.

Moved, To insert, in lieu of the Amendment made by the Lords to which the Commons have disagreed, the following words:—

(“Where, before the passing of this Act, the landlord, or any of his predecessors in title, has purchased or acquired the Ulster tenant right custom, or the benefit of a usage corresponding to the Ulster tenant right custom to which any holding was subject, and such holding has, in pursuance of section one or section two of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, ceased to be subject to such custom or usage; and, where the holding is sold for the first time under the provisions of this Act, the landlord may apply to the court to apportion to him such part, if any, of the purchase money as may seem to the court to be just under all the circumstances of the case; and the court may so apportion such part accordingly.”)—(The Duke of Argyll.)

The Duke of Argyll

LORD WAVENEY, in supporting the Amendment, quoted from the letter of a gentleman of great experience the following account of the difficulties of landlords in the matter of tenant right:—

“I purchased several farms at prices varying from £10 to £15 per statute acre. In most cases, I threw down the houses and added the land to the adjoining farm. In case of the enlarged farm changing hands, which has taken place in more than one instance, I protect myself by allowing only the tenant's right of the original portion to be sold, the new tenant becoming my tenant for the land purchased by me on the same terms as the man from whom he purchases the original portion—that is, he has tenant right only in the farm originally owned by the seller and none in that purchased by me. Nor can I see how he can justly acquire that right, unless by paying me the money I paid, less the capital value of any additional rent placed on the land in consequence of that purchase. This latter, however, is small, as in no case can a landlord get a rent equal to his rent proper and interest on his purchase of tenant right. Under the Land Bill my tenant could sell both portions, my purchase would merge in the sale, and I should lose all not covered by higher rent. Now, I have the right to resume possession if not satisfied with any proposed new arrangement, and could recoup myself by restoring the original conditions of two small farms. The landlord's compensation, it is said, in case of a sale of a tenant right by a tenant who had taken a farm, the tenant right of which had been purchased by the landlord and afterwards sold, would come out of the wrong person if then claimed. This is wrong. The seller would be selling that for which he never paid, and would suffer no injury by being obliged to hand over the proceeds of the sale, less his claim for improvements, if any, to the landlord to whom the property belongs, and the buyer would suffer no injury by paying the rightful owner instead of the tenant, who, by a lucky chance of law, was selling what did not belong to him. A great injustice will be done to those who have freely spent money in the hope of raising the condition and status of the smaller tenantry. Had I taken advantage of the law as it stood, I might have enlarged the holdings by ejecting those too small to live by farming, and paid nothing by way of compensation before 1870.”

He trusted that the injustice pointed out by the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) would be provided for by the Government accepting the proposed Amendment. If some such provision were not made, a great injustice would be done to a large number of landlords.

LORD CARLINGFORD hoped their Lordships would not insist upon this Amendment. He should like to remind the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) of what was done in this matter by the Act of 1870. No doubt, the Act said that an Ulster farm, once free of the Ulster Custom, should remain free from it. But what more did it do? Side by side with that provision, it subjected the holding to all the other general provisions of the Act. And what were they? They included compensation for disturbance, and in his (Lord Carlingford's) view, as a matter of principle, that compensation for disturbance was a harder measure to the landlords than anything the Government were doing under the provisions of this Act. In the case of tenant right he received some tangible value; but the payment of compensation for disturbance was not a payment which represented any value whatever. It was partly a payment in the nature of a penalty, and partly in the nature of a compulsory poor law to relieve the tenant. In point of principle, indeed, he maintained that it was a very strong measure to require every landlord in Ireland, including those who had bought up the Ulster Custom, to submit to the general provision of compensation for disturbance. He only mentioned that to remind them of what had been done by the Act of 1870. As to the question now before them, the Government's view with reference to the noble Duke's proposal that a lump sum should be given by a tenant in the case of the tenant right having been purchased was that it would be a practical injustice. They were convinced that, in practice, the only mode in any case, supposing there had been no legislation at all on the subject, in which a landlord could have recouped himself, would be in the way of increased rent, representing the full interest of the expenditure which—in his (Lord Carlingford's) opinion foolishly—he had made. If he had not so increased the rent upon the tenant right payment which he had himself made, including, of course, valuable improvements on the holding—if he had not done so, it was a case of great indulgence; and he would be only in the same position as any other indulgent landlord in Ireland. If, on the other hand, he had fixed his rent according to the circumstances of the case, and calculated it upon the tenant right payment, he would have lost nothing by the transaction. That was how the question stood. There might be cases of hardship of that kind. They could not be helped as regarded the past; but in future they could not arise, as the Bill would in all cases, either by agreement or the intervention of the Court, insure to the landlord a fair rent. What, then, would be the position of the tenant? There would be an increase of rent equivalent to the capital sum expended by the landlord, and that increase of rent would continue after a new tenant entered upon the holding. Therefore, if the landlord had fixed his rent according to the circumstances of the case, would it be reasonable to ask the tenant in occupation, who might have been paying the full value of the farm, to pay the landlord a lump sum in respect to tenant right, as suggested? The effect would be, if the tenant had to sell his tenant right on that increased rent, the value of his interest would be largely decreased, and it was quite evident that it would be preposterous and impossible to require that he should not only pay the capital sum to his landlord, but also that the increased rent calculated upon that capital sum should continue upon the holding, and that he should be required to sell on the diminished value. If that were to be done, it would be essential that the Court should reduce the rent before the man sold. If the landlord's tenant right payment, which might have been paid—God knows when—were to be repaid by the actual tenant, then the rent of that farm must be reduced accordingly. It must be reduced to the figure at which it would have stood if the landlord had not so bought the tenant right, and the tenant must be able to sell it at that reduced figure of rent. It was impossible that the landlord should receive that sum from the tenant, and, at the same time, go on obtaining to the end of time a high rent calculated upon another condition of things. These were some of the difficulties which they would have to meet if they attempted to make any provision such as his noble Friend (the Duke of Argyll) had proposed. The suggestion now made by no means differed in effect from the words already standing in the original Amendment. The Government were convinced that, although the Bill was a strong and severe interference with the action of the landlord, it did not, in the matter at issue, subject him to any money loss. The Government admitted, to the fullest extent, that the Bill would defeat and overrule the policy and the system adopted by the few landlords now in question; but beyond that they did not go. They were convinced that, in these cases, the landlord would have just the same means, as a matter of money, of recouping himself for his expenditure as he would have had if there had been no new legislation whatever, that means being the obtaining of a rent calculated upon the circumstances of the holding.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that, while believing that the original Amendment of the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) was not properly open to objection, he believed that this, as now improved, would be the most elastic and natural method of removing any misapprehension as to the effect of honouring the promise made by Parliament in 1870. The arguments of the noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal were of two kinds. In the first place, he pointed out the great enormity of the provisions of the Act of 1870, and said that the Government had done nothing in this Bill at all so bad as that. But he (the Marquess of Salisbury) could not admit that the noble Lord's appeal to his own wrong constituted any justification for any wrongs which he might in the future attempt to commit. But then the noble Lord went on to say that if the landlord suffered by reason of having bought the tenant right, and never getting value for it, at least he was paid by the increase of rent which was the result of the absence of the tenant right. But if there was one thing more than another which the noble Lord had laboured to impress upon the House, it was that there was no connection between the growth of tenant right and the amount of rent paid. He (the Marquess of Salisbury) would, if he might make use of a trivial simile, say that he could not understand under which thimble the pea now was. He could not understand whether the noble Lord had pinned his faith to the doctrine that the money payable by an incoming tenant and the rent to be exacted were to be twin sisters, growing up side by side, but independently, or whether they were to be dependent upon each other, the one rising as the other fell. In some of the debates that had taken place the noble Lord had taken the first view; but now his argument was based upon the second. What was the position of the tenant who would be affected by the Amendment, and who was the subject of so much commiseration, out of the result of whose free sale it was proposed that the first compensation of the landlord would come? He had come into the farm entirely without the payment of any purchase money whatever. He was in the country of Ulster tenant right, and surrounded by farms every one of whose occupants had paid a heavy sum before occupation of the farm, and he had enjoyed all the benefits of the tenant right, all the benefits conferred on the farm by the permanent buildings erected by his predecessors in title, and enjoyed them without paying the price for them; and before he could exercise the right of sale which the surrounding tenants possessed, he was bound to come on a level with them in respect of the sacrifices which they had made in the purchase of the tenant right. He must purchase that which he desired to sell as the others had. The difference between the Ulster Custom and the tenant right of the rest of Ireland no doubt caused considerable difficulty in dealing with the matter. The noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal had repeatedly spoken of the man who had purchased his tenant right as a foolish man. But he was induced to do so by an Act of Parliament which the noble Lord had been instrumental in passing. In Ulster a landlord had bought up the tenant right. He did so under the Act of 1870, and now it was proposed by Parliament that it should be taken from him, and given to the tenant. His (the Marquess of Salisbury's) view of the matter was that the Government had, by their Bill, been guilty, with respect to the whole of the landlords of Ireland, of something which was very like spoliation as regards their Common Law rights; and in this particular case, in addition to spoliation as regards their Common Law right, they were committing a special spoliation as against the guarantee of an Act of Parliament.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN failed to see any valid objection on the part of the Government to the proposal to give the Court power to apportion a certain amount of the purchase money to the landlord, if it should be satisfied that he had not been repaid for his expenditure in any other way. As he understood the noble Duke's (the Duke of Argyll's) Amendment, each case would be submitted to the Court, and the Court would apportion what belonged to the landlord and what belonged to the tenant, if he was entitled to tenant right. He could not, therefore, understand the difficulty of the Government. Why should not a landlord who had bought up the tenant right be recouped out of the money obtained on the first sale of the tenant under this Bill? The landlord who had purchased the tenant right would be compelled either to lose his money or to charge a sufficient increment of rent to pay him interest on it. The noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal said that that was what he ought to do; but in many cases it would be practically impossible for him to do so. He had given such a large sum for tenant right that he would be most unwilling to charge sufficient interest in the way of rent. So far as he knew, the reason why many landlords had bought up the tenant right was for the express purpose of insuring that men should not be overburdened by rent and interest on tenant right; and if they charged interest on themselves, they would be defeating the very end for which they had bought it. It would be compelling the landlords to raise their rents in order to pay themselves. That would be a most injudicious thing to do; and he confessed he could not understand why they should not be allowed to go to Court if they could show to its satisfaction that they had not been repaid by increased rent or in any other way. He, therefore, supported the Amendment of his noble Friend (the Duke of Argyll).

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY contended that the methods of repaying the landlord which seemed to be popular with some noble Lords could not be considered just. What his noble Friend (the Earl of Dunraven) had just said showed the extraordinary positions into which the question would be brought if they persisted in the Amendment. The noble Earl had said truly that if the landlords bought the tenant right they never expected to get it back in rent. If they could not get it back in rent, then it appeared to him that they would be repaid by the tenant who happened to occupy the farm. Though his noble Friend never expected to get recouped, and merely had the pleasure of knowing he was freed from the shackles which the Ulster tenant right imposed as to the selection of the tenant, yet his noble Friend supported an Amendment for payment by the tenant, who had not derived any advantage from the outlay. He should like to know how, if the landlord could not expect to get an equivalent in rent for his capital, he could expect to get the capital itself?

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL explained that his present Amendment was not the same—as it was said to be by his noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal—as that formerly under consideration. The words of his former Amendment were a specific and direct order to the Court to do something; they ordered that money paid by the landlord for the tenant right should be repaid to him; the present Amendment merely said there were circumstances under which they were to consider—that was, it would leave the Court free to judge of the whole circumstances of the case. Why should the Government not accept the suggestion if they had entire confidence in their own Court? It was a very fair one, and one that should be accepted by them.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he could not understand what was supposed to be the difference between the position of those who had bought up the Ulster tenant right, under the Act of 1870, and the position of those who would exercise the right of pre-emption under the 1st clause of the Bill. What those who exercised that right would pay would be exactly what those would pay who had bought up the tenant right under the Act of 1870. The tenant would only get the value of his own improvements and his own goodwill in a sale, and every person that made such a purchase under this Bill would be able to sell it again. The Bill placed that particular class of persons in a position in no way different from that of those who exercised the right of pre-emption. The landlord had got the improvements, and they could no longer be charged against him for rent or other purposes; and if he did not choose to recoup himself by adding to the rent, or having the rent assessed by the Court, that was simply because, for some reason or other, he did not think fit to exercise his right in the way that he could. He could not for the life of him see any injustice in it, and it was no reason that the tenant should therefore be deprived of the advantages of the Bill. It would be better to leave the landlord at liberty to recoup himself by charging a higher rent. The matter should be left to the Court. The Government could not agree to the former or present Amendment.

EARL CAIRNS said, they knew, practically, that purchases of tenant right had not been made by the landlords with a view to increase the rents, but with the object of getting rid of the inconveniences the system inflicted, and giving the landlord the right to choose his tenants. The question their Lordships had to deal with was a short and simple one, and the landlord's right of pre-emption under the 1st clause had nothing whatever to do with it. The landlord had bought up the tenant right under the Act of 1870, for, say, £1,000, that being its selling value in the market. If it again brought £1,000 after this Bill passed, it would have to be decided to whom this £1,000 belonged. It did not belong to the tenant, because he paid nothing whatever for it. It was the landlord who had paid the money. He did not mean to say that there might not be circumstances with regard to subsequent improvements; but it should be for the Court to say how much of that £1,000 should be contributed to the landlord with reference to the purchase he had made, and how much to the tenant in consequence of subsequent improvements or any other item. If the Court was considered competent to settle the rents that should be paid all over Ireland, surely it might be trusted with the decision of this simple matter.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, it would be a great advantage if their Lordships distinctly knew what the effect of the Amendment was. The version given by the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) and that given by the noble Earl the Secretary of State for the Colonies (the Earl of Kimberley) on behalf of the Government differed. He (the Earl of Camperdown) was in favour of the decision of all land questions, whether raised by the landlord or the tenant being left to the Court, and should, therefore, vote for the Amendment.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, he rose merely for the purpose of noticing an observation made by the noble and learned Lord the Lord Chancellor, who stated that the case of the landlord who had bought up the tenant right under the Act of 1870 was on very much the same footing as that of the landlord who might hereafter exercise the right of pre-emption. But was there not this very great distinction? The landlord who after the passing of the Bill exercised the right of pre-emption would do so with his eyes open, and would make such an adjustment of rent to the circumstances of the holding as he might think necessary. But the landlord who had bought up the tenant right relying on the engagement entered into by Parliament in 1870 did not do so with his eyes open. He was hoodwinked by the Act of 1870. He contended, in answer to the argument of his noble Friend (the Earl of Kimberley), that, in these cases where the tenant right had been bought up, the landlords had, as a rule, not been recouped by increase of rent; they had bought up the tenant right in order to relieve the tenancy of an incubus, and the tenants who had occupied their holdings without having to pay a large sum for "goodwill," in addition to a yearly rent, had clearly gained by the arrangement. It was perfectly reasonable, in his opinion, that the Court should be allowed the discretion of awarding to the landlord what sum he could fairly show he was entitled to.

Lords Amendment in page 5, line 10, leave out from ("soil") to the end of the paragraph, disagreed to by the Commons.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD said, that an important change had been made in the Bill since it left their Lordships' House with reference to the deterioration of holdings, which rendered it necessary that he should move an Amendment to the Commons' Amendments. He wished to leave out the words "the deterioration of the soil" in one part of the clause, and insert them at the end, which would indicate more clearly what was intended. There might be no objection to the landlord having to give notice, or being obliged to do so by the Bill, in case of the deterioration of the soil, which was a matter already covered by the clause; but, as the words stood now, they affected the question of buildings, and it would be impossible for the landlord in all cases to give notice of the deterioration of buildings to the tenant. The tenant, for instance, might destroy a building, and how could the landlord be aware of the fact until it was done? Again, there were many thatched houses in Ireland, and a tenant might burn down such a building; but how was the landlord to be on the spot and give the tenant the notice which was required of him? The notice should only refer to the soil, and should have no application to buildings.

Moved, In page 5, line 10, leave out ("the deterioration of the soil,") and in line 13, after ("notice,") insert ("by the deterioration of the soil.")—(The Marquess of Waterford.)

LORD CARLINGFORD said, the Government thought it better, if the notice was to be given at all, that the Bill should stand as it was, because the landlord would be in no way injured by it. In cases such as the noble Marquess referred to, the landlord would simply have to give the notice and then proceed under the powers given him by the statute. Any continuance of waste after the notice was given would be sufficient for the landlord to act upon; and he believed that the power given would tend to narrow the controversy between the two parties. Unless the notices were to be given, hard cases might arise, because he could imagine an owner lying by and allowing the tenant to go on in waste without notice, and then suddenly step in and exercise his rights under the Bill.

EARL CAIRNS said, that a tenant might pull down a house and the landlord might not hear of it until next year. How then could he give the tenant notice? Everyone would admit that the grossest case of waste would be that of the tenant's own house; and he hoped the Amendment would be accepted.

VISCOUNT POWERSCOURT asked whether the noble and learned Earl (Earl Cairns) had ever heard of a tenant pulling down his house? He (Viscount Powerscourt) never had; and even if he had, he should have no objection to such a proceeding. What they complained of was that the tenant built too many houses, such as they were.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that in case of dilapidation by pulling down a house the landlord could insist that the tenant should put it up again.

On question? resolved in the affirmative.

Amendments made by the Commons to Lords Amendment, in page 5, line 15, by striking out in line 4, the words "in addition to," and inserting "otherwise than in substitution for;" and in line 6, leave out from "nor" to "landlord" in line 8.

Moved, "That this House doth agree to the Amendments made by the Commons in the said Amendment."—(The Lord Privy Seal.)

On question?

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, that this provision, requiring the consent of the landlord to sub-letting, had been altered by the House of Commons in two respects. The Amendment which he proposed, and which was accepted by their Lordships, provided that no dwelling-house should be erected on the holding in addition to those already existing. That Amendment, which was destined to prevent over-crowding, from which the people in certain parts of Ireland suffered so much, had been altered by the Commons in such a way as now to make it read to the effect that no such house should be erected, except as allowed by the Act, otherwise than in substitution for those already on the holding. He had no objection to that; indeed, he considered it an improvement, because it was never contemplated that the tenant should be prevented from pulling down a bad house and building a better one in its place. On the contrary, he was most desirous to promote such an arrangement as that. He regretted, however, that the other House had struck out the words prohibiting any building from being used as a dwelling-house which, at the time of the passing of the Act, was not so used. This was meant only to prevent the tenantry from making use of buildings unfit for occupation as dwelling-houses. It was said that the words left out would have given the landlords opportunities of prying into the private affairs of their tenants. All he could say was that it was rather hard that landlords who did not pay attention to these matters should be accused of indifference, and that if they did they should be set down as Paul Pry's and inquisitors. He would not press the point, however, and would assent to the Commons' Amendment.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD said, that he must move the restoration of the words struck out by the Commons, if the noble Marquess would not do so. As the Bill stood, a tenant was not allowed to build for his son, his daughter, or a lodger; but he must lodge them in the pigstye. That was the most extraordinary provision he ever heard of. The tenant was prevented from building, and yet he should lodge them in some building on the farm, buildings on Irish farms not being very numerous or very convenient. He believed that the Irish landlords had generally tried to improve the class of dwellings occupied by the tenants; but the Bill encouraged the families of Irish tenants to remain on the farm, but compelled them to live in pigstyes and hovels in the farm-yards if they did so. He was sure the Government did not desire such a state of things to exist, and hoped, therefore, they would consent to replace the words which had been struck out.

Moved, "That this House doth disagree with the Amendment made by the Commons in line 6 of the said Amendment."—(The Marquess of Waterford.)

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he would remind the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Waterford) that there were ample statutory provisions to meet the case referred to; and they must remember that every breach of these conditions, large or small, might be visited with the sentence of loss of the holding by eviction from it. The Amendment would, he thought, tend to make the subject more involved, especially when they remembered that if another family came to live on the farm, and a fresh house was built, or a stable was turned into a dwelling, from that moment an act of sub-division had taken place in the eye of the law. The whole subject required to be very carefully handled, where nothing less than the forfeiture of the tenancy was involved.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, the object of the Government seemed to be to enact statutory conditions for encouraging sanitary offences and overcrowding, as, while they would allow a man to live in a pigstye, a cow-house, or a barn, they would not let him build a new house. He thought they were very ill-advised in adhering to this Amendment, because it intensified and exaggerated one of the worst evils to which the Irish peasant was exposed. But for the clause, it would be possible for the tenant to build an additional dwelling-house, if one were required, for a married son, or for the accommodation of an increasing family; but it was now proposed to adopt an impracticable vid media, and neither to drive away the surplus population, nor to permit the tenant to provide additional dwellings.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH said, he did not think it was worth while to wrangle over an Amendment of that nature.

On question? resolved in the negative.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Lords Amendments, in page 5, line 32, after ("title") insert ("and which the tenant at the time of the passing of this Act may be entitled by law to cut and remove;") and in line 34, leave out ("may be required") and insert ("the tenant may be entitled to cut in exercise of any right enjoyed by him immediately before the commencement of the statutory term,") to which the Commons have disagreed, not insisted on.

Lords Amendments, in page 5, line 38, after ("game") insert ("as defined for the purposes of the Act twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth Victoria, chapter sixty-seven"); and in line 41, after ("game") insert ("as defined for the purposes of the Act twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth Victoria, chapter sixty-seven," to which the Commons have disagreed, not insisted on.

Amendment made by the Commons to the Lords Amendment, in page 5, line 43, agreed to.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD moved to add wild duck, widgeon, and teal to the description of game to be preserved for the landlords. That would only be placing them in the position they now occupied, and the Government had stated that they had no desire to unduly interfere with the landlord's rights. This was a much more important matter than some people thought, because in some parts of Ireland wild duck, widgeon, and teal were the only wild game to be found, and if the landlord's right to preserve them was taken away it would be a serious matter. He, therefore, hoped the Government would accept the Amendment.

Moved, In last line of said Amendment, to leave out ("snipe,") and insert ("snipe, wild-duck, widgeon, and teal.")—(The Marquess of Waterford.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that the birds mentioned were not considered in the Game Act of England as game.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD said, they were considered as game in Ireland, and were always reserved in Irish leases.

On question? resolved in the affirmative.

Lords Amendment, in page 6, line 1, leave out ("persistently"), disagreed to by the Commons.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD moved to omit the word "persistently," and insert instead thereof the word "unreasonably." The clause as it stood would enable a number of tenants to combine together and obstruct the landlord, although they did not persistently do so.

Moved, To leave out the word ("persistently") in the said Amendment, and insert ("unreasonably.")—(The Marquess of Waterford.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR opposed the alteration. He thought the word "persistently" was much better than the word "unreasonably."

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, there might be a conspiracy amongst several tenants to commit this offence, and the word "unreasonably" would strike at that, while "persistently" might not.

On question? resolved in the negative.

On the Motion of The LORD PRIVY SEAL Lords Amendment not insisted on.

Lords Amendment, in page 6, lines 3 and 4, after ("sub-section,") insert—

("During the continuance of a statutory term, all mines and minerals, coal, and coal pits, quarries of limestone and other stone and slate, gravel and sandpits, woods and underwoods, and all bogs and bog timber, turbaries for cutting turf, and rights of turbary, except such of the said rights as the tenant, under the contract of tenancy subsisting immediately before the commencement of the statutory term, was lawfully entitled to exercise, shall be deemed to be exclusively reserved to the landlord,")

—disagreed to by the Commons.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the House do not insist on the Amendment, said, it was open to the objection that it was not desirable to put in the Bill that which was entirely unnecessary in point of law.

Moved, "That this House do not insist on the said Amendment to which the Commons hath disagreed."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD moved that so much of the Amendment as related to mines and minerals, coals and coalpits should be retained in the Bill. As regarded the remainder of the Amendment, he did not think it was necessary.

Moved, To leave out from ("coalpits,") in line 3, of the said Amendment, to ("shall") in line 8.—(The Marquess of Waterford.)

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he could not understand what was the noble Marquess's reason for making such a proposal. There could be no doubt that the landlord's property was fully protected, and that these words were wholly unnecessary.

On question? resolved in the affirmative.

Lords' Amendment, as amended, insisted on.

Lords Amendment, in page 6, line 8, leave out ("consequent on an increase of rent by the landlord"), disagreed to by the Commons.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY moved that the House insist on the Amendment. If the words were left out, the only effect would be that those landlords who had not gone through the qualifying process of asking an increase of rent would have the same privileges in respect of resumption which were conferred by the clause as those would have who had gone through that process. He was unable to understand why the fact of a landlord having raised the rent should be regarded as a special qualification for the resumption of his holding, or any portion of it, for the purposes specified in the sub-section.

Moved, To insist on the Amendment in page 6, line 8, to which the Commons have disagreed.—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

LORD CARLINGFORD said, that the Government could not consent to the omission of the words. Their appearance in the place where they were found in the clause was a mere matter of drafting to make a necessary reference to the 7th clause. They had no force in connection with the place where they appeared, any further than pointing out where the real question they were intended to deal with was situated. If necessary at all, that was not the proper place to make such an Amendment as that desired by the noble Marquess.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY thought the clause would read perfectly well without them.

On question? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 113; Not-Contents 37: Majority 76.

Resolved in the affirmative.

On the Motion of The Earl of Donoughmore, Lords Amendment, in page 6, line 27, leave out from ("as") to ("prohibits") in line 33, disagreed to by the Commons, insisted on.

Lords Amendment, in page 6, line 37, leave out from ("land") to ("From") in page 7, line 27, disagreed to by the Commons.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE contended that their Lordships should insist on amending the clauses in the direction of their previous Amendment limiting the scale of compensation. He would, therefore, move that the provisions regulating the higher scale of compensation which had been struck out of the Bill by their Lordships, but re-inserted by the Commons, should be again struck out, with the intention of subsequently moving the introduction of a more moderate scale.

Moved, To insist on the Amendment in page 6, line 37, to which the Commons have disagreed.—(The Earl of Donoughmore.)

LORD CARLINGFORD said, that, having accepted the principle of compensation for disturbance, he did not think it worth while for the noble Earl to insist upon this particular Amendment, contesting it now. Although the Government expected that compensation for disturbance would have small effect under the provisions of the Bill, as it would probably not affect many holdings, they desired that, whenever for any reason it might be brought into operation, it should be in the shape now proposed—that was, should be effective. The Government had proceeded on the authority of many of the Judges who administered the law, some of whom recommended a larger increase in the scale than was now proposed.

THE EARL OF PEMBROKE asked whether these opinions were got before or after the introduction of the present Bill?

EARL SPENCER replied, that these opinions were given in the evidence before the Land Commission.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that the cases to which the Judges had referred were cases in which the incoming tenant had induced the landlord to get rid of the outgoing tenant by a promise to pay compensation. That was to say, it was worth the incoming tenant's while to pay a slight additional rent, and also compensation for the disturbance induced by eviction. It was evident that under the present Bill, with the right of free sale existing, the bargain would have taken place directly between the parties, and no question of eviction would have arisen. Those opinions, therefore, had been given under a totally different state of things from that which would arise under the Bill. He wished to add that, in his opinion, the upper portion of the proposed scale of compensation was wholly uncalled for by the present state of Ireland. The noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal had confessed that the provision of compensation for disturbance was a more decided violation of principle than anything in that Bill.

LORD CARLINGFORD explained his statement to be that the principle of compensation for disturbance was in principle a greater interference with the landlord than the necessity now laid upon him of recognizing the sale of tenancies.

On question? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 100; Not-Contents 39: Majority 61.

Resolved in the affirmative.

On the Motion of The Earl of Do-NOUGHMORE, clause amended as follows:—In page 6, line 37, insert—

("And the said section three shall hereafter be read as if from such section were omitted the words 'for the loss which the Court shall find to be sustained by him by reason of quitting his holding,' so that the said section shall be read as providing that the tenant therein mentioned shall be entitled to such compensation as the Court, in view of all the circumstances of the case, shall think just, subject to the scale of compensation hereinafter mentioned.

"The compensation payable under the said section three in the case of a tenant disturbed in his holding by the act of a landlord after the passing of this Act shall be as follows, in the case of holdings—

"Where the rent is thirty pounds or under, a sum not exceeding seven years' rent;

"Where the rent is above thirty pounds and not exceeding fifty pounds, a sum not exceeding five years' rent;

"Where the rent is 'above fifty pounds and not exceeding one hundred pounds, a sum not exceeding four years' rent;

"Where the rent is above one hundred pounds, a sum not exceeding three years' rent, but in no case shall the compensation exceed five hundred pounds.

"Any tenant in a higher class of the scale may, at his option, claim compensation under a lower class, provided such compensation shall not exceed the compensation to which he would be entitled under such lower class on the assumption that the rent of his holding was reduced to the sum (or where two sums are mentioned the higher sum) stated in such lower class.")

Lords Amendment, in page 8, line
15, leave out from the second ("landlord") to ("may") in line 17, disagreed to by the Commons, not insisted on.

EARL CAIRNS said, that the Bill, as it was originally introduced, did not give the landlord access to the Court unless he proposed to raise the rent. Their Lordships, however, being of opinion that both parties should have equal access, made the Bill read that the Court might be approached by the tenant, or by the landlord and tenant jointly, or by the landlord; and the Commons had struck out the addition which extended the right to the landlord. It was proposed in the other House, at a time when the Amendment could not be entertained, to make the clause read, "or by the landlord if the parties have otherwise failed to come to an agreement;" and he should propose to make that Amendment now, on the ground that it was necessary to do equal justice to landlord and tenant. It was a most invidious position for the landlord that he should have to demand an increase of rent before he could have access to the Court, which should be equally open to him as to the tenant. Still believing in the justice of their contention he hoped the House would agree to his present proposition.

Moved, To leave out from ("after") in line 15, to ("may") in line 17, and insert ("if the parties have otherwise failed to come to an agreement.")—(The Earl Cairns.)

EARL SPENCER said, that in the other House the Government, in order to put the landlord and tenant on a more perfect footing of equality, had been willing to insert certain words varying somewhat slightly from those just proposed; but considerable importance was attached to that variation. The Forms of the House, however, prevented those words being proposed; but he now submitted them—namely, "or having otherwise failed to agree with the tenant as to what a fair rent is." The view of the Government was that, in the beginning, the parties did not stand on an equal footing; that the landlord had considerable advantages over the tenants in various ways, including the advantage of the possession of a large purse, and therefore the Government admitted the equity of the position taken up by the Commons. The Government were anxious to encourage the landlord and tenant to settle these matters out of Court, if possible; in fact, they considered it was only a part of the landlord's duty to do so. They therefore proposed that they should do so by means of the words originally inserted.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, while sympathizing with the Government in their desire that the parties should endeavour to arrange without coming to the Court, preferred the words of his noble and learned Friend (Earl Cairns), in order to meet the case where the tenant was in a state of hostility to his landlord, excited by outside parties.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR having spoken in favour of the original words,

Earl Cairns

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he thought it would be unfortunate if the Government insisted that where landlord and tenant could not come to an agreement in consequence of some external influence operating on the tenant, the landlord should be forced to demand an increase of rent in order to open the doors of the Court to himself. It would simply add unnecessarily to the bitterness between the two parties. Again, there were many reasons why a landlord might like to have his rent fixed by the Court, although he did not want to increase his rent. For instance, he might wish to have it fixed for purposes of sale.

On question? resolved in the affirmative.

Lords Amendment, in page 8, line 20, leave out from ("parties") to second ("and") in line 21, disagreed to by the Commons.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he must now ask the House to insist upon the Amendment in the 7th clause, which provided that a tenant of a present tenancy, or the tenant or landlord jointly, might apply to the Court from time to time to have a fair rent fixed, and that the Court might fix such rent after hearing the parties, and "having regard to the interests of the landlord and tenant respectively." The matter was one to which considerable importance was attached in Ireland. He proposed to leave out the words, "having regard to the interests of the landlord and tenant respectively." He freely admitted that these words had had no special sense attached to them; and if they were used in an English Bill they would not excite very much remark. But there was no doubt that when they were introduced in the House of Commons, though they did not excite very much feeling on the part of the Government at the time, and were described as being merely sentimental, yet, when they became more generally known, it was felt that they implied something more than at first sight appeared. This Bill had, more than any other Bill with which he was acquainted, reference to public opinion in the community with which it had to deal; and the words in question were to be viewed not only with reference to their precise legal effect, but also with reference to their operation in the minds of those to whom they applied. There was no doubt that, innocent as these words appeared, they raised very considerable apprehension among the landowners, especially in the North of Ireland, and he believed all over the country, that when brought before the Court, and when they had to operate on the minds of the Judges, they would have an effect most prejudicial and detrimental to the just rights of the landlord in the way of reducing his "fair rent." The belief entertained was that their effect would be to establish a species of right destructive of the rights of the landlords and tend to mislead the Judges. They were in the nature of an instruction to the Court to take care of the interests of the plaintiff and the defendant respectively; and such a recommendation to any ordinary Court of Law in England would be considered, if not as an insult, at least something more than unnecessary. It was dangerous to make provisions which the state of the law did not absolutely require, and in which an occult meaning was sure to be looked for, as the Government had, in the course of these discussions, perpetually reminded them. It was well to consider this in dealing with Commissioners who certainly would constitute a very remarkable anomaly in the history of British law, and it was especially wise to consider it in dealing with a matter so delicate as that of the rights of landlord and tenant respectively. No good reason could be shown for the insertion of the words; and as the landlords would be put in a very unusual position by the subjection of their rights to this qualification, it seemed to him that their Lordships would do well to adhere to their Amendment.

Moved, To insist on the Amendment in page 8, line 20, to which the Commons have disagreed.—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

LORD CARLINGFORD said, his thanks were due to the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury), because he had made his (Lord Carlingford's) speech for him. The noble Marquess had recognized the fact that the Government, in acceding to the insertion of those words in the clause, and desiring to retain them now as a convenient exposition of the general directions given to the Court as to the way it was to deal with the question, did not do so with the view of adding anything to the purview and principle of the Rent Clause. The noble Marquess's argument was that the insertion of the words excited alarm on the part of the landlords; but the Government urged that their omission would cause alarm in the minds of another and much larger class in Ireland—namely, the tenants, and in the present condition of that country the danger of alarm was beyond all comparison greater in the case of the tenant than of the landlord. The tenant class was the class they desired to secure and calm, not only by the legal provisions of the Bill, but in feeling. The mind of the great but poor tenant class was much more likely to be seized with groundless alarm than that of the landlord class. He was convinced that within the next few months this groundless panic would pass away from the minds of both; but if there must be alarm, it was far safer that the tenant class should not be the class to be alarmed. For this reason, he claimed the speech of the noble Marquess as an argument in favour of retaining the words, in order to escape for a time the alarm which would be attended with the most serious consequences.

THE DUKE OF ABERCORN, in supporting the Motion, said, he thought the retention of these words would be followed by the most serious consequences, and that the alarm of the landlords was by no means groundless. If the Bill, as it professed, only extended the Ulster tenant right custom to the rest of Ireland, although that would not be fair to those landlords on whose estates it had not been practised, it would be less open to objection; but it enlarged the custom into unknown quantities, and extended something much more injurious to the landlords. The custom had never interfered with a fair rent; it had been a thing outside the rent; it did not affect the rent, and was not affected by it. True, a very unfair rent would materially affect the tenant right of a farm; but a very unfair rent per se without reference to the tenant right could be satisfactorily regulated by the Land Court. The words contained in the clause were contrary to the whole spirit and principle of the Ulster tenant right custom; and the effect of it might be very injurious, in that the rents of the landlords might be eaten up. The more lenient a landlord had been and the lower his rents had been, the higher the tenant right was upon his estate, and the greater would be the fine imposed upon him in the diminution of his income. The clause would have the effect of inducing a new tenant to give a preposterous price for the tenant right in the hope that that might induce the landlord to reduce the rent. The words objected to were not in the Bill originally; they were accepted by Mr. Gladstone without any hesitation whatever, on the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell), who was a strong tenant right advocate. To show that the idea was not in the mind of Mr. Gladstone, but that it was contrary to his views, he would refer their Lordships to a speech by Mr. Gladstone, in which the Prime Minister said it would be better to deal with the tenants' interest, without mentioning the landlords' interest, and to deal with rent without mentioning the tenants' interest; that if they were mentioned together it would give rise to the idea that they were opposed to each other, and that it was their business to prevent the growth of the mischievous notion that there was a direct conflict between the landlord's interest in the rent and the tenants' interest in his holding. These words were in accordance with the Amendment of the noble Marquess; and the Prime Minister, in accepting those words and putting them into the Bill, under pressure from the Irish Members, had shown another of those changes of front of which he was so great a master. At the risk of wearying the House, he (the Duke of Abercorn) would state a case which had actually occurred to him, and which might be multiplied elsewhere. On a farm of his, a tenancy-at-will, at a fair moderate rent—£94 a-year—an incoming tenant, two or three years ago, gave £2,700 for the tenant right. The interest on that, at the lowest rate, was £112 a-year. The tenant came and said—"My interest on my holding is £112 a-year. The interest to my landlord is £94." What would the landlord receive in that case, and what would the Court decide under the words of the clause as to the rent payable? He hoped their Lordships would assent to the Amendment of the noble Marquess.

The Duke of Abercorn

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he had heard with surprise the speech of the noble Duke (the Duke of Abercorn), and he could not help thinking that his arguments were of a very unfortunate description. The words found fault with were that the Court was—

"To take into account all the circumstances of the case, and amongst other things to have regard to the interests of the landlord and tenant respectively;"

and nothing could be more clearly just. Did the noble Duke mean to say that the tenant had no interests to which regard should be paid? What he would have a right to was his improvements, and he would also have a right to the fixity of tenure which this Bill would give him. He (the Lord Chancellor) should have thought, therefore, nothing was more clear in this world than that the tenants had rights to which regard must be had, as much as to the interests of the landlord. These words—"having regard to the interests of the landlord and tenant respectively," had no tendency whatever to define the interests of the tenant any more than the interests of the landlord; to put them in any way whatever in opposite scales, or make them in any degree antagonistic to each other. They pointed out, in the only way possible, that the tenant had interests as well as the landlord, and a more baseless argument than that which seemed to deny it he could not conceive. The words were absolutely legal, strictly impartial, and entirely just so far as they were material; in fact, he was unable to conceive any that were more so, and to insist on striking them out was to aid and feed alarm instead of removing it. The words did not suggest ever so remotely any scale in which the one interest was to be put against the other. They merely laid down the duty of the Court, to look impartially to both. That appeared to be perfectly fair, and he owned that if there was any conceivable argument against the words it was that they were so obviously just and right that their insertion was unnecessary. But the arguments of the noble Duke showed that they were necessary, for they did not recognize any interest of the tenant. They thought it absolutely wrong to do so. ["No, no!"]

THE DUKE OF ABERCORN explained that he had plainly recognized that interest; but he objected to it as an element in the determining of the rent.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that was the very object of these words—to consider what should be the rent. On the one hand, the landlord's just rights ought not, in his (the Lord Chancellor's) opinion, to be in the slightest degree cut down or derogated from by the greater or lesser amount which the tenant might be able to get in the market without the concurrence of the landlord; and, on the other hand, in his humble opinion, it would be equally unjust to increase the rent, because the tenant was able to bring to the market his tenant right as a marketable and valuable commodity. On the one side and on the other, it would be the duty of the Court not to lay a rent upon the tenant, because of the value of the tenant right in the market; and, on the other hand, not to deduct from the landlord a rent justly due, because of the value of the tenant right in the market. On both sides it did appear to him that these words pointed to nothing but the doing of pure and simple justice; and those who objected to them suggested to simple minds the idea that pure and simple justice was not acceptable to them. ["No, no!" from the Opposition.] It was in the interests of noble Lords themselves that he pointed that out, as nothing was more likely to call in question their motives and purposes. It might not be their object; but it was the effect of what they were doing. He, therefore, thought that it would be very unwise on the part of their Lordships to leave the words out.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD said, that the noble and learned Lord (the Lord Chancellor) had stated that these words should be retained out of simple justice to the tenant; but he would tell their Lordships that they would, if retained, result in the very greatest injustice being done to the landlords of Ireland. The tenants were amply protected under the Bill. His complaint was that they directed the Court, in fixing the rent, to take into consideration the tenant's interest in his holding. He maintained that these words would force the Court, after finding out what a fair rent was, to reduce it by the interest upon the amount the tenant had paid for his tenant right; a provision that would, sooner or later, reduce rents to a minus quantity. The noble Lord (the Lord Privy Seal) had spoken of the alarm of the tenants; but he (the Marquess of Waterford) could answer for the tenants that they could feel no alarm under the Bill, for they had no reason to fear; but, on the other hand, the landlords would have great reason. Their rents would be reduced under this Proviso by the growth of the tenant right, and in process of time they would be completely ruined, if not entirely wiped off the face of the earth, because each time a statutory term was fixed the rent would be reduced, and the tenant right increased; and the lower the rent the higher would be the tenant right. If no directions were introduced the Court would proceed to settle the rent according to the usage in Ulster, where the amount paid for tenant right was never taken into consideration. He hoped their Lordships would strike out the words.

VISCOUNT POWERSCOURT opposed the Amendment on the ground that it touched not only the tenant right introduced by the Bill, but also the tenant right of Ulster. He regretted that noble Lords opposite took so cynical a view of tenant right, which had its market price, and, instead of being artificially restricted, ought to be left to the operation of the law of supply and demand. Unless the Bill granted tenant right, and unlimited tenant right, it would be practically useless. Ireland wanted quietness and peace, and to attain this state depended entirely upon granting an unlimited tenant right to the Irish tenant. He, therefore, thought that the retention of the words would be most useful, and that they would incur a serious responsibility in omitting them.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, that he wished to say a very few words in justification of the vote which he should give. He did not think the words could fitly be called neutral—far from that being so, they had a distinct significance. The reference to the landlord's interest was, indeed, little more than surplusage, because it would be impossible to fix rent without a reference to that interest. The words in question, however, were inserted with the object of introducing a reference to the tenant's interest, and they would, he apprehended, be regarded by the Court as mandatory and induce it to create an interest of that kind, even where such an interest had not existed hitherto. He pointed that out on the occasion of the Bill coming before their Lordships for a second reading. Since then, however, the Bill had been read a second time, and, as he took it, they were committed to the principle of the Bill as a tenant right Bill, and indeed something very like an unrestricted tenant right Bill. It had always seemed to him idle to suppose that there could be tenant right of that description without its existence tending ultimately to diminish the rent of the landlord. It was all very well for the Lord Privy Seal to assert that the rent and the tenant right might exist side by side. They might, he would acknowledge, do so at the outset; but, in the long run, economical forces would assert themselves, and it would be found that the tenant right tended to prevent the landlord from obtaining a legitimate increase of rent; while, on the other hand, if there were a fall of agricultural produce, the effect of tenant right would be to throw the whole of the loss on the landlord's shoulders. Those were the inevitable consequences of the creation of tenant right; but they had created it all over Ireland, and so they must look the matter in the face. It was idle with one hand to give tenant right to every tenant in Ireland, and with the other to take back any of the incidents which properly belonged to it. They should have the courage of their opinions; and as, by voting the second reading of the Bill, they had accepted the principle of tenant right, they ought to support Her Majesty's Government in resisting any attempt to deprive that custom of what he believed to be an inseparable incident. In The Arabian Nights, a story was told of a fisherman who, one day, brought up from the sea in his net a carefully stoppered bottle. He took out the stopper, and there emerged an enormous monster who had been imprisoned in the bottle for a long time, and who most ungratefully at once threatened to destroy his liberator. The fisherman asked as a last favour before he died that he should be shown the way the monster got into the bottle. The monster then went into the bottle, upon which the fisherman put in the stopper, and, for aught he (the Marquess of Lansdowne) knew, it had remained there ever since. Now, it seemed to him that the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) and his Friends opposite had consented to take out the stopper and had liberated the monster; but there was this difference between that particular monster and the monster of the present day, that the latter would not go back into the bottle. They must, therefore, submit with the best grace they could to the consequences of what they had done; and, having that opinion, he should support the Government in resisting the Amendment.

THE EARL OF ANNESLEY said, he had been informed that the opinion of one of the most eminent Queen's Counsel in the North of Ireland was that if these words were retained they would bring ruin to every landed owner on whose property tenant right existed.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH, though not attaching much importance to the words, the effect of which he considered had been over-rated, could not help thinking that it would be better to leave them out.

Resolved in the affirmative.

Lords Amendment, in page 8, line 23, after ("rent,") insert—

(" Provided always, that where application is made to the court under this section in respect of any tenancy, and the court is of opinion that the tenant of the holding in which such tenancy subsists, or his predecessors in title, has or have caused or suffered such holding to become deteriorated, contrary to the express or implied conditions constituting the contract of tenancy, the court may refuse the application, or may postpone the further hearing of the same until after the performance by the tenant of such conditions as the court may think proper,") —disagreed to by the Commons.

THE EARL OF PEMBROKE, in proposing to insist on the Amendment, said, he proposed to leave the words ("or his predecessors") and ("or have") out of the Proviso on this occasion. The only objection the Government made to the Amendment was that it was surplusage, its object being already provided for by the general powers given in the Equities Clause. He thought the surplusage argument came badly from a Government that were always ready to indulge in it when it was the tenant's interest that required protection. And he could not admit that it was unnecessary, or understand how anyone who knew the state of Ireland could believe that the Courts would have to refuse a man a statutory term on account of the condition of his farm, merely because they were permitted, though not enjoined, by the Act to do so. But if the Government were right in their view on this point, they were more than ever bound to insert the proposed provision as a warning to the tenant, who would otherwise go with light heart and a shabby farm to get his rent fixed, and be equally astonished and disappointed at the refusal by the Court of a statutory term.

The Irish landlords had a right to claim protection under this Bill that deprived them of the power to protect themselves. The Bill was going to do a vast amount of harm. Let them, at least, do a little good; and, seeing the amount of harm the Bill was certain to do, it would be a great relief if they were allowed to do a little good by the insertion of the Amendment.

On the Motion of The Earl of PEMBROKE, Amendment amended, by leaving out, in line 5, the words ("or his predecessors in title,") and ("or have.")

Moved, To insist on the Amendment, to which the Commons have disagreed, as now amended.—(The Earl of Pembroke.)

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he thought the Amendment was unnecessary, for a farmer who had farmed badly would be much more likely to get his holding into good condition again when he had obtained a statutory term than he was before, in order to avoid the penalties of the Act. The Government would adhere to the words of the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that the one great sin in agriculture was allowing a holding to deteriorate. Therefore, he considered this a very important point. They ought to prevent the tenant from deteriorating his farm with the view of getting a low rent fixed. They were really offering a direct reward to the tenant to do that which it was their policy and their object to prevent.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR considered that the 8th clause gave ample protection, and objected to fettering the hands of the Court.

On question?

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he would not put their Lordships to the trouble of dividing.

Resolved in the affirmative.

Lords Amendment, in page 8, line 35, leave out from ("landlord") to the end of sub-section ("3,") disagreed to by the Commons.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, in moving that the Amendment be insisted on, said, he proposed to further amend it by the omission of all words after the words "statutory conditions" in line 34, as he considered it was a provision that was most objectionable, and would prevent, in many cases, the resumption of a holding by a landlord for the space of 33 years. If the Amendment were agreed to, the sub-section would read as follows:—

"Where the judicial rent of any present tenancy has been fixed by the court, then, until the expiration of a term of fifteen years from the next rent day, such present tenancy shall be deemed to be a tenancy subject to statutory conditions."

The following part of the sub-section would be omitted:—

"And having the same incidents as a tenancy subject to statutory conditions consequent on an increase of rent by a landlord, with this modification, that, during the statutory term in a present tenancy consequent on the first determination of a judicial rent of that tenancy by the court, application by the landlord to authorise the resumption of the holding or part thereof by him for some purpose having relation to the good of the holding or of the estate shall not be entertained by the court, unless (a) such present tenancy has arisen, at the expiration of a judicial lease, or of a lease existing at the time of the passing of this Act, and originally made for a term of not less than thirty-one years; or (b) it is proved to the satisfaction of the court that before the passing of this Act the reversion expectant on the determination of a lease of the holding was purchased by the landlord or his predecessors in title with the view of letting or otherwise disposing of the land for building purposes on the determination of such lease, and that it is bonâ fide required by him for such purpose."

The expediency of the clause as amended was so necessary that he hoped the Government would not think it necessary to divide the House against it. The landlord ought to have the full right of resumption, not only for the good of the country, but for civilization itself. He could not imagine any provision more hostile to the progress of the country; and, unless the Amendment were agreed to, it would be next to impossible to extend what were now growing towns in various parts of Ireland; and he, therefore, earnestly hoped that the Government would not insist upon the insertion of the words which would in very many cases prevent resumption altogether.

Moved, To amend the said Amendment of this House, to which the Commons have disagreed, by leaving out, in addition, all the words after ("statutory conditions,") in line 34; and to insist on the Amendment as amended.—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

The Earl of Pembroke

LORD CARLINGFORD said, the Government could not agree to the proposal of the noble Marquess.

EARL SPENCER said, he rose to point out the great difference between the Bill as it stood at present, and the Bill as it came up from the Commons. That fact seemed to be overlooked during the discussion. The modification in question had been introduced to meet some of the hardships which had been brought before their Lordships a few evenings since, and which it was then generally admitted ought to be removed. It appeared to him that what the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) wanted was that the landlord should have a power of resumption at any time; but he (Earl Spencer) thought it was not right that the landlord should have the power of resumption in all cases, and the modifications in the Commons showed that the other House were willing to meet the views of that House to a very great extent.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, the Bill admitted that, on certain conditions, the landlord should have a power of resumption, and while he was sorry they had not gone a little farther, he thought the Amendment of the Government a fair compromise, and one of great value; and he would not, therefore, push his opposition to the clause any further. He could not, however, quite understand the position of the Government as regarded resumption, for the provision referred to in the Amendment deprived the landlord of the power of resumption for 15 years, and that deprivation seemed really to be giving to the tenant the perpetuity of tenure the existence of which had always been denied in the Bill.

On question?

The House being cleared for the Division.

EARL GRANVILLE, remaining seated, said, he would not put their Lordships to the trouble of dividing. It was clear that noble Lords opposite were prepared to follow the lead of the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) whenever he desired it; and he would not, therefore, impose upon their Lordships a needless trouble. He said this because he wished their Lordships to understand that if the Government did not divide the House on the Amendment and on the numerous Amendments of the noble Marquess, it was not because they agreed with them, but because it was useless to divide in the present state of the House, and to give their Lordships the needless trouble of walking out and in to the House again every few minutes.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that the remark of the noble Earl (Earl Granville) seemed to imply that his Friends would follow him (the Marquess of Salisbury) blindly in the course he was taking. He could assure the noble Earl they were as incapable of following him blindly, as he was incapable of acting without due consultation with them.

Resolved in the affirmative.

Lords Amendment, in page 9, line 14, leave out ("may, if it think fit,") and insert ("shall, if the landlord so requires,") disagreed to by the Commons, not insisted on.

Lords Amendment, in page 9, line 16, amended by the Commons as follows:— In lines 6 and 7, after "made," insert "and substantially maintained;" and after "landlord," leave out "or," and insert "and."

On the Motion of The Marquess of SALISBURY, Commons Amendments to the said Lords Amendment further amended, by substituting the words ("or acquired, and have in the main been upheld" for ("and substantially maintained;") leaving out ("and,") and inserting ("or;") and in line 8, after ("not,") inserting the words ("made or acquired.")

Lords Amendments, in page 9, line 39, leave out from ("term") to ("in") in line 41, and insert ("and on any such application no rent shall be made payable;") and in line 42, after ("title,") insert ("during such statutory term,") disagreed to by the Commons, and which were further amended, so as to restore the sub-section (8) as follows:—

"No rent shall be allowed or made payable in any proceedings under this Act in respect of improvements made by the tenant or his predecessors in title, and for which in the opinion of the court, the tenant or his predecessors in title shall not have been paid or compensated by the landlord or his predecessors in title,"

—not insisted on.

Moved, At end of the sub-section add—

("Provided that the court shall take into consideration the time during which such tenant

may have enjoyed the advantage of such improvements, and also the rent at which such holding has been held, and any benefits which such tenant may have received from his landlord in consideration, expressly or impliedly, of the improvements so made."—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

LORD CARLINGFORD said, that he could not accept the Amendment, for nothing was more important in the whole range of the Bill than that security should be given to the tenant for the value of his improvements. In England they could scarcely realize what was meant by an Irish tenant making permanent outlay upon another man's land. For the interest of all parties, everything should be done to induce the tenant to invest labour and capital on his holding with as much confidence as if the land were his own. If he did he would confer the most essential benefits not only upon himself, but upon the landlord and the country. The Government believed the provision was now in the best shape by far that it had yet attained, and they thought it better not to confine this provision for the security of tenants' improvements to future settlement of rents, but to apply it also to the first settlement under the Bill. He thought the words at present contained in the Bill were quite sufficient to meet the object in view, and they fully secured the landlord against injustice.

On question? resolved in the affirmative.

Lords Amendment, in page 9, after line 42, insert as a new sub-section—

"(9.) The rent of a holding shall not be reduced in any proceedings under this Act on account of any money or money's worth paid or given by the tenant or his predecessors in title, otherwise than to the landlord, on coming into the holding."

—disagreed to by the Commons, not insisted on.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, though it had been decided against, he still remained of opinion that, in some form or other, the principle of his Amendment should be adopted. He should, therefore, propose to move some other words, which he thought would place in more precise form the entire independence which he wished to secure between the rent and the price given for the holding. The point he wished to secure was that, apart from other considerations, the price given for the holding should not affect the rent either one way or the other. Let the improvements by all means affect the rents as much as they would; but the price given for the holding, whether it varied up or down, ought to have nothing to do with the amount which the landlord had the right to demand for judicial rent, and that in the interest of the tenant no less than of the landlord. It seemed to him that there was no safety for either party unless these two elements were left absolutely apart. He was glad to observe that the Prime Minister had held distinctly the language that the rent would not be affected by the price given for the holding. That might be to the interest of the tenant no less than of the landlord. The tenant might go to the landlord and say—"I have given a great deal for this holding; you must reduce my rent accordingly." But another operation was likely to occur. There would be in the market a mass of saleable holdings; they would fetch less than hitherto; and the landlord might say that, as a tenant paid less than hitherto for his holding, he ought to have his rent raised accordingly. He wished to exclude that operation just as much as the other. He would therefore move an Amendment to the effect that the amount paid for the holding should not of itself, apart from other considerations, be deemed to be a ground for increasing or reducing the rent.

Moved. To insert, in lieu of the new sub-section inserted by the Lords after line 42, to which the Commons have disagreed, the following words:—

("The amount of money or money's worth that may have been paid or given for the tenancy of any holding by a tenant or his predecessors in title otherwise than to the landlord or his predecessors in title shall not of itself apart from other considerations be deemed to be a ground for reducing or increasing the rent of such holding.")—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he must point out to the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) that under those words there would still be cases in which it might be the duty of the Court to consider, as a part of the facts of the case, the price that the tenant had given to his predecessor. He did not, of course, mean that the rent was to be reduced, because the tenant in question had chosen to give any extravagant or any particular price to his predecessor for the tenant right; but those payments would com-stantly cover and represent the permanent improvements on the farm; and, taking it in that way, it might be quite possible that unless they took the utmost care in framing those words they should contradict their own convictions with respect to the sanctity of the tenant's improvements. If he had bought them of his predecessor, he was in the same position as if he had made them himself. It was conceivable that the rent might afterwards be raised so as to confiscate these improvements. The Court, in fact, might find that the existing rent had been in part a charge upon the value of those improvements. It was difficult to frame an Amendment of this kind, and in the opinion of the Government it was totally unnecessary. They meant to adhere to their own form of words. The noble Marquess had not dealt with the case formerly put to him of a payment being made by the incoming tenant with the distinct privity of the landlord.

Resolved in the affirmative.

Lords Amendment, in page 11, line 12, leave out from ("and") to ("considering") in line 14, disagreed to by the Commons, insisted on.

Lords Amendments, in page 13, lines 31 and 32, leave out ("immediate landlord for the time being,") and insert ("landlord being a limited owner"); and in line 34, leave out ("next superior"), and after ("being") insert ("succeeding to him in estate"), disagreed to by the Commons.

EARL CAIRNS, in moving that the Amendments be insisted on, maintained that as, on the termination of a lease, the tenant ought to give up possession to the landlord, still more did that principle apply to middlemen, under whom other persons were in possession of the land.

Moved, "That this House doth insist on the said Amendments made by this House, to which the Commons have disagreed."—(The Earl Cairns.)

LORD CARLINGFORD said, it was quite impossible to except sub-tenants from the whole of the provisions and protection of the Bill, which would be the effect of the Amendment. The sub-tenants in question would have been lawfully created under leases which did not forbid sub-letting; and the superior landlord in these cases would, by his own act, have been a party to the creation of sub-tenants.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY remarked, that the Government, by their arguments, seemed to proceed on the assumption that the interests of the landlord were of the very smallest importance, and need not be considered. When those leases were originally granted, what was there to induce the landlord to believe that, in 1881, there would arise such a political power as would force the Government to abandon all principles of political economy, and set aside the rights of property which had hitherto been held good? It was impossible that he could have foreseen such a contingency and taken precautions against it. Therefore, the superior landlord was dealt with in a peculiarly hard manner by the provisions of the Bill for acts which had been omitted by the middlemen.

EARL GRANVILLE said, the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) reproached Her Majesty's Government with not considering the interest of the landlords. He was bound to say, on behalf of his Colleagues in "another place," that they had, in the late discussions, tried to draw a just balance between the landlords and the tenants, and had, in the interests of the landlords, opposed a great many propositions which were made against them. On the other hand, he (Earl Granville) was not aware that the noble Marquess had moved a single Amendment or delivered a single speech in favour of the tenants.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he thought it would be unwise to reject the Commons' proposal. The only argument which they had heard from the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) in favour of the Amendment was, that when, many years ago, the leases were created, the landlord did not foresee that any such Bill as this would be introduced into Ireland. Of course, they did not; but political circumstances which until that evening, he thought, had been recognized by the majority of their Lordships, had made it seem necessary for the social good of that country that the occupying tenants should have the advantages intended for them by this Bill; and what their Lordships were really asked to do was to take a large number of tenants holding under middlemen leases entirely out of the benefit of the Act. To omit a large class of these occupying tenants was to exhibit a total forgetfulness of all the objects and principles of the Bill. He sincerely hoped their Lordships would not persevere with this Amendment.

On question ? resolved in the negative.

Commons Amendments to Lords Amendment, in page 14, after Clause 15, insert Clause (B), and which Amendments were as follows:—In line 2, insert "in common with other persons;" in lines 3 and 4, leave out "in common with other persons;" in lines 5 and 6, leave out "which right is in this section referred to as a common right;" and in line 14, insert "express or implied"—agreed to.

Lords Amendment, in page 14, line 13, leave out from ("the") to the end of the clause, and insert—

("Portion of any holding so let does not exceed half an acre in each case, and that the total number of such lettings of portions of a holding does not exceed one for every twenty-five acres of tillage land contained in the holding").

—not insisted on.

Lords Amendment, in page 16, line 9, leave out from ("Provided") to ("that"), in line 14, disagreed to by the Commons, and section restored with Amendments, as follows:—

"Provided that at the expiration of such existing leases the lessees, if bonâ fide in occupation of their holdings, shall be deemed to be tenants of present ordinary tenancies from year to year, at the rents and subject to the conditions of their leases respectively, so far as such conditions are applicable to tenancies from year to year; but this provision shall not apply where a reversionary lease of the holding has been bonâ fide made before the passing of this Act; and provided also that where it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Court that the landlord desires to resume the holding for the bonâ fide purpose of occupying the same as a residence for himself, or as a home farm in connexion with his residence, or for the purpose of providing a residence for some member of his family, the Court may authorise him to resume the same accordingly, in the manner and on the terms provided by the fifth section of this Act with respect to the resumption of a holding by a landlord: Provided always, that if the holding so resumed shall be at any time within fifteen years after such resumption relet to a tenant, the same shall be subject, from and after the time of its being so relet, to all the provisions of this Act which are applicable to present tenancies."

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE, in moving to insist on the Lords' Amendment, said, he would remind their Lordships he had moved it when the Bill was in Committee, and he saw no sound reason why it should not be insisted upon. If a landlord wished to covenant in his lease for a right of re-entry at the expiration of the term, he should be allowed to exercise that right, and deal with the tenancy in such a manner as appeared just to him in the interests of the estate.

Moved, To insist upon the said Amendment to which the Commons have disagreed.—(The Marquess of Lansdowne.)

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he wished to remind their Lordships of the changes which the Government had introduced into the provision under consideration. The matter had been very carefully considered with a view to provide against the difficulty of hard cases that might arise as against the landlords, and what they had done was this.—They had, first of all, attached to these cases the landlord's right of resumption for reasons founded on the good of the holding or estate, or for public purposes as defined in the Bill; but they had gone further than that, because they now proposed to provide that the landlord, at the termination of the existing lease, should have the right, under the sanction of the Court, to resume the farm, either for the purpose of his own residence, or for the purpose of a home farm, or for the use of any member of his family. They believed it would be difficult to conceive a case of hardship which would not be sufficiently met by the clause in its present form. He thought, on the other hand, that if the Amendment was persisted in, a great injustice would arise under certain circumstances.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he should vote with the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) if he persisted in his Motion. He (the Marquess of Salisbury) wished to point out that there were three objects which a lessor might desire in reference to his land when a lease fell in. He might desire to take the management of the land into his own hands; he might desire to have it for building purposes; or he might desire to re-arrange and re-let it, with a view to its being cultivated in a more remunerative manner. He could not allow that the clause, even with the alterations that had been introduced into it as regarded the landlord's power of resumption, satisfied the just claims of the landlords. It was said that the tenants of Ireland were in a condition of status, and not in one of contract, and by that statement the Government justified their interference in the relations between landlord and tenant. But the tenants who would be affected by the Amendment had deliberately taken themselves out of the condition of status and put themselves into that of contract, most of them being as competent to contract as the Members of that House. To give in these cases special rights of occupancy to persons who had solemnly engaged to restore the land to the lessor at the end of their leases would be very unjust. Words might possibly be introduced into the Bill by which to distinguish between landlords who would suffer hardship under this clause and those who would not.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD thought there were two points of view from which this clause must be looked at—one, the Imperial point of view, and the other the Irish. As regarded the Imperial point of view, he quite agreed with the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) that it was iniquitous that contracts entered into between parties able to contract should be allowed to be broken up, and that the right of re-entry at the termination of a lease should be done away with. However, from an Irish point of view, the great difficulties and injustices which the clause presented would be got over, more or less, by the arrangement now proposed by the Government, because a landlord would not be prevented from regaining possession of a holding at the end of a lease, if he wished to do so for his own occupation, and would only be prevented from doing so, if he wished to let the holding to a tenant with a view of making him a future tenant. For himself, he could not see any great difference between a present and a future tenant; and, therefore, he hoped that the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) would not press his Amendment.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that if the Amendment were adopted their Lordships would be refusing to lease out of Ulster rights analogous to those which would still exist in the Province.

EARL CAIRNS said, he was in favour of the Lords' Amendment to the clause.

THE EARL OF COWTOWN supported the Government.

The Marquess of Salisbury

On question? resolved in the affirmative.

Lords Amendment, in page 16, leave out lines 24 to 36 inclusive, disagreed to by the Commons, not insisted on.

On the Motion of The EARL CAIRNS, the following Amendment added to the end of sub-section as restored:—

("Any person aggrieved by the decision of the Court in any proceedings under this section may appeal to Her Majesty's Court of Appeal in Ireland, and the decision of such Court of Appeal shall be final and conclusive.")

Lords Amendment, in page 19, line 12, leave out from ("who") to ("pay") in line 14, disagreed to by the Commons, not insisted on.

On Commons consequential Amendment:—Line 18, at the end of sub-section (3) insert—

("The condition as to three-fourths of the number of tenants may be relaxed on special grounds with the consent of the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, but so that in no case less than half the number of tenants shall be able and willing to purchase.")

EARL CAIRNS said, the necessity for the consent would hamper the Commissioners; but he looked upon this part of the Bill as illusory, because there was another clause which made the Treasury masters of the subject. They knew very well that the Treasury would not grant the money. The provision that a certain number of tenants should agree to purchase was also a pure delusion; because if the Commissioners went and asked the tenants if they desired to buy, they would naturally ask the price they would have to pay, and the Commissioners would not be able to tell them.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, the noble and learned Earl (Earl Cairns) had made a new discovery—namely, that the administrative words in the Bill which were intended to give certain powers to the Treasury gave it the power to dictate. Were they to be told that this part of the Bill had been made illusory and fictitious on purpose? Such a suggestion was one that ought not to be made in that House. The Government intended that this part of the Bill should be as operative as any other part of it. They regarded it as a very important matter, and great care had been taken in framing the clause. It was not to be supposed that the Government would allow the Treasury to dictate to them the policy they were to pursue.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, no imputations were made as to the intentions of the Government; but what they said was that the Treasury, in the exercise of the power given to them, would practically defeat the object of the clause. If he was not mistaken, it was the Treasury who defeated the Bright Clauses in the last Land Act, for they were rendered inoperative by the jealousy of the Board of Works in Ireland, which Board was, in reality, under the control of the Treasury. The Government might be superior to the power of the Treasury; but he doubted it very much, and he should watch with great interest how they worked these clauses. They might not desire to make these clauses illusory; but they certainly had not shown much zeal in their efforts to make them effective. It was only by creating a large number of tenant proprietors in Ireland that they could create that conservative feeling which was so greatly wanting; and unless Her Majesty's Government could approach the subject in a spirit worthy of its importance, he feared they would never advance a single step towards the end they had in view—namely, making the Irish people attached to the English Government.

EARL SPENCER said, Her Majesty's Government attached as much importance to the Purchase Clauses as the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) seemed to do, and they had shown their earnestness by what they had done on this subject. He hoped that these clauses would be more operative than the Bright Clauses of the Act of 1870, and he believed that that would be the case, as the purchases would not be made in the ordinary way in the Encumbered Estates Court. One of the reasons why the Bright Clauses of the last Act failed was because there was nobody properly appointed to make purchases which had to be effected through the Landed Estates Courts. Under the Irish Church Act no such difficulty arose, and he should be very much surprised if the Treasury succeeded in defeating the objects the Government had in view.

Commons' consequential Amendment agreed to.

Lords Amendment, in page 25, leave out sub-section (1) and (2) of Clause 31, disagreed to by the Commons.

LORD EMLY asked how the Court could possibly satisfy itself as to the prospects of the purchasers, and moved to omit the words after the word "loss."

Moved, That this House doth not insist on the Amendment made by this House in page 25, to which the Commons have disagreed, but propose in line 16, to leave out from ("loss") to the end of the sub-section.—(The Lord Emlly.)

On question? resolved in the affirmative.

Lords Amendments, in page 31, line 1, after ("may") insert—

("In case it thinks fit, permit any party aggrieved by the decision of the Land Commission in any proceedings to appeal in respect of any matter arising in such proceedings to Her Majesty's Court of Appeal in Ireland and may;") and in line 7, after ("such") insert ("matter or"), disagreed to by the Commons.

Moved, That this House doth not insist on the said Amendments made by this House in page 31, to which the Commons have disagreed, but propose, as a consequential Amendment, in line 6, after ("Ireland,") to insert—

("The Land Commission may also, in case it thinks fit, permit any party aggrieved by the decision of the Land Commission in any proceedings to appeal in respect of any matter arising in such proceedings to Her Majesty's Court of Appeal in Ireland, provided that no appeal from the Land Commission to the Court of Appeal in Ireland shall be permitted in respect of any matter arising under Part V. of this Act, or in respect of any decision as to the amount of fair rent, or any question of value or of damages, or any matter left in the discretion of the Land Commission.")—(The Lord Chancellor.)

On question? resolved in the affirmative.

Lords Amendments, in page 37, line 31, leave out from ("Act") to ("and") in line 34, disagreed to by the Commons, not insisted on.

Lords Amendment, in page 37, leave out lines 22 to 30, disagreed to by the Commons; and which sub-section, having been restored, had been amended as follows:—

"Whenever within six months after the passing of this Act any action or other proceeding shall be pending or be instituted against a tenant to recover a debt or damages before or after an application to fix a judicial rent, and shall be pending before such application is disposed of, the court before which such action or proceeding is pending, if satisfied that such judicial rent will be fixed within a reasonable time, not exceeding in any case three months, shall have power, upon such terms and conditions as the court may think fit, to stay the sale, under any writ of execution, or any process in such action or proceeding, of the tenancy in respect of which such application is pending, until the termination of the proceedings to fix such judicial rent, or the expiration of three months, whichever shall first happen."

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, in moving that their Lordships should disagree with the Amendment as amended, said, it was the last Amendment with which their Lordships had to deal when in Committee upon the Bill, and it was the Amendment known as Mr. Parnell's, with respect to suspending proceedings until after the fixing of a judicial rent. That Amendment had been somewhat modified in the House of Commons; but it had not affected the objectionable character of the clause itself. Under the clause six months were allowed, and no one who owed money and who claimed a judicial rent could be proceeded against within that period. But how was the Court in which the debt was sued for to know where the tenant might be? In the first place, it meant that all creditors would have to go without their money for nine months, which, in many cases, would be a great trial; and the other result would be that for the first six months the Court would be blocked by those who asked for a judicial rent simply to delay payment of these debts, and that whether they were entitled to a reduction or not. There was nothing in the clause to compensate for these monstrous evils, and he hoped the House would disagree with the Commons' Amendment.

Moved, "That this House doth insist on the said Amendment to which the Commons have disagreed."—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he did not think the merits of this proposal ought to be prejudiced by attaching to it, as the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) had done, the name of Mr. Parnell. He thought it was a mistake to give colour to, and prepare a bad reception to, a proposal that came from the other House by attaching to it the name of a Member of that House.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY explained that he had no intention of securing for the proposal either a good or a bad reception by mentioning the name of Mr. Parnell. He mentioned Mr. Parnell's name just as he had mentioned Mr. Bright's name in connection with other clauses, as a convenient way of indicating a well-known clause.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, the Government believed the clause rested on a reasonable foundation, especially now that the term during which the Court might delay processes had been limited to three months. It was merely applying to processes in the Superior Courts a principle which their Lordships had already accepted with reference to proceedings in the Inferior Courts. The provision which the Government wished to see retained in the Bill amounted, as far as the landlord was concerned, to nothing more than a postponement. There was no question of a loss of rent. Nay, it was highly probable that the landlord would be more likely to be paid the arrears due to him if the provision were allowed to stand than if it were not.

EARL CAIRNS said, that the provision was altogether one-sided, and would work much injustice. It was not a question of the landlord only, but of all the creditors, and having to wait for several months might be bankruptcy to some. If they were to protect the tenant against his creditors, they ought to protect the creditors against other suitors.

LORD DENMAN said, if the fixing of the rent were delayed, the tenant would be unable to satisfy any of his creditors, and a decision must cost money.

On question? resolved in the affirmative.

Moved, "That a Committee be appointed to prepare Reasons to be offered to the Commons for the Lords disagreeing to certain of their Amendments, and insisting on certain of the Lords Amendments."—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

EARL GRANVILLE: Her Majesty's Government agree to the Motion which has been made by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury), and which will be a matter of course in consequence of the proceedings of this evening. I think that perhaps your Lordships would consider it presumptuous on my part—and I do not know whether I should be doing any good—if I were to insist much on my own great regret, not as a Member of the Government, but as an individual Member of this House, at the constant and continuous manner in which your Lordships on the Opposition side of the House have shown this evening how little you have been influenced on this great and important question by the declarations of the opinions of the immense majority of the Representatives of the constituencies of the United Kingdom. But I may be allowed to say, and this is more agreeable to me, that I have derived considerable satisfaction from the fact with regard to several of my noble Friends behind me—Peers who have been strongly opposed to this measure, which has caused considerable difficulty to the Government in promoting it, and who have expressed their views with great ability—that at this stage of the Bill their conduct has been in marked contrast to that of the noble Marquess and of noble Lords opposite. I cannot help thinking that their conduct has been more logical, more consistent with the course which your Lordships began by taking—more consistent, in fact, with the reasons which the noble Marquess himself adduced in support of the contention that your Lordships should give a second reading to this Bill, and, I may add, more Conservative in the true sense of the word.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I do not know that it is consistent with the ordinary practice of your Lordships' House that, when you have come to resolutions on important matters, which have been fully debated, and when the determination of your Lordships has been arrived at and recorded, you should be subjected to something which, for want of a better name, I cannot but call a scolding from the noble Earl who leads this Assembly. My Lords, I believe that in the course you have taken this evening you have acted in strict consistency with the principles which you have avowed from the beginning. You have not interfered with the main principle of the Bill. You have merely sought to protect individuals and individual interests from hardship and oppression which were threatened against them by the action of the Bill. You have sought, in more than one instance, to make the Bill more exactly conformable to the arguments by which it has been recommended to you from the Treasury Bench, and to the declarations by which it was introduced. Above all—and this has been the scope of nearly all the Amendments on which your Lordships have insisted—you have sought to keep the Bill in the same shape in which Her Majesty's Government, on their own responsibility, introduced it to the House of Commons as a Bill to which they had then given the fullest attention, and which they believed to be adapted to meet the circumstances of the case. My Lords, your objections, made, as I think, not in any spirit of antagonism to the Bill, have not been met by a corresponding spirit indicating a desire either to respect your Lordships' opinions, or to promote an amicable and conciliatory settlement of the question. But such as the conduct of the Government has been in respect to this Bill, and such as the conduct of your Lordships has been, the conduct both of the Government and of your Lordships must be submitted to the judgment of the country, which is superior to both, and the country will recognize in your action a desire to protect individual right and time-honoured legal and Constitutional principles against violent innovation and temporary passion, which has been the principal function from the first of your Lordships' Chamber, and which I trust to the end you will boldly and manfully fulfil.

On question? resolved in the affirmative.

The Committee to meet forthwith.

CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT—OFFICERS AT OUTPORTS.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF MOUNT EDGCUMBE asked, Whether a memorial signed by 100 collectors of customs at the outports, and forwarded to the Lords of the Treasury on the 20th of November last, has yet been taken into consideration; and, if so, when the memorialists will probably be made acquainted with their Lordships' decision?

LORD THURLOW, in reply, said, that the Treasury had so recently as 1879 settled, in connection with the Board of Customs, a scheme for the clerical service of the ports. The Board of Customs did not, however, consider it necessary, as a part of that revision, to submit to the Treasury any change in the salary and position of the collectors. Their present appeal to the Treasury was founded upon the alteration made in their relative positions. The cost of the clerical service at the ports had already been most seriously increased—by not less than £1,000 a-year. The Treasury would certainly consider, before they presented another Estimate to Parliament, whether any change ought to be made in the salaries or otherwise of the collectors; but it must be well understood that the Lords of the Treasury would be guided in their decision by no consideration whatever except the efficiency and discipline of the service—apart from which they could give no weight to comparisons between what was at one time and what was now the remuneration of different classes. He feared it was not in his power to give the noble Earl any further information on this subject; but he trusted he would gather from his reply that the Memorial to which he had referred had certainly not escaped the serious attention of the Department to which it was addressed.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.

Report from the Committee of the reasons to be offered to the Commons for the Lords disagreeing to certain of their amendments, and insisting upon certain of the Lords amendments to which the Commons have disagreed; read, and agreed to; and a message sent to the Commons to return the said Bill with amendments and reasons.

REASONS OF THE LORDS FOR DISAGREEING TO CERTAIN OF THE COMMONS' AMENDMENTS AND FOR INSISTING UPON CERTAIN OF THE AMENDMENTS TO WHICH THE COMMONS HAVE DISAGREED.

The Lords disagree to the Amendment made by the Commons to the Lords' Amendment in page 2, line 5, which inserts ("and substantially maintained") for the following Reason:—

Because the words "substantially maintained" might be construed to exclude cases to which it is apparently the desire of both Houses that the Clause should apply;

Lord Thurlow

but the Lords propose to insert in lieu thereof the words ("or acquired and have in the main been upheld") and in the next line to leave out the first ("and") and insert "or."

The Lords insist on their Amendment in page 6, lines 3 and 4, to which the Commons have disagreed, for the following Reason:—

Because it is essential that there should be no doubt that, during the continuance of a statutory term, mines and minerals, coals, and coal-pits are the exclusive property of the landlord, and that the tenant should have express notice thereof; but the Lords propose to leave out from ("coal-pits") in line 3 of the said Amendment to ("shall") in line 8.

The Lords insist on their Amendment in page 6, line 8, to which the Commons have disagreed, for the following Reason:—

Because there is apparently no ground for giving any preference to the landlord who is desirous of increasing his rent.

The Lords insist on their Amendment in page 6, line 37, to which the Commons have disagreed, for the following Reason:—

Because their Lordships consider it necessary to impose a closer limit upon sums to be given as compensation for disturbance.

The Lords insist on their Amendment in page 8, line 20, to which the Commons have disagreed, for the following Reason:—

Because the words are wholly unnecessary for the purposes of the clause; are likely to raise unfounded expectations in the minds of some classes in Ireland; and may give rise to misapprehension on the part of the Court.

The Lords insist on their Amendment in page 8, line 23, to which the Commons have disagreed, for the following Reason:—

Because it is expedient that the tenant should be made aware by an express declaration that in the case of his causing or suffering his holding to become deteriorated, contrary to the express or implied conditions constituting his contract of tenancy, the Court may refuse an application to fix a fair rent unconditionally or conditionally;

but propose to omit from their Amendment the words ("or his predecessors in title") and the words ("or have").

The Lords insist on their Amendment in page 8, line 35, to which the Commons have disagreed, for the following Reason:—

Because it is very desirable that the power of resumption should be subject to as little restriction as is consistent with the interests and claims of the occupiers; and propose as a consequential Amendment to leave out from ("conditions") in line 34 to the end of line 35.

The Lords disagree to the Amendment made by the Commons to the Lords' Amendment in page 9, line 16, which inserts ("and substantially maintained") for the Reason assigned for disagreeing to the Amendment in page 2, line 5.

The Lords insist on their Amendment in page 11, line 12, for the Reason given for insisting on the Amendment in page 8, line 20.

The Lords insist on their Amendment in page 16, line 9, to which the Commons have disagreed, for the following Reason:—

Because it is unjust that those who have covenanted to give back possession of land to a lessor on termination of a lease should be relieved by Parliament from the obligation of doing so without any compensation being provided for the lessor.

The Lords insist on their Amendment in page 39, lines 22 to 30, to which the Commons have disagreed, for the following Reason:—

Because it is inexpedient and unjust to creditors to postpone the time for the recovery of their just debts without relieving them from the public or private obligations to which they are themselves liable.

With the preceding exceptions the Lords do not insist on their Amendments to which the Commons have disagreed and agree to the Amendments made by the Commons to the Lords' Amendments and to the Commons' consequential Amendment to the Bill.

QUESTIONS.

HIGHWAY RATES—ASSESSMENT AND POWER OF COMPOUNDING.

MR. HICKS asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, having in view the loss and inconvenience caused to Surveyors of Roads by the repeal of the 13th and 14th Vic. c. 99, by which owners of small tenements have been liable for payment of Highway Rates, he will not reconsider his decision, announced on 19th July, and bring in, at the commencement of next Session, a short Bill to place the owners of small tenements in the same position as regards Highway Rates as they now are as regards Poor Rates, instead of waiting for a larger measure which might give rise to long debates?

MR. DODSON: Sir, on July 19 I stated that I hoped to deal with the making and collection of rates next year. Should this be found impracticable, I shall not be indisposed to consider the propriety of bringing in a Bill to place the owners of small tenements in the same position in relation to highway rates as they stand in regard to poor rates.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—REMUNERATION OF POOR RATE COLLECTORS.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Is he aware that the Poor Rate collectors get ninepence in the pound commission, while efficient collectors could be had for fourpence in the pound; is the clerk to the union justified in refusing to inform a guardian when asked by him at the sitting of the Board at what time the poundage was raised to its present rate; and, is it beyond the power of a majority of a Poor Law Board to supersede a Poor Rate collector, or to lower the scale of payment if the guardians consider it too high?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the Local Government Board did not know of any case in which the Guardians paid 9d. in the pound commission. If the hon. Member would supply him with the facts, he would make an inquiry. The last part of the hon. Gentleman's Question he must answer in the affirmative.

ARMY (INDIA)—ROMAN CATHOLIC CHAPLAINS.

MR. A. MOORE asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether his attention has been called to the position of Roman Catholic chaplains serving the troops in India; whether it is a fact that, in addition to their being paid on a scale very much lower than that of their Protestant and Presbyterian colleagues, they are also declared disentitled to any leave, whether sick leave or privilege leave, or furlough whatsoever; whether this regulation is so strictly enforced that, when ordered from one station to another, all allowances cease from the moment of departure from the one to arrival at the other; whether there is any parallel for such treatment amongst any of the civil, military, or uncovenanted servants of Government in India; whether it is also the case that no provision is made for pension or retiring allowance, no matter what the length of service may be; and, whether he will take steps to remedy these grievances?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, the arrangements for the performance of all religious services for the Roman Catholic soldiery in India are made by the Archbishop or other Provincial head of that Church. All the personal details are managed by him, and it is he who deposes the several priests for the duties. For this superintendence and for the maintenance of registers of marriages, burials, &c., in Roman Catholic chapels, he receives a monthly allowance from the State, and this allowance has been increased within the last three or four years. The executive duties are paid for according to the number of Roman Catholic soldiers and Government servants in the garrison. The priests employed on these duties are not appointed by the Government, and they are liable to be removed or exchanged by their Bishop without any formal reference to the Government. They are thus on a totally different footing from Church of England or Presbyterian chaplains, inasmuch as they belong to no establishment, and are not Government servants, either covenanted or uncovenanted. No comparison can, therefore, be sustained. The services of the Roman Catholic priests being neither personally continuous nor at the permanent disposal of the State, neither leave rules nor pension rules would be applicable to them. The non-application of such rules cannot, under these circumstances, be rightly considered a grievance, neither can it be a grievance that, as individuals, they receive remuneration on a lower scale than those who are bound by strict conditions to the service of Government in India.

CHINA—THE OPIUM TRADE.

MR. A. PEASE asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether Her Majesty's Government have information confirming the statement of the "London and China Telegraph" of the 8th instant, that the Chinese Government have decided to increase the tax on foreign opium, and to levy a tax on native opium; and, whether Her Majesty's Government consider that the Chinese Government is free to levy what duties it pleases upon opium, imported and native?

Mr. A. Moore

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, Her Majesty's Government have received information that an increase of inland tax on opium is under the consideration of the Chinese Government; but not that such increase has been decided upon. They have no information as to a tax on Native opium. The Chinese Government are free to levy what duties they please on Native opium. Foreign opium, after it has left the importer's hands and is carried inland by the Chinese purchaser, is liable to such a taxation as the Chinese Government may think fit to impose upon it.

POST OFFICE—TELEPHONE POSTS AND WIRES.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether posts and wires erected for the purpose of conveying telephonic messages under the licence of the Postmaster General are under his charge; and, whether it is the duty of the local authorities to see that no nuisance is created by the erection of such posts and wires, and that they are properly maintained?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES): Sir, the licence mentioned in the Question of the right hon. Gentleman is granted by the Postmaster General to the Telephone Companies for the purpose only of enabling them to convey messages for payment, without infringing the exclusive right of the Postmaster General to transmit such messages. No doubt there is power in the Postmaster General to permit by agreement the Telephone Companies to use the telegraphic posts and wires vested in him; but at present, I believe, no such agreement has been entered into—certainly none in the Metropolis. The result is that the Telephone Companies, not having any protection by statute, are subject to the Common Law liability, which would prevent their erecting or maintaining any posts or wires so as to constitute a nuisance on or over any highway, and the duty of protecting the public interest would fall on the local authority. If the Postmaster General should hereafter permit the Telephone Companies to use any posts or wires vested in him, he will, of course, take care that they are properly maintained, so as not to inconvenience the public.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND)— RETURN OF AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS.

Mr. ANDERSON (for Mr. SERLY) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, if his attention has been drawn to the statement in a Paper presented by command of Her Majesty to Parliament, entitled "The Agricultural Statistics of Ireland for the year 1880," that the number of holdings is 574,222, and by another Paper presented by command of Her Majesty to Parliament, entitled "Return of Agricultural Holdings in Ireland compiled by the Local Government Board in Ireland from Returns furnished by the Clerks of the Poor Law Unions in Ireland in January 1881," the total number of agricultural holdings is stated to be 660,185; and, if he can give the House any explanation of the difference between these two Returns?

Mr. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he had communicated with the Registrar General with respect to the difference between the two Returns referred to, but had not yet received the required information. Perhaps the Question would be repeated on a future day.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIAN ADVANCES.

Mr. E. STANHOPE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is not the fact that Persia claims a considerable portion of the territory recently annexed by Russia in Central Asia; whether any remonstrances on the subject have been addressed by Persia to Her Majesty's Government; and, whether it is true that Russia has refused to allow any representative of this Country to be present at the approaching delimitation of the new Russo-Persian frontier.

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, in answer to the first clause of the Question, I have to say that we are not aware that that is so. No remonstrance on the subject has been addressed by that Power to Her Majesty's Government; and no proposal has been made to Russia, or refused by her, for the presence of a British Representative at the delimitation of the new Frontier.

FOREIGN LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLIES (OATHS AND PROCEDURE.)

Mr. LABOUCHERE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he would instruct Her Majesty's Representatives abroad to report upon the political oaths or affirmations exacted from the Members of Foreign Legislative Assemblies, and upon the mechanical modes by which votes are taken in Foreign Legislative Assemblies; and, whether he would lay these Reports, when obtained, upon the Table of the House?

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, there will be no objection to calling for the Reports which my hon. Friend requires.

THE MAGISTRACY—THE EVIDENCE FURTHER AMENDMENT ACT, 1869— REFUSAL OF MAGISTRATES AT BIR- MINGHAM TO ALLOW A WITNESS TO AFFIRM.

Mr. LABOUCHERE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to a report in the "Birmingham Gazette" of the 6th instant, of the conduct of Mr. W. M. Ellis and Mr. John Lowe, in refusing, when sitting as magistrates at the Birmingham Police Office, to allow a witness to give evidence because he asked to be allowed to affirm; and, whether he contemplates taking any notice of this conduct on the part of the aforesaid magistrates?

Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he observed that an almost similar Question was asked him by the Colleague of his hon. Friend (Mr. Bradlaugh) on the 17th of August last year. He must repeat the answer he then gave. This Question and many others put to him were founded upon an entirely erroneous view of the office and functions of the Secretary of State for the Home Department. Some people, and he was surprised to find among them some hon. Members, had a notion that he had got a general power to direct magistrates and Judges as to how they ought to conduct judicial investigations. The Home Secretary had no such power. The fundamental principle of the Constitution of this country was the independence of judicial officers, and the absence of any control of the Executive Government over the actions of the Judicature; and yet he was constantly asked if he had seen what such and such a justice had done, and if he would undertake to set the decision aside. If he undertook any such function he would do that which he was forbidden to do by the Constitution. The only office of the Secretary of State was to advise the Crown as to the exercise of the prerogative of mercy. He had made these observations generally, because he was constantly being plied with Questions of this kind. In reference to this particular Question, he had to say that if any magistrate or Inferior Court admitted evidence which ought not to be admitted, or refused to receive evidence which ought to be admitted, that was a matter that could be corrected, and only corrected, by a Superior Court of Law, upon the interpretation of the statute.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman whether it was not the case that the Lord Chancellor could dismiss any magistrate, and who was responsible in that House for the action of the Lord Chancellor?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the Lord Chancellor could dismiss a magistrate for proved misconduct, for conduct of a corrupt or dishonest character; but he could not do so for an error in the interpretation of the law. As to who was responsible for the action of the Lord Chancellor, that was a Question which he was not prepared to answer off-hand.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked whether ignorance, when it amounted to the extent shown in his Question, was not a reason of itself for removing a magistrate from the commission of the peace?

[No answer was returned.]

EXPLOSIVES ACT—REGULATION AS TO MINERS MAKING CARTRIDGES IN THEIR HOMES.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If, considering that there is a strong feeling of antagonism in many of the mining districts against the regulation under the Explosives Act prohibiting the miners from making cartridges in their dwellings, or contiguous thereto, for purposes in their employment, he will direct the inspectors of the various mining districts to report as to whether the regulation has led to a prevention of the destruction of life and limb in their respective districts?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he had received a Report from Major Ford, Inspector of Explosives, on the subject of this Question, from which it seemed that the regulation referred to was very necessary, and that serious accidents had arisen in consequence of a neglect of it. He would be happy to show the Report to the hon. Member.

STATE OF IRELAND—"BOYCOTTING."

LOD ARTHUR HILL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that there are hundreds of acres of meadow land, which are so called "Boycotted," that no one dare work on these meadows, no matter what rate of wages are offered; and, whether the Government intend to take any measures to prevent such wanton waste of property?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he was aware that there was what was called "a strike" among the agricultural labourers in certain parts of Ireland, and the Government had directed their close attention to the matter with the view of preventing any breach of the peace. He must, however, ask the noble Lord not to put general Questions on the subject, but to point to some particular case, when he should be happy to give him a precise answer.

ARMY ORGANIZATION—RETIRING OFFICERS.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether Colonels who held that rank before October 1877 will receive on retirement the fair actuarial value of their prospective succession to an Honorary Colonelcy of a regiment; whether it is the case that it has been conceded that Lieutenant Generals and Major Generals retired for non-employment under the maximum age, for remaining on the active list in their respective ranks, and whose retired pay is reduced by £10 a-year for every year under the maximum, will be permitted to receive the full rate of retired pay when they reach the maximum age; and, whether there will be any objection to General Officers retired as such under the Warrant of 1877 on account of their having reached the age of seventy being allowed the actuarial value, in the form of an annuity, of their present unattached pay and prospective pay as Honorary Colonels of a regiment?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to the first Question, I have to say that the officers referred to will receive the fair actuarial value of their former prospect to succeed to the unattached pay of a general officer, and ultimately to an honorary colonelcy, less, of course, their gains under the new Warrant. My answer to the second Question is also in the affirmative with respect to lieutenant generals and major generals on the active list on the 1st of July; but this rule will under no circumstances apply to general officers retiring voluntarily or to future general officers. As to the third Question, I have well considered my hon. and gallant Friend's suggestion; but it seems to me that it might raise an awkward precedent to alter the emoluments of an officer who has actually retired, and whose position is in no way affected by the new Warrant, and I fear it cannot be adopted.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT said, this was a very important matter, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give it his serious attention.

MR. CHILDERS: That I will promise to do.

ARMY PROMOTION—COMBATANT OFFICERS.

COLONEL ALEXANDER asked the Secretary of State for War, If he would explain why, as combatant officers have recently been promoted in large numbers, without calling for Reports of General Officers on their efficiency, such a course was considered necessary in the case of Quartermasters only?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to the hon. and gallant Colonel, I have to inform him that there was no difference made as to the Reports on combatant officers and on quartermasters. Reference was at first made to the annual confidential Reports, and where they raised any doubt special Reports were called for in the cases of some regiments abroad by telegraph. The result was that all the promotions of combatant officers were settled in The Gazette of July 26, and the appointments of quartermasters to the rank of captain will be shortly gazetted. As I said yesterday, the promotion of these quartermasters will date from the 1st of July.

THE ADMIRALTY—THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government will consider the expediency of transferring the functions of First Lord of the Admiralty to a gentleman enjoying the confidence of the Government, together with a seat in this House, so as to avoid the inconvenience occasioned by the absence of the responsible head of a principal spending Department in the discussion of the Estimates?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I understand the Question of the hon. Member substantially to come to this—whether it is possible to make it an absolute rule in the construction of the Administration that the First Lord of the Admiralty should be a Member of this House? Now, that is certainly, on the whole, and as a general rule, desirable; but it is not so far desirable, and has not commonly been judged desirable, to such a degree as to make it right that this should be an absolute rule. Of course, I need not say that an absolute rule of this kind can only be applied to a limited extent in the formation of the Government, because personal qualifications must govern the distribution of offices on the whole; and, therefore, I can only go half-way towards meeting the hon. Member. I am quite sure that there are many who sit in this House and who can recollect—it would not be good manners to refer, in his presence, to the present Secretary—many instances in which the business of the Admiralty has been very efficiently conducted by a Secretary, both on this side of the House as well as on the other.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, that, as his Question was founded upon the dictum of the right hon. Gentleman when in Opposition, he should call attention to the subject and move a Resolution.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—DEATH OF MR. HONE.

MR. GIBSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland,

Whether his attention has been called to the recent lamentable death by poisoning of Mr. Hone in Limerick; and, whether he will take steps to have a thorough and satisfactory investigation into the occurrence, so as to discover who is liable for the carelessness which caused it, and to prevent a possible recurrence of similar catastrophes?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I have seen an account of this very sad occurrence. I need not inform the right hon. and learned Gentleman that the law provides for the investigation of such cases in two ways—one by a coroner's inquest, and the other by the magistrates—on any persons being brought before them on a criminal charge. An inquest has been held on Mr. Hone, and the verdict was that death was occasioned by poisoning, carbolic acid having been administered instead of black draught. The jury appended to their verdict an expression of opinion that in all medical establishments poisonous drugs should be kept safely under lock and key. I need not say that that is an opinion in which I fully concur. Although the verdict of the jury did not inculpate any person, the porter of the establishment was not considered free from blame. He was, therefore, arrested and brought before the magistrates, who investigated the case on two days, and finally discharged the prisoner. I have received a Report stating that after having heard the evidence they were of opinion that death was clearly the result of accident. Under these circumstances, though I deeply deplore what happened, I do not see that I could take any further steps in the matter.

MR. GIBSON said, he was desired to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he thought there should not be a more thorough and complete inquiry into the whole matter?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I will make further inquiry into the case.

NAVY—OFFICERS ON LEAVE.

COLONEL KENNARD asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is the fact that an officer serving in a harbour ship at home is allowed the privilege of six weeks leave of absence from his ship, whereas the same privilege is denied to an officer serving in a harbour ship at Malta; and, if so, whether he will state the reason of the difference, or give any assurance that the inequality will be remedied in future?

MR. TREVELLYAN: Sir, officers serving at home can be granted the six weeks' leave of absence referred to in the Question if their services can be spared, though leave is an indulgence to be granted or withheld as circumstances make it expedient. With regard to officers serving abroad, whether in harbour ships or any other class of ships, there are no regulations, except the article in the Queen's Regulations (747), which prescribes that—

"Commanders-in-Chief will on their respective stations give such orders relative to leave as the climate or local circumstances may make expedient."

It must be remembered that officers on foreign stations have a right to a week's full pay leave for every six months' service after their appointment ceases, a right which is not enjoyed in the case of home appointments.

ARMY (INDIA)—PAY AND ALLOWANCES OF FIELD OFFICERS.

LIEUTENANT COLONEL MILNE HOME asked the Secretary of State for India, If the arrangements have yet been completed between the War Office and the Indian Government for the pay and allowances of the field officers who were added to the Army on July 1st when on service in India; and especially if the two senior Majors of each Infantry battalion in India will, as in England, draw the full pay and allowances of a field officer?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I am sorry to say that a final decision on this subject has not been arrived at—that is, as to the rates to be drawn by field officers under three years' service; but a very early decision may be expected, and the rate, whatever may be decided, will have effect from the 1st of July, 1881. The conditions laid down in the Royal Warrant with respect to bringing the two senior majors of Infantry of the Line on the full rate of pay of majors after three years' service will be observed in India.

LAW AND JUSTICE—SENTENCES IN CRIMINAL CASES.

MR. M'COAN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the case of Mary Palmer, who, for having exposed and slightly wounded her infant child, was last week sentenced at the Old Bailey, by Mr. Justice Lindley, to seven years' penal servitude, and whether, in view of all the pitiable circumstances of the case, and of the jury's strong recommendation to mercy, which was disregarded by the Judge, he will reconsider the sentence thus passed; and, whether his attention has been called to the sentence of eighteen months' imprisonment, with hard labour, which was passed at the same Sessions by the same Judge, upon Charles Strutten for killing his wife?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, so far as the Question points to a mitigation of the sentence, I have asked for the opinion of the learned Judge who tried the case, and I cannot say anything until I receive his opinion. As to the second part of the Question, which points to an aggravation of sentence, I have already several times intimated that I have no authority to interfere in such matters.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT— "EXAMINERS."

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN asked the Vice President of the Council, If he would explain why the title of "Examiners," a name given originally to University men appointed to set examination papers, should be retained in the Education Department, the scholastic work having been transferred to the "Inspectors;" and why this highly paid class of "Examiners" has been increased to the number of twenty-seven; and, whether the work usually done by the "Examiners," could not be done more economically and equally well by ordinary clerks, such as are employed in the Treasury, Board of Trade, and other Public Offices?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, I am informed that the preparation and revision of examination papers formed but a small part of the duties of the Examiners at the time of their original appointment in 1847. The scholastic work of these officers is lighter than it was at first; but in justification of the title given them, I may say that they examine the Reports of the Inspectors, and have to decide whether the conditions of annual aid are fulfilled by each school reported on and what grant shall be paid to it. They also conduct, under the secretary and Assistant Secretaries, the whole of the Correspondence of the Office, which, since the passing of the English Act of 1870, and the Scotch Act of 1872, has increased enormously and is increasing. In 1869, 23,076 letters and 11,178 Reports were received and dealt with. In 1880 the registered letters were 76,684, and 22,612 Reports were dealt with. The number of Examiners has necessarily grown with the growth of the work of the Department. No increase has been made since we came into Office. The Examiners must be on a par with the Inspectors, whose work they supervise and control, and none of these duties could be intrusted to ordinary clerks such as are referred to in the Question; and the emoluments of the Examiners are not in excess of those of the gentlemen who discharge corresponding duties at the Treasury and other high class offices. I have had occasion to employ some of these gentlemen on missions of the most difficult and delicate character, and on a variety of other work, which could only be performed by men possessing their knowledge and attainments; and I can assure the hon. Member that they have uniformly discharged their duties to the satisfaction of the Department and to the advantage of the Public Service.

RAILWAYS (IRELAND)—THE DUBLIN, WICKLOW, AND WEXFORD RAILWAY COMPANY.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he is aware that the public rights are being largely infringed upon by the manner in which the Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway Company are carrying out the work of widening their line at Kingstown by which a large portion of the road space has been taken from the public; and, whether this is being done with the consent of the Board of Works, in whom it is said the roadway, &c. is vested; and if, so, will he issue orders to that Board to insist on the entire Railway being bridged over, as it was formerly, and take other measures to have the public rights preserved?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, as this and the next Question of the hon. Member relate to the Board of Works, I have to answer them on behalf of the Treasury. The works on the Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford line referred to in the Question are being carried out under the authority of an Act of Parliament; but, in transferring the ground under the compulsory powers of that Act, the Board of Works have done their utmost to guard the interest and secure the convenience of the public. It is not thought necessary to require the railway to be covered in to the same extent as formerly; but I am assured that it is amply so for all the requirements of the public.

IRELAND—GRESHAM GARDENS, KINGSTOWN.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he be aware that a large portion of the public garden in Kingstown, known as "Gresham Gardens," which is vested in the care of the Board of Works, is at present used as a kitchen garden, to the exclusion of the public; whether it is by an official of the Board of Works that this garden is being so cultivated; and, if he will take steps to restore the portion of the gardens to their original public purpose?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, the ground referred to as Gresham Gardens is not vested in the Board of Works, that Board having in 1866 transferred the residue of the lease of it to the Royal Marine Hotel Company on condition that it should be used only as ornamental pleasure grounds attached to the hotel. The forming part of the ground into a kitchen garden is at variance with the conditions under which the transfer was made, and the attention of the Hotel Company will be drawn to the subject. The public never had access to the ground while held by the Board of Works, as it was only required in connection with the harbour works.

STATE OF IRELAND—THE MAGIS-TRACY—MR. A. E. HERBERT, J.P.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What decision the Lord Chancellor has arrived at respecting the language used by Mr. Herbert, J.P. on the Bench?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, my noble and learned Friend has not yet received sufficient information on the matter to enable him to come to a decision on the subject of the hon. Member's Question.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE RE-VISED CODE, 1881.

MR. J. G. TALBOT (for Viscount SANDOW) asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether, considering the very grave additional inconvenience which will be caused to all the schools of the Country by a long uncertainty as to the financial effects of the proposals for the revision of the Code, which in themselves must seriously unsettle for many months to come every school, and the desirability that both those who are responsible for the maintenance of the schools and the teachers of the schools should have ample time for their consideration, he will make public during the autumn the rate at which each item of the grant will be assessed; whether he will publish a fresh edition of the proposals for a revised Code, showing, by Italics, which portions of the Code are old and which are new; and, whether, considering that all alterations in the Code, on account of their wide spreading financial effects, are obliged to be made by the Education Department in concert with the Treasury, he can inform the House at once, or before the close of the Session, whether the effect of the revision of the Code is estimated to lead, in any sensible degree, either to an increase or diminution of the general Vote for Public Elementary Education?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, I cannot see how any inconvenience can arise to anybody from the proposals which I have laid on the Table. I have received numerous communications on the subject from managers and teachers, all more or less approving them, and not one expressing the apprehensions indicated in the Question. The changes proposed to be made in the Code, whether educational or financial, will appear in the Code of 1882, but will not take effect at once, or until ample time has been given for their consideration and approval by Parliament. These changes will be indicated in the usual manner, as prescribed by the Code itself. I have already stated, and it is distinctly set forth in Article 3 of our proposals, that the average rate of aid will be maintained, and I do not anticipate that the general Vote for Public Elementary Education will be affected by the changes we have proposed, except so far as they may reduce the cost of inspection and administration.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked the right hon. Gentleman whether there were any means of obtaining printed Papers setting forth the changes proposed to be made in the Code?

MR. MUNDELLA: The proposed changes are in the hands of the printers, and shortly the Papers will be distributed to Members of Parliament.

NATIONAL DEBT BILL.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD asked the Prime Minister whether he would withdraw the 3rd clause of the National Debt Bill?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he could not do so.

PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he thought it right, looking at the state of the Business of the House, that the Government should inform Members as well as they could what course they intended to take. It was understood that the discussion upon the Motion of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) with respect to Commercial Treaties would occupy a very large part of the evening; and if they could get into Supply by 11 o'clock, they proposed to go on with the Navy Estimates and with other Estimates—that was to say, with the Vote for the Transvaal, and the remaining Votes of Class IV., the Post Office Estimates, and the Supplementary Estimates. If they could not get into Supply by 11 o'clock, they wished to make progress with the Orders of the Day. Then, to-morrow, it was understood that they would take the Lords' Amendments to the Irish Land Bill, whatever they might be. There was no means of knowing whether their consideration was likely to last for any length of time; but if they should be disposed of by 2 o'clock, they proposed then to go on with the Navy Estimates. But if those Amendments were not disposed of by 2 o'clock, they would proceed with the other Estimates, including the Transvaal Vote, but not including the Irish Estimates, which were the subject of a special arrangement. If there was time, they wished to go forward with the Orders of the Day; but that would be a matter for the convenience of the House.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked when the Navy Estimates would be brought on, if they were not proceeded with that evening or to-morrow?

MR. GLADSTONE said, it was difficult at the present moment to answer that Question. It would depend upon the situation and circumstances of the House.

MR. W. H. SMITH: In any case, the Navy Estimates will not be taken to-night?

MR. GLADSTONE: No.

MR. MAGNIAC said, it would be almost impossible to discuss the Post Office Votes without having in hand the Annual Report of the Department.

MR. FAWCETT said, the Report had been out of his hands more than a week, and he had trusted that the printers would have it ready to-morrow. Yesterday they told him it would be impossible to get it ready for to-morrow, although it was a very short Report. They assured him it would be in the hands of Members on Tuesday morning.

MR. MAGNIAC said, the Post Office Vote should be postponed until the Report was in the hands of Members.

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked the Prime Minister whether he had any idea when the Indian Budget would be brought forward?

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked when the Irish Votes would be brought forward?

MR. GLADSTONE said, the Irish Votes would be proceeded with after the Navy Estimates. With regard to the Indian Budget, his noble Friend's intention was to bring it forward on the first day after the close of Supply.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked whether the Sitting to-morrow would be prolonged beyond the usual hour, and whether it was understood that no other Business than Government Business would be taken to-morrow?

MR. GLADSTONE thought that to-morrow no other Business would be taken than Government Business. The Sitting to-morrow would probably not be prolonged beyond 6 or 7 o'clock. He could not say at what particular time the Sitting would terminate.

CAPTAIN AYLMER asked the Prime Minister whether arrangements would be made next Session for bringing forward the Estimates and the Indian Budget at an earlier period than that at which they were generally considered?

MR. GLADSTONE said, that that would form part of the question which the Government would next Session consider with regard to the Business of the House.

ARMY—THE ROYAL MARINES—
AFFRAY AT BANTRY.

MR. HEALY asked the Secretary of State for War, If he has made inquiry into the conduct of the Marines at Bantry on 3rd August; and whether he can state the result to the House?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to the hon. Member I have to state that for many months after the Marines, who are an extremely well-conducted body of men, were stationed at Bantry no quarrels took place between them and the roughs of the town; but in May last a marine of the name of Kenny was knocked down and brutally kicked by a man named Patrick O'Leary; and I am sorry to say that he died of his injuries. O'Leary was committed at the coroner's inquest to take his trial for manslaughter at the Cork Assizes, but was acquitted. He returned to Bantry and boasted of having killed this unfortunate man, applying to him an epithet which I will not repeat. On the 1st instant another marine was knocked down without the slightest provocation and seriously injured; and the repetition of this brutality so exasperated the Marines that on the following day a body of them undoubtedly acted most improperly in sallying out of barracks with a view of fighting the roughs, and especially of thrashing Patrick O'Leary, if they could find him. Patrick O'Leary seems to have effected a series of very masterly retreats, and nothing more appears about him in the report of the proceedings; but the collision with the roughs took place, and the Marines cleared the streets. I need not say that this act was most reprehensible; and after dealing with the men, Sir Thomas Steele very properly ordered that the Marines should be removed from Bantry. I may add that I have received a copy of a resolution adopted at a meeting of the Bantry magistrates, expressing their opinion that the original attack on the Marines was most unprovoked, that they had punished one of those proved to be engaged in it, and adding their general testimony to the uniform good behaviour up to that time of the men, and their regret at their removal.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—
IRISH CHURCH ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

MR. CALLAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it was intended to take the Committee on the Irish Church Act Amendment Bill at the Sitting to-day?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, it was important that he should at that period of the Session take every opportunity of bringing on that Bill. The Irish Church Commission had nearly completed its labours, and it was not desirable that the salaries of persons employed under it should be continued when they had nothing to do.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, that if the Bill were brought on after Supply he should use all the Forms of the House in opposing it.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

FRENCH COMMERCIAL TREATY.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. RITCHIE, in rising to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to the Crown, praying Her Majesty to withhold Her consent from any Commercial Treaty with France which proposes to substitute specific duties for ad valorem duties, to the disadvantage of any article of British manufacture, or in any way to raise the present rate of duties payable on such articles, and which does not leave Her Majesty's Government full liberty to deal with the question of Bounties, or which would bind Her Majesty absolutely to its provisions for a longer period than twelve months," said, that, whatever might be the opinion of the House on the Motion which he was about to submit, he thought that there would be a unanimous feeling of regret that they should be called upon, in the year 1881, to consider the question of a Treaty, proposed to us by France, which was of a reactionary and Protectionist character. The prophecies that one of the great results of the Treaty of 1860 would be that France and all other countries in Europe and America would become so much alive to the benefits of Free Trade that the nations of both Europe and America would soon be bound together in one great Zollverein of Free Trade had, unhappily, not been fulfilled. So far from their being fulfilled, it could not be said that Free Trade principles seemed to have made much progress. The Treaty of 1860, which was undoubtedly of a Free Trade character, and which was concluded under the Empire, it was now sought under a Republic to replace by one of an altogether reactionary description. The Treaty of 1860, as was admitted by Her Majesty's Government, was of a very one-sided character, being much more in favour of France than of this country; and it was disappointing to find that France was now prepared to go back from the position which she took up in 1860, notwithstanding the undoubted advantages she had enjoyed under the Treaty. That result must be disappointing to them all, but more especially to the members of that Club which bore the name of the distinguished man who negotiated and settled the Treaty of 1860 on behalf of this country. So far from every country becoming more and more favourable to Free Trade, the Tariffs of foreign countries had a tendency every year to become more and more Protectionist. The only State in Europe which could be said to have adopted the principles of Free Trade was that country which was so much vilified by the Liberal Party—namely, Turkey. It was no wonder, then, that the people of this country were beginning to ask themselves whether a policy of admitting without question whatever came from abroad freely, while our exports were heavily taxed in those countries, was a sound and profitable one. He had lately read a speech made by the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Potter), the President of the Cobden Club, at its annual meeting; and he could not help comparing that hon. Member to a well-known character in fiction—Mark Tapley. The hon. Member for Rochdale seemed to agree very much with Mark Tapley in thinking that there was no merit in appearing cheerful under happy circumstances, but that the great merit was in being cheerful under adverse and dismal circumstances. In his speech the hon. Member made the astounding statement that Free Trade principles were progressing at home and abroad. How did the case stand at home? Surely no one who read the signs of the times could fail to see that throughout the large towns of this country there was arising an intense feeling of dissatisfaction with the present state of things. Even in Birmingham, which had the advantage of being represented by two Members of the Cabinet who were such thorough advocates of Free Trade, there were indications that the Free Trade policy of the Cobden Club was decidedly not in favour with that town; and, whether rightly or wrongly, they attributed much of the suffering and bad trade which existed throughout the country—[“No!”]—to that Free Trade policy. The hon. Gentleman who said “No!” would have an opportunity of telling the House in what town good trade existed. It was fully acknowledged that until recent years their Free Trade policy was a successful one. While they were the great manufacturing centre of the world it mattered little what duties foreign countries put upon their manufactures, which consisted, not of luxuries, but of necessities, as the consumers had to pay them; but foreign countries had now largely increased their manufacturing power, and had, instead of being importing countries, become exporting countries. Under these circumstances, it was time that they began to reconsider a policy which was all very well up to a certain time, but which some contended had now failed. While this was what was being said from one end of the country to another on the subject of their commercial policy, what had been the position taken by the Government with reference to the great principles of political economy? The Land Bill could hardly be said to be framed on the lines of true political economy. On the second reading of that Bill the Prime Minister treated with ridicule the economic propositions of Professor Bonamy Price as being too sound for any other than an ideal state in Jupiter or Saturn. It could not be said, therefore, that the Government had set a very good example at home, and, altogether, it was very difficult to coincide with the hon. Gentleman the President of the Cobden Club, when he said that the principles of Free Trade were advancing at home; and if they looked abroad it appeared to him that he must be a very sanguine man who could speak of the progress of Free Trade principles there. The tendency in every quarter of the globe seemed to be towards more and more restriction, and the French Tariff certainly of itself was no indication of any progress of Free Trade principles, notwithstanding the fact that they had enjoyed to some extent the benefits of Free Trade policy from the year 1860. The cheerful view of the hon. Gentleman was not, however borne out by the speeches of the right hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) and the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), who were so often found associated together in public proceedings in and out of the House. Another gentleman accounted for the want of success of the Cobden Club on the ground that they did not give dinners enough. The money was spent in literature instead; and he was very much struck with the fact that, while thousands of publications concerning the English Land Question were struck off, the circulation of Free Trade publications had declined. Only 100 copies were taken of Free Trade and Protection by Professor Fawcett, and of The Value of Political Economy to Mankind only 100 copies; whereas a most mysterious pamphlet entitled The Dog and the Shadow circulated to the extent of 50,000. What was "the dog" and what was "the shadow?" It was not for him to say; but at all events there was a marked difference between the number of the pamphlets on the Land Question and upon the questions of Reciprocity and Free Trade, which were the questions of the day. He found, however, that there was one proposition before the Cobden Club of which he could approve. At the recent meeting the members of that Club pronounced that they would rather have no Treaty at all than a worse Treaty. He did not know whether the Government were prepared to accept that. He was rather afraid that they were not. His attention was attracted to a letter in The Times by the President of the Board of Trade on the 8th of August, in which he said that "the feeling of the country was opposed to the conclusion of a Treaty materially worse than the present one." He ventured to say that that was not a proper expression of the public feeling, which was opposed, not merely to a Treaty "materially worse," but in any degree worse; and any action taken by the Government to bring about a Treaty in any shape worse than the present one would meet with entire disapproval. What was the position in which they were at present placed? It was with a great deal of regret that he troubled the House with this matter at this period of the Session; but in a few days they would separate, and by the time they met again, in all probability, if any damage was to be done, it would be accomplished, and they might find themselves bound by a Treaty of a most disadvantageous character, which excluded their goods from France, and prevented them from making an advantageous Treaty with any other country that might be prepared to do so. He did not, therefore, think it would be wise for the House to separate without a discussion on this important subject. He had the highest opinion of the Gentlemen charged with conducting the negotiations; but it was just as well to bear this in mind, that the tendency was to make a Treaty—a good one by all means, but make a Treaty. Therefore, it was essential the matter should be fully discussed before Parliament separated. The action of the Government hitherto did not inspire him with absolute confidence. They were told by the Prime Minister that everything that was done would be done in the full light of day. But how did the action of the Government square with these professions? The House would remember that it was with the greatest difficulty that his noble Friend (Viscount Sandon) extracted from the Government a copy in the English language of the French Tariff, and his noble Friend was deserving of their thanks for the persistency with which he pursued the matter and at length extracted the concession. The Chambers of Commerce in this country, no doubt, were quite able to understand the French Tariff in the French language; but it was a different case with workmen, and it was most necessary that the document should be placed in their hands, as they were greatly interested in the question. Almost everything which they knew with respect to these negotiations had been extracted by cross-examination from the Government, and little information had been given voluntarily. The present position of the question was the subject of very great anxiety in the country. They wanted to know the exact position which the Government had taken up upon this question, and also the position of the French Government. He had been told as early as October last that the French Government intimated their intention of substituting specific for ad valorem duties; and he wished to know whether the negotiations that had taken place had led to any alteration of the opinions of the French Government? If his recollection was correct, he thought the Prime Minister, in answer to a question, said that specific duties upon some few things might not, perhaps, make very much difference, but that as a basis of a new French Tariff it was impossible to entertain them.

Mr. GLADSTONE said, that, as far as he could recollect, what he stated upon that occasion was that, in the substitution of specific duties for ad valorem duties, Her Majesty's Government saw very great difficulty, and the mode of overcoming these difficulties had not yet been reached.

Mr. RITCHIE said, that he had spoken to the best of his remembrance. But there was no doubt that the Government were of opinion that a change of specific duties would be disadvantageous to this country. He found that Earl Granville stated in a communication to M. Challemeil-Lacour that a change to specific duties could not be otherwise than disadvantageous to British trade. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] He had the despatch in his hand. Well, he wanted to know whether the Government were still of that opinion, as there had been some shaky utterances on the subject on the part of the Government of late? He should be glad to know from the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether the Government held to the declaration of Earl Granville which he had just quoted? It would be impossible so to arrange specific duties as not to hit hardly some of their manufactures. The effect on Bradford might be judged by what had been said by Mr. Mitchell, ex-President of the Bradford Chamber of Commerce, who stated that the duties would be increased by such a change from 100 to 150 per cent; and one large manufacturer had expressed his intention of removing a large portion of his machinery to France in the event of such a change. The House of Commons had already declared, by a Resolution proposed by the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk), that it would not be content with a Treaty not less favourable than the old one, but would demand one more favourable. Had the Government communicated this Resolution to the French Government? We knew they had not. Why had they not done so? One would have thought that Resolution would have strengthened the hands of the Government in their dealings with France. His Resolution was not so strong as that of the hon. Member, and he hoped the House would agree to it. There should be no mistake about the action of the Government on the matter. The industrial community were unanimously of opinion that we should concede no more to France than we had already conceded. It was time that the policy which gave up everything and received nothing should be re-considered. It was acknowledged that the prophecy that all nations would soon adopt their Free Trade policy had been completely falsified. The doctrine of the Cobden Club—"Buy in the cheapest markets"—was not the original Free Trade doctrine. The Cobden Club said—"Take care of your imports, and the exports will take care of themselves." But if the present state of things went on, they would soon have very little exports to take care of. In 1872 their exports amounted to £256,000,000; in 1879 they had fallen to £191,000,000, showing a falling off of £65,000,000. In the period 1871-5, their exports to Europe were £741,000,000; in 1876-80, £626,000,000, showing a difference against the latter period of £115,000,000, equal to about 15 per cent. Their exports to America in 1871-5 were £374,000,000; in 1876-80, £270,000,000; a diminution of £104,000,000, equal to about 37 per cent. This alarming decrease in their exports was a very serious matter. What was to be done to remedy it? He wished it to be clearly understood that he was not there to advocate a return to Protection for their manufactures. He did not see how Protection would benefit their manufacturing interests. They produced more than they consumed, and must export the surplus; and no duty would effect a rise in prices, because they could not have one price for what they exported and another for what was sold at home. What they wanted was not Protection, but entrance for their manufactures into foreign markets. They could not afford to be gradually and permanently excluded from foreign markets. How was that to be arrived at? It was said they had thrown away their weapons. He denied that they had thrown them away. It was true that they put aside those weapons in the hope that foreigners would do the same. This not being so, what was there to hinder them taking them up again. If they had still retained them, there would only be a small minority in the country who would not advocate their use in order to get better terms from the foreigner. What was the Prime Minister's proposal with reference to the Wine Duties lately made to France? In a letter on the subject in January last, his Secretary wrote—

"Mr. Gladstone desires me to say that the attitude of foreign Governments in the chief wine-growing countries, and that of some among them especially, makes it in his view extremely doubtful whether they will on their side suggest such measures, and with such a degree of promptitude as might lead Her Majesty's Government to propose an alteration of the Wine Duties as a part of the financial arrangements of the current year."

What was this but a statement that before laying aside any portion of the weapons still left them they must have a quid pro quo? What was this but Reciprocity pure and simple? If, then, they were prepared to use such weapons as they still possessed, what was to hinder them taking up again those they had laid aside? Where was the difference in principle? He confessed he could see none. He should be told that Retaliation was as bad as Protection. Against that statement he could quote high authorities; but the present Free Traders looked with some contempt upon the doctrines of the great masters of the school—they had advanced beyond the views of Adam Smith and others. Professor Bonamy Price, whose political economy had been deemed by the Prime Minister so ideal as to be unfit for this planet, had stated recently that Retaliation was not antagonistic to the principles of political economy; and Mr. M'Culloch, a name that even hon. Gentlemen who were Free Traders would receive with respect, says in his Principles of Political Economy—

Mr. Ritchie

"If there be apparently good grounds for thinking that a prohibition will so distress those against whom it is levelled as to make them withdraw or materially modify the prohibition or high duty it is intended to avenge, it may be prudent to enact it."

Were there, then, "apparently good grounds" for thinking that such action on their part would be successful with France? Let them see what was the value of English trade to France. The whole export trade of France in 1879 amounted to £126,000,000, of which £38,500,000, or nearly one-third of the whole, came to this country. France, therefore, could not look with indifference upon a policy of Retaliation by this country. Could there be a doubt, looking to the enormous importance of their trade to France, of what would be the effect of a retaliatory policy on their part? Would it not certainly have the effect of compelling France to modify her hostile Tariff, and come to terms? The imports from France, too, were just such articles as might well bear heavier taxation if it should become necessary. The consumers of silks, gloves, wines, and articles de Paris, could well afford the extra price for such luxuries if they continued to purchase them. He contended, therefore, that they should not tamely submit to any hostile action on the part of France such as was threatened; that unless they could obtain a Treaty fully as good as the present one, their hands should be left free to adopt such measures as in their opinion were most conducive to their own interests. For these and other reasons he asked the House to agree that no Treaty at all with France would be better than a reactionary Treaty. He also asked the House to declare that no Treaty whatever would be satisfactory which did not leave the Government full liberty to deal with the question of Bounties. The question of Bounties was of even greater importance than hostile Tariffs. The latter destroyed their foreign trade; but bounties attacked them in their home markets, and the very existence of their manufactures was made impossible. Of course, he would be told that this was a matter which worked its own cure, and that a country acting on this principle would very soon begin to see the fallacy of giving Bounties; but where were the indications of that? Bounties on sugar had been in existence in France for many years; but so far were they from being convinced of their disadvantage, that they were now going to give an infinitely larger bounty upon the building of ships. That did not look as if the Sugar Bounties had led France to see the error of her ways. Having built up one immense industry, and so given employment to vast amounts of capital and labour, they proposed to do the same in another industry; and it was confidently anticipated in France, and, indeed, had been openly stated in the Chamber of Deputies, that the Shipping Bounties would enable them to compete successfully with England. He would not trouble the House with a long disquisition on the subject of Sugar Bounties. He had tried again and again during the Session to get an opportunity for the consideration of this matter, and had not succeeded. He would remind hon. Members, however, that the employment of a countervailing duty, in the last resort, had been recognized by the Committee which had been appointed to inquire into this question. It had, he knew, been contended by the President of the Board of Trade that bounties were beneficial to the consumer; but the Prime Minister evidently did not hold the same views as those which had been put forward by the Board of Trade. Replying to a deputation, the right hon. Gentleman had said that he did not think any benefit founded on inequality and injustice could be a permanent benefit to the consumer; but that, supposing the means suggested as a remedy—a countervailing duty—were sound—which, of course, he did not acknowledge—they were precluded from taking such action by reason of the Favoured Nation Clause in their Treaties. He (Mr. Ritchie) contended that if they were so precluded by the letter, they were not precluded by the spirit of that clause from action of the kind, because the spirit of the clause required equality, and bounties destroyed equality. On July 30th, Earl Granville wrote as follows to Mr. Adams:—

"I have considered, in communication with the Law Advisers of the Crown, Lord Lyons' despatches of the 2nd and 3rd instant relative to the French Mercantile Marine Bill. I have now to inform you that the bounties which it appears to be intended to give on the construction of vessels in France, and on long voyages made by such vessels, do not in precise terms constitute a violation of the stipulations of the Commercial Treaties between Great Britain and France. At the same time, it is a fair matter of representation that such bounties are contrary to the spirit and intention of those Treaties, and will, in another way, produce the very effect which their stipulations with reference to import duties are intended to prevent."

Here they had an admission by Her Majesty's Government that bounties were contrary to the spirit and intention of their Treaties, and brought about that which it was the object of those Treaties to prevent. Were they, then, to bind themselves again to such Treaties, or should they not take advantage of their freedom to take care that such a scandal as that pointed out by Earl Granville should no longer continue? They had a sure and certain mode of putting a stop to such a state of things. Should they again render themselves unable to avail themselves of it? Countervailing duties were not antagonistic to the principles of Free Trade. The Spectator, a thoroughly Liberal and Free Trade journal, thus expresses its opinion on the subject:—

"A countervailing duty would have this effect and no other, that all the sugar subject to it would still come in which would have come in if there had been no bounty, and no more, and this is just what the theory of Free Trade requires. Moreover, the cost of this fiscal operation would not fall on the wrong persons, as the cost of a countervailing bounty would. The countervailing duty, if imposed, would deprive our sugar consumers of a temporary advantage, very unsettling to trade, and having a tendency to foster unnatural production, but in depriving them of that temporary advantage, it would confer on them the compensating advantage of not being subjected to needles and trying variations of price, and of not seeing a useful class of their fellow-countrymen vexatiously injured or ruined by the caprices of foreign countries."

And further on, writing of the difficulties imposed by the Favoured Nation Clause of their Treaties, it says—

"It is no doubt a serious difficulty, and perhaps at present insuperable. But clearly we ought not to be obliged, by granting a Favoured Nation Clause, to treat nations alike under totally different circumstances, for that really means treating them not equally, but unequally. And we heartily agree that if the other difficulties of the case can be got over, we ought, in renewing our Commercial Treaties with the various countries of Europe, to provide against any construction of the Favoured Nation Clause so harsh that it shall compel us to deal unequally with different nations under the name of dealing equally with all."

This was the policy for which he asked the assent of the House. It was a policy which had been endorsed by very high authorities, some of them prominent members of the Cobden Club, and it was a policy founded on justice and Free Trade. So much for that portion of his subject, and he had now only to say a few words on that part of his Resolution which asked Her Majesty to withhold her consent to any Treaty which would bind her absolutely to its provisions for a longer period than 12 months. On that point he would at once remark that there was almost an entire unanimity of opinion in the manufacturing and commercial world. Unquestionably, it would be an immense advantage to be able to terminate a Treaty at 12 months' notice. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had said that if a Treaty were unsatisfactory, 12 months was too long for it to remain in force. He entirely agreed with the right hon. Gentleman on that point; but it did not by any means follow that a Treaty that would be satisfactory to the Government would be equally satisfactory to the people, who, under the present system, might find that they were tied and bound for years by the terms of a Treaty which they did not approve. The Prime Minister had stated that the terms of the new Treaty with France would not be more unfavourable to British goods than were those of the last; but such an assurance did not give the people of this country much hope that their interests would be properly looked after. It was the opinion of the President of the Board of Trade, a prominent Member of a Government which had, unfortunately, the power of binding them hand-and-foot, that a Treaty not materially worse than the present one would be satisfactory. He ventured to tell him that if he thought such a Treaty would be satisfactory, he very much miscalculated the opinion of the vast majority of all classes of the country. Nearly every Treaty of importance at present in existence was terminable at 12 month's notice. Where was the inconvenience of making this Treaty similar in regard to time? He confessed he failed to see any, and that he was sure was the general opinion of the mercantile world. But the inconvenience of binding them for a term of years might be very great and very real. A project was on foot, and was, he understood, received with much favour, to form a great Customs Union between their Colonies and the Mother Country on a basis of Free Trade. If they bound themselves to a Favoured Nation Treaty with France for a term of years, the consequence would be that they would be bound to accord to France whatever terms they might agree to with their Colonies or with any other Power in return for concessions on their part; and so such an arrangement would be rendered impossible. He therefore urged the House to take care that they should not be put in such a position, and that any Treaty to which they became a party should be terminable by 12 months' notice. He thanked the House for the patience with which they had listened to him. He was afraid he had put his case very inadequately; but, at least, he hoped he had said sufficient to induce the House to assent to his Motion. It was no question of Protection, but one of simple justice. His object was to prevent their already diminishing export trade from diminishing still further under a Treaty more hostile than the present one; to prevent their home trade from being extinguished by means of bounties; and to prevent the Government from committing them to a Treaty which would bind them hand-and-foot for many years to an engagement which might prove most detrimental to their interests. If the result should be that no Treaty at all was concluded, the loss would be theirs, not ours. They, at least, would be left free to take whatever course might seem most advantageous for themselves. The aim and object of France was to weaken our position as a manufacturing and commercial Power; and the people of this country would not, he was certain, any longer tolerate a policy of submission, which, in the end, must result in national misfortune. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to the Crown, praying Her Majesty to withhold Her consent from any Commercial Treaty with France which proposes to substitute specific duties for ad valorem duties, to the disadvantage of any article of British manufacture, or in any way to raise the present rate of duties payable on such articles, and which does not leave Her Majesty's Government full liberty to deal with the question of Bounties, or which would bind Her Majesty absolutely to its provisions for a longer period than twelve months,"—(Mr. Ritchie),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he was sorry that the hon. Member had spent about 20 minutes in what he might call "chaffing" the Cobden Club. Time was too valuable at this period of the Session to be occupied in that way. The middle portion of the speech was of a very different kind. It was somewhat of an academic dissertation, if one could conceive of an academy holding opinions so heretical as those of the hon. Member. In the latter portion of the speech the hon. Member came to business, and told the House what he meant, and it was with that portion he proposed to deal. The hon. Gentleman had remarked that it would be a great misfortune if the House were to separate without discussing a Motion of this kind; but in making that remark he had done but scant justice to the debate which had taken place on the Motion of the hon. Member for Gloucester, because, although the Government had on that occasion opposed the Motion of the hon. Member as being inopportune, they had, at all events, an opportunity of expressing their views with regard to it. In the course of the debate Her Majesty's Government, although they held that it would be an undignified proceeding for the House to carry such a Resolution at a time when the negotiations were going on, accepted the principle put forward by the hon. Member. The hon. Member opposite, therefore, would have saved himself much trouble if he had assumed that Her Majesty's Government would have adhered strictly to the declarations they had made on this subject on the former occasion. The hon. Member had said that if it had not been for this discussion to-night the country might have been bound by a Treaty which would practically have excluded British goods from France. Did the hon. Member mean seriously to contend that such would have been the case, when the Government had already declared that they would not be parties to the conclusion of a Treaty with France which would not leave British goods in as favourable a position as they had formerly occupied? The hon. Member had attacked the Government on the ground that they had shown too much favour to the Chambers of Commerce, as compared with the working people. No doubt, it was difficult to ascertain exactly who were the proper representatives of the working people, while it was easy to enter into communion with the Chambers of Commerce; but, nevertheless, exactly the same consideration had been shown to the former as to the latter. The hon. Member had also attacked the Government on the ground that they had kept back documents. That was no new charge to bring against a Government, for it had been made against the noble Lord opposite (Viscount Sandon) when he was a Member of the late Government. He must, however, complain of the tone in which this charge had been brought against the present Government by both the hon. Member and by the noble Lord. It had not been usual on former occasions to lay before Parliament Protocols of conferences or of negotiations which had not terminated, although he admitted that directly such negotiations had been concluded the Papers relating to them should immediately be laid upon the Table of the House. The late Government, however, had not followed that wise course on several occasions. The late Government, who had conducted several negotiations of great delicacy and importance, had not only declined, very properly, to produce the Papers relating to them while they were proceeding, but they had also refused to produce them after they had been concluded. Thus not a single word had ever been published by the late Government relative to the negotiations that took place in London in 1875 between the Government of this country and that of Italy with regard to the conversion of ad valorem into specific duties. Those Papers never were laid before the House, and the House was entirely without information on the subject; and yet the noble Lord blamed the present Government for maintaining secrecy with regard to these negotiations, although they had kept their promises to the letter. In 1877 most important negotiations were held in Paris. Those negotiations were full of interest in their bearing on these duties. The Papers and the Protocols relating to them were never laid before Parliament at all. Therefore, he hoped he had disposed once for all of these charges against the present Government. But there was a special point which was raised by the hon. Member in his speech just now, and it was a point in which he was supported by the noble Lord the late President of the Board of Trade, and that was that the present Government laid before the House more Papers in French than previous Governments had done, and that they did so for the purpose of secrecy. He should not be contradicted by anyone who was able to speak with knowledge of the fact, if he said that the present Government had made the translation of papers more common; that the late Government translated far less than ever had been the case before. The translation of ordinary correspondence was discontinued during Lord Salisbury's tenure of Office, and was discontinued by his order, and was only resumed in consequence of an order given by Earl Granville. In this matter of the French negotiations, Her Majesty's Government were under peculiar difficulties with regard to giving information to the House, and for this reason—that while on their side they had nothing to fear from publicity, they could not lay the Papers before the House without the consent of the Government of France, and the Government of France had not the same ardent desire for publicity in this matter by which Her Majesty's Government were affected. He could not forget that while the negotiations were going on, it behoved him to speak with considerable discretion. The Motion which had been brought forward by the hon. Member, and to which he only alluded in almost the last words of his speech, contained four heads. He began by stating that he was against the conclusion of the Treaty if it contained any conversion of ad valorem and specific duties, which would be unfavourable to any article of British trade. Her Majesty's Government made their declarations upon the subject of ad valorem and specific duties in the debate on the Motion of the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk), and they adhered to the declarations they then made, which declarations had been repeated several times by the Prime Minister and occasionally by himself. What the trade asked was that the average on which a conversion was made should be a fair average, and should not damage any important branch of trade. Her Majesty's Government asked that no article should be damaged. They had stated distinctly that they would not agree to any conversion which would destroy any branch of British trade. The second thing which the hon. Member asked was this—that the Government should bind themselves not to conclude the Treaty if any increased duty was payable on any article, as he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) understood, of British manufacture. Did the hon. Member mean to say that if we could get a Treaty beneficial to the linen or the woollen trade, Her Majesty's Government should not agree to it because there was a rise of 2*d.* on straw hats or some other article which was not very important to British trade? It seemed to him that that proposition carried its own refutation. The hon. Member spoke of the Sugar Bounties and of the bounties on French navigation. The Sugar Question was dealt with by his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, and he had no doubt he would be able to refer to it in the course of this debate. But with regard to sugar, it was the intention of the French Government that the bounty system should cease to exist. And with regard to their new law upon navigation, the hon. Member, he thought, was disposed to greatly exaggerate the importance of that law. Certainly, at the present moment, the British shipping trade was in a very flourishing condition, compared with the shipping trade of France. The shipping trade of France had been declining steadily; and it was the opinion of the highest authorities in France that the proposed law in regard to shipping would not prevent that decline, but would prove ruinous to the finances of that country. They might take note of the fact that the Minister of Commerce did not speak in support of that Bill. The country would become tired of the law, and it was not likely to endure. He thought the hon. Member's fourth proposition was less likely to be accepted even than the other three. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) entirely agreed with his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, when he said that if a Treaty were a bad one they did not want it for 12 months, for 12 weeks, for 12 days, for 12 hours, or even for 12 seconds; but that if it were a good one, then they should endeavour to secure that repose to trade which was given by a Treaty of long duration. A Treaty expiring every 12 months would be insufferable to traders; and in this matter he thought the policy of the late Government was a wise one in giving all their Commercial Treaties a duration of 10 years, for, he believed, if they could get a good Treaty, 10 years was as short a time as they should make it exist. With regard to the four proposals of the hon. Member, he must refer to the reply which was made on behalf of the late Government on this matter. The hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver), who was in his place and would be able to correct him if he was in error, was, he believed, one of the leading supporters of the policy which the Mover of the Resolution had advocated to-night. The hon. Member for Birkenhead supported proposals of this kind at the meeting recently held in Exeter Hall. [Laughter.] The hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) smiled. That hon. Gentleman was, no doubt, now prepared to take the same course as in the days when he stood forward as the solitary advocate of Protection. In 1868 and 1869 the hon. Member was the only Member of the House who had the courage of his convictions and the ability to express them in articulate language. The hon. Member for Birkenhead, on the 25th of April, 1879, asked the late Government to give a pledge—not four pledges, as the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) now asked for. He asked the late Government, in regard to those very commercial negotiations with France, to pledge themselves to the abolition of the surtaxe d'entrepôt. The case as to that was very strong—the strongest that they had in their negotiations with France. The hon. Member asked the late Government to promise not to conclude a Treaty without obtaining satisfaction as to the surtaxe d'entrepôt, and the reply of the late Government said—and they were wise words—that it would be wrong of them, imprudent, inconvenient, and impolitic to give any assurance beforehand of the nature of the conditions which the Government would require in negotiating the New Treaty with France. That reply must be his reply to the four propositions of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets. He could only repeat that the Government were unable, for the reasons given by the late Government in 1879, to pledge themselves beforehand to make the conclusion or the non-conclusion of the Treaty dependent on any particular proposals of that kind. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets had referred to Her Majesty's Government not having communicated the Resolution passed on the Motion of the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) to the Government of France. It was not usual or convenient for the two Governments to communicate the Resolutions come to by their respective Parliamentary Bodies to each other. But the Representatives of the French Republic in this country who were negotiating the Treaty were perfectly aware of that Resolution, having read the papers like other people, and they knew also the character of the speeches which were made in its support; and he might state, if it was any satisfaction to the hon. Member, that the Resolution was the subject of animated conversation at the meeting of the Commissioners next day. The hon. Member had insisted in much detail on the impossibility of converting ad valorem duties into specific duties. The Government had taken every possible step to obtain the best information which existed in the country on the exact force of the French proposals, as far as they had them up to the present time. They had communicated personally and in writing with the leading firms and with all who chose to put themselves in communication with them as to the possibility or impossibility of that conversion. In that they had only taken the same steps, though, perhaps, in greater detail, as were taken by the late Government on the same question in 1875, during the Italian negotiations. But the late Government, having received all that information, acted in the teeth of it, and sanctioned those duties by renewing a Treaty with Italy after the Chambers of Commerce of Yorkshire had almost unanimously asked them to have nothing to do with them. It was impossible to give any pledge that no such changes in certain articles of British trade would be allowed, or that that they would not be allowed altogether. But the Government had distinctly stated, and he stated again, that they would not consent to any such change as would put an end to any considerable trade in any article, and that they must have a Treaty on those points which would be as satisfactory as the existing Treaty. The hon. Member spoke of the decline of British trade; and though he did not actually propose Protection, yet he suggested the imposition of duties on foreign goods manufactured in this country, which it would be difficult to raise without Protection to the British manufacturer. The figures put forward by the hon. Member were misleading, and so far from a decline there was an increase, although a less rapid one than in former years, in British trade. In 1879, addressing the other House, Lord Beaconsfield pointed out by conclusive figures that British trade was not declining then; and if that was the case then, how much more must it be the case now, when there was a revival of trade? The hon. Member asked in what town was there a better trade than existed a few years ago? He might mention Sheffield, Nottingham, and Leicester. He thought that even the cotton trade was in a more flourishing state this year, and that almost the whole of the trades of England were in a better condition this year than they were last year and the year before. A pamphlet published by the Association which was agitating the country in the hon. Member's sense showed that the hostile Tariffs were not to blame for a reduction of the British woollen trade. The hon. Member had carefully avoided referring to proposals for taxing the food of the people. He had proposed a duty on silk and certain other articles. A large quantity of the silk brought here from France was brought for re-exportation; and it must be remembered that it was not imported entirely for our own consumption. When the hon. Member talked of retaliating against France, he should recollect that a large part of our imports from France consisted of food, and he would be playing with edged tools, because, although, as representing a constituency like the Tower Hamlets he would not himself propose to tax the food of the people, yet there were other persons co-operating with him who did not refrain from doing so. There was a great meeting at Exeter Hall last week—[An hon. MEMBER: Not great.]—well, if it was not a great meeting, it was not from any want of advertizing or spending money. At that meeting, the chairman, Sir Algernon Borthwick, made a speech, in which the only practical proposal was a proposal for the imposition of a tax upon the food of the people. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) ventured to say that nothing could be more in conflict with the principles which were put forward in the House of Lords by the late Earl of Beaconsfield than the principles which were now professed by the gentlemen who were behind this agitation, and who held their meetings at the Beaconsfield Club.

MR. RITCHIE said, he was not connected with any organization. He had nothing to do with the meeting at Exeter Hall, nor with any body of people which the hon. Baronet imagined were behind him.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he accepted the hon. Member's assurance that he was not connected with the meeting, nor with anybody behind him. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) observed that when the hon. Member in his speech said he was not going to impose Protection, the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) sorrowfully wagged his head. Notwithstanding the hon. Member's assurance, he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) must point out that the leading promoters of this meeting were those who had been going about with the hon. Member.

MR. RITCHIE: Going about!

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The hon. Member attended several meetings on the Sugar Question.

MR. RITCHIE: One.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he thought it was more; but, of course, he accepted the assurance. The promoter of that meeting was a Mr. Kelly, who was one of the leading promoters of the meeting at Exeter Hall. Moreover, taking into consideration the moment chosen for this Motion, the time of that meeting, the allusion to the great public opinion outside, and the similarity of the hon. Member's remarks with the speeches at that meeting, there seemed to be a connection between this Motion and the agitation. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) would say no more, except that he believed the people of this country would not tolerate the re-imposition of taxes upon food; and those who advocated the imposition of duties upon foreign goods would find themselves greatly hampered by their alliance with those who advocated taxes upon food. He must repeat that the Government would offer their distinct opposition to this Motion, because it sought to pledge them to four separate conditions. They could not pledge themselves with regard to these four proposals, or, indeed, any condition at all. They took their stand on the same ground taken by the late Government, that "it would not be prudent"—in fact, most inconvenient—"to give any assurance beforehand of the nature of the conditions that would be required in the negotiation of a new Treaty with France."

MR. RITCHIE said, he wished again to declare that he was in no way connected with the meeting in Exeter Hall.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he thought it was very desirable that they should at once make it clear that they were not to be persuaded from discussing the great question of the French Treaty by the skilful way in which the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had mixed up the discussion with the question of Protection. He imagined there was hardly anyone in that House who was not faithful to the genuine principles of Free Trade as they were propounded by the wise founders of that movement many years ago. The hon. Baronet seemed to undervalue the importance of this great and grave matter. He tried at first to blame him (Viscount Sandon) for the course he had taken in the matter. He complained of the tone he had taken. If, however, the hon. Baronet and the Government had taken the straightforward course of saying that the public interests would suffer, the Opposition would at once have ceased to ask questions; but when they demanded information, they were put off with all sorts of excuses. Anyone who perused the answers, would find it exceedingly difficult to get anything like a definite answer. He denied entirely that there was any blame attaching to the Opposition from the tone which they had adopted in these matters. The Prime Minister the other day denied that there had been any concealment or mystery, and said that the negotiations should be conducted in the full light of day, and that the whole commercial world should know what was going on. But what was the course really taken? Before the Commission all that was done was to issue a general Circular, and after the Commission met a few times, audiences were given to deputies representing various trades. The hon. Baronet had not given a very satisfactory explanation of the publication in French of the Commercial Tariff. What he said was that the Marquess of Salisbury had published certain despatches in French; but everything depended upon whom the Papers were for. The Tariff was required by the commercial community of England, and by a great number of the working men of England, and he re-asserted his position that it was a most extraordinary thing to publish the Tariff in French just when the negotiations were about to begin, and when everybody wished to know what the conditions were. He was borne out in that view by the Chambers of Commerce of Halifax, Glasgow, Greenock, Hull, Leeds, Macclesfield, Carlisle, Dewsbury, North Shields, and Tynemouth. The Government must have known the feelings of the Chambers. More than this, they dropped out all information about agriculture, which was seriously affected by the new French Tariff. The duty on oxen was increased, as it was on game and other things, and on fresh butchers' meat a new duty was levied; but no information was given on these points, the subject was entirely ignored. Even had the English farmers been masters of the French tongue, they would not have known the changes proposed and affecting agriculture. There was here great reason to complain. Why did not the Government apply in the winter to the Chambers of Commerce to supply them with their views? It was a great mistake to suppose that it was only the trades directly affected that were interested in this question. There were trades in this country—and he cited Wolverhampton in particular, the centre of the iron and other trades—which had not been included even in the Cobden Treaty. The Government ought to have originated communications with the great centres of commerce to know what their views were. As this question had been treated in a somewhat cavalier manner, it was necessary to go back to 1860 and to see the views that were then held. Surely the whole condition of the world then was perfectly different from what it was now. He would quote the words of the Prime Minister to show what was expected from the example of one or two of the principal countries on the rest of the world. The right hon. Gentleman said, on March 9, 1860—

“We came to the conclusion that if France once frankly, sincerely, and decisively entered upon the career of freedom of trade, her own experience of the commencing stages would be a security for her proceeding onwards towards its consummation such as we could not by any other means obtain. That is the meaning of the Treaty. That is the reason of the avoidance of minute arrangements, because they would have been a total misconception of the fundamental principles of the Treaty. . . . The moral contagion of France and England acting together in the sense of liberty of commerce. . . . I believe the example of France and England joined in one course and one policy will turn the hearts and minds of men to the blessings of peace and gradually spread from country to country a sense of the manifold evils that result from protection.”

He would venture to say that a different tone would be adopted now. Those hopes had been dashed to the ground, and they had to face a new state of things. The judgment of the Foreign Secretary on the Treaty of 1860 was that to a great extent it had been one-sided; its operation had not been so favourable as was expected. What were the provisions of that Treaty? The discussion was too apt to drift into general vituperation of Protection, and the real provisions of the Treaty were forgotten. It ought to be borne in mind that it was originally made for 10 years only. They gave up duties amounting to £1,200,000, and bound themselves not to impose fresh ones. The French agreed to put no higher duty than 30 per cent upon any article of commerce. The community were not satisfied with that Treaty. But it was made in a period of superabundant hopefulness. What had been its effect? No doubt, since it was made there had been a great increase of trade between this country and France. The President of the Board of Trade said the increase had been fourfold. How had the two countries respectively been affected? He would quote from the figures of the hon. Baronet the Member for Surrey, who was a great authority in these matters. Taking the 10 years from 1851 to 1860, their imports from France were £113,000,000; exports to France, £83,000,000; or, excluding foreign and colonial produce passing through this country as an entrepôt, exports were £39,000,000, as against £113,000,000 of imports. In 1861-70 imports were £296,000,000; exports, deducting foreign and colonial produce, £129,000,000. In 1871-80, there were £421,000,000 of imports, against exports, deducting foreign and colonial produce, £124,000,000. That was a picture of how fairly the Treaty had acted with respect to the trade of the two countries. He thought it was impossible to conceal from themselves the fact that the knowledge of the enormous preponderance of their imports from France over our exports to that country was creating a feeling of irritation and uneasiness amongst the working people of this country. But as to the real condition of their negotiations with France, only a few favoured Chambers of Commerce had been informed; the rest of the country had been left in ignorance, and would not have an opportunity of judging whether a good or bad bargain was being made. The general belief was that the increase in the French Tariff would cause a rise of 25 per cent over the present duties. Then, the change from ad valorem to specific duties was a serious one, and the hon. Baronet had treated the question too cavalierly. Chambers of Commerce looked upon the question as of the highest importance, and had an insuperable objection to it. In addition to these great changes, France proposed to make another great change with respect to Shipping Bounties. The hon. Baronet treated the question of Shipping Bounties very lightly; but he could assure him that was not the tone taken by the most experienced men in the country. He said they would not last long. But that was said long ago about Protection, which even now showed no signs of disappearing. The feeling on that question was very strong both in England and Scotland. He would not, however, take English opinion on this subject; but he would take the opinion of the Edinburgh Chamber of Commerce—shrewd Scotchmen—who, after a discussion on the subject, passed this resolution—

“That, in view of the increasing protective character of French legislation, especially in respect to the proposed system of Shipping Bounties, it is inexpedient to conclude any Commercial Treaty with France which will have the effect of interfering with the free action of the British Government in regard to its fiscal arrangements.”

The Edinburgh Chamber of Commerce looked upon the enormous trade of the great lines of steamships, such as the Cunard Line, with its immense number of employés, as greatly affected by those Bounties. By those interests the present state of things was looked upon as most alarming. Similar views were expressed at Glasgow. If shrewd Scotchmen were alarmed on the subject of the Shipping Bounties, people in England should look very sharply to this matter; and he was sorry to find how very little the Government seemed to be alive to this grave question. He ventured to say that the position was a very grave one, and, he thought, ought to be treated with rather more gravity by the Government. He did not think it was at all fair that an endeavour should be made to put them off the scent by talking of Protection, whereas what they wanted was a serious and sober consultation as to a matter of grave national interest. Nor were the accounts received from their Consuls abroad more encouraging. Their Consuls at Havre and Nantes had written accounts of the Bounty system which were calculated to cause the greatest alarm. He could by no means take the coulour de rose view of their commercial position which the hon. Baronet had expressed. He quite agreed that the trade of England was enormous; but he knew enough of the feeling prevalent in the great centres of industry—in London, Liverpool, Staffordshire, and the Black Country—to make him feel that every possible endeavour should be made to better their position, and that they needed every possible advantage that the Government could give them which might raise and increase the emoluments which they got from the trade of their country. So far as he could see, they could not ignore the fact that depression did exist; and it was no use shutting their eyes to it, that there was a lack of employment, and that there was a feeling that their sufferings were considerably due to the general closing of the markets of the world to this country. Whether they were right or wrong was a matter for very serious and careful consideration, and he felt they were bound to give that consideration to it. What nation in the world was now opening its markets to them? Was Austria, Italy, Germany, or the United States, or their own Colonies? What leading market was more open to them, with the exception of Turkey, than it was 30 years ago? Instead of that they saw this spectacle. It seemed to be almost a law that, as force institutions prevailed, as popular Assemblies gained more and more control of the great States of the world, as the popular voice got more powerful and potent in the administration of affairs, it seemed almost to be a law that industries of these countries were immediately greatly more protected in consequence. It only bore out the wisdom of the remark made by the Earl of Beaconsfield in 1860, when he said that they could never trust to the democracy of France to allow her great industries to be subverted or destroyed. He thought this country would act very rashly, with the great uncertainty of trade which existed, if they bound themselves to Treaties for any long period. The hon. Baronet expressed great contempt with regard to this; but let him observe that Parliament would have no chance whatever of having its say with respect to the bargain to be made with France. The Treaty would be virtually concluded, and it might be a matter for a Vote of Censure on the Government next year. Considering the feeling of the country and the uncertainty of trade for the future, it was surely wiser to limit the Treaty to 12 months. After the experiment it might be wise enough, if the country approved, to continue the Treaty for a longer period; but he ventured to say it would be much more acceptable, both to the leading manufacturers and to the great mass of the working people, if it was settled that their future with France, considering the enormous interests involved, should not be tied up for a very long period. There was one argument which he wished the House to attend to. The Prime Minister seemed to treat as a very slight affair their Treaties being terminable after 10 years. He held in his hand a list of the Treaties with Austria, Belgium, Italy, Columbia, Russia, Sicily, and the United States. The period of 10 years for which they were mostly settled had long since expired, and in many of these cases trade with those countries had been going on with a 12 months' notice for periods of 8, 12, and 16 years. He never heard that there was any uncertainty with regard to those countries. He would, therefore, beg the House to insist that the Treaty with France should be concluded only for a short period. He had very considerable fear with regard to the action of the Government in respect to this Treaty. There had been what was called so much shilly-shallying about it. The right hon. Gentleman the junior Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) surely meant something when, writing in the course of last month, he stated that—

“Her Majesty’s Government will be guided by the general sentiment of this country. I have no doubt that this feeling is, generally speaking, opposed to the conclusion of any Treaty which should be materially worse in its terms than the present one.”

That he (Viscount Sandon) held to be a very threatening expression to use. He believed it entirely misrepresented the feeling of the country. They did not want a Treaty worse than the present one. On the other hand, they wanted one better, and he believed the country would be bitterly disappointed if they found they had a Treaty not much better. Then, again, the language of the hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) himself was very doubtful. He said they would not agree to anything which would destroy any article of British trade, as if he thought it possible that any British Government would conclude a Treaty with France which should destroy an article of British trade. All this pointed, not to a better Treaty, but a worse Treaty. The truth was, that France was evidently very clever about this. She had frightened Her Majesty’s Government apparently, and the fact was they felt now that if they got something a little worse than the present Treaty they would do a very good thing in comparison with the state of things which France dangled before their eyes. He wanted, without doubt, a much better Treaty. Allusion had been made to the Cobden Club, and, as this was so, he would venture to quote the words of the noble Lord, now President of the Council, who, as president of the Club, said, as reported in The Times in July, 1880—

“We find that the principles of this Club are becoming prominent all over the world, and that in Free Trade, in foreign policy, and in home policy, these principles are what you have adopted as the motto for your books—‘Free Trade, peace, and goodwill among nations.’”

This expression showed, in his view, that there were many gentlemen living in a sort of fool’s paradise. They were shutting up the markets of the world, instead of opening them, when they abandoned such commercial outposts as Candahar—many of which, he thought, in the future would have led to a great increase in British trade. If they went on the principle of drawing in, instead of—where it legitimately could be done—opening out fresh markets for themselves, it behoved them to be still more careful in their negotiations with the old countries of the world; and, as far as he saw, there was no substantial indication that the Government were awake to the serious gravity of this matter. He would venture to appeal to all those who valued the principles of Free Trade. [Ironical cheers.] That was the way the Government tried, if they could, to throw this matter of commercial negotiations into a question of Protection; but he would appeal to those who valued Free Trade to be very careful in their negotiations with the rest of the world, so as to secure that their great industries should not suffer and be seriously damaged by the Protection action of other nations, because he thought he must be very blind to the signs of the times who did not see that for some reason or other their exports were diminishing, and the country was flooded with foreign productions, and that in consequence there was sure to be a feeling arise against the principles of Free Trade. He trusted they would have some more satisfactory statement from the Government, and some assurance that, in revising their relations with France, they would not bind themselves for a period of many years.

MR. J. K. CROSS: I heartily agree with a good deal that has fallen from the noble Viscount (Viscount Sandon), and with some of the remarks of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie), and so far as their recommendations to the Government go, as to the making of a Treaty with France, which shall be better than the present Convention, the noble Lord and the hon. Member will have the support of almost every Member on this side of the House. But it seems to me, Sir, that there is a good deal of misapprehension as to the bearings of this question, as to our trade with France, and also as to our trade with many foreign countries; and a good deal of the opposition to the negotiation of a new Treaty is based upon ignorance of fact. There are certainly objections to any Treaty of Commerce from a Free Trade standpoint; the greatest, to my mind, being that we give colour to the fallacy that in reducing or abolishing import duties it is not the nation which abolishes the duty which is chiefly benefited, that it is not the nation which adopts Free Trade that gains the most. Then, why have a Treaty at all? For this reason, Sir, that without Treaty our goods will be subject to the General Tariff—a Tariff which before 1860 was prohibitive, and which is largely prohibitive now, but with which we have no more right to interfere than we have to interfere with the Tariffs of the United States or Germany. We have absolutely nothing to do with the fiscal, or even with the protective, arrangements of foreign countries; their Tariffs are arranged by their Rulers in what they conceive to be their own interest; and though we know that they would be gainers by the abolition of all protective duties, we have no right to impose our notions upon them. What interest can be served by trying to tie up the hands of the Government, and by forcing them to break off negotiations before they know what are the best terms offered by France? The duty of the Government is perfectly clear in this matter; they understand the interests of the community; and surely those who are so capable in the ordinary affairs of life will be able to negotiate a Treaty which will be satisfactory, if such a Treaty be possible. The noble Lord seems to be labouring under an extraordinary delusion respecting the General Tariff, and he confounds it with the Tarif à Discuter, arguing as if they were one and the same thing. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets considers specific duties an evil. Speaking as a manufacturer, wishing to do the largest possible trade with France, I do not hesitate to say that in every case where it is possible to assess a specific duty at all, it is preferable to an ad valorem duty. It is much better for the manufacturers of this country that the duties charged upon their goods should always bear the same relative proportion to their cost of production, irrespective of raw material; that the duty should always bear the same proportion to the wages. In cases where the raw material varies greatly in price, the price of goods varies also, and with ad valorem duties, the tax upon the goods will at one time be equal to 30 per cent, and at another to 60 per cent, on the wages price. It is better for the French competitor also that the duties should be specific, for he will then be able to depend on a certain fixed protection, whereas in the case of ad valorem duties his protection is a movable quantity, not easily ascertainable. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets went on to speak of the Sugar Bounties. That is a matter which has often been discussed in the House, and which has caused much interest in the country; but it has always been a question whether the effect of the drawback was properly understood. A great reduction has taken place, not only in the duty but also in the drawback allowed on refined sugar exported from France; and the saccharine test has been altered, so that now, I believe, there is no bounty whatever on its export; and when sugar refiners complain that they are injured by the drawback allowed by the Austrian Government on raw sugar, and, at the same time, that they are injured by the French drawback on refined sugar, I really do not understand what they mean; for, at any rate, the drawback on raw sugar, if it has any effect, must cheapen raw sugar to them. What are the facts concerning French refined sugar? The latest published accounts of the French Government show that the exports of refined sugar from France to all the world—exports which are ruining the English sugar refiner—have fallen from 74,000,000 francs in 1875 to 39,000,000 francs in 1881, in the first six months of the year, or that they are about half now what they were in 1875; and still our sugar refiners seem to be no better off for the failure of the competition. I am told that some of the members of one great Scotch firm have bought land on the Thames, are spending £150,000, and are going to produce 70,000 tons a-year more refined sugar, to add to the depression. I heard something the other day which will illustrate the position of the sugar refiners. Some six sugar refiners, I think from Liverpool, called to see an hon. Member, and met him in the Lobby; they told him their dismal story, to which he listened with patience. When they had finished, he said—"Well, gentlemen, if you can find me a sugar refiner who lives in a house of less than £200 a-year rent, I will support Mr. Ritchie's Motion." They sighed, but they went away sorrowful, for they had great possessions. Next day, he met two of them in the Royal Academy, and asked if they had bought any pictures. "No," they said, "there is nothing worth buying;" but one of the gentlemen found something worth buying before he left town, for he is reported to have bought a pleasant little house for the modest sum of £37,000. Of course, there may be poor sugar refiners; but in such cases as these I do not think much sympathy is needed. There are a great many people outside the House who oppose a new Treaty with France on very different grounds; but the question is really whether the Resolution brought forward to-night is not an unfurling of the old flag of Protection? I am glad to hear hon. Members say that nothing is further from their intention; but what are the reasons alleged for the great opposition to this Treaty? It has been stated over and over again by Members outside this House, and inside too, and in the public Press, that our trade is in a decaying state. There was a meeting the other night in a great hall in London, at which many Members of Parliament were present; it was there stated that the effect of Commercial Treaties had been disastrous to this country; that France was now in the van of commerce, America second, and England a bad third. There were a good many Members of Parliament present, but not one of them had the grace—nay, I may say not one of them had the common honesty—to protest against such a statement. A little time ago I ventured to move for a Return showing the exports of France and England, in their home manufactures of cotton, woollen, linen, and silk. That Return, presented on the 1st July, showed that the exports of England were, in 1849, £40,000,000; in 1859, £73,000,000; in 1869, £107,000,000; in 1879, £94,000,000; and in 1880 they were £109,000,000. The French exports of the same manufactures were—in 1849, £16,000,000; in 1859, £32,000,000; in 1869, £35,000,000; in 1879, £28,000,000; and in 1880 they were £29,000,000; showing an increase in the English exports between 1859 and 1879 of 32 per cent, against a decrease in the French exports in the same period of 11 per cent; and, carrying the comparison on to the year 1880, we find that whilst the English exports of these four staple articles had between 1859 and 1880 increased 50 per cent, the French exports of her own production of these articles had decreased 10 per cent. How then can it be said that France is beating us out of the markets of the world? But I shall be asked why do I not compare the international exports and imports of the two countries? Is it not a fact that France sends to us much more than we send to her? Yes, she sends to us direct much more than we send to her direct; but what does it matter to us if she takes calico from Manchester in return for butter, or if she takes silk from China or coffee from Ceylon? The goods sent from here to those countries really discharge our debt to France. A good deal of stress is laid on the fact that, according to the Returns, France appears to be sending to us some £15,000,000 a-year more merchandize than we send to her; and we are asked if this will not cause a drain of bullion, and if this is not the sign of a losing trade? Well, Sir, how stands the bullion account? I have as much right to judge the state of trade by the bullion account as anyone else has to judge it by the trade account; and if I find that we get much more bullion from France than we send to her, I might point to that as a proof of a profitable trade. What are the facts? In the last two years we have received from France £9,437,000 in gold and silver coin and bullion, and we have sent to her £2,192,000, showing a balance in our favour of £7,245,000; and I have just as much right to quote this as a proof of profitable trade as hon. Members have to quote their figures as a proof of unprofitable trade. But, Sir, such comparisons are worthless. Then, an exact comparison is impossible for another reason; our Board of Trade Returns do not discriminate between goods going into France through foreign countries and those which are sent for home consumption to those countries. In connection with the Treaty Commission I had occasion to try to obtain accurate information. Finding that the export of English yarn to France appeared in the export tables as £478,000, and not thinking this correct, I made inquiries from half-a-dozen merchants in Manchester, and found that they alone sent more yarns to France than the export tables showed, but that the greater part of their sendings went through Antwerp, and did not appear in the exports to France at all. I found also that many goods coming to this country from Switzerland and some from Italy were entered among the French imports, making it impossible to compare the items of international trade. But really these returns matter nothing. These matters may be well left to our merchants. What our merchants have to do is this—they have to take care that they get more than they give. What are our Board of Trade Returns? They are a record of the sum total of the national business—a record of the aggregate of the individual transactions of our merchants; but I am afraid they are something which many hon. Members do not understand, for when it is stated that our imports are £120,000,000 a-year more than our exports, I hear hon. Members say, shaking their heads—"What nation on earth can stand such a drain?" Well, Sir, the drain has been going on for a long while. In the last 23 years we have imported £1,600,000,000 more merchandize and some £70,000,000 more coin and bullion than we have exported; we have, at the same time, increased our foreign investments in a marvellous manner. We have more railways, more shipping, more mines and manufactories, and more comforts of all kinds; and I venture to think that even if, in the course of a few years, our imports should exceed our exports by £200,000,000 annually, we shall not be ruined. I may mention one article which does not appear in the Board of Trade Returns at all. We do a large business as manufacturers and exporters of ships; but "shipping" does not appear among our many exports. May I say a few words as to the meaning of the great figures put before us by the Board of Trade? Hon. Members cannot quite understand how it is we get home £120,000,000 a-year more than we send out. It arises, to a great extent, from the fact that our merchants know exceedingly well what they are doing. When they send a commodity abroad they must get more for it than they give at home. If the House will allow me, I will give in detail three instances of our export and import trade. In the first place, I will take the shipment of £1,000 worth of cotton goods to Bombay, the returns coming home in raw cotton; in the second, I will take the shipment of £1,000 worth of pig iron to Calcutta, the returns coming home in jute; and in the third, the shipment of £1,000 worth of coal from Cardiff to San Francisco, the returns coming home in wheat. I give the gross returns in order to avoid confusion in detail. In the shipment of £1,000 worth of cotton goods to Bombay the freight will be £50; on arrival the goods will have to fetch £1,050 to clear expenses; the merchant or his agent will have the cash in hand; he might send it home, but this is the last thing he thinks of, and he invests his £1,050 in cotton, freighting it to Liverpool or London at a cost of £70. This cotton will require to be sold for £1,120 to clear expenses. There will appear in the export table an "export" of £1,000 of cotton goods, and there will appear in the import table an "import" of £1,120 of raw cotton, and no one will suffer loss by excess of import. In the second instance, £1,000 spent in pig iron will, at very low prices, buy 500 tons, the freight of this by steamer to Calcutta will be £500; the iron must realize £1,500, which sum invested in jute will purchase 100 tons; the freight to Dundee will be £300, and the value of the jute on arrival £1,800. There will appear in the Board of Trade Return an "export" of £1,000 of iron and an "import" of £1,800 of jute, and no one will be damnified thereby. The next instance is more startling. £1,000 will buy 2,000 tons of coal, free on board at Cardiff; the freight of this coal to San Francisco will be £1,500; the amount realized for it in San Francisco will be £2,500, which sum invested in wheat will purchase 2,000 quarters. The conveyance of this wheat to Liverpool will cost £1,500, and it will require to be sold at £4,000 in Liverpool to cover cost and expenses. In the import tables there will be an entry of £4,000 wheat; in the export tables there will be an entry of £1,000 coal; the one exchanges for the other. Is anyone poorer for this transaction? But it may be said these are ideal figures. [Mr. NEWDEGATE: Hear, hear!] Does the hon. Member for North Warwickshire not accept them? Well, I will quote from the Board of Trade Returns themselves. Last year (1880) 587,000 tons of coal were sent from this country to India. They were valued here at £265,000, and appear at this figure in our export tables; in the Indian import tables they are valued at 11,380,000 rupees, or a little over £900,000 sterling money. This sum purchased 60,000 tons of jute, the value of which on arrival here was £1,080,000. The coal left this country valued at £265,000; its equivalent, the jute, came home valued at £1,080,000, and I do not know that anyone is worse off for the exchange. But it is said to be unpatriotic to export our coal in exchange for wheat, that we had better grow our corn at home, and engage more English labour. But would that be the result? Will any hon. Member say that on imported wheat we spend less in labour than on home-grown wheat? What was the cost of the labour employed in the production of a quarter of wheat in England? I ask the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), who is an authority on such matters. He will, I hope, correct me if I am wrong. From what I can learn, I believe that in quoting 10s. as the labour cost of the production of a quarter of wheat in England I am in excess of the average. Well, what is spent on the getting of a ton of coal in this country, sending it to San Francisco, exchanging it there for a quarter of wheat, and bringing the wheat home? The getting of the coal will cost nearly 4s. in labour; it will be put on the railway and on shipboard by Englishmen and sent across the ocean in a ship built by Englishmen, with English capital. On arrival at San Francisco it is exchanged for wheat, the sending of which home again employs English shipping, labour, and capital. When the wheat arrives here, how much of its cost is represented by British labour? There is the labour spent on sinking the pit, on getting the coal, on transferring it to the port, on building the ship and manning it; and there is the labour employed in taking out the coal and bringing home the wheat. I do not know how I can assess the labour on a quarter of coal-won wheat at less than 30s., or probably three times as much as is spent on a quarter of home-grown corn. But what is the advantage to the nation? A merchant buys 500 or 1,000 tons of coal, sends it abroad, and exchanges it for wheat. He brings home a quarter of wheat in exchange for a ton of coal. A ton of coal in England at the present time is not worth more than 8s., in many cases not nearly so much. If we get in exchange for coal something which, in this country, is worth five times as much as the coal, is not this an advantage to the nation? I do not see that we are worse off through entering into transactions such as these. Well, Sir, what is to be the Autumn campaign of Gentlemen opposite? Is the flag of Protection again to be unfurled? Are we to lose that freedom of action we have enjoyed so long? Are we to accept trammels which hon. Gentlemen are not bold enough to support in this House, but which, when outside these walls, they do not hesitate to advocate? I do not think their programme will succeed. I suppose that hon. Gentlemen opposite will allow that if foreign nations imposed no duties on our exports, our trade would be very flourishing. Well, there is one great trade not hampered by foreign Tariffs, the greatest industry in this country, except agriculture—the coal trade; the trade which really is the key to the commerce of the world. Every nation is ready to receive our coal, yet the coal trade was never in a condition so depressed as it is now, notwithstanding that the production of last year was the greatest on record. What will be the result of Protection, if you try it? You must take heed from Germany. She is not now pointed at as a nation in the van of commerce. She was so a little while ago; but the blighting breath of Protection has passed over her, and she is falling behind. Some hon. Members wished to place a differential duty on wheat. They have such duties in Germany, and they are very moderate; not more than 5 per cent. Yet it is calculated that the difference in the price of rye bread, through the action of this duty, is such that a man will find himself short of a month's provision during the year. If the price of food is advanced 10 per cent, as some propose, the purchasing power of the workman, and of everyone, would be correspondingly reduced unless wages were raised; but there is no record, so far as I know, in the history of mankind where a tax upon food has raised the rate of wages; and in Germany the question now is not whether wages shall be raised, but whether the workman can have as much work and wages as before. Manufactories are going on to shorter hours, and discharging workmen to emigrate, until it appears that no less than 145,000 emigrants have left the shores of Germany during the last six months; and it is said that during the current year the export of humanity from that country will be 250,000. Perhaps I may be excused if I speak earnestly on this subject. My earliest days were passed in the shade of Protection. I do not want those times to come again. May I quote a short description of those times, written, not by a Radical, not even by an enthusiast for Free Trade, but written by the French historian, M. Guizot? The quotation refers to my native town; and he says, speaking of the time from 1836 and 1840—

“Bolton, a town of the second class in Lancashire, near Manchester, containing about 50,000 people, had been thrown by the commercial crisis into a condition of utter misery. Out of 50 manufactures 30 were closed, more than 5,000 operatives knew not where to seek or to obtain the means of sustenance. Disorder and crime, as well as misery, increased with awful rapidity; nearly half the houses were tenantless; the prisons overflowed, infants died in their mothers' arms, fathers deserted their wives and families, striving to forget those whom they could no longer maintain. But the evil continued; no succour came.”

Then it was, Sir, that the agitation in favour of Free Trade began. Do hon. Members opposite wish for a return of those times? My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, no doubt, remembers the condition of Bolton then, and I do not think that anyone will wish to exchange our present experience for a return of those old days. In regard to this Resolution, I am most anxious that our Government should have the power to make reasonable Treaties with foreign nations in the interests of commerce. I have the fullest confidence that the Government will carry out the best arrangements that can be made, not only with France, but with other countries also; and I sincerely hope that nothing may ever be done by our statesmen to endanger that most precious privilege of Englishmen—the right to buy what we most want where we best can.

MR. JACKSON said, he wished only to give a few reasons why the House should adopt the Resolution of his hon. Friend. He was sure everyone who had listened to his hon. Friend the Member for Bolton (Mr. J. K. Cross) must have felt satisfaction in listening to such an interesting and able speech. It was not his intention to follow him in the line he had taken. It surprised him, however, to hear the hon. Member express a desire for specific as against ad valorem duties; and he was surprised to hear the statement that we had nothing to do with the way in which the French levied their duties. He had always understood that the Treaty of 1860 was a bargain between the two countries, and he had yet to learn that one of the parties had no right to interfere when they felt that bargain had been broken. In the next place, he could not accept the view of the hon. Member that it was a sign of prosperity that our imports very largely exceeded our exports. If that were so, why did not the hon. Gentleman recommend that no effort should be made to reduce the rates in the new French Treaty—because that would most effectually limit our exports, and probably increase our imports? Coming back, however, to the question in hand, there were one or two points in the speech of the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs which he thought came very strangely from him. He could not help thinking when he was addressing the House that he was making a very clever speech; but he evaded the difficulties which had been brought before them. In regard to specific duties, he pointed out that this question had been considered by the late Government in regard to a proposed Commercial Treaty with Italy. He also pointed out that the Government had no objection in principle to specific duties. He (Mr. Jackson) at once said he had no objection in principle to specific duties; but the difficulty which he and his constituents felt in regard to the question was that all attempts hitherto made to convert ad valorem into its exact equivalent in their manufactures had failed. The hon. Gentleman did not enlighten the House as to whether the Commissioners had been able to find out an equivalent in specific duties which would be satisfactory to Bradford and Leeds manufacturers and merchants. The question under discussion was one in which his constituents took a deep interest, and one in which they were vitally concerned. A Petition had been presented to the House that day which practically followed the lines of the Resolution, and which was signed by 25,350 of his constituents, praying the House to sanction no Treaty with France on worse terms than the existing one. Of the 15,000,000 of British manufactures which were exported from England to France about one-fourth was exported from the West Riding of Yorkshire, and that showed how deeply interested the district was in the question. Instead of so many complaints being made against the Government, he would rather that their hands were strengthened so as to enable them to make a better Treaty. He did not see why the Government should not have followed the course adopted in regard to the Treaty of 1860, and have left to Parliament the power of final ratification. Many persons to whom he had spoken on the subject did not think this would in the least degree have endangered the Treaty or diminished the chances of making better terms. As regarded the proposal to alter ad valorem to specific duties, he would remind the House that the Joint Commission—British and French—which sat in 1860 was, after several months' labour, unable to come to any agreement as to any proper equivalent specific duty so far as woollens were concerned. He was open to correction if he was wrong; but he was informed that the proposals which the French Commissioners had made for the conversion of ad valorem into specific duties on mixed woollens represented an increase in the present rate of duties of from 20 to 200 per cent. If these were the most favourable proposals the Government had received, he could not conceive that they would for one moment listen to them, as they would destroy the trade of a very large district, so far as France was concerned. The district which he had the honour to represent had another important trade—namely, the leather trade. Leather was divided into four classes. The French Government proposed to make some slight increase in three of the classes, but a very large increase in the fourth. They proposed, in the last-mentioned case, to increase the duty from 10 francs per 100 kilos to 50 francs per 100 kilos, or an increase of 400 per cent. This proposal, although it affected only one category of goods, affected 90 per cent of the total amount of leather exported from this country to France, and covered the whole amount of leather of British manufacture exported. He mentioned that to show the danger of the Commissioners being misled in endeavouring to fix an average which would be equivalent to the present ad valorem duties. A constituent of his had received a trade circular, dated June 6, from a wool broker in Melbourne, which said that in the address of the retiring Chairman of the Melbourne Chamber of Commerce reference was made to the contemplated new line of steamers from Marseilles to that port, which the French Government were likely to subsidize for the special purpose of enabling French manufacturers to obtain their supplies of wool direct. That might be considered simply a trade circular; but the Returns furnished by the Board of Trade tended to confirm the view that France had, during the last 10 years, been more and more taking her supplies of raw material from abroad direct, and not through the London markets. The exports of British produce and manufactures and of foreign and Colonial goods from this country to France showed this result. In the 10 years from 1861 to 1870 the exports of British manufactured produce to France amounted to £101,590,000, those of foreign and Colonial goods to £128,490,000. From 1871 to 1880 British exports to France had increased to £160,230,000, while the exports of foreign and Colonial produce had fallen to something over £124,000,000. The bounties, therefore, which the French proposed to give to their shipping involved, not an imaginary, but a real danger. So far as he was able to judge, under the Treaties at present in existence, subject to annulling on 12 months' notice, there had been found no inconvenience to trade. When the revision of Treaties of Commerce had to be taken in hand, it was exceedingly undesirable to bind this country for a long period. One other matter he might refer to. Under the present French Patent Laws, inventors, more especially the manufacturers of machinery in this country, were placed at a great disadvantage. Under any patent taken out in France the patented part must be made in that country. The consequence was that one portion of the machinery was probably made in this country and another portion in France. That was an arrangement which worked very disadvantageously for the manufacturers of machinery in this country, and especially in the borough (Leeds) he had the honour to represent, which contained some of the most eminent machine makers in England. One firm had found the inconvenience so great that it had been compelled to take a workshop in Lille for the purpose of carrying out the arrangement. He hoped that in negotiating a new Treaty with France care would be taken that our machine manufacturers should be placed on equal terms with the French. They had heard a great deal that night about Free Trade, Reciprocity, and Protection. The hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Slagg), whom he always listened to with pleasure, went out of his way the other day to say something with regard to Reciprocity and Protection, and he looked to technical education as the cure for the difficulties under which we laboured with regard to hostile Tariffs. Well, he had heard a story which might throw some light on that point. A Bradford manufacturer told a merchant dealing with America that he had some goods which he wanted to send to that country. He was recommended to send, not the whole of those goods, but only three bales, representing about £400. Those goods were sold at a great advance upon Bradford prices; but when the merchant told the manufacturer that there was a debit of £36 against him, he had the greatest difficulty in making the manufacturer understand that in consequence of the duties, ad valorem and specific, and the charges imposed, the manufacturer, had he given the goods away at Bradford, would have been £36 in pocket. How would technical education remedy that? He should like to ask the hon. Gentleman whether he thought that the extension of any system of technical education in this country—an extension which he should be glad to see—would enable us to compete against such a state of things as that. The hon. Gentleman had said that Reciprocity and Protection were dead and buried; but that there had been an attempt to resuscitate them. It struck him that the hon. Gentleman must have been visiting their grave and have seen their ghosts, so very much afraid of them was he. Recently he was speaking to an American Free Trader, who, he believed, was a friend of the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Potter), and who had recently come from America, and he asked the gentleman when the Americans were going to take their duties off. The gentleman replied that he did not think much progress was being made in America in the way of Free Trade. He (Mr. Jackson) asked him what would be the effect of imposing a duty upon all corn imported from America, and the reply was—

“The imposition of a duty upon corn by the British nation would do more to spread Free Trade principles in America than anything which has taken place for a long time.”

It had been stated on high authority that force was no remedy; but when persuasion and entreaty had failed it might be useful to try a little coercion. He did not believe that there was a man in this country who desired Protection for Protection's sake. But if we did not occasionally speak out and make it known that we intended, if need be, to protect ourselves, we should find ourselves left behind in the commercial race. He quite agreed with the hon. Member who preceded him that the country was not in a deplorable condition; but the mere fact that our trade was a large one did not prove that employment was being provided for the large mass of the population, and he could show by figures that at all events with regard to particular industries our imports were increasing, while our exports were decreasing. Taking manufactured woollen goods as an example, it would be found that whereas the value of our imports from France in 1872 amounted to £2,800,000, in 1880 it amounted to £4,800,000; while in the same period that of our exports to that country had diminished by £1,000,000. That, at all events, was not a condition of things which was satisfactory to the British manufacturers. Looking at the matter in a broader way, it would be found that while the total value of our exports of woollen goods in 1872 was £32,000,000, it had fallen in 1880 to £17,265,000, or nearly one-half. On the other hand, the value of our total imports of the same class of goods had risen from £4,380,000 in 1872 to £7,649,000 in 1880. It was a noteworthy fact that our periods of prosperity in this country were those in which we exported the largest quantity of goods; while our periods of depression were those in which we exported the least and imported the most. He trusted, therefore, that the Government would agree to this Resolution, which he believed would strengthen their hands in the negotiations for a Treaty with France, and would tend to promote the interests of the manufacturing industry of this country.

MR. BARRAN said, he must congratulate his hon. Friend and Colleague (Mr. Jackson) upon the temperate tone of his speech. If his example had been followed by Gentlemen of more experience in the House, very much better service would have been done to the trade and commerce of the country. He thought the House would have no difficulty in discerning that the object of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) was the very object which he had himself deprecated. There could be no doubt at all that the question of the Sugar Bounties and the question of Reciprocity was to be the Party cry of the Tory Party. The new-born zeal of the noble Lord the Member for Liverpool (Viscount Sandon) on behalf of the working men of this country would have been very much better manifested at a time when the noble Lord was in power, and when the late Government in the year 1877 had a fair chance of concluding a Treaty on terms such as we should be able to accept at the present day. He was quite sure that whatever might be said of the action of the Foreign Office at the present day, their conduct compared favourably with that of their Predecessors. They had been willing at all times and under all circumstances to lend their aid in furtherance of trade and commerce. The position of the Liberal Party entitled the Ministers to some consideration. At any rate, they did claim to be Free Traders; and, as Free Traders, they claimed to be the champions of the best interests of the nation. He had not lost his faith in Free Trade, and he thought that the public would be reassured when they read the speech delivered that night by his hon. Friend the Member for Bolton (Mr. J. K. Cross); and those who had been disposed to yield a little to the entreaties of men who were anxious to return to the trammels of Protection would also, he imagined, be inclined to have some faith in Free Trade principles. If we looked back to 1860, when the Treaty was first made, and compared the condition of the trade and commerce of this country, if we compared the social condition of the people, the Returns of pauperism, or the state of the labour market of that time with the present, we must feel that very great strides had been made. We were now asked to return to the old system of Protection. The proposition of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets would lead us into the difficulty of having no Treaty with France and of being subjected to the same disadvantages as we experienced in 1860. At that time France was in a state of great depression; her industries were languishing, and her people dissatisfied. She adopted a more wise and liberal principle, and negotiated with this country for the purpose of reducing her duties. Up to that time her duties were prohibitory. He was right in saying that both England and France had been largely benefited by the changes then made. The changes were, no doubt, subject to the fluctuations of trade and commerce; and France had, no doubt, suffered, as other nations had suffered, from depression in trade. When this depression occurred from time to time, people were naturally disposed to seek for remedies; and the probability was that France, at the present time, was seeking for a remedy which many of them would condemn. He was anxious that we should not follow her example—that we should maintain our principle of Free Trade. But he contended that we had a perfect right to make such terms with France as we felt disposed to do. We were in the same condition as regarded France as we were in 1860. France had denounced the Commercial Treaty and had set us free. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets spoke of France as if she were doing something unfair by imposing certain conditions. He was not sure that the hon. Member would not say that France had no right to promulgate a General Tariff. She had promulgated a General Tariff. Those were the terms on which she was disposed to do trade with the whole world. But she did not say that she was not prepared to make special conditions with us. She had appointed Representatives to enter into negotiations with us. They had met in London and they had exchanged views with the Commissioners. He had great confidence in the ultimate result being satisfactory. We must accept the best terms we could get, or we must adopt the principle of having no Treaty. He contended that the advantage which we enjoyed in a moral point of view from the Treaty with France was equal to that which we enjoyed in a fiscal respect—that the fears of a French invasion had vanished in consequence of our commercial intercourse with France. This was a question not merely of pounds, shillings, and pence; it was a question of living on amicable terms with our neighbours, which would lead to the prosperity of the two nations. The noble Lord the Member for Liverpool said he knew a great deal about the working men, and he was anxious about their present condition. Though the trade between this country and France had not lately been as prosperous as many manufacturers wished, he had no hesitation in saying that the condition of our people generally was very satisfactory; that there was very much less distress, much less pauperism, and much more satisfaction and peace among our people now than 30 or 40 years ago. Emigration from this country to America had decreased 30 per cent. One of the causes—the main cause—of the depression which existed in this country at the present time was a production of goods—and he took blame to himself in that matter—in excess of the demand of the nation and of the world. He had no fear for England, except we lost confidence in ourselves. If we maintained our Free Trade principles and continued to have such a Ministry as we had now, and which had done so much to promote our material welfare, we should enjoy happiness and prosperity.

MR. NEWDEGATE said: Mr. Speaker, I wish to say nothing that may disturb the confidence of the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Barran), who has just sat down; but I confess that it is with intense satisfaction I find the commercial interests of this country preparing for a Commercial Treaty, by giving this House the benefit of their knowledge and experience. I well remember the Treaty of 1860, and I remember how very much we were kept in the dark as to the negotiations, which were previously conducted by Mr. Cobden —as it appeared afterwards, on the part of the Government. There is a most singular despatch from the late Lord Clarendon, who was then our Minister in France. He wrote to the Foreign Office begging to know in what capacity Mr. Cobden appeared, for it was evident, although Lord Clarendon most good-humouredly overlooked the fact, that Mr. Cobden was, in fact, superseding our Minister in Paris, by negotiating without authority with the French Imperial Government. That despatch is in the Library, and I think that it affords a warning, which the commercial interest and its representatives in this country should bear in mind, to the effect that when it is known that a Commercial Treaty is contemplated, they should urge their views upon the Government in this House. I rejoice to say that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, in answer to a Question from myself the other day, assured this House that whatever negotiations might be carried on—whatever agreement might be made between Her Majesty's Ministers and the Ministers of France with respect to a Commercial Treaty—the functions and the rights of this House should be respected, and that any such agreement should be provisional until it received the consent of this House. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] I am sorry to see that the right hon. Gentleman shakes his head and denies the accuracy of my impression. It is necessary that this House should remember that Commercial Treaties differ from all other Treaties, inasmuch as although the conditions of a Commercial Treaty may not alter existing duties, it is almost inevitable—actually inevitable—that the Treaty should trench upon the functions and the power of this House as to the imposition of new or renewed duties. Now, Sir, in 1860 this question was formally decided; and, with the permission of the House, I will read the words of Lord Palmerston, showing how genuinely he understood and respected the right of the House to have its powers and its functions reserved unfettered by any engagement entered into by Her Majesty's Ministers without the assent of this House. Speaking of that Treaty, Lord Palmerston said—"When ratified the Convention will be laid"—(he did not call it a Treaty, but he called it a Convention)—

"When ratified, the Convention will be laid before the House; but this much I will say now in answer to the question of the right hon. Gentleman"—

(the late Lord Beaconsfield)—

"as to what would be the function of this House in regard to that Convention"—

(he did not call it a Treaty)—

"that the arrangements stipulated to be made on the part of Her Majesty are made conditional on the consent of Parliament to them. Unless we have the consent of both Houses of Parliament we are free from any engagement that has been contracted."—[3 Hansard, clvi. 109.]

And that is the position which I trust the right hon. Gentleman will reserve to this House, as it was reserved before. Notwithstanding the declaration of Lord Palmerston, which I have quoted, in 1860 the House still was not satisfied that it had been sufficiently consulted, and what did Mr. Disraeli—then the Leader of the Conservative Party in this House? Sir, he moved this Resolution because the House felt that there had been an undue degree of concealment in the negotiations—

"This House does not think fit to go into Committee on the Customs Acts, with a view to the reduction or repeal of the Duties referred to in the Treaty of Commerce between Her Majesty and the Emperor of the French, until it shall have considered and assented to, the engagements in that Treaty."

The House divided. It was a very full House, and these are the numbers:—For the Motion 230; against the Motion 293: Majority 63. This shows plainly how determined the House was not to allow itself to be led blindfold into any compromise of its power of taxation. I am glad, therefore, to find that the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) has elicited from the House the true spirit of independence, which Mr. Pitt, the negotiator of the first Commercial Treaty with France, so much respected in 1797 that he laid the whole conditions that he had proposed to France on the Table of the House for five months before the Treaty was completed. I mention these facts to show how completely justified is the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets in bringing this subject before the House; since now, at the conclusion of the Session, we have the prospect of negotiations with France; and the House, in the fulfilment of its duty to the country, is bound to reserve its assent and its sole power of dealing with taxation, lest Her Majesty's Ministers should imagine that the House has abandoned to them the functions which rest solely with itself. I was glad to read what the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister said at the Lord Mayor's dinner, that he believed this House to be in no way deficient in talent, as compared with any of its predecessors; and I think the House, by its conduct to-night, is proving itself worthy of that commendation by showing its readiness to defend the rights and functions with which the nation has intrusted us. To-night I am better satisfied on this subject than I have been for years. The hon. Member for Bolton (Mr. J. K. Cross) wished to tempt me into a discussion as to the balance of trade. It is a subject on which I have both written and spoken; but I have become more cautious than the hon. Member for Bolton seems to be, for, looking across the House, after presenting some figures calculated to produce a very strong impression in favour of the present commercial policy, as affecting the balance of trade—looking across the House the hon. Member said—"But I shall be told that I am dealing with imaginary figures." I could not withhold the expression of my assent. I have had some experience of the difficulty of obtaining exact statistics to illustrate fairly the balance of the trade of the United Kingdom, and it is not by partial instances of isolated transactions that that great question can be duly or safely tested. I stand here, Sir, unblushing in the retention of my former opinions. I am prepared to say what I was obliged to tell the Mayor of Birmingham, the brother of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade. The Mayor, at a meeting in Birmingham, feared that I might enter on this subject. I replied—"You must remember that though I may be in a minority in England, I have the majority of the commercial world with me in these opinions." I cannot believe that our brethren across the Atlantic are lunatics any more than ourselves. I think it would be a reflection on the English race if I were to be so presumptuous as even to appear to admit anything of the kind. Will hon. Members believe that I, who was the last Chairman of the Protection Society for the United Kingdom and the Colonies—will hon. Members believe me to-night, when I tell them that when I first joined that Society my first struggle was to induce the members of it to agree with the late Sir Robert Peel, who had then proposed the reduction of various Customs' Duties, which had been imposed or enhanced by the previous Liberal Government? I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that such is the fact. I, and the late Mr. Beckett-Denison, supported, and successfully supported, the Tariff introduced in 1842, and the further reduction of Customs' Duties by the late Sir Robert Peel up to 1845. And yet you nominal Free Traders seem to consider me a fanatic—I, who supported the late Sir Robert Peel in converting the prohibitory Tariff of this country, which had been imposed and enhanced by the Liberal Governments which preceded that of Sir Robert Peel in 1842, into a scale of moderate protective duties. The term Free Trade has been perverted; it has been misused for years to designate the system of free imports maintained by this country, while the Tariffs of other countries are becoming more and more protective. That which hon. Members on this side of the House and the commercial public are beginning to demand is not Free Trade in the perverted sense that I have described, but Fair Trade, so that we may trade with foreigners on something like terms of equality. The only difference between the two sides of the House is, I believe, as to the means by which fair trade may be obtained for the commercial and industrial interests of this country. I hope, I have reason to believe, that the bigotry of free imports is being dispelled. The Representatives of the commercial interests are here. I am here in answer to the appeal virtually made by the Prime Minister in his speech at the Lord Mayor's dinner. We are here for the purpose of arming, for the purpose of strengthening the hands of Her Majesty's Ministers in their negotiations for a Commercial Treaty with the Government of France.

MR. WILLIAMSON said, it was quite true that the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) did not advocate Protection pure and simple; but he did not advocate Free Trade. The hon. Member advocated Retaliation, and that they knew to be only another name for Protection. Although the hon. Member repudiated the idea of imposing a duty on breadstuffs, yet, from the cross-examination to which he subjected him

(Mr. Williamson) before the Royal Commission, some notion of that kind must have been floating through his mind. It might appear paradoxical, but he had the impression that the hostile Tariffs of some of the competing nations did not do us the injury that some hon. Members opposite imagined, but helped to stimulate our trade to a certain extent. At least, they gave us a firmer grip on the non-manufacturing countries, such as South America, China, Japan, and Australia, which were the largest consumers of our goods. He did not think the hon. Member had treated the House fairly in the years he had selected for comparison. He had also not placed the figures in every case fairly before the House. In truth, no nation that imposed high Tariffs on manufactured goods could compete with us, and never would be able to do so. Practically the shipping trade of America had been annihilated by Protection, while the British shipping trade had been remarkably prosperous for the last two years, and he hoped that prosperity would continue. No doubt less profits were made, and complaints were heard in consequence; but that was one of the results of the altered conditions brought about by telegraphy and other things, and they must accept the situation. He did not concur in the gloomy views taken by the hon. Member as to the trade of the country. A number of our manufacturing districts—notably Leicester and Nottingham—had been fairly prosperous of late, and the workmen fully employed. In Bradford, on the other hand, there had been much depression; but that was capable of explanation. He did not think the Bradford people were up to the mark in point of taste. They manufactured cheap articles of dress for women, and it was very difficult to make these tastefully. They also manufactured them chiefly of lustres, whilst of late the fashion had changed in favour of softer and more clinging substances. As to the sugar trade, he was sure that we had suffered more from antiquated methods of refining than from foreign bounties; and he understood that recent legislation had so modified the French Sugar Bounties that they could exercise but little influence on British trade. He would contend that some of the facts stated by the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Town Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) and by the noble Lord the Member for Liverpool (Viscount Sandon) were capable of explanations different from those which they had given. He did not suppose for a moment that the House would sanction the Motion, and he hoped it would be rejected by a large majority.

MR. ECROYD begged to compliment the hon. Member for Bolton (Mr. J. K. Cross) upon his able speech. In this debate it was no Party question they were discussing; and if there was one thing more than another which, as a new Member, he was pleased to observe in the House, it was the ready allowance made for honest differences of opinion which they must always expect to find among men who studied great political questions. It was not to be wondered at that there were great diversities of opinion among those who were classed as Protectionists. No doubt, some Gentlemen did desire to see a return to Protection; but he (Mr. Ecroyd) was not one of them. There were, no doubt, also those who held the opinion that the best way to bring round nations like the United States and France was to retaliate upon them in this way—that if they put a duty of 20 or 50 per cent on our leading productions we should put the same duties upon theirs. He could conceive no principle more irrational, and none less capable of being carried into practical application; and if that were the meaning of Retaliation he was no Retaliationist. With regard to the term Reciprocity, it was very difficult to understand what meaning to attach to it. It contained within itself the germs of those high desires expressed by the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Barran) for the peace and better understanding between nations in which they all agreed. Reciprocity, in whatever sense they took its meaning, must surely be a thing they would all desire to bring about. There had been a great deal of discussion about the balance of trade, and perhaps the general question might be approached in that way very profitably. He was one of those who attached no necessary importance to the discrepancy between the exports and imports of this country. We had very large foreign investments, and in connection with our great carrying trade a large amount of wages must accrue to us. The income due to us on these accounts must cause our imports, as a general rule, considerably to exceed our exports in value; but one important element had been left out of sight by those who would explain the whole excess in that way. The years 1871, 1872, 1873, and 1874 were years of great prosperity to this country, in which our industries were in active employment. In those years there was a tendency exhibited to a nearer approximation of the amounts of our exports and imports than during the less prosperous years that followed. According to many of the explanations, which really over-explained the reason of the great difference between our exports and our imports, those ought to have been years when the nation was becoming impoverished; but he did not think any one on the opposite Benches would be bold enough to assert that. The real explanation was that in those years, because our industries were fully employed, because we were earning a large surplus income, we were greatly adding to our investments abroad; whilst in the years which had followed our industries had only been two-thirds employed, and there had been a great amount of enforced idleness. The result had been that having the same or a greater population to feed and clothe, upon a reduced income, we had been compelled to withdraw from foreign countries part of the value of our investments there. He had observed the extremely optimistic tone in the speeches of hon. Gentlemen opposite, many of them Representatives of large manufacturing towns, where he knew there existed a great amount of discontent on the part of the working classes with the present position of our commerce and industries; and he ventured to think they would find it much more difficult to justify themselves before their constituents than would those who had invited the attention of the House to the subject. The great question of Free Trade, and what it had done for this country, was dwelt upon in somewhat eloquent language by the hon. Member for Bolton in the latter part of his speech. He (Mr. Ecroyd), too, was one of those who had the privilege of witnessing the success of the agitation for Free Trade; and, though a young man, he took a deep and proud interest in what was then done by the country. He had never thought that course mistaken, and still believed that what was then done was rightly done. He recognised to the fullest extent the great benefits that Free Trade had brought to the working classes of this country. But the state of things was much changed since then. At that time the laws of this country were the great barrier against a free interchange of commodities, and there was little restriction on the part of the United States. Now, the Protection and exclusion were on the part of the States, which had created an artificial system for the purpose of excluding foreign manufactures. That country was becoming more and more independent of England. The old state of things could not be restored. Those considerations were the key to the discussion of the great question, which was falsely called Reciprocity. This country had within its boundaries a population skilled and industrious in all manufactures beyond any people the world had ever seen. They were not in the position of a nation which could live upon its own limited resources. They had to manufacture for vast regions of the world, and they were dependent for the food of the people on free intercourse with other nations. During the last 10 years that intercourse had been restricted, and this want of Reciprocity was the thing of which they complained. They desired that the barrier now imposed by the United States should be removed as effectually as England removed in 1846 the barrier which she had erected. He maintained that what was contended for at present under the name of Free Trade was not the substance but the shadow which was fought for, not by working men, but by the doctrinaires by whom the working men allowed themselves to be led. He had some authority to say this, because he had been returned to the House by a large working-class constituency, after he had expressed to them with great freedom his opinions on this subject. There had been an attempt made in this country to set up the principle of free land; but he should, for one, leave it to those who had landed property to judge for themselves how it could be turned to the best account, and he should encourage no one to attempt the growth of wheat under conditions where it could not pay. He knew very well the stigma that must attach to anyone who would proclaim his belief in the necessity of proposing any tax whatever upon the food of the people; but if the difficulty from which we suffered was this—that we were obliged to purchase, say, £100,000,000 sterling of food every year from people who would not take our productions in exchange, it must be a matter of vital importance to try if we could not establish within our own Empire the power of growing those products. The sacrifice could only be temporary, and the moment we succeeded in establishing that power we should enjoy the substance instead of the shadow of Free Trade. The Cobden Treaty was an attempt to promote the principle of Free Trade; but he could not admit that it had succeeded as its promoters expected. In negotiating with the French Government it was of the greatest importance that we should not at this time enter into any Treaty which was irrevocable. He was not going to say that Retaliation was the policy to be adopted towards France. He hoped we should have a friendly establishment of increased freedom of exchange between this and other countries. But it might, unfortunately, be otherwise, and we should stand in a worse position if we bound ourselves beforehand by a self-denying ordinance not to impose duties under any circumstances upon manufactures imported from France into this country.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: At the commencement of the interesting and moderate speech just delivered by the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Ecroyd), he referred to speeches from this side of the House, which, in his opinion, contained references to subjects outside and beyond the immediate issue under discussion. I cannot but think that the same criticism will apply to much that has fallen from the hon. Gentleman himself; but I do not make this a matter of complaint. On the contrary, I do not hesitate to say that the real interest of this discussion consists in those portions of it which have reference to the new doctrines of Fair Trade, Reciprocity, and Retaliation, of which we have heard so much and know so little, and with respect to which we are naturally anxious to have accurate and definite information. I had hoped, in view of this debate, that at last we should be able to grasp the phantom which has so long eluded us. I confess that these expectations have been disappointed, and that even now, after having listened attentively to everything which has fallen from the hon. Member and from previous speakers on his side of the House, I am still in the dark as to what they mean, and even as to whether they understand their own meaning themselves. It is gratifying, no doubt, to be assured, as we have been by all of them, that they are opposed to Protection and in favour of "real" Free Trade; but it is difficult for a plain man to reconcile these assurances with the other statements which they have made. We have had expounded to-night several shades in the new heterodoxy which seems at last to have secured the patronage of the Conservative Party. We have, in the first place, my hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), whose consistency we all gladly recognize, and who tells us that he stands before the House "unblushing," the last Chairman of the old Protection Society, the last rose of summer, for 40 years left blooming alone, and now both gratified and astonished to see himself surrounded by so large a company. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) refuses to go as far as the hon. Member for North Warwickshire. He tells us that he is not in favour of Protection; but then he adds that he approves of countervailing duties, and that he considers that we should now do wisely to take up once more the weapons which we have prematurely abandoned—meaning, by this expression, the duties upon foreign produce by which, in former times, home industry was supposed to have been protected. Then we have the noble Lord the Member for Liverpool (Viscount Sandon). He is indignant that an attempt should be made to mix him up, of all persons in the world, with the discarded doctrines of Protection. He protests, in almost pathetic tones, his admiration and respect for the deceased leaders of the Free Trade movement; and I cannot avoid saying, in passing, that it is a characteristic fact in this and similar discussions that those who agree with the noble Lord are fond of expressing their respect for the Free Trade leaders and Political Economists who are gone from us, and who cannot repudiate the heresies which are now attributed to them; while they are unwilling to accord any authority at all to the utterances of those Free Traders and Economists who are still alive—who are the legitimate heirs and successors of the dead, and who continue and maintain their true faith and best traditions. The noble Lord tells us that he is in favour of "Fair Trade." I have a great respect for the noble Lord, though I am not able to take him at his own estimate as the true Representative of the trading classes and the commercial interests of this country. But it is in no disrespect to his general ability that I challenge him to point out to the House any practical distinction between what he calls Fair Trade, and what the rest of the world have hitherto consented to call Protection. He complains, for instance, with regard to the Cobden Treaty that it bound this country not to impose any duties on French produce, while it left the French free to levy duties not exceeding 30 per cent on the products of English industry, and he says that this is not a fair arrangement. But how does he propose to alter it? He may, of course, endeavour to persuade the French to give up their duties and to allow the free import of English goods. He knows, however, that this is impossible, and the only alternative open to him is to meet the French in their folly, and to impose duties not exceeding 30 per cent on their exports. That may be right, or it may be wrong; but, at least, the operation would produce a state of things exactly similar to that which existed under the protective system which the noble Lord professes to disapprove. On the whole, then, although the means are different and the language varies, it appears in every case, and in spite of protests to the contrary, that hon. Members opposite do intend to revert to a system of protection, although they prudently refuse to tell us the exact nature of the protective measures which they desire us to adopt. Although in this respect they continue indefinite and vague, we have, at least, as one result of the discussion, a full statement of the grounds on which the claim for Reciprocity or Retaliation is based; and I am here to challenge the allegations which have been made, and to say, with regard to them, that they are, in the main, either greatly exaggerated or altogether inaccurate.

Before I call the attention of the House to the facts and figures on which I shall rest my case, I have to notice a preliminary matter which has been referred to by the noble Lord the Member for Liverpool. In language so strong as to be almost offensive, he accuses the Government of practising concealment upon Parliament and the people. I emphatically repel these imputations of motive, and these insinuations, which are unworthy of the noble Lord. I admit that he ought to be a good judge of what constitutes concealment. While he was a Member of the late Administration he had much experience and practice in this matter; and I will venture to say that the great difference between the late and the present Government is that the present Government conceal nothing that they can possibly publish, while the late Government published nothing they could possibly conceal. Sir, the discovery of the noble Lord is a monopoly of his own; the charge of concealment has not been made or supported by any other Member. It has not been suggested on behalf of any representative commercial body, or on behalf of any of those organizations of working men whose interests the noble Lord now undertakes to champion! and the grounds on which he bases his accusation are childish and frivolous in the last degree. He complains, in the first place, that we have not published the propositions which have been made to us, from time to time, on behalf of the French Government. He knows that we have been anxious to lay these propositions before the country, and that we have only been precluded from doing so by the express refusal of the French Government to allow them to be treated as otherwise than confidential. Then, in the second place, he refers to what he calls once more, in spite of contradiction, the refusal of the Government to give a translation of the General Tariff. We gave, at his request, a copy of this Tariff in the original French, although we considered that it was entirely unnecessary, as the General Tariff has not yet been the subject of discussion, and it may never have any practical interest for this country. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Stuart-Wortley) was the first to ask for a translation. Now, I believe, it is usual not to refuse any Return pressed for by any hon. Member unless its publication is inconsistent with the interests of the public service; and, therefore, I did not refuse the request of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield; but I took him into my confidence, and explained to him the reasons which led the Government to think that the translation was unnecessary, and I asked him whether, under those circumstances, he would not think it well not to press his Motion. A few days afterwards the noble Lord came down to the House, and, in a hectoring tone, and with a "stand and deliver" manner, demanded an explanation of what he called my extraordinary reply, and insisted on an immediate assent to the Motion. I ventured to deprecate the noble Lord's warmth, and I begged him to wait for a few days until I had an opportunity of consulting the Representatives of the commercial classes to know whether they considered the publication would be of general service. The noble Lord has said to-night that we ought to have consulted the Chambers of Commerce at an earlier period; but when I proposed to communicate with them, the noble Lord expressed his contempt for these authorities, and declined absolutely to be bound by their opinion, preferring to rely upon his own special sources of information. This is the inadequate foundation on which the noble Lord seeks to erect his superstructure of charge and accusation against the Government. He goes on to say that in a Return which we presented some time ago we dropped out all information about agriculture; and he insinuates that this, too, was part of the insidious plan of the Government to withhold information from all concerned. Sir, the noble Lord would have been more "straightforward," to use his own expression, if he had told the House that the Return to which he refers was a preliminary Return, containing the changes of duty on the principal articles of export from England to France. There is no considerable export of agricultural produce to France; and consequently it was not, and indeed could not have been, included in this Return. But when the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John Manners) asked for particular information on the point, I had no hesitation whatever in at once acceding to his request. Lastly, the noble Lord complains that the Government did not take an earlier opportunity—during the winter, I think he said—of consulting Chambers of Commerce and the Mayors of the large towns with regard to the propositions of the French. The Mayors of the large towns and the Representatives of the commercial classes are people of common sense, and they would not have thanked the Government if we had attempted to consult them before we had any proposition at all to lay before them. My hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir Charles W. Dilke) has already pointed out that if it be an offence to delay the publication of documents connected with commercial negotiations, the late Government have much more to answer for than we. It is true that the noble Lord disclaims any comparison between the present negotiations and the arrangements with Servia which were withheld from Parliament during the time of the late Government. But my hon. Friend did not rest his case upon this, but on the fact that in the negotiations on two several occasions—in Paris—in connection with the French Convention, the Protocols and Papers were not produced by the late Government. There is another case in point. In 1877, a most important Commission was held in France to inquire into the state of industry in that country and into the condition of the labouring classes. This was a matter which had the greatest interest for the working classes here, whose claims on the present occasion the noble Lord has without any authority assumed to represent. But what happened? When my right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council (Mr. Mundella) again and again pressed the late Government to give a translation of the Report of the proceedings of this Commission it was refused by them on the score of expense. I am not now saying whether the refusal was justified or not; but I do complain that those who live in glass houses like the noble Lord should not be so exceedingly ready to throw stones.

In listening to the speech of the Mover of the Resolution, I have had occasion to-night to ask myself several times what can be the object of the Motion which he has made. I am driven to the conclusion that it is his desire, and that of the hon. Members who support him, to prevent any Treaty being negotiated at all. I believe, in 1860, the Conservative Party did all in their power to secure the failure of the negotiations; and, no doubt, they are only consistent in now endeavouring to make it difficult for the Government to continue or to extend the provisions of the Treaty then concluded. The hon. Member asked the House to agree to conditions precedent to the making of a Treaty which everyone knows are impossible, and if they were accepted by the House no Treaty at all would be practicable. The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has already pointed out, forcibly and conclusively, that under this Resolution, if the French Government offered a Treaty which on 99 points out of 100 was a great amelioration of the existing Convention, the Government would be unable to agree to it if on the 100th point, however unimportant it might be, there were any increase of duty, however small. But I want more particularly to call the attention of the House to the third condition in the Resolution of the hon. Member. We are, in the words of the Resolution, to conclude no Treaty which does not leave us "full liberty to deal with the question of bounties." There is no doubt that this is aimed at the "Most Favoured Nation Clause," which has been asserted on other occasions against the proposal of the hon. Member to impose what he calls countervailing duties in the case of sugar. The effect of this condition would be, taken with those which precede it, that not only would the Government be unable to make what is ordinarily known as a Commercial Treaty, but they would not even be allowed to fall back upon a simple "Most Favoured Nation Clause," under which, in the case of both France and other countries, English trade has derived the most striking advantages, and without which it would be possible for France to impose differential duties against all articles of English manufacture. On what ground is this condition to be imposed? It cannot be necessary in the case of the Shipping Bounties which the French have recently, most imprudently and foolishly, in my opinion, undertaken to grant. There is nothing, I believe, in the Treaty stipulations which would interfere with the right of the Government to re-enact the Navigation Laws if they were silly enough to do so, after the experience of the past, and with full knowledge of the enormous and unexampled extension of British shipping which has taken place since the repeal of that legislation, and which has made the Mercantile Marine of this country the envy and astonishment of the world. And as regards sugar, whatever might have been the case in the past, there is now no ground for interference on this head either. In the course of the last 18 months the French Government have reduced the duty on sugar by one-half, and have altered the method of testing for drawback, and by these two changes they have, in the opinion of the experts whom I have consulted, reduced the drawbacks until there is now no bounty at all, or, at least, no bounty of the slightest practical importance on the export of refined sugar. But suppose that my information is incorrect, and that there still exists a bounty, or that one results in the future from changes in manufacture. In this case, who is to decide the amount of countervailing duty which is to be imposed as against the bounty? There is not the slightest agreement between the different representatives of sugar refiners, the Board of Trade and other authorities, and the French Government and their experts, as to what is the precise amount of bounty in each case. Is it likely that any nation will allow us to be judge in our own cause and to assert, as against their information and belief, the amount of duty which we are entitled to levy without infringing the "Most Favoured Nation Clause?" The only result of such an attempt would be to lead to disputes and retaliation. The "Most Favoured Nation Clause" would be whittled away until it practically ceased to exist, to the great injury of British commerce.

I say, then, that it is impossible to regard the Resolution otherwise than as an indication of the desire of the Party opposite that no Treaty at all should be concluded with France. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets has said that the people of this country would be unwilling to accept any Treaty that did not greatly improve the existing condition of things.

MR. RITCHIE: I did not say so. What I said was that the people of this country would not accept any Treaty which was not on equally good terms with the Treaty of 1860.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I accept the hon. Member's correction; but if he did not say so, other speakers in the debate, and notably the noble Lord the Member for Liverpool, pressed his contention up to the limit I have stated. But though the noble Lord, by putting forward impracticable demands, would do his best to make a Treaty impossible, I cannot doubt that he and his Friends would be disposed to throw the whole blame for failure on the Government, and to ignore the part they themselves would have taken in securing this result.

Before going further, I should like to ask the House to consider briefly what has been the effect of this Treaty, whose continuance seems to be regarded with indifference by hon. Members opposite. I find that in the 10 years, 1851 to 1860, before the conclusion of the Treaty, our average exports to France were £8,300,000 per annum. Of these, British produce, as distinguished from Colonial and other produce, was represented by £4,400,000. Last year these figures had risen to a total export of £28,000,000, £16,000,000 of this being for British produce alone. This Return is 17 per cent less than the Return for 1871, which was the highest year, and 10 per cent more than the Return for 1877, which was the lowest; and I quote these figures because it is necessary to observe that there are great fluctuations in the trade, and nothing can be more unfair than to take only selected years for purposes of comparison. Now, coming to the imports, I find that for the first period of 1851-60 the average imports were £11,300,000, and they had risen, in 1880, to about £42,000,000. These figures are 40 per cent greater than those for 1871, the lowest year; and 10 per cent less than those for 1875, which is the highest. But these figures, important and satisfactory as they are, do not represent the whole facts of the case. The Returns of the Board of Trade, accurate in themselves, must be taken with qualifications and applied with knowledge. Thus the figure for the imports must be considerably reduced if we wish to arrive at the actual amount of produce of French origin which is retained for consumption in this country. There are, for instance, large exports of textiles of different kinds from Switzerland to Great Britain which come through France, and cannot possibly be separated in our Returns from French imports. Again, much of what comes from France is taken into warehouse for a short time in this country, which is the great depôt of the commerce of the world, but is only temporarily held here, and goes on quickly to its real and intended destination in the United States or our own Colonies.

With regard to the exports, on the other hand, they have to be increased if the true amount of British trade with France is to be correctly ascertained. I am informed, for example, that British yarns intended for French manufacturers in the Vosges go through by way of Antwerp, and would consequently appear in our Returns as exports to Belgium, although really part of our transactions with France. When these allowances are made, it will be seen that, satisfactory as are the figures derivable from the British trade statistics, they do not fully represent the importance to this country of the commerce which has been created and stimulated by the action of the Cobden Treaty.

Passing now to more general considerations, I gather from the speeches which have been made that it is the contention of hon. Gentlemen opposite that during recent years English trade has been declining and leaving the country; that wages have fallen, and that great suffering consequently exists among the working classes; that the profits of trade have disappeared, and that generally the country is on the verge of ruin. They also appear to think that foreign countries have benefited by our loss, and in proportion to it. Now, Sir, I challenge all these assertions. It is said that we take too optimistic a view of the present state of English industry, and I am prepared at the outset to make some admissions. I admit that the state of agriculture has been for some time such as to cause to all of us the greatest concern. I believe Mr. Caird has estimated that the difference in production from agriculture during the past three years, as compared with the normal average, has been equivalent to a loss of £150,000,000 sterling. Some other economists have put it at double that amount; and clearly it is impossible that £300,000,000, or even £150,000,000, can be subtracted from the purchasing power of the country without more or less affecting injuriously every other trade and interest. But this is not a question of Protection or Free Trade; and the state of things which we deplore arises mainly from the absence of sun, and the unfavourable seasons of the last four or five years.

Again, there have been special trades recently—as, indeed, in all preceding periods—which have been injuriously affected by special causes, and subject to special depression. The case of the Bradford trade is the best known instance of this; but it is due almost entirely to a change of fashion, and is also independent of questions of Protection and Free Trade.

Lastly, there has been, no doubt, a most serious diminution in the profits of capital, due to the rash and violent speculation and over-production which prevailed a few years ago. The case of the coal trade is one in point. The production of coal in this country last year, which was the year of greatest depression, was, nevertheless, the largest ever turned out of our mines. The period when the demand for coal exceeded the supply was known as the coal famine, although even then more coal was being raised than in preceding years. But that famine induced a rise in price of something like 16s. a-ton, and naturally brought into the trade a number of persons who opened fresh mines; and, although the demand has continued, the supply has increased in still greater proportion, and there has been a consequent heavy fall in prices. The same thing has, no doubt, taken place in other trades, and notably in the great iron industry of the country. But a loss of profit from such a cause must not be confounded with a loss of trade, or supposed to indicate approaching ruin. It has sometimes been said that grumbling is the secret of England's success, and no doubt while we are grumbling we are continually tending to improvement and perfection; but it would not be safe to accept, without further consideration, the complaints of those who are not doing so well as they think they ought, as representing accurately the general condition of the country. Statistics are against them; the irresistible logic of facts is opposed to the pessimism which sometimes prevails.

Let me call the attention of the House to some figures illustrating the more cheerful view which I have ventured to take of the situation.

First, as to our foreign trade. I find that, with regard to exports, the total value exported in the six years, 1869 to 1874, was £1,688,000,000; the total value for the succeeding six years, 1875 to 1880, was £1,571,000,000, or a fall of about 7 per cent. But I must point out to the House that this fall was in value only, and that as, during the same period, there was a general reduction in price, averaging probably not less than 20 per cent, the real volume of our export trade has considerably increased, even during the worst period of depression, as compared with the period of greatest inflation.

And, if even the value has not increased, and if the volume has not increased in greater proportion than has actually been the case, that, I may inform the House, is to be attributed, not to Free Trade, but to the action of my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General. This statement may appear paradoxical; but the House will recollect that it was at the instigation of my hon. and learned Friend that, some years ago, a Committee sat, of which he was the Chairman, to consider the subject of foreign loans. That Committee destroyed the credit of more than one foreign country. They were no longer able to borrow money here, and as they could not get credit they could no longer take our goods. It cannot be considered a disadvantage that we do not sell to people who will never pay for what they buy; but the result, no doubt, was temporarily to reduce the export of British produce.

Coming now to the imports, I find that, after deducting re-exports, they were, in the first period I have selected for comparison, £1,702,000,000; and, in the second, £1,947,000,000, or an increase of about 14 per cent. There are some persons who regard the increase of imports with dissatisfaction; and it may be interesting to point out why it is that this increase has taken place. During the period referred to we largely increased our investments in foreign countries. The interest on these investments had to be paid, and foreign countries have paid for them by exporting goods, which have, of course, swelled our import returns. And if hon. Gentlemen opposite, the advocates of a Reciprocity system, were successful in erecting some barrier by which these importations could be arrested, what would be the result? Foreign countries must continue to pay their debts. Not being able to pay in goods, they would have for the time to pay in bullion and specie; there would be an accumulation of the precious metals in this country, and that would speedily bring about a rise in the price of all other articles. When that rise had been established, our power to export would be diminished; the amount of our exports would be reduced until the balance, or excess of imports over exports, was again re-established, although the volume of each would be lessened, to the enormous disadvantage of all concerned. In other words, the effect of an attempt to redress the balance would be promptly to lessen the value of our exports, but could not ultimately affect the difference in amount between them and our imports.

In confirmation of what I have said as to the increase in the volume of our trade, I now turn to some items of our production. I have taken the figures which I am going to quote from an interesting article in last week's Economist, from which it appears that in the first period of six years, to which I have already referred, the production of coal was 710,000,000 tons; in the second it was 813,000,000. In pig iron the production increased from 37,000,000 tons to 39,000,000. The consumption of wool advanced from 1,064,000,000 lbs. to 1,232,000,000 lbs.; and the consumption of cotton from 7,215,000,000 lbs. to 7,578,000,000. I might easily add to the list; but in all the principal articles of which we have Returns the increase in our trade is equally marked. But then it is said wages have been reduced, and the condition of the working classes is that of great distress; in fact, we have been given to understand that they can hardly keep body and soul together. Undoubtedly there has been a reduction of wages in almost every trade from the level which they reached in the time of greatest inflation; but what is also true is that the purchasing power of wages has become considerably greater in the same period, and, as a matter of fact, it appears that the consumption of every important article of necessity or luxury by the working classes has shown a remarkable increase. Thus the consumption of sugar, an article which the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets is so anxious to increase in price, has advanced from 42½ lbs. per head in 1869, to 63½ lbs. per head in 1880. It is not wonderful, under these circumstances, that the sugar trade, in spite of the desire of some of the refiners for protective duty, is in a condition of great prosperity—a fact which the Returns leave beyond a doubt, and which is confirmed by information I have recently received to the effect that on a dissolution of partnership, in the case of a great firm in the North, while the original house is maintaining its production, the outgoing members of the firm have just purchased eight or ten acres of land in London on which they propose to erect a refinery at a cost of about £150,000, which will turn out something like 70,000 tons of refined sugar per annum. Then, in the same period, the consumption of tea has increased from 3·63 lbs. to 4·59 lbs. per head per annum; of tobacco, from 1·35 lbs. to 1·43 lbs; and of spirits, British and imported together, from ·98 of a gallon to 1·09 gallons. It is impossible to ignore the significance of these facts, which show that whatever may have been the depression of trade, it has not yet affected the power of the working classes to procure for themselves increasing quantities of the necessities, the comforts, and the luxuries of life. There is one other article to the consumption of which I refer with some reserve, as I have been unable to check the figures, which I have obtained from an interesting statistical work, called The Progress of the World. But in this book I find it stated that during the period of 20 years, from 1831 to 1850, the consumption of wheat per inhabitant was 270 lbs. per annum. In the nine years, 1871 to 1879, it had risen to 341 lbs., and in the same period the price had fallen from 55s. per quarter to 48s., which is a fact of the more importance and interest because it has been shown by Dr. Farr, in his statistical abstracts, that the death-rate of the population falls 3 per cent for each 2s. per bushel in the price of wheat.

I may also refer to the subject of pauperism. If the working classes were being ruined in consequence of a mistaken fiscal and commercial policy, the result would be manifest in the Poor Law Returns; but, on the contrary, it appears that while, in 1869, 1,167,000 persons were receiving pauper relief in England and Scotland, in 1880 the numbers had fallen to a little under 902,000 persons.

Mr. Chamberlain

As regards emigration, while the total number of persons who left these shores in six years, 1869 to 1874, was 1,218,000, in the six years between 1875 and 1880 the numbers fell to 850,000; and it is remarkable that in Protected Germany, during the whole of that period, emigration has been considerably increasing.

I must now go back for a moment to the excess of imports over exports which causes so much anxiety to a certain class of persons in this country, and is regarded by them as a sign of weakness and a proof of our commercial decline. I consider it, on the contrary, as a fact which ought to give us the greatest satisfaction, and I think I can show conclusively that this is the case. Let us take a comprehensive view of the question. I find that during the last 40 years, which embraces the whole Free Trade period, the total balance of trade or excess of imports over exports is, roughly speaking, £1,600,000,000. Now, how is it supposed that this is paid for? It seems to be the idea with some persons that the whole of this vast sum has been paid by this country in what they call "hard cash," meaning bullion and specie. But an examination shows that during the same period the imports of bullion and specie have exceeded the exports by something like £40,000,000; and, therefore, the total balance of goods and specie together must be taken at £1,640,000,000.

Again, I ask, how is this accounted for? Is it supposed that this country owes that sum to other nations? Nothing can be farther from the fact. On the contrary, in the period to which I have referred, the indebtedness of other nations to this country has enormously increased. It is now estimated at not less than £1,500,000,000, and no one, I imagine, would put its amount at the commencement of the period at more than £500,000,000. Consequently, foreign countries, while sending us £1,640,000,000 more than they have received from us, have at the same time got into our debt to the extent of £1,000,000,000. This investment has been made, not in specie or bullion, but in English goods, and if it had not been made our exports would have been something like £1,000,000,000 less, and the balance of trade would have been increased to the larger sum I have named. What does this enormous balance represent, then? In the first instance, it represents the cost of freight, the carrying trade of the world, and especially of English goods, having passed almost entirely into English hands. But over and above this item, it represents nothing more nor less than the profit derived by this country from its external trade and the interest from its investments abroad, during these 40 years.

There is another way of looking at this matter. Instead of taking it in bulk, consider the details of our foreign trade, and let us follow out a particular transaction. I have seen it stated that in Birmingham there exists a profitable industry in the manufacture of idols for South African negroes, and another industry for the manufacture of guns warranted to burst the first time they are fired. Generally speaking, I observe that everything which is said about Birmingham is inaccurate, and I disclaim any belief in these stories; but suppose, for the sake of argument, that this charge against the morality of my fellow-townsmen could be substantiated, and that a Birmingham manufacturer sells a brass deity to the negroes, or a gun such as those which were disposed of by the late Government to the number of 200,000 at the rate of 2s. 6d. a-piece; then, if for either of these commodities the Birmingham trader received an ounce of gold, as he well might, in return, the transaction would appear in the statistical tables as an export of 2s. 6d., and an import of about £3. The balance of trade would be £2 17s. 6d. against the Birmingham tradesman, and yet I do not think he would have any cause to be dissatisfied with the pecuniary results of the transaction. But why should what is profitable in the case of the individual become unprofitable when multiplied by the thousand or the million in the case of the nation? And yet this is the contention of gentlemen who fume and fret whenever the value of what we receive is greater than the value of what we give.

I have a few more words to say on the proposition that foreign nations have benefited during the period of depression in this country. This supposition is entirely unwarranted by the facts. There are periods of depression in all countries, although it is important to bear in mind that they are not always coincident, and that it is, therefore, unfair to compare the same years without taking circumstances into account. Taking first the case of France, and dealing with exports only as a test of prosperity, I find that the exports of domestic produce, which averaged in the two years 1858-9 £83,000,000, had increased in the two years 1878-9 to £128,000,000, an increase of £45,000,000, or 54 per cent. In the United Kingdom the increase in the same period was from £123,000,000 to £192,000,000, an actual increase of £69,000,000, and a percentage of increase of 57 per cent. On these figures I have to make two observations—first, that it is more important to consider the actual increase in money than the percentage, because, as the initial figures in the case of foreign countries are very much smaller than those of English trade, the proportionate increase may well be larger, even when the actual increase is very much less; and, secondly, I must point out that the increase, such as it is, in French trade is much greater than it would have been but for the loss of Alsace and Lorraine. In other words, while the internal trade of France has suffered by the cession of territory, the external trade has increased by the transfer of this portion of her internal trade, or a considerable part of it, to the statistics of her external commerce. If to-morrow Ireland were separated from the United Kingdom, no doubt a large trade between the two countries would continue to exist; but it would go to swell the exports, and, apparently, to increase the foreign trade, and would cease to be reckoned as part of the internal transactions of the country. Taking these facts into account, it would appear that in Protected France the advance and improvement in foreign trade has been much less marked and considerable than in Free Trade England.

I have already referred to the fact that in 1877 trade in France was so bad that a Commission was specially appointed to inquire into it. In the United States the depression preceded that in this country. It began and finished earlier; but, as a proof of its severity, I may mention that while from 1869 to 1873 the immigration into the United States averaged 200,000 per annum, in 1874 the balance of immigration over emigration was only about 1,000. In 1878 the iron industry was so depressed that, according to the Trade Reports, nearly two-thirds of the furnaces were out of blast, while in 1866 the total exports from the United States, which had been £65,000,000 in 1860, had fallen to £27,000,000. Next year they were about double this amount—the fluctuations being largely due to the action of the Civil War; but they are illustrations of the fluctuations which take place in the trade of all countries at some time or another. I remember being in Belgium, at Liege, during the height of the depression in the iron trade in this country, when it was supposed that Belgian manufactures were largely competing with us. I found there the same complaints as to loss of trade and profit, and I was told that the manufacturers were working at a loss, and selling only to keep their works partially employed, while the shares of great Iron Companies both in Belgium and Westphalia had fallen in many cases much below par. And in connection with this I might mention a statement which was made to me by Mr. Hick, formerly an esteemed Member of this House. I had seen in the newspapers, as a proof of the extent of foreign competition, a report that the girders for a large factory in Lancashire had been purchased in Belgium, and I asked Mr. Hick to explain it. He said—"The best explanation I can give to you is a contradiction, for those very girders were cast in my own foundry." The fact is that the effects and extent of foreign competition are almost always exaggerated. Unfounded statements are made and accepted as true without inquiry; but I am confident, from my own experience, that as regards the hardware and iron trades more especially, of which I know most—though I think the same remark would apply to other industries also—there never has been, for any considerable time together, serious competition from foreign manufacturers with the standard industries of this country. Within the last few days I have seen an extract from a Report of the Chamber of Commerce at Berlin, in which a protest is made against the Protectionist policy of Prince Bismarck; and if time permitted I might multiply instances to show that, whatever the extent of the depression here may be, it has been in recent years paralled or exceeded in every other country in the world.

Mr. Chamberlain

And now, Sir, I turn to a consideration of the remedies which are proposed by hon. Gentlemen opposite, for a state of things which, as I have shown, exists largely at all events only in their imagination. We are to adopt a policy of Reciprocity and Retaliation. But, I want to know, what are the precise steps by which this policy is to be carried into effect? Hon. Gentlemen opposite do not agree among themselves. The hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Ecroyd) is the only speaker who has gone into some details. He said that it is the duty of our working men to make some sacrifice in order to re-conquer the free and fair trade which we have lost. There is no doubt about the sacrifice which the working men would have to make in order to adopt the policy of the hon. Gentleman. His view appears to be this—and I do not say that there is not an appearance of justification for it—we are to retaliate on foreign countries by putting on protective duties in order to induce them to take off the duties which they now levy on our goods. The hon. Gentleman appeared to consider that his proposal was a temporary expedient, to be adopted with reluctance and regret, and to be abandoned as soon as possible. But suppose foreign countries are not persuaded by the hon. Gentleman, or by his Retaliatory policy, to take off their duties? How long is the experiment to last? Is it to be for five years, or for 10 years, or for 20 years, or for ever, that the working classes are to be called upon to make the sacrifices which it is admitted will be entailed upon them?

Then, again, on what goods are we to retaliate? On which of our imports are we to put duties? That is a question of cardinal importance on which the advocates of Reciprocity ought to, but do not, agree. Does the hon. Gentleman propose, for instance, to tax foreign manufactures? I understand him to say that it would be foolish, in the last degree, to attempt to put duties on the principal manufactures of foreign countries.

MR. ECROYD explained that he meant that it would be foolish to impose in each case duties corresponding in amount to those directed against us. What he proposed was to put moderate but uniform duties on foreign manufactures.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I am glad to have the explanation of the hon. Member. I understand that if the foreigner charges 40 or 50 per cent duty on English manufactures, the hon. Member would retaliate by putting 10 per cent on the manufactures of the foreigner. But the hon. Member is altogether inconsistent in such a proposal. He stands up as the advocate of "Fair" Trade; but does he not see that it is just as unfair that there should be duties, say of 40 per cent on one side and 10 per cent on the other, as if there were 30 per cent on the one side and none on the other? Unless the duties imposed by us are the same as those imposed against us it is clear that trade will not be fair, although it will no longer be free. But there is another point which I submit to the consideration of the House. England is of all countries the most vulnerable in this matter—that is to say, that in spite of, or rather I am inclined to say in consequence of, the Protectionist policy of foreign countries, we export a great deal more than we import in the way of manufactures.

MR. ECROYD: The great bulk of our exports go to India and China.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I challenge the view of the hon. Member; and I say that there is no country with which we have trade of any importance to which our exports of manufactured goods are not in excess of our imports. Take the case of the United States as an example. That is the worst instance of Protection with which we have to deal. I am speaking from memory, and I do not pledge myself to the exact figure; but, roughly speaking, I am under the impression that we export about £16,000,000 of manufactured goods to the United States, while our imports are only about £3,000,000, the rest, and great bulk of our imports, consisting entirely of raw materials and food; and, therefore, such a commercial war as the hon. Member proposes would do us more harm than the foreigner, who might retaliate on our retaliation by prohibiting, or still further increasing his duties on, our goods, or even by putting a duty on the exports of articles which we do not produce for ourselves.

I have already asked how long these sacrifices are to be imposed on the working-men—for 10, for 20, or for 30 years? [MR. ECROYD: No, no!] The hon.

Member only intends it as a temporary expedient; but the effect of such a policy will be to foster weak industries unsuited to the country—such, for instance, as those which existed in Coventry or at Bethnal Green, which, even in the times of Protection, had only an unhealthy life, and which, when the time of experiment ceased, would be immediately destroyed, carrying with them in their ruin the fortunes of all who had been tempted by this mistaken policy to engage in them. [MR. RITCHIE: Wines.] Sir, I have already detained the House too long in answer to the speeches which have been made. If I am to undertake to answer arguments in the nature of interjections, I am afraid I shall have to make an excessive demand on the patience of hon. Members. But the answer which I have made to the hon. Member for Preston does not satisfy the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets. It is the difficulty of this subject that every man has his own separate specific, though all call it by the same name of Reciprocity; but the Reciprocity of the Tower Hamlets differs from the Reciprocity of Preston; and the Reciprocity of the Tower Hamlets differs at different times in the evening. What I now understand the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets to say is that we ought to put a duty, not on manufactures generally, but on wines, and gloves, and silks. As regards silks and gloves, I have the same answer to make which I have already made to the hon. Member for Preston. If they are not industries which can be maintained in this country without Protection, it would be most imprudent and unwise to foster them by unnatural means, and the result would only end in the misery and suffering of all concerned. Wine, no doubt, stands on a different footing. The duty on wine and on spirits is not protective; it is partly fiscal and partly moral, and might be dealt with upon those considerations; and if the Treaty negotiations with France should break down, the English Government would be perfectly justified in dealing with the Wine and Spirit Duties as they thought best for the interests of the country.

Well then, does anyone propose to put a duty on raw materials? The hon. Member for Preston, in the speech which he made at Exeter Hall, protested against so suicidal a proposal. Is it conceivable that we should ever be foolish enough to do away with the foundation of a great part of our trade—namely, the freedom with which we receive the raw material? Take the case of sugar. Why is it that this trade has been so prosperous of late years, so much so that I have heard it currently reported that one of the leaders in this manufacture has made a fortune of £1,000,000 or £2,000,000 in less than 20 years? It is partly, at all events, in consequence of the injudicious Bounty system adopted by other countries which has enabled our manufacturers to get their raw sugar at less than cost price, and has enabled them to undersell the manufacturers of the rest of the world, especially in neutral countries. This is a fact which the Austrians have begun to find out; and manufacturers, both in Austria and in France, are naturally protesting against a system which places this immense advantage at the disposal of the British refiner.

Lastly, Sir, is anyone bold enough to propose that we should put duties upon food? The hon. Member for Preston, no doubt, has the courage of his convictions. He has referred to the sacrifices which he would require from the working classes, and he does not hesitate to make the demand upon them that they should pay an extra price of 10 per cent upon the most important articles of their daily consumption. Well, Sir, I can conceive it just possible, although it is very improbable, that under the sting of great suffering, and deceived by misrepresentations, the working classes might be willing to try strange remedies, and might be foolish enough to submit for a time to a proposal to tax the food of the country; but one thing I am certain of, if this course is ever taken, and if the depression were to continue, or to recur, it would be the signal for a state of things more dangerous and more disastrous than anything which has been seen in this country since the repeal of the Corn Laws. With the growth of intelligence on the part of the working classes, and with the knowledge they now possess of their own power, the reaction against such a policy would be attended by consequences so serious that I do not like to contemplate them. A tax on food would mean a decline in wages. It would certainly involve a reduction in their productive value; the same amount of money would have a smaller purchasing power. It would mean more than this, for it would raise the price of every article produced in the United Kingdom, and it would indubitably bring about the loss of that gigantic export trade which the industry and energy of the country, working under conditions of absolute freedom, has been able to create.

Sir, I think I have now dealt in turn with the arguments which have been brought before the House. I may summarize my conclusions by quoting to the House the opinion of one entitled to respect as an authority on this subject. The extract I am about to read is from a work entitled Twenty Years of Financial Policy, and was written in 1862 by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote). It is, in my opinion, as applicable to the present state of things as it was to the time when it was written, and I do not suppose that the right hon. Gentleman has swerved since then one iota from the views which he has so well expressed. He says—

“The great fiscal and commercial measures of the last 20 years have wrought a wonderful change in the circumstances of the country. A complete revolution has taken place in many parts of our moral, social, and political system which may be directly traced, either wholly or in great part, to the effects of those measures. Our material wealth, too, has enormously increased—our trade has developed, and our manufactures have been carried to great perfection. There have been seasons of temporary, local, and partial suffering, and the changes which have proved beneficial to the public have sometimes pressed hardly on particular interests; but, upon the whole, it can hardly be questioned that the condition of every portion of the community has been greatly improved by the new policy.”

In conclusion, I can assure the House that Her Majesty's Government are fully alive to the feeling in this country with reference to the present negotiations. That feeling is not keen for the conclusion of a Treaty, and would not be satisfied with any arrangement which was worse than the one now expiring; but I believe it would be disappointed if any effort were spared to bring the negotiations to a successful issue. As long, therefore, as there appears to be a chance of a happy result, we will not be forced by unwarrantable and frivolous charges of concealment and secrecy, or by attempts to impose extortionate or unreasonable conditions, to give up the negotiations in a pet, and without exhausting every means of arriving at an understanding honourable and beneficial to both countries. The commercial results of the Cobden Treaty I have shown to be of great importance—of great value to this country, and of greater value still to France; since the trade, large as it is, is a much smaller proportion of our total transactions than it is of those of our neighbours across the Channel. But these results are, in my opinion, overshadowed by the political advantages of the good understanding which has so long prevailed. I hope that, by the exercise of wisdom and discretion, and good feeling on both sides, it may yet be possible to renew and to extend relations which have contributed so materially to the prosperity of both countries, and to the welfare and the peace of the world.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he rose with great diffidence, and with some trepidation, after the warning addressed to him in the earlier part of the evening by the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to ask the permission of the House to state, in a few sentences, why he intended to give his vote in support of the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie). The hon. Baronet had informed him, and informed the House, that he had no claim to speak with any authority on the subject. He could not help thinking that that was wholly unnecessary information. He was not aware that he had ever pretended to do so. It was quite true, and he acknowledged it with great humility, that he had never yet pretended to be an authority in the matter. He had never claimed to be a sapient member of the Cobden Club, or a duly-instructed disciple of those Gamaliels of political economy on the other side of the House, who professed to be so immensely superior to the Occupants of the Benches on the Tory side of the House. Nevertheless, he hoped, before he sat down, that he should be able to convince the House that the reasons by which he was guided in supporting the Motion were dictated by plain common sense. But before he did this, he would ask the permission of the House to refer, in a few words, to the speeches which had been addressed to them that evening. In the earlier part of the evening they heard from the hon. Gentleman the Member for Bolton (Mr. J. K. Cross) a speech which he presumed to characterize as a speech of the greatest ability, and one to which he had listened with great interest and admiration. Further than that, they had been favoured with a lecture of considerable severity by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade. The right hon. Gentleman said he could not understand what they meant by the Motion. He hoped, before he sat down, to be able to make the right hon. Gentleman understand, at all events, what his (Mr. Chaplin's) views on the subject were. But neither was the right hon. Gentleman able, for the life of him, to draw any distinction between Fair Trade and Free Trade. If he was not mistaken, before many months had passed, the right hon. Gentleman would find his intellect on that question considerably sharpened by the agitation and feeling which, he suspected, no one knew better than the right hon. Gentleman himself were widely and rapidly spreading in the country on the subject. The right hon. Gentleman had fallen foul of the noble Viscount the Member for Liverpool (Viscount Sandon), whom he accused of being grossly deficient in the courtesies of debate.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: The hon. Member entirely misrepresents me. I did not use such words. I never said that the noble Lord was grossly deficient in the courtesies of debate.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he was thankful to be corrected by the right hon. Gentleman. He did not think the right hon. Gentleman could believe that the noble Lord would willingly be guilty of any discourtesy in that House. He was the last person who was open to such a charge. But, whether the right hon. Gentleman complained of a want of courtesy on the part of the noble Lord or not, he did undoubtedly complain of the charges which the noble Lord had made against the right hon. Gentleman for the concealment of the policy and intentions of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman drew a distinction between the manner in which the policy of the present Government had been carried out and the manner in which the policy of the late Government was conducted, and the concealment which had been practised by each. He (Mr. Chaplin) declined to accept the distinction of the right hon. Gentleman, and would prefer to draw one of his own. The concealments of the late Government were published to the world and put into plain English, whereas the concealments of the present Government, instead of being put into plain English, were disguised in the French language. To his great surprise and amazement, the right hon. Gentleman turned round and said that the publication of the documents in question was one of the most useless expenditures he had ever known and a great waste of public money. If that were really the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman, why did he grant the Return? He had always thought that the present Government was par excellence a Government of economy as well as of all the other virtues in the world. Undoubtedly, they were a Government which had the largest majority he ever remembered; and if the right hon. Gentleman was really of opinion that the publication of these Returns was a great waste of public money and a useless expenditure, no man in the House deserved more severe condemnation than the right hon. Gentleman for consenting to publish them. The right hon. Gentleman had been good enough to admit, at all events, that there was some foundation for the statements which had been made on that side of the House. He had condescended to allow that there had been great agricultural loss and agricultural depression; but how had it arisen? It had arisen, according to the right hon. Gentleman, from nothing but the absence of sun. Unless he (Mr. Chaplin) were altogether mistaken and his memory deceived him, he had been led to believe that the agricultural depression was in a great degree owing to unrestricted foreign competition, in addition to the absence of sun. If that were true, what became of the contention of the right hon. Gentleman? If it were the case that the agricultural depression was owing to unrestricted foreign competition, and that the depression in trade was caused by agricultural depression, was it not the fact that, on his own showing, the depression of trade at the present time was in some measure, if not in a great measure, caused by that very system the right hon. Gentleman was the advocate of—namely, the system of Free Trade? The right hon.

Mr. Chaplin

Gentleman had called upon hon. Members on that side of the House to state what remedies they proposed. He (Mr. Chaplin) was not aware that they were called upon to state any remedies whatever. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman in that respect was very much like the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Bolton—they both appeared to him to be admirable and able speeches, but deficient in one particular—they were not speeches ad rem. They were speeches directed against Protection, and the speech of the hon. Member for Bolton was specially directed against the imposition of any duty upon corn. But what was the Motion before the House? The Motion before the House was a proposition on the part of his hon. Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets that no Commercial Treaty should be entered into with France except on certain conditions, and among those conditions was one in particular—that they should not tie the hands of the Government for more than 12 months. He could assure the hon. Member for Bolton that if ever the time arrived when he thought it necessary and right in the interests of the whole community to do so, he would not hesitate for a moment to propose the imposition of a duty upon corn, whether on wheat or barley or any other description of corn. The hon. Member for Bolton asked him (Mr. Chaplin) to explain to the House, if he were able to do so, what the cost in this country would be of producing a quarter of wheat. [Mr. J. K. Cross: I said the cost in labour.] That was exactly what he understood the hon. Gentleman to have said. The object of the hon. Member was to find out what the cost in labour of producing a quarter of wheat in this country was in order to establish a theory that it gave far less work to English working people than a quarter of wheat imported from abroad. The statement of the hon. Gentleman was that a quarter of wheat cost in this country 10s., whereas the cost of a quarter of wheat imported from abroad was 30s. Now, what did the hon. Member mean by the cost in labour? He acknowledged the vast superiority of hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House in their knowledge of political economy, and especially the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade. But surely, hon.

Members opposite must have learned by this time that everything that contributed to the production of a quarter of wheat in this country, except the original soil, was the fruit of labour. First, there was the seed. That was the fruit of labour; for it had to be collected and sown. Then there was the manure. They heard a great deal about artificial manure. In this case would any hon. Gentleman tell him that the application of artificial manure was not the fruit of labour? Could any hon. Member describe anything to him in the world that was necessary to the production of a quarter of wheat that was not the fruit of labour? Then, taking that view of the matter, although it was one upon which he had sometimes made calculations, he was asked the question suddenly, and he was sorry he had not got his calculations with him; but, putting it at the lowest, the cost of the production of a quarter of wheat in this country could not be estimated, he thought, at much less than £2.

MR. J. K. CROSS wished to ask if the hon. Member included anything in his calculation for rent?

MR. CHAPLIN said, no; and he would tell the hon. Gentleman how he arrived at the calculation. He was informed by the farmers with whom he was in the habit of conversing in the country that it did not pay them to grow wheat unless they could get a return of £10 an acre. Allowing 30s. or £2 for rent, a balance of £8 was left. He took the produce of an acre of four quarters, which was a liberal allowance indeed. He was sorry to say that the produce did not often reach that amount now. That brought the calculation to £2 a-quarter, and in that calculation he put aside all consideration of rent altogether. The hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs pointed out that the Motion of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets contained four distinct propositions. So far as he (Mr. Chaplin) was concerned he approved of them all; but he attached especial value to that which declared that the hands of the Government should not be tied in any Treaty into which this country might enter with France for a period of 12 months. He would state to the House, with the utmost frankness, the grounds on which he held this opinion. He could not believe, in spite of all the reassuring speeches they had had from the other side of the House, that either the present condition or the future prospects of the commercial portion of the country were by any means satisfactory; and he must say that he had, besides, some considerable apprehension that they had been driving the theory of Free Trade now, for a good many years, much too hard. There were a good many reasons for apprehensions on their part. They in this country were in the uninterrupted enjoyment of the blessings of Free Trade, while on the Continent of Europe and in America they found what the right hon. Gentleman not long ago described as the impoverishing system of Protection—a system which the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright), who was notorious for his temperate language in dealing with this subject, on one occasion spoke of as the last refuge of cowardice, idleness, and greed. But, notwithstanding that, what did they find with regard to the commerce of the country during late years as compared in point of increase with the commerce of those benighted and blinded nations which pursued a policy opposite to their own? He found that during the last 10 years under Protection the trade of France had increased 39 per cent. Under the same system the commerce of Belgium, during the like period, had increased 51 per cent, and the commerce of Holland 57 per cent. That was the result of Protection on the Continent of Europe. What was the condition of things in America? He found that the commerce of that country under Protection—that impoverishing system, that last refuge of cowardice, idleness, and greed—had increased 68 per cent during the last 10 years; whilst the commerce of this country had increased under the blessed system of Free Trade just 21 per cent in that period. The fact was, that those countries whose commerce, according to the authority of Free Traders, ought to be languishing, was catching hand over hand the commerce of England, which, according to their theories, ought to have prospered so much under Free Trade. He confessed that was a fact which, to a certain extent, filled his mind with misgivings and even with alarm, and those feelings were certainly not allayed when he remembered that some of the advocates of Free Trade in that House and in the country at the present time were the same men who were its advocates when it was first introduced as a system—the same men who had been proved by experience to have been mistaken, and to have been absolutely wrong in almost all the prophecies they made with regard to its adoption by other countries. When, for instance, the dangers which might arise to this country were pointed out, if England alone amongst nations adopted the policy of Free Trade, the charge was always met by the assurance on the part of Mr. Cobden and his Colleagues that those dangers could not by any possibility arise, because the advantages of Free Trade were so obvious that all other countries would immediately follow their example. But it would not be difficult to show, by a reference to the words of Mr. Cobden himself, that he was mistaken. Mr. Cobden said, on one great occasion, with reference to the success of the principles which he advocated—

“ We have a principle established now which is eternal in its truth, and universal in its applications; it must be applied in all nations and throughout all time, and if we are not mistaken absolutely in thinking our principles are true, be assured that these results will follow, and at no distant time.”

But these results never had followed; and what was the inference he must draw from Mr. Cobden's own words, if it was not that Mr. Cobden was mistaken, and that his principles were not so true as he believed them to be? The fact was, that since this country adopted Free Trade, there had been a complete revolution in the conditions of the whole world, and this had led, as a natural consequence, to many results which had never been dreamt of for a moment by the advocates of Free Trade at that time. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham himself, now the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, declared on one occasion that there was no other country in the world which produced corn in quantity more than sufficient for its own consumption, or supplied in such a degree that she could by any possibility become a dangerous rival to this country. He had no doubt that when that statement was made it was perfectly true, although it was entirely opposed to the facts of the present day. Mr. Cobden thought, on the other hand, that they should purchase food from other countries, but that they would take their manufactures in return. They did, indeed, purchase food from other countries, and they were beginning to rely, he feared, too much upon them for their supplies, to the detriment of their own agriculture, and to an extent which, if certain unhappy contingencies were to arise, might lead to great danger, and possibly great disasters, for this country. But those countries did not take their manufactures in return, although they bought from them such enormous quantities of food. That was a state of things which must, he thought, if left unchecked, sooner or later lead to a condition of national bankruptcy. But if the prophets of former days were wrong in estimating the course that would be pursued by other countries, he was bound to say that the prophets of more recent times had been even more mistaken. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, on the 25th of July, 1877, the occasion of the Cobden Celebration, when pointing out to the members of the Cobden Club, as he presumed, how the doctrines of Protection were being gradually destroyed in the United States and in France, said—

“ If we look to France, we see that Protection is becoming weaker. If we look to the United States and consult any intelligent American who comes to this country, we shall find that there it is shaken and is tottering to its fall.”

It was four years since that statement was made, and if it was true that Free Trade was then tottering to its fall it was remarkable that it should be so steady at the moment he was speaking. But the right hon. Gentleman having spoken of the opinion of intelligent Americans four years ago, he might perhaps be permitted to refer to the opinion of intelligent Americans at the present time as it reached him through a personal friend who had visited the United States during the last few months. His friend stated that in speaking of this question of Free Trade everyone talked of the suicidal policy which they were pursuing in England. He must say that it increased the distress and alarm which he felt, to find that those who assumed to be the instructors and guides of public opinion on a question of such vast importance as this, were so bigoted by their prejudices in favour of their own views as to be absolutely unable to form an intelligent, sound, or impartial estimate of public opinion in any country which happened to be at all contrary to their own. He was quite aware that in expressing these opinions he should be held in the estimation of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to be only fit for the interior of a lunatic asylum. ["Hear, hear!"] He supposed it would be useless to remind him or hon. Members who cheered that assertion, that if this view were carried into effect that asylum would be shared by the leading politicians and the greatest statesmen of every country in Europe except their own. However that might be, he was not in the least degree influenced by charges of that nature; on the contrary, he thought that, sooner or later, they would recoil upon those who made them. He was sincerely anxious that the Motion of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets should be accepted by the House. It pledged no one to any retrograde action in the matter of Free Trade; but it did leave a road open for action of that character, if it should be found or shown by experience to be necessary or desirable in the future. He could understand that its acceptance might possibly be a mortification to the self-love of members of the Cobden Club, or of hon. Members who sat on the opposite Benches; but it was not his business to find a shelter for or throw a veil over the self-love of any hon. Members opposite. The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had alluded to a meeting held some days ago at Exeter Hall. As he was informed, that meeting was composed of working men and the delegates of working men from all parts of the country, and, notwithstanding the disparaging terms in which the hon. Baronet had spoken of it, he should have been glad to attend and hear from the workmen themselves the views and opinions which they entertained upon this most important question. He concluded by expressing a hope that the House of Commons would give its vote in support of this Motion, which, if carried, would leave the hands of the Government untied; while, at the same time, it would enable them to deal with the question in the future in such a manner as might be necessary in the interests of all classes, especially of the working classes of the country, and for the commercial prosperity of the nation at large.

MR. MAC IVER said, that at so late an hour he did not propose to detain the House for any length of time; but there were one or two points upon which he desired to make some observations. He wished to point out that statistics were, at best, half truths, and that the conclusions which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had given to the House were totally at variance with the practical knowledge of every carrier by sea. He had been for 25 years connected more or less with the French trade, and for many years had been a partner in a firm of shipbrokers at Havre. In matters of this kind the opinion of shipowners was of value, because they had not only the figures of the Board of Trade to instruct them, but they saw behind the scenes. They knew the character of the business which their own ships were doing, the kind of things they were carrying; and they saw also what kind of things their competitors were carrying. Figures alone, even when they were true, were not the whole truth. Not longer ago than yesterday he was, as a Director of the Great Western Railway Company, looking to see what kind of business they were doing with ports in France, and to-day's experience of the Great Western Railway was the same as his own experience of former years. The trade from Great Britain to France was in articles which possessed value in themselves; while the trade from France to England represented, for the most part, luxuries and things of no particular value, except as the finished productions of valuable labour. Their price was, in a great measure, wages which they paid indirectly to French artisans. But the right hon. Gentleman was not even correct in his figures. Having been at the pains to examine the Board of Trade Returns for the last 22 years, he was in a position to contradict the right hon. Gentleman's statement that the exports of bullion were greater from France to England than from England to France. The actual figures of the last 22 years were that they had sent France in bullion £140,000,000 and had only got half of it back. Again, what did they get from France in the way of goods? Their imports of French products during the last 22 years were nearly £700,000,000; £400,000,000 of this consisted of manufactured goods and wines; and, in round figures, their importation of farm and garden produce was not much short of the other £300,000,000. What, on the other hand, were their exports to France? Not £700,000,000, nor £400,000,000, nor even £300,000,000. Everything of British or Irish production that they sent to France—not manufactured goods only, but including coals and pig iron—did not add up to more than about £270,000,000. And the facts were worse than the figures, for while the character of French exports made them profitable to France, our exports of such things as coals and pig iron were, to some considerable extent, loss of wealth, and supplied the raw materials for competing industries. He wished to point out that ships were cosmopolitan. British capital owed no allegiance to the British Crown, and it was open to the English people to invest their money abroad in ships. Undoubtedly, a certain school of Free Traders would so invest money under the French Bounty system. The effect of that system would be that where any competition existed between French and English ships in foreign trades the balance of success would be with the former. He asked the House and the Government why they should think of concluding any new Treaty with France which would allow the French to do what they were doing now with regard to the surtaxe d'entrepôt—an arrangement whereby France stimulated the trade of such ports as Havre and Bordeaux to the disadvantage of every port in Great Britain and Ireland. The French people said that this was not at variance with the “Most Favoured Nation Clause;” but from the geography of our position we were the only country seriously affected in the way he had pointed out. By the system to which he objected, not only were English shipowners wronged but English seaports as well—such places as Liverpool, for instance—and not alone our brokers and merchants; in fact, the mercantile classes and the labouring classes generally. They had great reason to complain of the Government. Her Majesty’s Ministers should not merely speak of this as “an important question;” but they should get up and say that they would protect the interests of the British merchants, and would not conclude any Treaty with France which did not enable the ports of Great Britain and Ireland to compete fairly with those of France. France, in this matter, was doing a deliberate wrong to us, and he (Mr. Mac Iver) complained bitterly against the Government and against the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs from whom, in spite of the invariable politeness of their utterances, it was difficult to get any definite reply. It seemed to be impossible for them to say to the French Government, as they ought to do—“You must deal fairly by us or we shall decline to negotiate a Treaty with you.”

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 153; Noes 80: Majority 73.—(Div. List, No. 384.)

Main Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Committee deferred till To-morrow.

PARLIAMENT — ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS — LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. GLADSTONE: It may be to the convenience of the House that I should state that in consequence of the prolonged proceedings which we understand to have taken place in the House of Lords on the Land Law (Ireland) Bill, we do not propose to ask the House to proceed with that measure to-morrow. We will take it on Monday. To-morrow, at 12, we propose to take the Navy Estimates.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT was bound to say that this statement had taken the House with surprise, and that the proposed arrangements would be very inconvenient to many hon. Members. [Laughter.] Hon. Members opposite were prepared to laugh at any statement; but it was a fact that many hon. Gentlemen would come down to-morrow for the purpose of discussing the subject which the Prime Minister had said early in the evening would come on for consideration. There was, of course, no help for it if the Prime Minister had made up his mind; but hon. Members should have been told about it sooner, so that other arrangements could have been made.

MR. GLADSTONE: I must say I am surprised to hear the hon. and gallant Baronet speak in this strain. It is, of course, necessary for us to do all we can to save the time of the House, and to bring on this important Bill at the earliest possible moment for the convenience of Members. But what would have been said of the Government if we had come down here at 12 o'clock to-morrow to consider the Lords' Amendments without having had those Amendments printed? I am sorry our arrangements must give inconvenience to anyone; but that inconvenience will be felt on all sides of the House.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I quite agree that it would be far more convenient to have another day to consider the Lords' Amendments before we discuss them here. As they have come down to us at such a late hour, no doubt it would be advisable to defer their consideration until Monday. I am not sure whether it would not have been better to have fixed Monday in the first instance, as that would have saved the necessity of putting many hon. Members to inconvenience. No doubt, the day was originally fixed with the best intentions; but we cannot help regretting that hon. Gentlemen should be put to inconvenience.

REGULATION OF THE FORCES BILL.

(Mr. Secretary Childers, The Judge Advocate General, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman.)

[BILL 193.] CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

MR. CHILDERS said, that yesterday, at midnight, the clock was taken off this Bill; but after taking it off at 12 o'clock, the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) put it on again at 4 o'clock in the morning. Strictly speaking, the hon. Member was within his right, although the clock did not appear on the Notice Paper; therefore, he (Mr. Childers) would not proceed with the Bill.

Consideration, as amended, deferred till To-morrow.

NATIONAL DEBT BILL.—[BILL 243.]

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lord Frederick Cavendish.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. WARTON objected, and suggested that further time should be given to the hon. Member for the City of London to consider what course he would take.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS urged the House to agree to the Motion, and pass the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE

BILL.—[Lords.]—[BILL 227.]

(Mr. Attorney General.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS asked whether, under all the circumstances of the case, the Government would not withdraw that part of the Bill which related to the patronage of the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas and the Chief Baron of the Exchequer?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, the Government had fulfilled a pledge they gave as to this matter, and were prepared to discuss it now. If it was not dealt with now the patronage would remain with these Courts until next Spring. The Government having fulfilled their pledge would leave the matter in the hands of the House; and if the Government agreed to postpone the discussion, it must be understood that they did so in deference to the wish of the House.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, there could be no objection taken to the action of the Government; but he hoped they would agree to leave this matter to be dealt with next Session.

Second reading deferred till Monday next.

PEDLARS (CERTIFICATES) BILL.

[Lords.]—[BILL 234.]

(Mr. Courtney.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Courtney.)

MR. COURTNEY, referring to an objection to this Bill entertained by the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour), explained that under the Act of 1879 a pedlar could obtain a certificate for any particular district; but if he wished to go into another district he must apply to the magistrate for another certificate. That involved an inquiry by the police as to the man's character, and the whole matter became either irksome or degenerated into a farce.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR explained, that he had blocked this Bill only to ensure a discussion upon it at a proper time. He had been requested to state the objections felt by the Commissioners of Hertford to the Bill. It was true the Bill removed trammels, and, as a rule, that would be a good thing; but the work of the pedlars was decreasing with the increasing means of communication, and as their trade grew less they supplemented it by other trades, which ought to be supervised by the Police. For the protection of the public it was considered necessary to restrict the certificates to districts, so that the pedlars could be more easily watched. The operative clause of this Bill was the 2nd clause, and he thought the whole argument against the Bill was that it removed a restriction which ought to be maintained.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he did not think the objections of the hon. Member were well-founded. No other objections had been offered to the Bill, and he had been advised that these pedlars exercised a very useful trade, and were very much hampered and embarrassed when they went into a town like Birmingham, in which there were several police districts. The endorsements of the certificate were no benefit at all; and the Police were empowered under the existing Act to demand the pedlar's certificate and to inspect his pack. Representations had been made to the Home Office that these men suffered from embarrassing regulations, and he hoped the House would allow the Bill to pass.

MR. ONSLOW, representing a place where there were many pedlars, said, the head of the Police there had assured him that the certificate was a great safeguard to the public. The pedlars were more or less of the tramp class, and unless the Police had control over them they might transfer the certificates from place to place. The pedlars were not confined to towns, but were all over the country; and he considered this a very dangerous Bill, for it would encourage burglary and housebreaking. He did not believe the Police of the country would agree to the Bill.

MR. WHITLEY said, the Police in his district had told him the mere endorsement of the certificate was no protection at all; and, under these circumstances, he felt bound to support the Bill.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, it certainly appeared to him that the Bill was one of very doubtful expediency.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 80; Noes 8: Majority 72.—(Div. List, No. 385.)

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Short title) agreed to.

Clause 2 (Alteration of 34 & 35 Vict. c. 96, so far as regards requiring indorsement of a pedlar's certificate).

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, the whole pith of the Bill was contained in this clause; but after the division which had already taken place, he would not waste the time of the House by taking another division. He had not received a sufficient amount of support to justify such a course, and he could only expect a repetition of the defeat he had already sustained.

Clause agreed to.

Bill reported, without Amendment.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he hoped the House would now allow the Bill to be read a third time.

Question, "That the Bill be now read a third time," put, and agreed to.

Bill passed.

PETROLEUM (HAWKING) BILL—[Lords.]

(Mr. Courtney.)

[BILL 222.] CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Consideration of the Bill, as amended, be deferred until Saturday."—(Mr. Solicitor General.)

MR. WARTON said, he must enter his protest against the practice now resorted to of putting down deferred Bills for a Saturday Sitting. A Sitting had been fixed for Saturday really for the purpose of taking Supply, and he had understood that Supply would be the only Business proceeded with. That was the understanding last week, and it had been acted upon. When an exceptional Sitting was held on a Saturday, there ought to be a distinct understanding that no Business would be entered upon except such as was really necessary in the interests of the country.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL): To save further time, I will put down the Bill for Monday.

Consideration, as amended, deferred till Monday next.

POLLEN FISHING (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND, Bill to amend the Law regulating the Close Season for fishing for Pollen in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND, Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND, and Mr. WILLIAM EDWARD FORSTER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 248.]

House adjourned at a quarter before Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

NAVY (SOBRIETY).—RESOLUTION.

MR. CAINE, in rising to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it will promote good conduct and sobriety among the men and boys of the Royal Navy if the spirit ration were henceforth discontinued, and some equivalent given, equal to the value of the spirit ration, in the form of improved dietary or increased wages;"

said, that he was anxious to state his case as briefly as possible, in consideration of the state of Public Business. Intemperance was the great cause of insubordination in the British Navy, and he could not do better than begin by reading an extract from The Western Morning News, one of many similar cuttings he had made from the newspapers, in regard to a court martial which had been held on a private of the Royal Marines for drunkenness and assault. The only defence the man made was that he had taken "an extra tot of grog," and that he did not know what he was doing. He was sentenced to 18 months imprisonment. He (Mr. Caine) took that as an illustrative case of the evils arising from the habit of intemperance, induced by the supply of a daily spirit ration. Another cause of drunkenness, strange as it might appear, was the existence of so many teetotallers on board of every ship in the Navy. This arose in the following way. The money given by the Admiralty to the men in exchange for the rum ration amounted to 1½d. for two days. The selling price of the rum on shore would be about 1s. 6d. The consequence was, that men who did not draw their spirit ration sold it for what they could get to those members of the mess who were in the habit of drinking. The cook of the mess got considerably more liquor than was contemplated by the naval authorities, being paid for his trouble by each of the other members of the mess giving him a small portion of grog, amounting in the aggregate to over two pints a-day. Another cause of drunkenness was the habit of saving drink for a birthday or some other occasion which it was desired to mark as a special festivity. This was of too frequent occurrence, and sometimes a whole mess would get into difficulties through excessive drinking, after having saved their rations for a week or 10 days. Another evil of the system was that the spirit ration was frequently given to petty officers to overlook certain small offences. He quite agreed that they were bound to make their sailors as comfortable as possible on board their ships, and to give them the best scale of diet which was available for them; but he contended that rum was not food, that spirits were not in any way food, that they were bad for the morals, and bad for the health, and ought to be discontinued. He would not detain the House, as in other circumstances he might have done, by quoting the testimony of distinguished medical men on that point. It was now, he thought, clearly proved that spirits were not necessary; but, on the contrary, that they were dangerous as an article of diet. He contended that the discontinuance of the spirit ration would not in the least interfere with the efficiency of the Navy; in his opinion, it would improve it. He could quote many cases to show that sailors who had to serve in very hot climates found that they could do their work better without the spirit ration than they could do with it. In the Cunard Mediterranean Service, where the men had to endure great heat during summer, the spirit ration had been discontinued. He recollected the case of a gunboat which was sent out by the Indian Government to the Red Sea for special service. By some strange mistake, which, he was sorry to say, did not more frequently happen, the supply of rum was omitted from the ship's stores. That was not discovered until after the ship had set sail. The commander did not think it right to put back; but he put in at Aden and took in a plentiful supply of coffee and sugar. The men had hard service, being frequently employed in rowing in open boats in the hottest weather. They had an unlimited supply of coffee and sugar, and they did their work exceedingly well. When the ship got back to Bombay they were compelled to take the regulation ration of rum, and a petition, signed by every man on board, was presented to the captain, asking that they might have coffee and sugar instead of the rum ration; but the Regulations of the Navy at that time did not allow of it. He had a great many other instances to show that men could do their work in hot climates better without rum than with it. In the Arctic regions, where sailors had to endure great extremes of cold, it was found that they did their duty as well without the rum ration as with it; indeed, evidence was readily forthcoming that men were healthier and better without spirits than they were where spirits were being served out. He would read a short extract from the diary of Sir John Ross, regarding his expedition of 1829-33, which he (Mr. Caine) regarded as of the more value as at that time temperance principles were not so popular as they were now. He (Sir John Ross) narrated how he stood the cold better than any of the men under his command who used tobacco and spirits. When they were obliged to leave the vessel, and left the stores behind them, he said—

“It was remarkable to observe how much stronger and more able the men were to do their work when they had nothing but water to drink.”

To come to another point, he (Mr. Caine) found that teetotallers were constantly distinguishing themselves above their fellows. Officers of his acquaintance told him that teetotallers were men chosen for special service, because they could be so much better trusted than other men. The first man who reached the top of Majuba Hill was a teetotaller of the Naval Brigade. He lost his life from the fact of his being first up the hill. In 1877 the Army and Navy Challenge Cup at Wimbledon and the first prize for the Army and Navy were secured by the same man—the first instance of the sort on record. That man was a lifelong teetotaller in the Navy. In 1878 the Army and Navy Challenge Cup was again won by a teetotaller. There were several other instances in which teetotallers in the Navy had distinguished themselves in musketry practice, all of which went to show that there were excellent precedents for the practice which he recommended. The spirit ration had been abandoned in the American Navy for 17 or 18 years with the most beneficent results; and they had a great many instances of sailors in their Merchant Service doing their work more effectively without the spirit ration than those who got the spirit ration. It had been intended that this Motion should have been seconded by the hon. Member for Carnarvonshire (Mr. Rathbone), if he had been able to be in his place. He would have been able to give important evidence of his experience as a member of a firm who, for 30 years, had sailed their ships without giving grog—a practice which had now been adopted by the best Ship-owning Companies. He would have been able to state that even during the Crimean War, when ships were detained for a week or ten days waiting for crews, owing to the scarcity of sailors, neither his firm nor any other firm not allowing grog on board had to wait for a single day for a crew, though the men had to sign articles that they were not to receive any grog. Messrs. Lamport and Holt, managing owners of the Brazil and River Plate Line, with 40 steamers, and trading to a very hot country, said, in reply to an inquiry, that it had been the rule with them for many years, except in cases of sickness, not to allow intoxicants of any description to be served out to the crews of their steamers. This rule, they said, was adopted by other Steamship Companies, and it did not in any way deter men joining the service. Messrs. Ismay and Imrie, who possessed, in addition to their steamers, a very large fleet of sailing vessels going to all parts of the world, their steamers being engaged in the Atlantic trade, which was a most difficult and exposed voyage, said that all their crews signed articles without any grog clause, and no intoxicants were permitted to be served or sold to them on board. They could testify from long experience that this rule had neither prejudiced nor prevented good crews being freely obtained. For some years grog in their service had been altogether abolished, with satisfactory results in the performance of their duty by the crews, and improved discipline, and, consequently, greater safety of the valuable lives and property intrusted to their care. But perhaps the most remarkable testimony was given by reading the instructions issued in 1875 by the Pacific Steam Navigation Company, one of the largest Steam Shipping Companies trading from Liverpool to the West Coast of South America. He (Mr. Caine) wished it to be noticed that the Directors took the matter under their consideration, and did not leave it to the chief purser. The instructions said that a case of drunkenness on board the Royal Mail Steamship Britannia, on her last homeward voyage, having been proved, they decided to abolish the allowance of spirits to seamen, firemen, bakers, and cooks in future. The stipulation on the articles of "no grog allowed" had to be strictly adhered to, and care must be taken that it was properly explained to the men on signing articles. Previously the seamen, when at sea, were not to have more than three glasses of grog, the fireman three glasses, and cooks and bakers two glasses each; and when in harbour the seamen received two glasses, and the firemen two glasses, and the cooks and bakers one. Even that moderate allowance resulted in so much intemperance on board their ships at sea that they were obliged to rescind this order. Messrs. Smith and Son, the largest owners in the East India trade, and Messrs. Allan Brothers, Liverpool and Glasgow, whose vessels went perhaps the most severe voyages during the winter months, did not allow spirit rations. He knew that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Trevelyan) had given his earnest attention to the subject; and he hoped before long to see these stupid, absurd rations got rid of, greatly to the advantage of Her Majesty's most important Service. He would conclude by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. WILLIAMSON said, he desired to second the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough (Mr. Caine). He believed that the existing arrangements of the Navy really became a temptation to men and boys, and injuriously affected their efficiency. He also believed that they were a hindrance to men in their desire to abstain themselves, and to promote temperance among their shipmates. His own experience as a shipowner was this—that at the beginning of their career they served out grog, but for at least 20 years they had given that up. Their ships were among the ice of the Arctic Seas for weeks. Since they had made the change, it had promoted the good of the men themselves, and had acted most efficiently and well in the promotion of sobriety and good conduct in the crews of their vessels. His experience was all in favour of the recommendation to the Secretary to the Admiralty to take this into consideration, and make arrangements in furtherance of the Resolution which had been submitted to the House.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it will promote good conduct and sobriety among the men and boys of the Royal Navy if the spirit ration were henceforth discontinued, and some equivalent given, equal to the value of the spirit ration, in the form of improved dietary or increased wages,"—(Mr. Caine.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR JOHN HAY said, he was quite sure that the Navy was not yet ripe for the proposal made. A great deal had been done of recent years in the direction indicated by the hon. Member in his Motion; but there was a number of considerations which weighed against this ration being done away with. Already half of it had been discontinued; but there were considerations with reference to climate and other matters which must be regarded before a ration of this kind was discontinued for those who desired it. Sometimes the water supply on board ship was of a very questionable character, and the medical officers of the Navy were of opinion that the spirit ration was of advantage to the health of the men. He recognized that many of the evils suggested were developed by the spirit ration; but he was quite sure that many other evils would be introduced if it were entirely done away with. For the last 20 years all persons under 18 years of age were not allowed the ration, and a very large proportion of the seamen and marines were members of temperance associations. He thought that the great majority who still continued to use it, and for whom it was useful under certain conditions of service, should be allowed to do so. He could not believe that the Admiralty would prevent this; but that they would go on as they had hitherto done, and endeavour to induce the habit of temperance among our seamen and marines, which had made so much advance of recent years.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he could not congratulate the House upon their having entered upon the Navy Estimates through the portal of an unusually interesting discussion—a discussion which had done credit to the interest of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Scarborough (Mr. Caine) in the principles of temperance, and to his eagerness to apply those principles to the welfare of our Navy. He (Mr. Trevelyan) might venture likewise to thank the hon. Member for having stated the arguments against the abuse of spirits in the Navy at a moment when, for the first time for 20 years, the Admiralty were going to do something noteworthy to check it. What that something was he proposed to explain to the House—to state why it was that the Government considered it more expedient to deal with the question in that way than in the way proposed by the hon. Member. The hon. Member's efforts were singularly well-timed. It was only within that very week that the punishment of flogging had practically been abolished in the Navy by Admiralty Order; and the Members of the Board which had issued that Order were bound to ask themselves what could be done to diminish the temptation to the faults and crimes for which flogging was once the recognized punishment. As to the cause of those crimes, there was no doubt whatever that it was drink—the direct and indirect effects of drink—to which most of the misconduct that existed in the Navy was due. In the year 1850 this was so manifest that a Committee of 11 eminent officers—admirals and post captains—was appointed, who found that—

"The evening grog is the source of those evils which render discipline irksome, and give to the Naval Service a character for harshness which it does not deserve."

In consequence of their Report the allowance of rum, which then was a quarter of a pint per diem, was reduced by one-half, and many excellent alterations were made in the system of diet, which conduced much to the bodily comfort and moral welfare of our seamen. The present state of things stood thus: At 7 the sailor had his breakfast, with his cocoa; at 12 he dined, and then he had his half-gill of rum, which was served out in the shape of diluted grog; at half-past 4 he had his supper, with tea and sugar as a beverage, and that was his last meal. One feature of this arrangement was its extraordinary cheapness to the country. The Admiralty purchased the spirit in bond. The rum ration, which, with the duty added, would be worth 2½d., only cost the country the third of 1d., and the entire cost of the rum issued to the whole Navy all the world over was last year only £14,500; and this year, with the rise in spirits, it was £18,000. But the Admiralty, in case a man forewent his rum, thought it right to break through its usual rules, and to allow him far more than the value. A man might take in place of his rum an extra ration of tea and sugar, which was worth a third more than the rum; or savings in money, which were pretty nearly twice the value of the spirits. And it was a rule in the Service that no one, whatever his rank, might draw his spirits if he was below the age of 18. He was not going to try and persuade hon. Gentlemen that a sailor who drank his rum and water with his dinner, and never exceeded that dose, was likely to be much the worse for it. That was not the question. The question was two-fold. In the first place, their young sailors acquired a taste for spirits, by getting them daily at an age when they were quite as well without them. And, in the next place, there was such a quantity of spirits going a-begging on the lower deck, that a man who liked to exceed found it easy to get more than was good for him. Officers who had the means of knowing believed that a sixth of our crews were teetotallers. They certainly were so in some vessels. And yet of the 38,000 seamen and marines afloat, only 2,000 or 3,000 took money or tea in lieu of rum. The plain fact was that whereas the Government gave, and could give, a little over $\frac{1}{2}d.$ in place of the ration, the ration itself sold for $2d.$ and $3d.$; and they all knew what that meant. The man who did not drink his rum preferred to sell it to his comrades, rather than sell it to the Government. And, again, rum was issued to officers as well as to men. It was issued, but comparatively seldom drunk; and there could be no doubt that a great deal of it was given away, and went to the lower deck. Dr. Macleod, the retired Inspector General, one of the most trusted and experienced of our medical officers, said that in the different ships in which he had served all serious accidents could be traced to the men who were at the time more or less excited by spirits; and he wrote—

“It cannot but have a pernicious influence on young men to have a daily ration of spirits served out to them as part of their diet, as it must tend to engender in them eventually a desire for the stimulant, and assist from the first to lay the foundation of disease in whatever organ of the body may happen to be constitutionally weak.”

But, if it was bad for young men to drink spirits, it was bad for them to go from 4.30 P.M. to 7 A.M. without any food at all, exposed for half the time to the fatigues and rigours of a night watch. Under those circumstances, the Admiralty had come to the following conclusion, under the original impulse of his right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), though his scheme had been considerably enlarged since that. In the case of those who should in future enter the Navy, they would withdraw from all men and boys of every rank below the age of 20 their spirit ration. In the working out of this the Admiralty had been considerably strengthened by the Motion on the Paper in the name of his hon. Friend (Mr. Caine). In place of rum, in addition to tea and sugar, they would give a ration of soluble chocolate and sugar, which sailors, who were keeping midnight or morning watch, might use as the material of a very well-timed and much-needed meal, which was a change from their cocoa, preferred by many, and which was less liable to disagree with the few delicate stomachs in the Navy. It was cheaper to the Government, besides being more palatable. It had been carefully impressed on the commanders of ships that the sailors, if inclined, should take this cocoa in the shape of a hot meal during the night watch; but if the sailor preferred—and this was the most recent addition to the Government scheme—instead of taking cocoa he was to be allowed largely to increase the allowance of sugar, which was really the most popular of all the rations on board ship. At the present time, the allowance of biscuit was $1\frac{1}{4}$ lb., and that would be changed into an allowance of 1 lb. biscuit and an allowance of $\frac{1}{4}$ lb. of flour. This $\frac{1}{4}$ lb. biscuit was never taken up. It was quite astonishing to observe the quantity of biscuit which was left in store, and it was evidently a part of the ration the men did not care for. Old sailors would know that with this $\frac{1}{4}$ lb. of flour they would make the composition they greatly preferred—namely, duff. The belief of the Admiralty was that when the young sailor had reached 20, and had experienced the comfort of this extra meal in the night, and this large allowance of sugar, he would prefer not to draw his grog, but would continue to take the more healthy ration, and what by that time would be, he thought, a more palatable diet. The Admiralty likewise proposed to discontinue the issue of rum to officers. The rum which was issued to officers' messes was not drunk as a beverage at dinner; it was drawn in large quantities at a time, and might be said seldom or never to be consumed with any moral or physical profit to the consumer. A great quantity went in presents to the men of the servant and artificer classes as a sort of easy payment for small services; and spirits given in this manner in general went to someone who got more than was good for him. When the ration of rum was reduced by one-half in 1850, no compensation was given to commissioned officers; but the Admiralty did not propose to take this course on the present occasion. A sum of money equivalent to the savings price of rum would be contributed to the mess in aid of the mess funds. And, in another respect, the Admiralty had done something for the cause of morality and discipline, and had, he believed, proved that they understood the laws of health better than they were understood by some of the Admiralties of the past. In order to meet the exhaustive effects of labour in the stoke-hole under a tropical climate, extra grog was permitted to be served out to the men in the engine-room in hot latitudes; and that permission, as the nature of things was, was rapidly turned into a custom. In the Indian troop-ships, some 10 or 11 years ago, extra rations of porter were given to the men, and claret to the engineer officers, and the idea was encouraged that an increased dose of alcohol was the best prophylactic against effects of an enervating climate. But courts martial soon began to show that that idea was a perilous one to start on board ship; and "tropical grog" was the institution to which more than one poor fellow owed his downfall. The present Board—their hands, he gratefully acknowledged, strengthened by the action of the hon. Gentleman and the spirit which it denoted—abolished the whole system of extra issues of alcohol in any shape or form, and substituted for it beverages like limejuice and sugar, and oatmeal and water, which, if not very exhilarating to read about, were much more innocent and salutary in their effects, and which, he had no doubt, would in the long run do more to cheer the stoker under his arduous labours in the tropics, sweetened as those labours were by the large extra pay by which they were very deservedly rewarded. Having stated what the Admiralty proposed to do in order to promote temperance in the Navy, he must turn to the proposal of his hon. Friend, and state why the Government could not ask the House to adopt it. In the first place, that proposal touched the habits of men who had entered the Navy on the existing conditions of service, and touched them with no gentle hand. Every man now in the Navy came in on an understanding that he should have his grog; and to send him off on a three years' cruise without the possibility of getting a drop of what he had been accustomed to, and that when he, perhaps, was a man of 35 or 36, was what he did not think they could or ought to do. It was true that the great Ocean Lines had abolished the issue of grog, and he (Mr. Trevelyan) was very glad of it; but if it had suddenly been done half-way through a voyage, when the men had no choice but to go without their grog or jump overboard, he thought it would have been a step of which the Directors would, perhaps, have repented themselves. Our men were bound to the Service, and great care had to be taken in dealing with their feelings, and even what some, who did not know sailors, were apt to call their fancies, in order to prevent the idea arising among them that advantage had been taken of their situation. Already, the mere report that the grog of the warrant officers was to be stopped—a report which was quite erroneous—had caused a real genuine feeling of anxiety among officers who were no alarmists. He did not like, and hon. Gentlemen who had listened to his answers in the House would acknowledge that he did not like, arguments drawn from the possible discontent and dissatisfaction of our seamen; but he was bound to say that the opinion of naval men in and outside the Admiralty had reminded him that there was a measure in all things, and the hon. Member asked them to proceed further than the Government thought it wise to go. Hon. Members seemed to feel this themselves; for when they sought to abolish the rum ration they, at the same time, in order to make that step palatable to the Navy, accompanied it by financial proposals which the Admiralty could not accept, and which he was convinced that the Treasury would not sanction. Hon. Members proposed that the Admiralty should give the seamen the equivalent of their rum ration in victuals or money.

Mr. Trevelyan

To give the equivalent, and very much more than the equivalent, in victuals—that was, in tea, sugar, and chocolate—was exactly what the Admiralty proposed to do. To give the equivalent in money, and much more than the equivalent for what the rum actually cost the Government, was what the Admiralty did already. What hon. Members meant was that they should give the sailor what he could sell his rum for on board ship, or what he could buy it for at a public-house on shore. And what was that sum? The actual cost of a gallon of rum to the Government was 1s. 5d. last year. It now had mounted to 1s. 9d. The savings price allowed by the Government to the sailor was at present 3s. a gallon. The value of the gallon in the grog-shop would be 15s. The average cost of the rum to the Navy for each year was £15,000 to £16,000. The savings, which were taken by about 2,800 people, came to about £2,032 a-year. The tea and sugar ration, which was taken by about 1,200 people, was about £750 a-year. That was to say, the rum ration and its equivalents at present cost the country about £18,000 a-year, one year with another. The proposals of the Government, which he had detailed in his speech, would, if they were accepted by the whole Navy, cost about £36,000 a-year; but, as the operation of the proposal would be optional and gradual, the burden on the Treasury would be very much less than that. But, while the change for the better, it was hoped and believed, would be very great from the proposal of the Government in proportion to its moderate cost, what would be the result of the proposal? About that there could be no doubt whatever. The proposal of the hon. Member for Paisley (Mr. W. Holms) to make the value of the spirit ration such as would induce the teetotaler to sell it to the Navy instead of to his friends, would entail a burden on the country of over £96,000, and add nearly £80,000 to the Navy Estimates as an inevitable and instant burden. As Secretary to the Admiralty he must say that, if the country was willing to give his Department £80,000 a-year more, there were many ways in which it might be more usefully spent than in raising the pay of the seamen. Our seamen were, considering the rank from which they were drawn, perhaps the best paid and pensioned among the large bodies of our public servants, and the ease with which the flower of the population were attracted into the ranks of the Navy proved that to add £80,000 a-year to those attractions would be an indefensible expenditure of public money which was so much wanted elsewhere. Half that sum would enable the Admiralty to set at rest all the personal questions connected with every branch of all the innumerable Services under their control, and to deprive his hon. Friends the Dockyard Members of a grievance for ten years to come. But he must not recommend the House of Commons, for any purpose whatever, however moral and proper, to add at one sweep so enormously to the pay of our seamen. The Government proposed a tentative measure, which made the first step, and a pretty long one it was—indeed, they had been taking it for the last 20 years—towards substituting wholesome and innocent sustenance for ardent spirits. When they had seen how that worked they, or their Successors, would, if necessary, be ready to go further—if possible, very much further, and even the whole way; but this was as far as they thought it safe and wise to go at present. He could only thank the House for listening with attention while he had detailed the arrangements which the Admiralty had put forward, which, long before the hon. Member had this Motion on the Paper, it was their intention, in a modified shape, to put forward—an arrangement from which it was confidently expected, by those who knew the Navy best, that much good would result with as little arbitrary interference as possible with the habits and the susceptibilities of our seamen.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he had listened with very great satisfaction to the statement of his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty. No doubt, the conduct of the men had much improved of late years. A drunken sailor, once so common a spectacle, was now rarely seen. He did not understand the hon. Gentleman to say that the allowance of chocolate would be made to the morning watch universally. Such an allowance would be a useful thing for men engaged, as they were, in arduous labour. No doubt, the men, by arrangements among themselves, obtained some food during the interval between half-past 4 and 7; but if the chocolate were served out to all the watch, there was no doubt it would do much to prevent that sense of exhaustion which induced many to have recourse to spirits as a stimulant. He was aware that commanders had authority to order an extra allowance under certain circumstances; but it should be more generally exercised. He thought the ration of chocolate should be issued somewhat more freely than hitherto. Although it would entail a considerable charge, it was just one of those charges which would result in economy in the long run.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE thought the proposals of the Government were very satisfactory; but he thought they might be made still more satisfactory if, instead of giving spirit rations to total abstainers, who sold those rations in order to purchase soluble chocolate, the Admiralty would provide them with soluble chocolate, especially as regarded the morning watch.

MR. CAINE said, he expressed the feelings of the friends of temperance throughout the country when he said they were satisfied with the large concessions made to them. He expressed his full appreciation of the line in which the Admiralty had embarked, and which he hoped before long would result in the adoption of his Resolution.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

NAVY—H.M.S. "ATALANTA."

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. JENKINS, in calling attention to the Report of the Committee appointed to inquire into the loss of Her Majesty's ship Atalanta, which was a matter of very great importance, and well worth the attention of this House, said, that all who had taken any interest in naval matters, and had followed the proceedings of that Committee, would agree with him that the noble Earl who now presided at the head of the Admiralty (the Earl of Northbrook) had done a great public service in establishing a very valuable precedent, inasmuch as this Naval Commission had been composed of other than naval officers, who had rendered valuable service and elicited very valuable evidence in the course of the investigation; and he could not help thinking, if the right hon. Gentleman who lately presided at the Admiralty (Mr. W. H. Smith) had taken the same course after the loss of Her Majesty's ship Eurydice, instead of bringing up one or two half-drowned seamen to be tried, they would never have heard of this miserable June or training ship Atalanta. Having followed the evidence of that Committee closely, he thought the Civil Members of the Committee had shown great skill and knowledge in dealing with the questions that came before them. He thought, however, it was a matter for regret that the inquiry was confined almost exclusively to the condition or unseaworthiness of this ship. He regretted that the inquiry had not extended to the fitness of a ship of this kind for a training ship. In the evidence before the Committee facts had been brought out which, in his judgment, proved conclusively that a grave blunder, a grave error in judgment, was made by the Admiralty advisers of the right hon. Gentleman; and he was very much surprised that his strong common sense and practical knowledge should have allowed him to sanction the fitting out of the June as a training ship. So far as he (Mr. Jenkin) could gather, the reason given for that was that she was the only sailing ship in Her Majesty's Service that was available for the purpose, and, to his mind, that was a very great objection to her employment. Now, a ship of 900 tons, according to the evidence, could have been built in a Naval Dockyard for £4,000 or £5,000 more than it cost to repair the June. The ship was 33 or 34 years old, and the original estimate of the cost for repairing her was £11,500. That was increased to £19,000, or thereabouts, and the total cost for repairs exceeded £27,000. After expending that enormous sum of money upon her, what did they find? That after her first cruise for nine months, she had to be repaired at a cost of £1,800 or £1,900, and a few months after that the repairs to her again amounted to over £300. The fact was that, the mistake having been made, the Admiralty had not the courage to condemn her, as she should have been, upon her first inspection at Portsmouth. As to the stability of the ship, it was proved at the outset that she was unsuited for the Service, because, before she left Plymouth, one of the best seamen in the Navy, Admiral Sir Thomas Symonds, condemned her and threw doubt upon her fitness for the Service. At the time the vessel left England she showed symptoms of straining, which made it plain that she was not so stable and sound as she should have been when first commissioned. The evidence of the master's mate was very important, as also was the carpenter's of the ship, his evidence showing that at the time she first left England she showed symptoms of straining, and throughout the voyage made a good deal of water even in ordinary weather. When they had an old ship, it was impossible to say whether the straining was such as to make it dangerous or not; and in this particular ship, he believed, the straining was of the character to make it dangerous. That it was so was seen from the fact that it created great anxiety in the mind of Captain Stirling and the officers of the unfortunate ship. Captain Stirling was never quite satisfied with this ship from the time she was first commissioned, for he was always suggesting alterations to the Admiralty. Although the Committee was appointed to inquire into her seaworthiness, they had not done so, but appeared to have evaded the question; and he should like to know if his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Trevelyan) could throw any light upon the matter, or if it had received the attention of the Admiralty? He had thought it his duty to bring the subject before the House, as he considered it a question of very great importance, and one which should not be passed over lightly. The evidence showed conclusively that the Admiralty were at fault; and though he did not blame the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. H. Smith), he blamed those who persuaded him to take this course. Ships of the kind were not fit for training ships. It was true they had a sailing vessel in the Mediterranean; but that was very different to crossing the Atlantic in the Winter months; and he would ask the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Sir John Hay) whether boys and young seamen could not be trained as well, or even better, in ships of steam power than in sailing ships pure and simple?

In the future, he hoped the same mistake would not be made, and that these sailing ships would not be used as training ships. A great deal had been done by the Admiralty in fitting out a flying squadron; but they wanted more than that, they wanted a detached squadron, and he hoped his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty would be in a position to tell them that steps with that end in view were being taken, so that our seamen and officers might be better trained than they could be under the present system.

MR. DUFF said, that, knowing how anxious the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Trevelyan) was to get into Committee upon the Naval Estimates, he would not enter into details in supporting the views of his hon. Friend. That was a subject on which he had more than once expressed an opinion in that House; and though he agreed with the Secretary to the Admiralty, who, in a speech the other day, said he believed the Navy, men and officers, were imbued with the spirit which distinguished the men in the days of Hawkins, Blake, and Raleigh, he was bound to say he was somewhat sceptical as to whether the men and officers now were as great naval sailors as the men of the 16th century. He doubted if they could go through the Straits of Magellan without a pilot. He was afraid that the men of the present day were not so efficiently trained as they should be; and he was very much struck at looking into some figures brought out before the United Service Institution by Admiral Wilson, that out of 18,500 seamen—and we had only about 19,000 seamen pure and simple—10,000 men were under five years' service, and they only averaged 18 months at sea, while 4,270 had served between five and 10 years, with four and a-half years' sea service, and 2,600 15 years, with 11½ years' sea service. Bearing in mind that point, he referred them to the Report of the Atalanta Committee, which stated that a large part of the men had never had the opportunity of handling a ship under sail in heavy weather, their knowledge being chiefly derived from books, and not from practical experience. The necessity of that was the more plain when they remembered that it was a practice amongst the large steam packet companies to insist that all their officers should have had their knowledge of seamanship from sailing ships. It was partly from want of this knowledge that so many disasters occurred. No officer would get up and say in that House that a man was fit for the duties of a seaman after about a year and a-half's sea service. How, then, was the difficulty they were now under to be avoided? The modern man-of-war did not employ many sailors, and that was all the more reason that they should seek for some special means of developing good seamanship. He therefore pressed on the Admiralty that they ought to have an increased number of cruisers. Those cruisers might be attached to the Channel and Mediterranean Squadrons; and, instead of their having so many vessels like those at present on foreign stations, they should have vessels of about 2,000 tons—vessels of auxiliary steam power, and not overloaded with guns. If the Service abroad were carried on with those vessels, they would be a very important school for training the officers and men. There would be a saving in the cost of coal, for he would not allow these vessels to steam excepting under certain circumstances. They might, with great advantage, be profitably employed in the Pacific, on the South-East Coast of America, and in the West Indies. Naval authorities he had spoken to on the subject had admitted that the only objection that could be raised was that of expense; but he did not think that they would be justified, if the Admiralty thought these vessels would conduce to the good of the Service, in refraining from having them on the ground of cost. In an interesting speech the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty had said that he believed that half the commerce of the world floated under the British flag. If that was true, it was an important reason why their commerce should be properly protected, and he was bound to say that he did not think matters were satisfactory in this respect at present. He hoped that in next year's Navy Estimates they would hear that the Admiralty were prepared to carry out some scheme for giving the men of the Navy greater experience as bond fide sailors; and if there was no objection, except the objection of expense, he hoped they would have the courage to come down and ask the House for the money necessary.

SIR JOHN HAY said, that he desired to join with the hon. Members for Penryn (Mr. Jenkins) and Banffshire (Mr. Duff) in entreating the Admiralty to take some steps for training the officers and men in handling ships under sail. He did not, however, concur in the view of the hon. Member for Penryn in the condemnation that he had passed on the Admiralty for selecting the Atalanta for the purpose of a training ship. They must regret the loss of life that occurred in that vessel; but having served in the Vestal, a ship identical with the Atalanta, in very heavy weather and in a typhoon in the China Sea, he (Sir John Hay) knew that a vessel of that kind, well handled, was quite safe. Nor did he concur in the opinion of the hon. Member that there should be steam power in all the sailing vessels that might be used for purposes of training, for it would add enormously to the cost; and the opportunity that the officers would have for using the steam power at any time, when the energy and skill of those in command, and the skill of the men required to be developed, would tend to have an injurious effect. He thought that the figures which had been given should alarm the country. It was true that our Mercantile Marine had developed enormously, and that by its means we had a considerable number of men returned as seamen in training. A very small proportion of these men, however, could reef and steer—the old qualification for a naval seaman. He calculated that, as a matter of fact, when the number of servants, artificers, and foreigners were taken into account, they had only a Reserve of 15,000 men whom, in the event of necessity, they could hope to call upon from the Mercantile Marine in addition to the Royal Naval Reserve. This was all the more serious, since, of 19,000 men now quoted as seamen in the Navy, there were 10,000 who had only an average of a year and a-half's service at sea, and they all knew that a year and a-half's service at sea was utterly insufficient to make a sailor. He might, in connection with that fact, mention that although seamen might be improved in character and conduct, there was no doubt that, even amongst the more experienced of them, the sailing qualifications had much deteriorated. Before a Committee of the House last year Captain Shaw, of the Fire Brigade, an experienced and talented officer, mentioned that, until about 10 years ago, the men of the Fire Brigade were taken almost entirely from the Navy; but latterly he had given up taking men from the Navy, because he found that they had not got the activity and other qualifications that were necessary to make them efficient in the Fire Brigade. He now went to the Mercantile Marine to obtain the men that he required. It was thus impossible to suppose that we had such seamen as we could desire, and a change was absolutely necessary. They trained their boys for the Navy, and they had a force of 18,500 trained seamen; but there were only some 4,270 men who had had four and a-half years' service at sea, and 2,603 who had had seven and a-half years' service; whilst there were only 1,816 who had had 10 years' service. That was a small proportion to rely upon, and it was for that reason that he had given Notice to call attention to the desirability of having additional cruisers built or bought—for it did not much matter which—for the purpose of attaching to each squadron cruising ships, in which, when the iron-clads were in harbour for re-fittings, or when their service at sea was unnecessary and expensive, to put a proportion of the crews on board, and so gain for them that activity and that daring which was only obtained by constant exercise aloft. There was another question to which he would now call the attention of the House, and that was to the very few iron-clads that they now had for the defence of the country. In his opinion, an iron-clad was now what the line-of-battle ship was formerly. The naval power of a country was measured by its iron-clads. Although many of his hon. Friends would not agree with his views, he would call their attention to the idea on which iron-clads were first created. Some hon. Gentlemen were now of opinion that in creating an iron-clad they must create an impregnable movable castle. That was not his opinion. It was necessary that they should have large iron-clads to meet vessels like those Italy had produced, and such as the French possessed in the three largest ships of their Navy; but iron-clads were built originally because wooden ships were exposed to shell which set fire to them, and the vessels were liable to destruction before they could make a sufficient impression on the enemy. This directed attention to the building of iron-clads. At present it was quite true that the power of the guns was much increased; but if they built their ships of a material that could not be set on fire, they could continue an action, and it was not to be supposed that they would not lose some men and ships, but they could prolong the engagement and bring it to a successful issue. He, therefore, desired not to urge on the Admiralty the construction of great and costly ships—ships costing £1,000,000 each—but a sufficient number of ships to maintain the peace and perform the duty of the old line-of-battle ships. What was the proportion that this country seemed to desire in former days? In 1793 the British line-of-battle-ship Fleet numbered 115, whilst France had 76, and Spain 65. The combined Fleets of France and Spain were more in number than the British Fleet; but the proportion was thought sufficient. It, at any rate, preserved the peace in 1790, although it did not do so in 1793. In 1790, when France and Spain were bent on war in the question regarding Nootka Sound, a large fleet was immediately commissioned, and an armament of 53 sail of the line brought France and Spain to terms without a declaration of war. In 1820 there was hardly a line-of-battle ship in the world that did not belong to England; our sail of the line surpassing in numbers the combined Fleets of all the other countries. In 1840 the relations of France and England were considerably strained after the successful attack on Acre; but the Fleet of England in the Mediterranean was increased by 17 sail of the line in a very short time, and the result was that France kept the peace. It was shown that a display of naval superiority might effect what a long and bloody war might fail to do. On the change from sailing line-of-battle ships to steam line-of-battle ships, France for a time took the lead; but in 1860, thanks especially to the patriotic protest of the late Prince Consort, an effort was made, and our superiority was re-established. Then came the era of iron-clads, which had replaced the old line-of-battle ship. At first our great private establishments seemed to leave us without fears of any rival; but France emulated our activity, and in 1870, while Great Britain had 40 iron-clads, France had 31. At that time other Powers had hardly any iron-clads; but it must be borne in mind that now there were 266 iron-clads or more owned by Powers other than Great Britain. He would, however, use France otherwise than as the standard of comparison, and would remind the House that the present Secretary of State for War (Mr. Childers), in 1870, as recorded in Hansard, when he stated the numbers of the Fleets as 40 and 31 respectively, also said that, in order to maintain the relative supremacy of England, it would be necessary to build each year 12,000 tons of iron-clads—8,000 in the Royal Dockyards and 4,000 in private yards—that was, to produce three new iron-clads in each year, in order to keep pace with the shipbuilding then going on in France. The result of the last 10 years had been very different from that contemplated. France, after her great misfortune, was supposed to be devoting herself solely to the improvement of her Army, which was increased to 1,700,000 men, and it was thought she would not pay the same attention to her Navy. It was not, however, as they expected. They had now built or building in the English iron-clad Navy 58 or 59 ships, of which six were building. The French iron-clad Navy was 62 or 63, including 11 that were building. Thus, in numbers, it would be superior to our own, when those building were completed, and that was not a result that we could regard as satisfactory. If the proportion that they desired in 1870 was as three to four, it could not be advantageous to this country that that proportion should now be apparently equal. Subtracting the vessels that the French were building, they had 52 iron-clads, all but one in European waters, whilst, subtracting those that we were building, we had 53, not all in European waters, but in all parts of the world. It was, therefore, evident that in the Mediterranean, the Atlantic, and generally on the European coast, the French were in numbers greatly superior to us. But of the ships he had named belonging to the British Navy, one was at Melbourne, two at Bombay, one at Hong Kong, two at Bermuda, and four in China, the Pacific, and Australia. Those 10, then, must be deducted from the force available for the Atlantic and Mediterranean, leaving 48 or 49 in Europe, of which six were building, to compare with 63 French, of which 11 were building. It might be said that a majority of the French ships were wooden ships iron-armoured, and that we preferred iron and steel. It was asked—Were the French ships of a character and quality that were dangerous to England? And, in looking at that question, he would remind the House of what had recently occurred in the Tunis affair. Perhaps the country generally were unaware of the fact that by a stroke of the pen, as it were, 10 sail of iron-clads appeared off the harbour of Sfax on a recent occasion, whereas we had only six iron-clads in the Mediterranean; and, however powerful and effectual these might be for the services they might be called on to perform, the House would remember that ships of that kind or any other kind could not be in two places at once. An hon. Friend of his who had visited Brest Harbour had informed him that he had seen there 31 iron-clads fitted with the newest artillery and mitrailleuses. He did not deny that steel and iron ships were preferable to some of these vessels, which, it might be said, were of wood and iron, and such as this country would not be satisfied to rely upon. But it must be remembered that we had in our Navy wood and iron ships which were returned as perfectly good and efficient vessels—the Lord Warden and the Repulse, for instance, which were built before, at least, 20 of the ships in Brest Harbour. The French had increased their Navy very much more rapidly than England during the last 10 years. Instead of having built 120,000 tons in the course of 10 years, as was stated to be necessary in 1870, England had only built 96,000 tons. Therefore, although it was evident that France had increased her Navy rapidly in the course of the last 12 years, this country had built ships in nothing like the proportion suggested as being necessary by the Secretary of State for War in 1870. He (Sir John Hay) suggested that instead of building six ships at the present time we should be building 18, in order to keep pace with the rate of building in France, which had, during the time he had referred to, more than doubled. Moreover, all the other European Powers had added to their maritime strength, and there were, in addition to the iron-clads possessed by England, a total of 266 iron-clads belonging to the various Powers of the world; and he contended that these must, of necessity, be taken into consideration in deciding the number of iron-clad vessels which this country ought to possess for the maintenance of her naval superiority. He was not of opinion that shipbuilding should be confined to our Dockyards, which ought to be particularly utilized for the purpose of repairs; but that it should be distributed amongst the mercantile shipbuilding yards of the Clyde, the Tyne, the Humber, the Mersey, and the Thames, the resources of which were sufficient to turn out from two to three iron-clads each within the time necessary for their construction. Now, it was admitted that it was impossible to maintain the Navy in a state of completeness without spending £12,500,000 upon it annually; but, notwithstanding this acknowledged fact, we had now cut that amount down to £10,000,000. On the whole, therefore, during the last 10 years we had spent £15,000,000 too little on the Navy, except in that year when the late First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. W. H. Smith) bought the ready-made iron-clads, which alone saved the country from occupying a naval position inferior to that of France. He trusted the House would forgive him for having endeavoured to make clear the absolute necessity which existed for maintaining the superiority of the British Navy; and he appealed to the First Lord of the Admiralty to make an effort in that direction, which, if the facts were as he had stated, he felt sure the country would willingly respond to.

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY said, he had been asked to reply on behalf of the Admiralty to the observations which had been addressed to the House by the hon. Member for Penryn (Mr. Jenkins); and he trusted that it would not be thought that the important statement which had been made was treated with any disrespect in consequence. With reference to the speech which had fallen from his right hon. and gallant Friend (Sir John Hay), he should leave that to be dealt with, when the general Shipbuilding Vote was reached, by his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty. He would, however, say a word or two with reference to the personnel of the Navy. His right hon. and gallant Friend had not expressed all the confidence which he had hoped he entertained in the Naval Service of the present day, and seemed, to some extent, to question the seamanship of the men, quoting in support of that view an opinion expressed by Captain Shaw, the Superintendent of the London Fire Brigade, to which he (Sir Thomas Brassey) offered the opinion of another gallant officer who had come fresh from his command, and who spoke in the highest terms of the seamen of the Fleet. With reference to the Royal Naval Reserve, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite seemed to question its efficiency; but, from reliable information in the possession of the Admiralty, he (Sir Thomas Brassey) was in a position to state that the Royal Naval Reserve was never in a more efficient condition than at the present time. He believed there had never been so little difficulty in keeping up the number of the Force. So far from there being any difficulty in this respect, they had recently had applications for the enrolment of men in excess of the number provided for in the Votes, and they heard there were men applying for admission whom it was a great disappointment to the recruiting officers to reject, on account of the exceptional qualifications which they possessed. He might also state the Liverpool Committee of Ship-owners and Masters, who for many years had been watching attentively the position of merchant seamen, had recently dissolved, because they were sensible of the great improvement which had taken place in that respect. He would also remind the House that the facilities for training seamen were now brought to a degree of development and efficiency which had never been reached in former years. They had heard, on a recent occasion, of the great prosperity which, at the present time, was attendant upon the shipping enterprise of the country; and those who were anxious for the maintenance of seamanship in the Merchant Service must learn with satisfaction that the owners of ships were now finding the investment of their money more remunerative in sailing ships than in steam vessels. In turning to the speech of the hon. Member for Penryn (Mr. Jenkins), it was not necessary to trouble the House with any lengthy observations on that subject, nor was it for him (Sir Thomas Brassey) to vindicate the conduct of the late Board of Admiralty in selecting the Atalanta as a training ship. The House was aware that naval opinions were strongly in favour of training our seamen in sailing ships, and the officers of the Navy were, in this matter, not singular in their views; because, in the Mercantile Marine, experience in sailing ships was held to be indispensable to the production of a seaman. That principle having been accepted, the next question was this—Was the Atalanta a suitable ship for the Service? On that point it was sufficient to observe that, when formerly in commission, she held the character of being a buoyant and stable vessel in bad weather. In accordance with the duty which devolved on the present Board of Admiralty, a Committee was appointed to inquire into the matter, and it was determined that its investigations should be of the most searching and impartial character. The Committee was fairly constituted, and combined both naval and other elements. The inquiry was most exhaustive, and the Report was signed by every Member of the Committee. It was to the effect that the Atalanta was a sound and stable ship, well-manned and well-equipped. With such a Report as that before them, the Board of Admiralty had not felt themselves called upon either to punish or to censure any officers, whether professional or executive, who were responsible for the selection and the equipment of the vessel. The heavy expenditure on repairs to the vessel had been sharply criticized, and it must be admitted that if such an outlay could have been anticipated, it would have been preferable to have built a new ship. There was a great discrepancy between the original estimate and the final statement of the cost of repairs, which amounted altogether to £28,000, the original revised estimate having been £16,000. But, on the other hand, it was stated on the part of the shipbuilding department that a vessel of the same type could not have been built at a less cost than £36,000. This would apply to the argument of the hon. Member for Penryn, that a new ship might, perhaps, have been constructed at a less cost than the amount of repairs. The liability to great and unforeseen expenses was doubtless an objection to fitting out any old wooden ship for renewed service at sea. In the case of the Atalanta the expenditure was distributed over a lengthened period. It was divided between three Dockyards, and no single individual was responsible for what had occurred. He would not hazard a conjecture as to the cause of the loss of the Atalanta. It was certain that the vessel had encountered a hurricane of extraordinary severity; and seamen well knew how fearfully the ordinary phenomena of bad weather were intensified in those great tempests which were encountered only at intervals of years. He need not pursue further the painful subject of the loss of the Atalanta. Before passing to other topics, he would take the opportunity of expressing on behalf of the Admiralty and the nation their sincere and heartfelt sympathy with the widows and the orphans who had been left desolate by the disaster. He now turned to the general subject of the training of seamen; and as regarded that no hon. Member was more entitled than his hon. Friend to address the House on the subject. He spoke with the experience of a successful shipowner and a former commander of merchant ships. The Navy would value the opinion of a seaman who had received his training in what he might call the Sister Service. His hon. Friend had said that he shared the general opinion that the art of handling a ship under canvas was a valuable, if not an essential, part of a naval education. At the same time, he recognized the importance of steam in combination with canvas as an additional guarantee for safety. Such being the views of his hon. Friend, he claimed his general approval for the ships, in which the majority of their seamen were now serving. They had at present in commission one large frigate, the Inconstant, and 19 corvettes, some of which far exceeded in size and power the frigates of former days. They had 13 sloops, and one sailing sloop, the Cruiser, which was doing excellent work in the Mediterranean. He was giving expression to his personal opinion when he said that he hoped that another vessel like the Cruiser might hereafter be added to the Mediterranean Squadron. We had also five brigs, which were most useful for training purposes, attached to the home ports. On the last occasion when the Board visited the Dockyards, they saw the squadron of brigs weigh anchor in Plymouth Sound, and execute in admirable style a series of intricate evolutions under sail. The present Board were determined to keep up the seamanship of the British Navy in a manner worthy of its ancient reputation. They had fitted out a Flying Squadron, and transferred large numbers of seamen from the barracks at Sheerness and the receiving ships at the home ports to sea-going ships. They would take care to supply the Navy with ships which would be efficient under steam and sail. They would spare no pains to improve not only the ships but the system of training. They knew that they were watched by competent critics, and he thanked his hon. Friends the Members for Banff and Penryn for their interesting and suggestive speeches.

ADMIRAL EGERTON said, he was of opinion that no particular individual was responsible for the selection of the Atalanta, the whole Board being really responsible; and he had no doubt that the reasons which were put forward in favour of her selection were satisfactory to the Board in general. Remarks had been made with reference to the age of the vessel. As they all knew, there were old ships and old ships. One old one might be seaworthy, while a younger one might be utterly unseaworthy. He might illustrate that by recalling to mind the loss, some 20 years ago or so, of the ship that took Wolfe to Quebec. It was lost on the sands, and it was found, on examining her, that she was as sound as she possibly could be, although she must have been something like 104 years old. Everyone formed his own theory as to the cause of the loss of the Atalanta, and there certainly was nothing in the evidence to show that her age had anything to do with her loss. He was surprised to hear it said that Admiral Symonds objected to her; for he believed that any objections which he could have entertained against her were with regard to her equipment for such a purpose as that for which she was used. Sir Thomas Symonds was the son of her constructor; and, so far as his (Admiral Egerton's) recollection served, he did not think there was any vessel of which he was prouder. She sailed and was commanded in an admirable manner. That was the conclusion at which he had arrived after a careful study of the Blue Book on the subject. There was little or no profit to be found, however, in further discussion of this painful subject, and he regretted that the memory of it had been revived. He wished to endorse the remarks of the right hon. and gallant Admiral opposite (Sir John Hay) with regard to the very great importance of increasing the number of their war ships. He had not investigated the question so fully as his right hon. and gallant Friend of the number of ships in course of building by foreign Powers; but while he would not like to say a single word which would cause a feeling of antagonism between this country and France, he felt bound to say that it was impossible to observe without some anxiety the large number of iron-clads which their neighbours across the Channel were constructing. As to the best type of ship to build, he would very much prefer that they should build a large number of smaller iron-clads, rather than that they should expend vast sums in building one or two very large ships. It might be necessary to have one or two great vessels; but he thought they should spend the money of the country to much greater advantage by building a large number of smaller ones with the proper amount of speed, rather than in building a few great ships. He was very anxious that the Admiralty should turn its attention more to the consideration of the armament of the Navy, for competent observers had put it on record that they were not in a satisfactory position in regard to the guns on our ships. A distinguished officer had said that the English guns were not equal to the guns on the vessels of some foreign Powers, and that that was the opinion of the foreign officers themselves. As to training ships, he agreed that they ought to use both steam and sailing vessels for the purpose, and there certainly ought to be some sailing ships on foreign stations. Such ships ought to have one or more tenders attached to them for the use of officers and men. With regard to expenditure, the new ships that were necessary to the efficiency of the Navy could not be built without considerable outlay; but he felt convinced that if it were only clearly shown that we were absolutely behind other nations as regarded the equipment of our Navy, no difficulty would be found in providing the money requisite to place it in its proper position in relation to the Navies of the world.

MR. MACLIVER said, he desired to press upon the Government the necessity of considering the claims of that deserving and important class, the naval engineers. On a former occasion, when the subject was before the House, the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Trevelyan) stated that the position of the naval engineers had been improved; but that was said under an evident misapprehension. So far from that being the case, they were no better off now than they were 20 years ago. In moving the Navy Estimates, the Secretary to the Admiralty stated that in future less blue-jackets and more artificers would be employed in the Dockyards; and that being so, he trusted that the position of the artificers, which, so far from being better, was really worse than it was formerly, would also be taken into favourable consideration. He wished also to call attention to the manner in which the grievances of naval officers were attended to at the Admiralty. It had been said that the Admiralty was always ready to meet the claims of those who felt aggrieved. On this point he had recently received a letter from an officer of long standing and great experience in the Navy, in which he said that if officers brought forward complaints, however well founded they might be, they would become marked men, not by the Civil Lords, but certainly by the Sea Lords of the Admiralty; and the writer went on to suggest that, as a remedy for such a state of things as now existed, the First Lord should appoint a certain time and place at which he would be prepared to receive officers and listen to their grievances.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF protested, in the strongest possible manner, against the way in which the Navy Estimates had been treated that year. They were brought on that day without a single Minister being present who was responsible for the Estimates. He had nothing to say adverse to the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Trevelyan), who, either as Secretary to the Admiralty, as a speaker, a writer, or a politician, was a credit to the House and to the country; but the hon. Gentleman was not a responsible Minister. His complaint was that the First Lord of the Admiralty was a Member of the Upper House, and that he had never opened his mouth about the Navy since he had held his present Office. In 1871, the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government stated that the two Ministers responsible for the two great spending Departments ought to be in that House; and in 1872, he said that the two principal Ministers who were responsible for those Departments ought to sit in the House of Commons. He (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) pointed out, however, that when sitting in the Lords, the First Lord of the Admiralty could not be responsible for the Estimates, and it was plain that the right hon. Gentleman did contemplate that the First Lord ought to be in that House. It was trifling with the House and with the country that these Estimates should be discussed before a Gentleman who, however able, was not responsible, and that the Ministers who were responsible were not there. The result of having the First Lord in the other House was that a host of petty tyrannies towards the Navy and the Dockyards might be brought forward, to which they could get no satisfactory reply. One act of tyranny to the Dockyards perpetrated by this invisible Board was in their stopping a quarter of an hour of the dinner time of the labourers. That put the men to a great deal of inconvenience, because, whereas before they were able to walk home and get their dinners, they were now no longer able to do so. The old navigating officers of the Fleet also complained of the way they had been treated. The warrant officers also complained that they were put on a lower rate of pay when working in the harbours than what they enjoyed when at sea; and many other grievances of artificers, Dockyard riggers, and others might be mentioned. With regard to the complaint that the First Lord would not see a deputation from that House because it was an interference with discipline, he maintained that it was no such thing, and that the engineers and Dockyard labourers had just as much right to have their views represented as any other class of electors in the country. He trusted that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty would bring this matter before the particular Lord of the Admiralty, who would put it before the next Lord, who would place it before the First Lord, and that the grievances of the engineers would be remedied. He wished his hon. Friend would go into the complaints that came from the Dockyards. He would find that none of them were extravagant; but he would also find that a great many were reasonable, and that all of them were plausible, if the hon. Member had the opportunity of going into these matters as he (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) had when he visited his constituents. An hon. Member behind him reminded him that the crisis might soon come; but he was always happy to meet his constituents, and feared nothing as far as that was concerned. If the hon. Member (Mr. Trevelyan) only went into these matters, he (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) was sure he would find a great deal to redress. He trusted that in future years the Navy Estimates would be moved at an earlier period of the year, and that the day was at hand when the First Lord of the Admiralty would again be a Member of that House.

MR. PULESTON, in reference to the claims of the naval engineers, said, he considered them to be urgent and well-founded; and that any scheme for the improvement of their condition should also include those who were below them—namely, the engine-room artificers. With respect to what had been said as to the refusal of the First Lord of the Admiralty to receive a deputation of Members of the House in reference to the complaints of the naval engineers, the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Trevelyan) had spoken of the discipline of the Navy, and disapprovingly of the fact that officers had asked Members of Parliament to bring forward their grievances. But they were driven to do so, as they found, practically, that their complaints were otherwise unheeded. While he (Mr. Puleston) said that, he joined very cordially in what had been said by his hon. Friend (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) as to the courtesy and efficiency of the hon. Gentleman who held the Office of Secretary to the Admiralty and represented that Department in the House. It had been promised that the new scheme relating to the Royal Marines should be promulgated by the 1st of July; and, as it was not issued yet, there was some anxiety to know what it was to be. He had endeavoured, on more than one occasional, to urge the desirability of getting rid of some of the glaring inequalities that existed in the Dockyards, and he had submitted plans by which that object might be attained. The distinctions, for example, between shipwrights, wheel-rights, and carpenters were so unnecessarily wide as to call for serious attention; and the labourers' question was a large one, particularly that raised by the hired men. The most important requirement was that more men should be put on the Establishment. Something was done by the late Government in that direction, and, to some extent, the factory hands were established. It was necessary to offer inducements to good men to remain in the Service. When they joined it they wanted to look forward to the future as being measurably provided for. In the absence of such provision, the law of supply and demand produced serious variations in the population of the Dockyard towns, which, in a large measure, were built up on the faith of Government. Then, with regard to pensions and to provisions for the widows and orphans of seamen, Admiral Gambier had shown that there were various funds in connection with the Admiralty, derived from fines and other sources, which, even without any help from the Treasury, and without any contributions by the men themselves, would constitute suitable provision for this purpose. The fact mentioned on a former occasion by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Trevelyan), that only 3 per cent of the seamen who had been asked for their opinion upon a fund to which they should contribute had replied in the affirmative, was due mainly to the circumstance that no matured scheme was placed before them; and he (Mr. Puleston) believed that if a substantial and intelligent scheme were presented to them, showing that if they either contributed so much themselves, or authorized so much to be deducted from their pay, a fund would be made sufficient to provide adequate provision for their wives and children, the affirmative answers would be nearer 100 per cent than 3 per cent. He desired also to call attention to the arbitrary way in which officers were sometimes dismissed from the Service; and he would give as an instance the case of two officers in one of the Departments, the Medical Department, who, after serving, one in Stonehouse and the other in Plymouth, for a year on trial, were confirmed in their appointments and then suddenly and summarily dismissed without any charge being made against them. They had, on the faith of their appointment by the Admiralty, gone to considerable expense in furnishing their houses, and establishing their families in what they regarded as a permanent position; and the only explanation they could get from the Admiralty was that the interests of the Service required their dismissal. Men dismissed under such circumstances, of course, lost their character, and would not be able to obtain other occupation, because they could give no reason for their dismissal, although their accounts had been declared by the Admiralty officials to be in perfect order. Such a system was injurious not only to the men, but to the country; and he hoped the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Trevelyan) would consider their case. At the least, compensation ought to be given them, and their characters vindicated, so that they might have a chance of obtaining other employment. Another matter of importance was the action of courts martial; and he would remind the hon. Gentleman of the case of Lieutenant Deacon, who, after 18 years of good service, was some time ago court-martialled on a charge of drunkenness at the mess, and convicted on the evidence of four officers, although four others declared that he was not drunk. One of the witnesses upon whose evidence mainly the officer was convicted, it was reported, had since been the subject of charges which showed, at least, that, if these statements were true, his evidence was of less value than it was assumed to be. He did not dispute the finding of the courts martial, nor question their ability and sincerity of purpose; but the sentence in this case had been unanimously declared by the papers throughout the country, including the Army and Navy papers, to be of unprecedented severity; and he again appealed to the hon. Member to allow the sentence to be reconsidered—not with a view to Lieutenant Deacon re-entering the Service, but in order in some way to lessen this unmerited disgrace. In conclusion, he would express his regret that when the Navy Estimates were about to be considered the House should be so empty as it was on this occasion, and that more interest was not taken in a Service to which, more than to any other, the greatness of this country must be attributed.

MR. BROADHURST said, he sincerely trusted that next Session the Navy Estimates would be brought on at a time when it would be possible to discuss the important matter raised by the speech of the hon. Member for Plymouth (Mr. Macliver). The engineers of the Royal Navy were still looked upon to a considerable extent as intruders; and the fact was not realized so much as it would have to be, that engineers would be the chief mainstay in the future of our fighting vessels. He hoped that any scheme which might be prepared would be a thorough one, dealing with the grievances in no niggardly manner, and placing the engineers in the position demanded by their importance in the Service.

MR. H. ALLEN, as Member for Pembroke, also desired to enforce the arguments of the hon. Member for Plymouth (Mr. Macliver), and observed that the position and claims of the engineers were more and more forcing themselves on the attention of the public. With regard to the number of men on the Establishment, he believed that before metal was substituted for wood in the construction of ships, all the Dockyard employés were on the Establishment, and were entitled to superannuation allowance on retirement. But the system of hiring men was then introduced, and now in the Pembroke Dockyard only about one-third of the men employed were on the Establishment. Another grievance was that men of inferior grade were set to do superior work; and when they had passed their probation were not put into the superior grade, but were kept in their old position, and received the pay and pension belonging to the inferior grade. He hoped the hon. Gentleman would endeavour to remedy that grievance.

MR. BIGGAR, who had a Motion on the Paper to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the claims of Mr. John Clare, patentee of iron shipbuilding, said, he was unable to move the Resolution; but he desired to call the attention of the House to the matter. The claims of Mr. Clare had been frequently placed before the House, and the reply had always been that this case was settled a very long time ago, and that the Minister of the day was not disposed to re-open it. He (Mr. Biggar) did not think that was a sufficient answer; and he did not intend, if he could in any way avoid it, to accept a reply of that sort. He wished the Minister of the day, or some succeeding day, to meet the case on its merits, and to give a sufficient explanation, or such a decision, as would settle the question once for all. Though the case had been pending for a long time, his friend, Mr. Clare, had never allowed his claim entirely to collapse. Up to the time at which the claim arose, the principle on which iron vessels were built was with vertical columns from the keel, and then by what were called stringers from stem to stern of the vessel. After sustaining any strain, ships built in this way were liable to double up like a sheet of paper, and go down in deep water. Mr. Clare invented a new principle, somewhat resembling lattice girders. Whether Mr. Clare was the original patentee of this improved form of shipbuilding or not, there was no doubt that his plans were submitted to the Admiralty, and that the Admiralty was impressed by the desirability of the plans, and afterwards built vessels upon plans similar to his. So far all seemed very fair. Mr. Clare, however, made an application for compensation; and, in his (Mr. Biggar's) personal opinion, one reason why the claim was unsuccessful was this—that he expected to be paid at a very high rate. He expected to get a commission upon all vessels which had been built upon his plans, and on all vessels that might be built on these plans during the term of his patent. The result was that a controversy arose between the Admiralty and Mr. Clare. They set him at defiance, and gave him an opportunity of trying his case in a Court of Law. The result was unfavourable to Mr. Clare, for the reason that Mr. Scott Russell and Mr. Charles Fox gave evidence that his plans were not a novelty, but that vessels on the same plans had been previously built. Mr. Clare was convinced that that evidence was erroneous, and thought he could prove it. What he (Mr. Biggar) claimed was that a Select Committee should be appointed to inquire into Mr. Clare's case. He did not ask the Government to commit themselves to give any compensation; but he asked that they should not oppose the appointment of a Committee next Session to investigate the claims, and, if they found they were not just, then there was an end of the whole matter. If the Committee recommended in Mr. Clare's favour, the Government would only be bound to take into consideration the nature of his claims.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, he had intended to say something with regard to the claims of the engineer officers; but it appeared that they were satisfied with the prospects held out by the Government, and they, no doubt, had good reason for believing that their case would be attended to. With regard to the warrant officers, the same observation would also apply. But two cases had occurred lately, one at Plymouth and the other at Devonport, where persons in the service of the Admiralty had been dismissed without being afforded any opportunity of making their complaints known or having them investigated. He should like to know why, in these two cases, no opportunity had been given to persons who, after many years' service in the Navy, had been deprived of their employment, of having an investigation into the circumstances of their dismissal. The particular case upon which he wished to say a few words was that of Lieutenant Deacon, who was dismissed from Her Majesty's Service in consequence of the finding of a court martial which sat upon an accusation of intoxication made against him. Now, he (Mr. Clarke) was very sensible of the difficulty of reviewing a decision of a court martial; and, of course, his own experience in Courts of Law had taught him to be very careful indeed in forming a judgment upon reading the proceedings of a trial as to what really took place. But he was bound to say deliberately, after reading the report of the evidence given at Lieutenant Deacon's court martial, that anything more unsatisfactory than the evidence which was given there he never remembered. Mr. Deacon was charged with intoxication, and the witnesses against him were persons who did not volunteer their accusations, but who had been spoken to before they were called to give evidence. In almost every case it was only under pressure that they expressed the opinion that Mr. Deacon was intoxicated. The particulars of the charge were certainly of a very remarkable character, because the intoxication was alleged to have taken place at a time when Mr. Deacon was at dinner—he was, in fact, presiding at the dinner—he had given a toast, and had then ordered coffee, and had left the dinner; and, so far as one could see, there was no evidence of his having behaved in such a way as to lead anyone to believe that he was in a state of intoxication. So far as the evidence went, he (Mr. Clarke) was quite unable to find anything except an expression of opinion on the part of some persons that this gentleman was intoxicated, and it was upon evidence of that description that he was dismissed Her Majesty's Service. It was a matter of terrible importance to a man who, though not old, had spent several years in the Service; and he hoped the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty and the First Lord would give the case their re-consideration. If ever there was a case in which the finding of a court martial needed reviewing, he thought it must be that of Lieutenant Deacon.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he should reserve any observations he might have to make upon the question of iron-clad ships until he had had an opportunity of hearing the statement of his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Trevelyan). The hon. Member for Penryn (Mr. Jenkins) had drawn attention to the case of the Atalanta; and although he (Mr. W. H. Smith) had not intended to address the House after the able statement made by the Civil Lord of the Admiralty (Sir Thomas Brassey), yet he thought it would be, on the whole, more fitting that he should now notice some of the statements made by the hon. Member. He had very generously acquitted himself (Mr. W. H. Smith) of any personal responsibility in the loss of that unfortunate ship; and he might take the opportunity of saying that no circumstance, except the loss of the Eurydice, occasioned him more deep sorrow during his administration of the Admiralty than did the loss of the Atalanta. It was a most deplorable occurrence, and entitled the relatives of the gallant men who sacrificed their lives to the sympathy and regard of the country. The hon. Member had referred to the Naval Lords being responsible for the selection of the ship. He (Mr. W. H. Smith), however, wished to express his entire concurrence with the observations of the hon. and gallant Admiral the Member for East Derbyshire (Admiral Egerton), and to say that the Board as a Board were responsible for the selection of the Atalanta. Of necessity, in the distribution of business, the discharge of certain duties fell to one or another member of the Board; but the Board, as a whole, were responsible for everything that was done by them. The vessel was selected, not by himself or by his Board, but by the previous Board; and he believed they selected her with full knowledge of all the circumstances of the case, and that they were fully justified in their selection. She was a ship of good character and good reputation. She had been almost completely rebuilt at Pembroke, and so thoroughly and substantially refitted that, to the best of the belief of those competent to judge, she was in a perfectly sound condition when she left British shores. No doubts were expressed as to seaworthiness, and the gallant Admiral then commanding at Devonport in no way hinted that she was in the slightest degree an unsafe vessel. She was, in his opinion, too small to accommodate the seamen; but that was a mere expression of opinion with regard to size. The misfortune was deeply to be deplored; but he (Mr. W. H. Smith) was not on that account prepared to say that the endeavour to train seamen in sailing vessels must be a mistake. If it was, it was a mistake which was shared by the most experienced owners of steamships in the country. He believed that in some of the largest lines of steamships the owners made it a condition that their junior officers should have had a practical training on board purely sailing vessels. There was another fact which had been lost sight of. He believed that the Merchant Service was as well manned and the ships were as well found as at any period of its history. There was a great advance in the seaworthiness of their ships and the character of the sailors. Yet it was notorious that on the occasion which resulted in the loss of the Atalanta more than 20 ships foundered at sea, or, at any rate, had not been heard of, having been engulfed in the storms that prevailed then. He thought that circumstance alone pointed to a condition of things which might well account for the loss of the Atalanta. With regard to the captain, he wished to say that that officer was selected on account of his reputation as a sailor. He believed that the captain never uttered a single suggestion as to any deficiency in the ship herself. He had complete confidence in the ship, and he (Mr. W. H. Smith) could only say for himself and his Colleagues that they had complete confidence in the captain and his officers. He hoped, however, that even that calamity would not induce the Admiralty to refrain from training their seamen in sailing ships. There were circumstances in which the use of steam was very desirable, and there were vessels which possessed steam power and also sailing qualities. The Comus was a vessel of that class; and they had, to a considerable extent, taken the place of the gun-boats on the Chinese coast. But he hoped that their sailors would continue to be trained in purely sailing ships.

MR. JENKINS rose to reply to some of the observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster, when—

MR. SPEAKER said, that the hon. Gentleman was not entitled to make a second speech.

MR. TREVELYAN said, that, as his right hon. Friend (Mr. W. H. Smith) reserved his remarks upon their iron-clads for the purpose of saving time, he would ask his hon. Friends to pardon him if he also reserved any answer he had to make to their observations until the House was in Committee. There were one or two matters, however, upon which he would wish now to say a few words. A remark had been made by the hon. and gallant Admiral the Member for East Derbyshire (Admiral Eger-ton) as to the British Navy being behind other Navies in large ordnance. Such was not the case, though the real fact was that we were at this moment at the actual point of a revolution in the larger ordnance. The guns of the future were not yet afloat, being, with scarcely an exception, still in the course of construction. With regard to the state of the Navy at present, he would give one or two figures; but not by way of comparison of the relative strength in this respect of the British Navy and of the Navies of other countries. Austria had 10 ships carrying 110 heavy guns; Italy, 12 ships carrying 91 heavy guns; Germany, 18 ships carrying 118 heavy guns; Russia, 29 ships carrying 179 heavy guns; France, 59 ships carrying 356 heavy guns; and Great Britain, 98 ships carrying 572 heavy guns. He was not speaking of iron-clads. It might be said that all those guns, with scarcely an exception, were of the old type. There were guns of a new type in the Chilian and Japanese Navies; but almost all other nations were in an attitude of expectation concerning them. Last year the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. H. Smith) took money for 14 6-inch guns of the new type; this year they had taken money for 115. It was only yesterday he (Mr. Trevelyan) had to issue a Minute under which the first battery of guns of the new type was to be mounted on an English cruiser now carrying six Armstrong guns. His noble Friend (Lord Northbrook) did not let a day pass without holding some consultation, or asking some question as to the state of progress of one or other of those guns, and the Admiralty would not rest until what the right hon. Gentleman so eagerly desired was accomplished, and Great Britain had an equipment of guns far superior in number, and not inferior in power, to the guns of any of the great Powers of the world. When he (Mr. Trevelyan) spoke of Lord Northbrook he was not inclined to defend him a second time; but this he might say—that Lord Northbrook possessed in a high degree the power of inspiring those who acted with him with a feeling of loyalty and attachment to himself, and with energy and public spirit in carrying on the business of the country. He did not see anything beyond what he had said the other day that needed defence in the personal conduct of Lord Northbrook, nor anything to complain of in the Parliamentary situation. He did not see any inconvenience in the management of the Department which arose from the present arrangement, though his share of the responsibility was as great as any reasonable man could desire to have. Where there was £11,000,000 of public money to be spent, there was plenty of work, not only for one man, but for two men, and for many more to help and supplement their efforts. With regard to the matter which his hon. Friend (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) brought before the House, that was a question which required very minute inquiry at the various ports of the country. He could only say, with regard to the shortening of the dinner hour in the Dockyards, that in the Dockyards, as elsewhere, the Factory Acts had to be observed; and that, it being necessary to make up in the course of the week five quarters of an hour taken from the working time of the boys subject to those Acts, various plans were considered, and it was ultimately decided to curtail the dinner hour in the manner of which the hon. Gentleman complained. At the same time, the Admiralty would be glad to adopt any better arrangements that could be suggested. With respect to the Royal Naval Engineers, they were the only branch of the Service that had not been dealt with in a comprehensive manner, and he would make a statement with regard to them in moving the Navy Estimates for next year. As for the delay in the promulgation of the scheme for the Royal Marines, he had to say that it was due only to the desire of the Admiralty to judge of the practical working of the corresponding scheme that had been prepared by the Secretary of State for War. It only remained for him to say a word on the case of Mr. Clare, which had been brought forward with great moderation, considering the long time it had been before the public. In June, 1855, Mr. Clare wrote to the Admiralty, stating that if buoyancy, strength, and resistance were the points required, he could produce a mode of construction which would produce greater efficiency than any yet adopted. For some time after that he laid his plans before the Admiralty, where they were carefully considered; and, after consultation with the professional officers, a reply was given. In September, 1853, Mr. Clare filed a patent for certain methods of fastening iron plates of iron-clads; and on the 13th July, 1855, the then Secretary to the Admiralty answered him that the Board was not prepared to entertain his suggestion, and in November of the same year wrote—"I have to acquaint you that we have no occasion for your services." This was done on the responsibility of the professional officers of the Admiralty. Mr. Clare was not willing to accept this answer, and in September, 1864, he sent in a bill for £6,571,740, the details of which he (Mr. Trevelyan) had by him. He would only read the last three items—

"To loss by Admiralty for withholding payment from me since 1856, £2,000,000; to loss by Duke of Somerset nominating gentlemen to oppress, persecute, and swindle me of my property by perjury, £2,000,000; to the interference on behalf of the Duke of Somerset paying Captain Coles for 14 years for my inventions, £2,000,000."

This was followed by a printed paper entitled—"Clare versus The Queen; or, a Petition of Right versus a Petition of Wrong," which concluded by saying—

"If your Majesty will be pleased to say that a sum of money shall be paid on account, and a new trial take place, my case shall not only be proved quickly, but shall put every one of the Admiralty conspirators and perjured witnesses into gaol."

Up to this time he had relied upon the opinion of the professional officers, who positively declared that they gained no benefit whatever from Mr. Clare's services. But he did not put a great deal of store on what had up to then occurred. Mr. Clare took his case into the Queen's Bench, and filed a petition claiming £500,000 for the infringement of his patent. The Admiralty contested his claim, which was tried in February, 1863, at very great length; and the evidence of the Admiralty professional officers was supported by some of the ablest naval engineers of the day. Mr. Scott Russell stated that he had built many ships, and he produced the drawings of one built in 1850 identical in principle with the idea of Mr. Clare. "If you believe the Crown witnesses," said the Lord Chief Justice, "then there was no novelty in the invention, or there has been no infringement of it." Mr. Samuda, another witness, declared that for many years he had built ships on this principle. The opinion of the Lord Chief Justice was very strong. He characterized the claims to be the wildest and most extravagant he had ever known. Since that time Mr. Clare had never left the Admiralty alone, and his letters convinced him (Mr. Trevelyan) that he belonged to that class of men whom the Admiralty could not possibly have accepted as one of their professional officers. His claim before the Court of Queen's Bench was that he ought to have been engaged as constructor and shipbuilder for the Admiralty. He still wrote and signed himself—"Inventor, Patentee, Upholder, and Marine Ship Constructor of the State Navy since 1853," but sometimes only used the initials. The late First Lord of the Admiralty left it on record that it was clearly impossible to re-open the case. The verdict of a Court, presided over by one of the ablest Judges that ever sat in the Queen's Bench, had been taken; and he thought successive Boards of Admiralty were quite right in declining to re-open the question. It very often happened that a gentleman came to the Admiralty and made a sort of general proposition; and in subsequent years, when another gentleman did really make such a thing as was vaguely suggested, the first gentleman sent in a claim. The Admiralty was not ungenerous; but if inventors of real service to the country were to be rewarded, it was all the more necessary to refuse the claims of those whom the Admiralty professional officers pronounced to be of no service whatever.

Mr. Trevelyan

PASSENGER ACTS—EMIGRANT SHIPS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. O'DONNELL, who had the following Notice on the Paper:—To call attention to the Report on Accommodation for Emigrants in Transatlantic Passenger Ships; and to move—

"That the grave abuses complained of by Miss O'Brien, and partly admitted by the Board of Trade, require a prompt legislative remedy," said, he thought a great misapprehension had gone abroad with regard to the alleged failure of Miss O'Brien to make out her case. The substance of her complaint, he held, was made out beyond all doubt by the admissions of the Government Department itself. He also wished to call attention to the fact that the only evidence called at the inquiry was that of a character which ought to be looked at with healthy suspicion by the public at large. The Blue Book on the subject, laid before the House, consisted of a Minute by the President of the Board of Trade upon the conduct of his own officials, and of the evidence of the managers of a large number of Companies. Where none but the witnesses for the defence were heard, it was a triumph for the prosecution to see that practically these charges were proved, and that was the case with the present inquiry. The emigration question was of great importance, as emigration was increasing; and they must not forget that the arrangements for emigration were more and more controlled by the circumstances of the great rush of Continental emigration. To Miss O'Brien was due the deep gratitude of Irishmen and Irishwomen, for the womanly courage with which she had come forward and made her statements, by which she had exposed herself to opprobrium and something very like insults on the part of the officials of the Government. It would be seen, by reference to the admissions of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, that he practically admitted the truth of Miss O'Brien's statements. He admitted that provision ought to be made for keeping communications between the married and the single women separate; he agreed that the lavatory accommodation ought to be separate. The President also seemed to be disposed to agree that, if a certain number of women were carried, there should be a woman of position to act as matron, and that showed how well founded were the allegations made on the subject. It was stated that some of the Companies were very well arranged and managed; but the law was not made for the restraint of the well-behaved, but for the restraint of the ill-behaved. He (Mr. O'Donnell) very much regretted that the President of the Board of Trade had thought fit, in that statement, to indulge in a serious reflection against Miss O'Brien and against the poor, and he also regretted that he should put those reflections in a public document. It was admitted, by manager after manager, that it was practically impossible for the emigrants in a large number of ships to change their clothes, or to wash themselves from the beginning of the voyage to the end. Among those persons for whom the President of the Board of Trade had such unquestionable scorn, he chose to particularize in referring to workmen's garrets and hovels. He thought so eminent a democrat might have kept in the background such an expression. The answer, which had attended the inquiry, he was sorry to say, appeared to be re-echoed by the subordinates of the right hon. Gentleman, and especially was this found to be the case in Mr.

Gray, Assistant Secretary to the Board of Trade. Miss O'Brien had described the monster berths in which passengers were packed as "huge hammocks," in which men, women, and children lay side by side promiscuously. To a person like Miss O'Brien, not acquainted with the nomenclature on board emigrant ships, it was not unreasonable that those long trays of passengers, one above another, should look like "huge hammocks," or that the way the passengers were packed together should suggest something like "promiscuousness." In drawing upon the horrors of association with persons of dissolute morals and conversation, Miss O'Brien had asked if a shrinking girl-child of 11 years should strive "to rise and flee to save her soul," what could she do? In these monster berths, which were divided, the "pigeon-hole" sleepers could only get out head foremost or feet foremost; and, in cases of prostration or sickness, that must be a matter of some difficulty. But what was the interpretation put upon the supposition of a girl striving "to flee to save her soul" by the Assistant Secretary to the Board of Trade? What was the base, ignoble joke made of the innocent expression of this lady by Mr. Gray? Addressing each manager that came before him he asked—"Supposing that a girl-child—a shrinking girl-child—should strive, in Miss O'Brien's words, 'to flee to save her soul,' or to leave her berth for some natural purposes——." This was the base, ignoble jest of Mr. Gray. It was in the face of officials of this character that this spotless Irish lady had been compelled to fight on behalf of her countrywomen. Mr. Gray's "dirty joke" was repeated in every case. Such was the character and tribunal that had tried the case; and yet upon the evidence of this tribunal the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade declared "that Miss O'Brien's case had completely broken down," that her statements had been thoroughly investigated by competent officials—like Mr. Gray—and that it was not too much to say that they had been entirely disproved. The fact was that, with regard to one particular ship, Miss O'Brien's case did break down, and she was the first to admit it; but the general charge of want of proper precautions in the trade at large was proved to demonstration. Undoubtedly, it was the case that men, women, and children were pigeon-holed in monster berths; and matters should be so arranged as to prevent any more serious consequences than lack of ventilation or suffocation. Miss O'Brien complained that the single women were not necessarily partitioned off from the married couples; thus, anyone who claimed marriage might, in reality, be an agent of infamy in New York, as had often happened when, owing to great pressure, the worst-managed Companies did a roaring trade in emigration. The Companies themselves could not be altogether blamed for this state of things, for the simple reason that the Passenger Acts did not compel them to separate the passengers as suggested. Yet it was said that Miss O'Brien's charges had been disproved. Owing to the fact that there was a common thoroughfare to the lavatories, available at night, indecent persons had the most dangerous facilities for carrying out their purposes. Miss O'Brien asked that there should be legal prohibition of such facilities. The present Acts did not provide for the separation of single men from single women on board, and that statement had been made by Mr. Montgomery, the representative of the Dominion Steamship Company, apparently to the surprise of the officials of the Board of Trade. It was urged that there was the steward's watch at night to preserve the passengers from molestation, but that officer was not allowed to examine the women's berths at night; thus, if a man entered these berths he was comparatively safe. Miss O'Brien had further complained that the women's berths, in many cases, had no fastenings from the inside, and urged that the provisions made by the best Companies should be made compulsory in all cases. The women were frequently unable to offer any resistance, as when they were prostrated by sea sickness. Passengers had no protection against the semi-sailors and semi-lubbers who did the unsailor-like work, and, practically, had the run of the whole vessel, and many complaints had been made against these men. He (Mr. O'Donnell) was not aware that immorality always followed where facilities for immorality were provided; but he maintained that emigrants had a right to be protected against indecency as well as against immorality. Cases of immorality were not always made known, for the simple reason that such exposure would reflect upon the conduct of the Companies upon whose vessels they occurred. The minds of the heads of these Companies were so interested and so disposed, that even when grave charges were made they were at once led to take the view of their under officials. He (Mr. O'Donnell) could assure the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade that, besides the people, the great mass of the Bishops and clergy of Ireland were most deeply interested in the matter, and most grateful to Miss O'Brien for her heroic efforts. A worthy Irish priest had sent him one or two extracts to which he would refer. He had an extract from a most popular newspaper, circulating amongst the classes that came out as steerage emigrants—namely, Frank Leslie's Weekly, which dealt with the misconduct and abuses that had occurred on the steamer Hecla. The evidence given before the Emigration Commissioners at Castle Gardens showed that the steward had been drunk during the entire passage, and had taken liberties with the female passengers as if it formed part of his duty. It was high time, the paper stated, that the owners and agents of these Linesteamers, who had a snobbish contempt for poor people of humble birth, should understand that America took a different view of the matter, and would enforce, so far as they were able, the better treatment of persons who came there to enjoy the freedom of that country and the equality guaranteed by her Constitution. A respectable Irishwoman, writing from her uncle's home in Boston to The Boston Pilot, one of the most respectable papers in any country, gave an account of her sufferings, and the insults to her and other women in a ship belonging to one of the best conducted Lines. She stated that on Sunday, the 20th September, she sailed from Queenstown (Ireland) on board the Hecla, and received the worst ill-treatment. The steerage passengers were packed together like cattle in a truck, and constant abuse and insult were offered to the female passengers. The steward especially was most insulting, and used the worst expressions towards them. They made several complaints to the captain, and he told them that he would make it all right; but he never did. The females could not dress or undress during the voyage, or even wash themselves. Some of the gentlemen passengers complained to the captain of how the females were treated; but he gave them no satisfaction, but laughed in their face. The steward was drunk all the time. She never suffered so much in her life as she did during that voyage. He had also a letter from a gentleman connected with the Catholic University School, Stephen's Green, Dublin, dated May 10, 1881, in which he related particulars of a double visit he paid to America on board two ships which he mentioned. He did not go steerage; but he said it was a matter of common talk among the better class of passengers—the freedom and liberty the sailors permitted themselves among the young women of the steerage class. It was notorious among the passengers that gross acts of impropriety were committed by sailors towards the female passengers, and four females became insane during one voyage. He (Mr. O'Donnell) got another letter, mentioning the name of the ex-emigrant agent in Liverpool, who was prepared to give information in regard to the gross misconduct of sailors on board Atlantic steamers. Sailors were not only admitted to the female compartments, but actually outraged the passengers. To show that his (Mr. O'Donnell's) description of the hammocks was not in any way exaggerated, he might refer the House to the statements on the subject by Dr. De La Poer, the Medical Officer at Queenstown. The principal officer of the Board of Trade (Captain Wilson) was sent over from London, and he also practically admitted the whole substance of the charges made by Miss O'Brien against the present system. He (Mr. O'Donnell) contended that the fact that there were precautions taken on well-managed Lines furnished no argument against the necessity of altering the law so as to compel misconducted captains and sailors in charge of those ships to become well-conducted. Captain Wilson said that the longitudinal division between the berths, which was only from 6 to 10 inches high, was movable, and, as a matter of fact, was removed if a husband and wife with children were together, so that, when the mattress and bedding were put in, the division practically did not exist. The berths all formed one long mattress. He contended that that was a colourable evasion even of the existing law, because the Passenger Act provided that, except in the case of married couples, every adult passenger should have a separate berth. The existing system was simply scandalous, and it was a wonder there were not more complaints. Although his statement had been necessarily brief, he had brought forward ample proofs from the admissions of the Board of Trade, the admissions of their officers, and in the absence of any impartial investigation, that though, of course, it was quite open for well-conducted Lines to conduct themselves well, it was also open for ill-conducted Lines to conduct themselves badly. He hoped a new spirit would be breathed into this administration, and that now that the Government were to take an official part in Irish emigration, they would not by a superficial examination, but a real determination, put an end for ever to the scandalous abuses which disgraced the present passenger traffic.

MR. A. MOORE said, the question was one of great importance, and he and others felt that, particularly now that the Government meant to promote emigration by Government means, it should engage their serious attention. He ought to say that Miss O'Brien's statements with regard to the Germanic were not fully borne out by some of the emigrants. He (Mr. Moore) had promised to abide by the verdict of the emigrants; and the moment it was received he conveyed his regret to the Company to which the ship belonged. He, however, felt, after having taken great interest in the question for some time past, and after having carried on a long correspondence respecting it, that Miss O'Brien had done a real service to the country by her disclosures. It was perfectly clear the law was in a most unsatisfactory state, and he could not imagine a more dishonest inquiry than that held by Mr. Gray at Liverpool. That gentleman went down to Liverpool with a preconceived view, which he was determined to prove, and every question he put was what lawyers called a "leading question." His report was the report of the permanent official whose dignity had been touched. It was wholly misleading, and was replete with the most offensive, insolent vulgarity. Father Nugent was the only independent witness summoned, and what was his evidence? It amounted to this, 'that upon the first-class Lines from Liverpool to New York things were pretty well conducted. He told them that these Lines had separate inclosed berths for married couples, for single men, and for single women. But the point was that the law did not compel the Companies to provide these inclosed berths; it only stipulated that males above 14 should be separated from all other classes in the ship, and did not prevent married men or supposed married men sleeping in a room with unmarried women, no matter what their age. As at present framed, the law opened the door for every kind of abuse on inferior Lines. He held in his hand a report of the proceedings at the trial of the masters of a great many ships in New York. That would have been a mere futile ground for observation for the officials of the Board of Trade. The captains of these ships had been convicted for gross overcrowding. One of the first ships on the ocean, one belonging to the Inman Company, sailed from Queenstown 18 months ago with about 450 passengers more than the number she was entitled to carry, and instead of punishing such a gross scandal as it deserved, the Board of Trade let off the owner with an ample apology. When they had these direct proofs of overcrowding, it was necessary that they should look into the state of the law, and see that it was thoroughly reversed. He received a number of letters on this subject, some of a most atrocious kind, from dismissed agents and others, which he intended to pass over, and others from persons of undoubted respectability, disclosing a state of things which required the prompt intervention of the Legislature. He was sensible that, in bringing forward these complaints, they might possibly divert traffic from British ship-owners to foreign Lines. That would be a great calamity, because foreign Lines were managed in a most abominable way, and emigrants would not even have that protection which the present unsatisfactory state of the law afforded with respect to British vessels. The substance of the complaints he had received was that there was not proper separation for the sexes, and that young single women were attended by men. These men might enter the compartments of females at any time for the nominal purpose of attendance, when, perhaps, the poor young women were absolutely exhausted from sea sickness. He had received letters from females who travelled to America, complaining of the want of privacy in their compartments, and of the undue proximity of their berths to those of single and married men. The absence of medical assistance when required, and of the attendance of a stewardess, were also complained of by the young women whose letters he read. Referring to the advertisements published in London, inviting emigrants to travel by a Line which would convey them to New York at a rate considerably lower than that of the Liverpool Companies, he said it should be publicly known that emigrants beguiled by these solicitations were merely taken in small coasters to Antwerp, and there transhipped for New York in vessels of a most filthy description, which rendered life almost insupportable during the voyage. He had received a communication, in which the fullest credence could be placed, showing how a ship of this kind became a perfect pandæmonium after a certain hour in the evening. In the vessel to which the letter specially referred there were 430 passengers, some of whom were subjected to the roughest usage, and even kicked. The women on board were not given separate accommodation. He complained—first, that there was no legal obligation to enforce separation; second, that the Board of Trade had no legal control over the arrangements under which passengers were conveyed who left this country and were transhipped at a foreign port; and, third, that the Board of Trade had no control over the arrangements with regard to immigrants coming to this country. The horrors of the 48 hours' voyage from the Scandinavian and North German ports exceeded what was experienced in the long Atlantic voyage. The only satisfactory solution of the matter was to insist on the separation of the sexes. He did not think the shipowners would be hostile to such a regulation. Indeed, the Allan Line had for years carried out the system of separation, and would not now depart from it for the world. True, the male and female passengers were on the same deck; but no man was permitted to enter the inclosed berth in which a woman was. A strong argument was that on board the Indian troopships the most absolute separation prevailed, and there was no sufficient reason why the same system should not be enforced in the ordinary emigrant-carrying traffic. It was also necessary—and he was glad that the Board of Trade supported them in this—that there should be some woman appointed to take charge of the female department. Perhaps the House was not aware that the emigrant traffic from Queenstown to New York paid the shipowners a great deal better than the first-class passengers. The total cost for each steerage passenger was not above £2, leaving a net profit of something like £4. A Protestant clergyman in the East End of London had told him that the question would never be settled until they got some religious ladies of the Catholic faith to take the work in hand voluntarily. The emigration to our Australian Colonies was conducted under admirable regulations, and in Melbourne there was an excellent house for the reception of emigrants. He trusted that some similar establishment would be provided at Queenstown. The sanitary arrangements were scandalous in almost every case; certainly some that he had seen on a White Star vessel seemed very satisfactory; but, for the most part, they were very much the reverse. The whole subject was one in which Irish Members felt a deep concern for the honour and happiness of a number of poor people. They thought that every protection ought to be afforded to emigrants going out to America in order to give them a fair chance of starting in life.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he would endeavour to lay aside all personal feelings in replying to the speeches of hon. Members, although he thought he might complain of the tone and temper of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell). He came to the consideration of the question with one feeling only—an earnest desire that, out of the discussion, the House might arrive at some practical conclusion as to what alterations, if any, were possible and desirable to secure the comfort and decency and morality of the emigrants. The hon. Member for Dungarvan had commented strongly on the persons who had conducted the inquiry for the Board of Trade, and also on the evidence given. Mr. Gray was a trusted and valued officer of the Board of Trade, and was most impartial and disinterested in the matter, because there was no question of the conduct of the Board of Trade officers. As to the evidence, what other evidence was it possible to get? The first point to be decided was the actual system; and for that purpose Mr. Gray and Captain Wilson, accompanied by Miss O'Brien, personally examined some of the great Liners. Miss O'Brien was, of course, not present at the inquiry; but she was present at the personal inspection, and she coincided absolutely as to the statements made with reference to what was seen at that inspection. He agreed entirely with the hon. Member for Dungarvan as to the importance of the subject. It was important, in the first place, to the emigrants themselves; and it was also important to the owners of the great steamship Lines, whose character had been so seriously, and, as he thought, unjustly impugned. It had been said that the Board of Trade, to a great extent, had admitted the charges of Miss O'Brien, and that they had shown that by the recommendations they had made. Well, he did not wish to minimize those; but he must say they were not of urgent importance. After careful inquiry, it was recommended, in the first place, that there should be, what already existed in many cases, separate communication from the single women's and from the single men's quarters without going through each other's quarters. That was desirable; but he did not think it was so important that a different state of things necessarily contributed always to immorality. A common passage and a common staircase was the usual thing with all houses and hotels; and the idea that these emigrants, men and women, were not to be trusted to go upstairs together involved an accusation against the people concerned that he should be sorry to make. Then, the second recommendation was the possession of a sufficient number—an ample number—of lavatories and latreens; and, having expressed the strong opinion of the Board of Trade on this point, it would be carried out. Then, the third recommendation was that a matron should have charge of the women's quarters, and that was a suggestion that shipowners would do well to consider. On some Lines it had been adopted, and afterwards abandoned for reasons not connected with expense. It was always usual in long passages to select one or more of the women to act as matron during the voyage. The hon. Member for Dungarvan said Miss O'Brien's statements had been proved; but there he must differ from him; and then the hon. Member went on to observe that he (Mr. Chamberlain) had used scornful language with reference to Miss O'Brien, and that was a statement he must absolutely and utterly deny. He had treated Miss O'Brien throughout with the greatest respect—a respect to which her sex and her good intentions entitled her, though he could not but regret that, in making statements rashly without sufficient experience, she had done injustice to a respectable trade. The words he had used, and which the hon. Member had quoted, were—

Mr. Chamberlain

and he denied that there was anything in that of the nature of an expression of scorn to Miss O'Brien or the emigrant classes. If single women were berthed together—from 20 to 30 together—if all were virtuous and well disposed, or even if any were, it would be impossible that any immorality could take place. Miss O'Brien was certainly mistaken in many of the statements she had made, as she herself admitted. No such thing as a “monster hammock” existed in any of the emigration vessels that had been referred to by the hon. Member. There were separate compartments, in which trays one above another were placed at right angles to the vessel, these trays consisted of five or six berths; so that in a whole compartment it was possible to have 24 beds; but they were not in line as in a hammock. The mistake was perfectly unintentional on the part of Miss O'Brien, if she had admitted that she could not reconcile what she saw on the second occasion with what she thought she saw on the first. She had further stated that she had seen “a dark hole” resembling those on board slave ships. It was proved that there was no such hole; but that the decks were well lighted and ventilated, and the one referred to was subsequently used for cabin passengers. The charges in regard to the misconduct of stewards and sailors were not, as far as he knew, possible of prevention; inasmuch as it would not be possible, by any legal proceeding, to prevent these persons from making their way into the quarters of unmarried women if they chose to do so. As far as overcrowding of emigrant ships was concerned, he could only say that that had already been legislated against; and if any complaint on the point was made, he should certainly take steps concerning it, as he should also if it was made known to him that in emigrant ships male servants were allowed to go into rooms occupied by women. Separation was possible, no doubt; but it could not be carried out without considerable difficulty and expense, and ought not to be attempted unless the legislation was made universal as far as all the emigrant-carrying Companies were concerned. He admitted that the Passengers Act might, with advantage, be amended in some particulars, and nothing would please him better than to bring in an amending Bill; but the conduct of the hon. Member for Dungarvan and his Colleagues had made such legislation rather difficult and left the time very short indeed, and a Government might be excused from undertaking such legislation when so many arrears were left unattended to.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, after the statement made by the Prime Minister yesterday as to the hour at which Supply would be taken, he should not ask the House to go into Committee of Supply that night.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY expressed his regret that the Government did not see their way to requiring the complete separation of the sexes on board emigrant ships, and said the time the Government had employed in passing Coercion Bills for Ireland would have been much better spent in legislating upon the question under discussion.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at Seven o'clock

DRAINAGE (IRELAND) PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL.—RESOLUTION.

LORD THURLOW moved—

“That the Order of the 1st day of April last, which limits the time for the Second Reading of any Bill brought from the House of Commons confirming any Provisional Order be dispensed with with respect to the said Bill.”

The noble Lord explained that the Bill was one of considerable interest and importance to a large number of persons in Ireland. The measure had reference to a district in the county of Cork. It was of a very useful character, and he hoped it would not be prevented from becoming law by reason of a technicality in the Forms of the House.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, he did not think he ever rose to do a more painful or unpleasant duty than the present. He had been for a great many years Chairman of the Committees of that House, and it was his duty in that Office to see that the Orders of the House with regard to private legislation were observed. He had never yet found any want of confidence in the decisions he had come to, and this was the first time in which, having expressed a decided opinion against a proceeding of this kind, that opinion had been overruled. One of the Standing Orders of the House was that no Bill confirming a Provisional Order should be read a second time if brought from the other House after the 16th of June; but this Bill was not read a first time in the House of Commons till the 21st of July, and if their Lordships allowed such an infraction of their Orders, those Orders were worth nothing at all, for nobody could rely on them. He had never shown any unwillingness to suspend the Orders when good reason had been shown; but here there was a deliberate insult to the House of Lords.

Everything was ready in the Office in Ireland by the 22nd of January, and the delay was simply owing to the negligence of the promoters to push it forward in due time.

EARL GRANVILLE entirely agreed with the observation of the noble Earl that the Orders of the House should be maintained; but could not accept the view that any insult to the noble Earl would be involved in a Resolution of their Lordships to suspend the Order for the public convenience. He was not acquainted with the details of the matter, and could not say why the Bill was not proceeded with at an earlier date. He could not help thinking that the observations of the noble Earl would expedite parties who were concerned in Private Bills. There was really no objection to this Bill. The object of it was good, and it was desirable that it should be passed this Session. He thought they might suspend the Order in this exceptional case. To do so would cast no reflection on the Office of the noble Earl.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he felt that the noble Earl had done his duty by calling attention to this matter. Unless the Order was maintained, there was very little chance of it meeting with any respect hereafter. These Orders were often a security against private rights being invaded by the action of Provisional Orders, and if the noble Earl went to a division he should support him. But, while saying that, he admitted that there was in this case some ground why they should take an indulgent view; and, as there was no opposition to the Bill, he would advise the noble Earl not to press his objection.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, he could not accept the advice which had been given him, because if he did it would go forth that their Orders were of no use. If this were a small case he would not press his objection. This Bill was ready on the 22nd of January; but the promoters had thought proper not to push the Bill forward. If the Motion were agreed to there would be an end of their Standing Orders.

LORD THURLOW desired to assure their Lordships that nothing had been done which was prejudicial to the dignity or the Office of the noble Chairman of Committees. There had been an unfortunate delay; but he might observe that two Bills analogous to the present were brought in last year in the month of August, and were passed into law.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, that the fact just mentioned showed that he was not unwilling in proper cases to have the Standing Orders suspended. The circumstances of last Session were very exceptional indeed. Everything was very late. As he believed it to be necessary that the Standing Orders should be obeyed, he should divide against the Motion.

On question? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 29; Not-Contents 31: Majority 2.

PATRIOTIC FUND BILL.

Commons Amendments considered (according to Order), and agreed to.

In reply to Viscount SIDMOUTH,

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK said, there was a sufficient fund at the disposal of the Commissioners, supplemented as it would be from other funds that were available, to render it unnecessary that an appeal should be made to the public for subscriptions for the widows and orphans of the sufferers by the loss of the Doterel, and he hoped that other similar cases would also be met in the same manner in future.

CEYLON — ECCLESIASTICAL SUBSIDIES.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, in rising to call the attention of the House to the correspondence relative to ecclesiastical subsidies in Ceylon; and to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies for explanations of his despatches of 19th November 1880, and 14th June, said, he desired to call their Lordships' attention to the Correspondence recently laid before Parliament on the ecclesiastical subsidies in Ceylon. This Correspondence referred to two subjects which were distinct—namely, the maintenance of the Bishop of Colombo and his clergy, and the maintenance of the Reformed Church at Wolfendahl. With regard to the Bishop, he should say nothing of the intrinsic merits of the Bishop of Colombo, because it would weaken the line of argument he was going to take, because he had better leave that to other noble Lords and to the right rev. Bench, and because he was bound to believe that the only grounds of action of the Secretary of State for the Colonies were those stated in paragraph No. 2 of his despatch of November 19 of last year—namely, the small number of persons supposed to be benefited out of the general taxation of Ceylon. For the Secretary of State this was, therefore, a question of population, and if the population of Ceylon were limited to the 250,000 Christians, of whom 190,000 were Roman Catholics, the inequality which had moved the Secretary of State would be great; but as there were 2,150,000 non-Christian inhabitants of the Island, other considerations must be taken into account.

According to the figures adopted by the Secretary of State's despatch, there were some 470,000 Hindoos in Ceylon. He proposed to eliminate these altogether from the discussion, because most of these were poor Coolies employed on the coffee plantations, and were, for the most part, only temporary sojourners in Ceylon, and were not affected by taxation. Those who belonged to the few Hindoo temples in Ceylon might be classed with the Buddhists. Now, the 1,500,000 Buddhists and the 180,000 Mussulmans of Ceylon would be equally dismayed and alarmed for the property held by themselves as religious communities when they found the Government disendowing its own religion; and there were indications in this Correspondence that the temple lands of the Buddhists were threatened with attack and spoliation, or with new taxation, which would have the same effect. As to the Mussulmans, it was to them but a very slight grievance, if it were a grievance at all, that some portion of the public money derived from general taxation should go to the maintenance of a representative of the religion of the State; but it would be a great grievance to them to be subjected to a State and a Government without any religion, such as the English Government would appear to be if the policy of these despatches were carried out. He could not conceive any greater humiliation for the Mussulmans than to be under a Government which had discarded religion and its ministers, and which hung out the colours of infidelity, or, as it was now called, agnosticism. In the meantime, this grievance was as nothing compared to that from which the Mussulmans of Ceylon were actually suffering. Though they were from 170,000 to 180,000 in number, and were the most intelligent, active, and wealthy of the Native communities, they still had no representative in the Legislative Council. He hoped that the regard for equality of the noble Earl would induce him to remedy this before long. So far he had spoken on general principles; but to come to particulars, the Mussulmans in Ceylon often spoke to him of the Bishop of Colombo, but they never said anything against him or his office; and, though this subject had probably been discussed in the local newspapers, it had not been alluded to in the letters he had received from that Island. He might say much the same as to the Buddhists; although it appeared to be inconsistent with their tenets, yet they were much attached to public worship, and would think ill of a Government which discouraged it. The most ancient mosque in Ceylon was originally built on temple land, which was leased by the Buddhist priests to the Mussulmans; and when they found that the building erected by them was dedicated to public worship the Buddhist priests refused to take the money reserved as rent for the land. The Governor of Ceylon, Sir James Longden, wrote to the Secretary of State to the effect that the ecclesiastical subsidies might be withdrawn in Ceylon because the circumstances were different from those in Trinidad, where he had opposed such a measure. He thought that the difference was, however, all against the policy of the noble Earl, for in Trinidad less scandal would be caused than in Ceylon, where the exemplary demeanour and learning of the Buddhist priests made it the more essential that a State professing to be Christian should not desert the field. If the Government persisted in the course laid down in these despatches, it would be more easy to believe that it was indifferent and hostile to religion than to believe the excuses on account of economy or of equality put forward in this Correspondence. He trusted that the noble Earl would reconsider his decision, even though he should reduce the stipend of the Bishop and reduce the number of the clergy who were now supported by the Government of Ceylon, and that he would not sever the connection between Church and State, and throw to the Bishop a freedom which he did not require, or, as the noble Earl's despatch worded it, "relieve him from all State interference." At the same time, in order to satisfy those feelings which were raised by consideration of the statistics of the population, some assistance might well be granted to the Portuguese, who, in general, were not as wealthy as the other classes of the Christians. It appeared from the Correspondence that the Dutch Reformed Church willingly joined the Church of England, and rallied to that Church in 1796, and had shown no signs of wishing to separate from it. As for the unofficial Members of the Legislative Council who had raised this question, and who, in a heathen and idolatrous country, had called upon the Government to withdraw its countenance and support from the established ministers of religion, the more fitting attitude for the Government towards them would be that which was adopted by His Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople some 200 years ago, who, when the Quaker persisted in keeping on his hat before him, said the Turks were right, and that the man must be mad. The Government of Ceylon might get over the difficulty caused by the steps taken and related in this Correspondence by making grants of some of the land still at the disposal of the Government to the different Churches. The case of the Church of Wolfendahl, belonging to the Reformed Dutch Church of Colombo, stood upon a different ground. The decision of the Secretary of State, in his despatch of June 14, was open to all the objections which might be made to his decision against the Bishop of Colombo; but, besides that, it was a distinct violation of the engagements of the British Government at the time of the capitulation of the Dutch in 1796. It appeared to be only a quibble to endeavour to evade that engagement by saying that the Dutch clergy voluntarily left Ceylon in 1806. The Dutch settlers did not leave, and were now there, and were known as Burghers. They required and had a claim to the stipends stipulated for their clergy in 1796, and it made no difference to them whether the original clergy left voluntarily or had all died of an epidemic. Least of any could our Government afford to disregard and break its Treaty engagements; and, even if the Secretary of State attached any value to this quibble of the Law Officers, the matter in dispute was too trifling to make it advisable to risk the opposite view which was taken by the Dutch Burghers. This was not the only Colony in which Treaty obligations had been set aside and disregarded and hostile comment provoked on the part of the former countrymen of the Colonists whose rights had been set aside.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, it was important that they should know whether the disendowment referred to by the noble Lord had been effected, and, if it had not, whether there was time for consideration. It could hardly be considered as actually done; because, so far as he knew, there was a Legislative Body in Ceylon, and the only record they had of the opinion of that body was to the effect that it ought not to be done. The Secretary of State, in his despatches, seemed to contemplate that the thing would be done. He presumed it would be done by votes, in obedience to orders from head-quarters. The objections raised to the proposal were, first, that it was a violation of Treaty obligations; and, secondly, that it was inexpedient in itself. As to its being in violation of Treaty obligations, that, at all events, was a very important matter, and it had, probably, been considered by the Law Officers of the Crown. There was a Proclamation following the Treaty, which, to uninstructed persons, seemed to be an acknowledgment of the obligation of maintaining the Christian religion on the part of the Government which succeeded the occupation of the Dutch. At the time of the cession of Ceylon by the Dutch there were two great religions in the Island—one the original Buddhist religion, professed by the great majority of the inhabitants, the other the Christian religion, professed by a large body. At that time the Government issued a Proclamation, stating that both those religions should retain the rights ceded to them by the Dutch Government. But it was said that instead of one body of Christians in the Island there were now several; and, no doubt, there was a temptation to apply to Ceylon the principles which had been applied in other places where there were different Christian denominations. But when they considered the Papers they would find that not even all the congregations of the Church of England were subsidized. Some successors of the old Dutch congregations continued to receive those stipends, and they were under the Bishop of Ceylon, although they were, by descent, the representatives of the old Dutch Presbyterian congregations. Many of their ministers were actually persons whose ancestors were of those Dutch Christians, or belonged to the Native Churches which grew up under Dutch protection. Now, the question was raised—Why give the subsidy to the Church of England and not to the other bodies? It was a sufficient answer to this to say there was a large heathen population, consisting also of various bodies. The most important was the Buddhist, which received this subsidy; but there were other heathen denominations existing throughout the country who received no subsidy. To those who said that the Buddhist body should be disendowed as well as the Christians the answer was plain—if you promised a sum of money to one person it was no reason he should not get it because other persons to whom you made no such promise got none. The noble Lord said that the Buddhists were not endowed; but they were secured by the Government one-third of the landed property of the whole country. Not only so; but in the cultivation of this land they were secured from taxes which fell on all the other inhabitants of the Island. That, of course, increased the incidence of taxation on the other inhabitants; and, therefore, the Buddhists were practically endowed with a large sum of money. If they endeavoured to disendow the Buddhist body they would lose possession of the Island, because one-third of the land was in their possession, and they constituted an overwhelming majority of the population. Consequently, it would be dangerous to tamper with the rights secured to them by Treaty. Now, he was surprised that some of those who were so eager against endowments of all kinds should be discontented with endowing their Christian brethren in Ceylon, while they were bound to maintain so very large an endowment of a heathen religion. The case of Jamaica was not analogous to the present, because in Jamaica no heathen religion received large amounts of public money. It would, besides, be highly undesirable to show in Ceylon our readiness to shake off all recognition of the Christian religion on the part of the State, especially as the Proclamation at the cession of the Island made such loud declarations that the Christian religion, which the Dutch had left in a flourishing condition, was to be maintained by the Government that succeeded them. The course pursued in a good many instances by the Colonial Office lately, of disestablishing and disendowing Churches, was one which, to say the least, required to be taken with caution. It was now proposed to sweep away the corporation sole created by Letters Patent in the Bishopric of Colombo. This experiment ought, in his judgment, to be made with great caution. It was in the power of the Crown to create corporations; but it was not quite clear that the Crown could by its own act supersede them. The gravest complications as to property had been introduced in various Colonies by the off-hand way in which the Colonial Office had dealt with these matters. A serious law-suit had recently arisen with reference to property at Grahamstown, in the Cape Colony; and a very important question would have to be decided before long by the Privy Council as to whether the corporation of the Bishopric of Grahamstown was still in existence, although the Crown had, for the time, failed to appoint anyone to occupy the corporation. The result at present was complete confusion as to all property connected with this matter. So in Ceylon the same difficulties might arise which had occurred in other Colonies, where the seeds of many law-suits had been sown by the way in which this matter had been dealt with. Therefore, although he did not expect the noble Earl to alter his views on the subject, he hoped he would not fail to give full consideration to the difficulties that might arise from the course he was about to adopt.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he was not prepared to admit, in the slightest degree, that the action of the Colonial Office, either in that or the other matters referred to, had been either rash or hasty. The decision affecting the Cape Bishopric to which the most rev. Prelate referred took place many years ago, before he was in the Office which he now had the honour to hold; and the effect of it, as far as he remembered, was that the Letters Patent could not be legally maintained. He could not admit the truth of the allegation that the action of the Colonial Office had sown the seeds of many legal disputes in regard to ecclesiastical matters in the Colonies. The Colonial Office had, in all these instances, advised that a statute should be passed in each Colony to enable the disendowed Churches to transact their work and to hold property. He agreed, indeed, with the most rev. Prelate that it would be a great hardship and a scandal to the Church if measures were not taken to enable the Church to administer its affairs in a satisfactory manner. With regard to the particular question now before the House, he must point out that the most rev. Prelate had spoken of the Buddhist endowment as if it were the same thing as the endowment which was about to be done away with. The Buddhists in Ceylon had possessed, from very ancient times, large tracts of land, which were known as temple lands, while the very small endowment which was now given to the Anglican and the Presbyterian Churches came directly out of the taxation of the Island, and was paid by the Government. With regard to any lands which the Church possessed, it was distinctly provided in a despatch, which he wrote on the subject, that there was to be no interference.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY inquired whether such lands were free from taxation?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he did not know; but he did not think that because they were bound by Treaty to respect the privileges of the Buddhists, therefore they were bound, for all time, to extend the same privileges to other religions. This was a question, not of Christianity, but of a variety of Christian denominations. There were in Ceylon large numbers of Buddhists, Mahomedans, and Hindoos, a considerable number of Roman Catholics, and a handful of Anglicans and Presbyterians. They endowed this handful of Anglicans and Presbyterians; but they totally disregarded the claims of the Roman Catholics, Mahomedans, and Hindoos. Such an injustice could not possibly be defended. When he held Office before this question came up for consideration, and some persons at that time desired that a change should be made; but nothing was done, because it did not appear that there was any feeling in Ceylon in favour of the change. Since then, however, a strong feeling had been expressed by a considerable number of persons in Ceylon that these endowments should be put an end to. Therefore, he thought, the time had come when the change might be made, not rashly, but after the consideration of many years. There were nearly 250,000 Christians in Ceylon. Of these, 190,000 were Roman Catholics, and 45,000 belonged to unassisted Protestant denominations, leaving only 15,000 Anglicans and Presbyterians, who received a State contribution of £10,000 a-year. If the endowment of the latter was continued, could it possibly be maintained that the Roman Catholics ought to receive nothing? If there were Treaty obligations requiring them to keep up this endowment, he should have considered that they were absolutely bound either to continue it or to give a sum of money by way of compensation. But he thought the most rev. Prelate could not have referred to the actual words of the Treaty, which said—

“The clergy shall continue in their functions and receive the same pay and emoluments as they have from the Dutch.”

The only question which could arise was whether the present Dutch Church in Ceylon was entitled under the Treaty to continue to receive some stipend? As there might be a legal doubt on this point, he referred it to the Law Officers, who gave it as their distinct opinion that the Treaty did not apply, for shortly after its conclusion the whole of the Dutch clergy left, and the payment made to them came to an end, and the present payment could not be held to be made under the Treaty. The Bishop of Colombo had urged upon him the necessity of giving sufficient time to the Church in Ceylon to make arrangements, and a period of five years had accordingly been granted for the purpose. He might observe that the Bishop said he was not prepared to advance on behalf of the Church of England in Ceylon, as a whole, any claim for a continuance of the State assistance, and he added—

“I am not aware that as a Church we have any right to it, nor am I sure that its permanent continuance would be to our ultimate advantage.”

This was not merely a question of the disendowment of a Church. It was a question of justice to the various inhabitants of the Island. To give a concurrent endowment to all these religious communions would be out of the question for various reasons, and, amongst others, that it would impose a burden on the revenues of the Colony which they could not bear. The strongest possible case had been made out for putting an end to this small endowment, which was not at all necessary for the maintenance of the Church in Ceylon; and he could not hold out any hope that the policy on which Her Majesty's Government had determined in respect to this matter would be departed from.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON desired to know whether all the details of the proposed arrangement had been settled, or whether there was still room to modify them? He trusted care would be taken to prevent legal complications in regard to Church property if disestablishment took place. He also trusted that his noble Friend would make the transition as gradual and as easy as possible.

TUNIS.—RESOLUTION.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN, in rising to call attention to the present state of affairs in Tunis; and to move—

“That, in the opinion of this House, any interference with the integrity of the Ottoman Empire in North Africa is likely to prove dangerous to the peace of Europe,” said, that on the last occasion this subject was before the House the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs remarked that, in view of the complicated state of things then existing, it would be the duty of the Government to take the best advice they could get and to give a full and frank explanation to Parliament. Since then Papers had been presented relating to both Tunis and Tripoli, and, judging from the public Press, matters had become somewhat less complicated than they were; but the information contained in the Papers was somewhat meagre, and matters were still so far complicated that he thought that the full explanation which the noble Earl suggested would be welcomed by the House and the country. The first thing that would strike anyone on reading the Papers would probably be that there was no mention made of the Enfida case. It was not necessary for him to go into the details of this dispute. The facts were that a French Company negotiated with Khereddin Pasha for the purchase of a large estate in land. As there existed in Tunis, as in other Mahomedan countries, a right of pre-emption on the part of neighbouring proprietors in the case of a sale of landed property, the precaution was taken of leaving a strip all round the Enfida estate in the hands of Khereddin

Pasha, so as to exclude the possibility of the right of pre-emption being exercised. But, as it turned out, this precaution was unavailing, as a Mr. Levy possessed some portions of property in the centre of the Enfida estate. He was consequently able to exercise his right of pre-emption, and did so. It was suggested that the matter should be referred to arbitration; but Her Majesty's Government very properly decided that it ought to be settled in the Local Courts, and, in order that the Courts should exercise unbiased judgment, two British ships of war were sent to Tunis. Mr. Levy brought his claim forward in the Hanefi Court, the Court to which such matters were always referred, and an order was given putting Mr. Levy in possession. Afterwards, at the instance of the French Minister Resident, the case was taken out of the jurisdiction of the Hanefi Court, and referred to the Maliki Court, which did not take cognizance of cases of that kind. He had seen it stated that this Court had decided against Mr. Levy. How far that was true or not he did not know. He had seen it also stated that the British Consular Judge had been ordered back to Tunis to report as to whether our Treaty rights were interfered with by the transference of Mr. Levy's claim from the Hanefi to the Maliki Court. Whether, theoretically, our Treaty rights were broken was a matter which he could not judge; but he should imagine that there could be no doubt that, practically speaking, they had been broken. If the matter had been left to the free and unbiased action of the Bey's Court there could be no question that Mr. Levy would be put in possession of the estate; but if, owing to the preponderating influence of some other Power, the case was taken out of the proper Court and referred to another tribunal and decided against Mr. Levy, there could surely be no doubt that an infringement of our Treaty rights had taken place. Another important omission was that instructions from the Government to our Consul General at Tunis were not, he imagined, given in full. Mr. Reade had instructions to accept the new order of things in so far as it did not violate our Treaty rights. The noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was very properly most particular that our Treaty rights should not be infringed, and

France, very properly, undertook to say that they should not be infringed; but, as a matter of fact, it appeared to him impossible that they could be maintained in the spirit. One of the principal stipulations in our Treaties was that the Representative of Great Britain should be treated with the same honours in every way as were accorded to the Representative of any other nation; but as very special honours and privileges were accorded to the Representative of France, there could be no question that at that time our Treaties were broken. The noble Earl pointed out the difficulties arising from the double functions exercised by the French Minister Resident at Tunis, and France had so far recognized these difficulties that she had appointed a subordinate of M. Roustan's to the post of Consul. But the difficulty was not really solved by this. Another point of importance was the right of access which our Representative had to the Bey, and the right of British subjects to have matters in dispute decided by the Consul in concurrence with the Bey or his delegate. The delegate must, of course, mean a Tunisian delegate; and if the Bey's delegate was the Representative of another Power, the spirit of the Treaty was broken in that case. The Papers presented contained the statement made through the Havas Agency to the effect that there was nothing in the French Treaty to preclude the Representatives of Foreign Powers from claiming audience of the Bey whenever he thought right to accord it. That might be very true; but the Treaty contained a provision giving us a right of access to the Bey. It might be said that we could not have compelled the Bey at any time to have accorded an audience to our Representative; but, in the event of his not doing so, we should have had our remedy in remonstrances with the Bey. It was useless to suppose that we had that remedy now, seeing it was absurd to suppose that the Bey was any longer a free agent in the matter. The general tenour and object of our Treaties was that British subjects should enjoy equal privileges in the way of acquiring lands, investing money, and carrying on all the affairs of life with the subjects of any other Power; and it was obvious that if any other Power obtained a preponderating influence over the Bey and over the Local Courts, the whole spirit of the Treaty was, practically speaking, broken. Our Commercial Treaties also must not be lost sight of. Our Commercial Treaties with Tunis were very favourable to us. They would be open to revision next year; and although it was stipulated that they could not be altered without the consent of both parties, it was probable that, in view of the commercial relations between France and England, there might be more difficulty in renewing them on equally favourable terms to us, under present circumstances, than if we had to deal with the Bey uninfluenced by France. The real difficulty was that there was no real authority in Tunis. The Sultan claimed supreme authority; but his claims had been disallowed. The authority of the Bey had been, practically, superseded, and yet in theory it remained unchanged. The foreign affairs of the country were, to all intents and purposes, in the hands of the French Minister Resident, who thereby became the Suzerain of Tunis. And yet he was not the Foreign Minister of the Bey, for the Tunisian Minister of Foreign Affairs retained his position, but was subject to the control of the French Minister Resident. It was difficult to see what was the position of British subjects in reference to Tunisian subjects in Tunis, or Egypt, or Malta, or in this country. Would disputes in which Tunisians were implicated be decided by the French Ambassador or Consul General or by the Consul General and Ambassador of Turkey; and would a British subject, having a dispute with a Tunisian subject—say in Egypt—be dealt with by the British Consul and the Courts of the Viceroy, or by the British and French Consular Courts? A kind of government within a government, where nobody appeared to be responsible, existed in Tunis, which might lead to endless difficulties. For instance, to whom were British subjects to apply for redress who had lost property during the bombardment of Sfax? Was application to be made to the Bey, who was supposed to be responsible for the government, but was certainly not responsible for the bombardment; or to France, who was responsible for the bombardment, and who was not supposed to be responsible for the government of Tunis? If a country was conquered, and the conqueror accepted the Treaty obligations of the conquered, the other parties to those Treaties had no cause to complain. They could hold the new Government responsible for the observance of their Treaties. But if one nation exercised complete control over the affairs of another nation, but without definitely taking and exercising the functions of a Government, it was difficult to see how other people could guard their interests. To whom were they to appeal? Who was responsible? The one nation was not responsible for the government of the country theoretically, neither was the other responsible practically, seeing that it had ceased to retain real freedom of action. Our Treaties were designed for the protection of British subjects at a Court irresponsible and independent as far as European influence was concerned. Tunis could not any longer be looked upon in that light; and though the letter of our Treaties might remain intact, it would be strange if the spirit of them was not broken. A state of things existed which might lead to difficulties at any time; and, as anything that could imperil in the slightest degree the friendship existing between this country and France would be greatly to be deplored, the present state of affairs was most unsatisfactory, and it would be a relief to know that there was a probability of this anomalous condition of affairs being brought to a close. So much for the manner in which our Treaty rights were jeopardized. He did not intend to dilate upon the possible dangers to our trade. He called the attention of the House on a former occasion to the magnitude of our Indian and Colonial trade that passed through the Malta Channel; and it could not be denied that our feeling as regarded the security of that trade must be modified if an important naval position commanding the Malta Channel passed out of the hands of one of the Barbary States into those of a great Naval Power. We had great interests involved in that part of the globe, as had also other nations, Spain and Italy especially, and anything imperilling the interests of those countries could not but be dangerous to the good feeling existing among nations. The greatest danger, however, appeared to arise from the effect upon the feelings and sentiments of Turkey which might be produced by the annexation or occupation of any portion of her dominions in Africa. Turkey was very hardly dealt with. Her territories were constantly circumscribed and guaranteed, and then circumscribed and guaranteed again. But if every guarantee was speedily followed by some fresh infringement of her territory, it was not likely that Turkey would have much confidence in guarantees. He presumed that some continuity existed in Treaties, and that the Treaty of Berlin ratified the Treaty of Paris, and that again ratified former Treaties affecting Turkey. He did not think that Tunis was mentioned in the Treaty of London of 1841; but it happened that it was particularly mentioned during the Conference at Vienna which preceded the Treaty of Paris of 1856. It was probable that Tunis was especially before the eyes of Europe at that moment as having contributed a contingent of 25,000 men to the forces of the Sultan engaged in the Crimean War. Russia was, very naturally, somewhat reluctant to give a specific detailed guarantee as regarded all portions of the Ottoman Empire, though willing to give a general guarantee; and Prince Gortchakoff stated as one of his reasons that, if any detailed guarantee were given, such a thing as an invasion of Tunis would have to be considered a casus belli. France, however, saw no difficulty in giving detailed guarantees; and M. Drouyn de Lhuys stated that he would willingly give, not only a general guarantee, but a detailed guarantee, and added that he saw no difficulty in extending it to the Regency of Tunis. According to the 13th Protocol of the Conference of Vienna there could be little doubt that the Regency of Tunis was considered to be included within the general guarantee given by the Great Powers to Turkey by the Treaty of 1856, and we could not be surprised if Turkey considered that an infringement of her Treaty rights had taken place. Turkey, as was usual, had been put in an impossible position. She was told that if hostilities broke out among the Arab tribes on the Frontier of Tripoli, she would be held responsible if she could not put them down; and she was told also that if she sent troops to Tripoli, and hostilities broke out among the Arabs, she would be responsible for having fomented them. If she did not send troops and difficulties arose, she would be told, as was told to the Bey of Tunis, that she was unable to control the Arabs. Any interference with the Sultan's dominions in that quarter of the globe was greatly to be deplored, as being likely to upset the balance of power in the Mediterranean, and to unsettle that settlement of the Eastern Question which Her Majesty's Government had laboured so hard and so successfully, in some respects, to bring about. Turkey gave way to the wishes of the European Concert and allowed a settlement to be made. But if the settlement so arrived at in deference to the wishes of the concert was to be followed immediately by some fresh interference, we could not expect Turkey to look upon the concert as anything but a somewhat one-sided affair. If the concert of the Powers were only possible when there was a question of dividing some portion of the Ottoman Empire, and if it resolved itself into its primitive elements the moment there was a question of preserving what was left of the Ottoman Empire, the Sultan was not likely to look with great respect upon the European Concert and the concert failed in its objects. How could we, or any other of the European Powers, expect Turkey to fulfil her obligations, financial or otherwise, if we did not fulfil our obligations to her? How could we press upon her to undertake reforms and carry out the promises which she made, if we on our part did not carry out the promises which we made to her? It was not unreasonable to look with some degree of anxiety upon what might result from the French occupation of Tunis. A fire was burning in the midst of most inflammable materials, and all those who had property in the neighbourhood naturally felt anxious. There were two ways in which a fire could be treated. It could either be dealt with at the commencement, or it could be confined within limits. The first policy, if practicable, was the best. There could be no objection, on the part of this or any other country, to France taking the necessary measures for the protection of her Algerian Dominions; but it was possible that if the grave consequences which might ensue from the occupation of Tunis had been pointed out to her, she would have been able to do all that was necessary without going so far as she had. It would be a most lamentable thing if anything occurred to endanger the friendship existing between England.

and France; and he did not suppose that France would wish to do anything that could weaken that friendship; but the danger was that in embarking on a certain course she might find it very difficult to check herself. He must confess that French statesmen appeared to have but vague apprehension of the danger to which the state of things in Africa exposed them and others. The noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs pointed out the difficulties that might arise on account of the pretensions of French Consuls in Tripoli and Egypt to exercise protection over Tunisian subjects. M. Barthélemy St. Hilaire merely promised to examine into the question and to make a communication about it. Whether that communication had been received he did not know; but anyone would have supposed that such a simple matter required very little examination, and needed only a distinct disavowal. M. St. Hilaire had spoken very plainly concerning Tripoli. He stated to Lord Lyons that the French Government had no intention whatever either of invading it or of attempting to establish any exclusive or predominant influence in it. But it must be remembered that he and other French statesmen had been equally distinct and clear in disavowing any intention of annexation or of an occupation of Tunis other than one of "an essentially provisional character," and in stating that the only object of French interference was the guarding of her Algerian Frontier, and protecting her interests in Algeria. But as yet we saw no sign of the provisional nature of the occupation. On the contrary, France appeared to be consolidating her occupation, and was even appointing Governors over various portions of the country. He did not suppose that France had any designs towards Tripoli; but the danger was that in occupying the position she now held she might find herself irresistibly dragged into a still more complicated position. The noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs also spoke very distinctly as regarded Tripoli; but he was equally clear as regarded Tunis. In fact, it was difficult to understand what difference this country could recognize between the two Provinces. The noble Earl stated that Tripoli formed an integral portion of the Ottoman Empire, and that Her Majesty's Government looked upon Tunis as forming part of the Ottoman Empire. The only difference that he could see was that the Governor of Tunis was called a "Bey," and the Governor of Tripoli was called a "Dey." He was tempted to remark that—

" 'Tis strange there should such difference be, 'Twixt letter B and letter D."

But it seemed that in the difference between the letters "B" and "D" there was some inscrutable reason which caused Her Majesty's Government and the other Powers to look upon Tripoli in a different light to that in which they viewed Tunis. It would be very interesting to know what was the opinion of the other Great Powers on this point, particularly on account of what the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs said on a former occasion in that House. He then stated that, although we held that Tunis formed part of the Ottoman Empire, and although Austria and Germany held the same view, he had reason to know that they would not have assisted us in carrying our views into effect. It was important, therefore, to know what Austria and Germany, for instance, thought about Tripoli, because if our carrying out our obligations and views depended upon the assistance we received from other Powers, it was obvious that the assurances of the noble Earl concerning Tripoli were not of great value unless read alongside of the opinions of the other Powers on the subject. For the reasons he had given, it appeared to him that there was scarcely any portion of the world where more sensitive interests of many nations were at stake than in those portions of the Ottoman Empire which bordered on the Mediterranean. There was no spot on the globe where a small spark was more likely to bring forth a serious conflagration. Under those circumstances, it was not unnatural that we should feel somewhat uneasy that Parliament should separate without the full explanation that was promised by the noble Earl.

Moved to resolve,

"That, in the opinion of this House, any interference with the integrity of the Ottoman Empire in North Africa is likely to prove dangerous to the peace of Europe."—(The Earl of Dunraven.)

LORD LAMINGTON said, that, with all deference to the noble Earl who had just sat down, he thought that the subject of Tunis and the position of the Ottoman Empire in respect of it had been brought recently much too frequently before their Lordships. He confessed that having read the recent despatches laid upon the Table he did not think that France had any design whatever to interfere with the integrity of the Ottoman Empire, and that the assurances given to them by eminent French statesmen ought to satisfy them on that subject. For his part, he had gathered the opinion he had expressed from the despatches before their Lordships and from the speeches delivered by M. St. Hilaire, M. Gambetta, and other distinguished French statesmen. They ought to take the assurances of Foreign Powers as they were given, until by some overt act they had reason to believe that they had said what they did not mean.

EARL GRANVILLE: I desire to say a few words to your Lordships in respect of the speech of my noble Friend behind me; and, in the first place, I have to express my regret that entirely owing, not to my fault, but to circumstances with which your Lordships are acquainted, my noble Friend was obliged on several occasions to postpone his Motion. I have listened very attentively to what my noble Friend has said. Some of us, my Lords, in this House and out of it, are sometimes not able to express our ideas very clearly; but I know no one who is able to express his views with more clearness than is my noble Friend. The only thing which I failed to catch was the drift—the practical result which he desired by his speech to obtain. Certainly the noble Earl does not wish to censure Her Majesty's Government, towards whom he seemed to entertain a friendly feeling throughout the speech. He made but one complaint, to which I will allude immediately. He put the question whether the Government can assure the House that a state of things which he described as anomalous would soon be brought to an end. I hardly know what that question means. Does it mean that he expects the French Government to give up the Treaty with the Bey and withdraw from their position, which undoubtedly is one that enables them to exercise great influence in Tunis? That is a question that he can hardly expect a reply to. The noble

Earl complains that the Correspondence does not give sufficient details of the Enfida case, in which he takes great interest. The fact is, the Papers give all the information we have to give. The noble Earl had been informed that it was decided to refer the case to arbitration, and that two vessels of war were sent to watch that arbitration; but that is an entire misapprehension. At the beginning, when we were hardly informed of the circumstances of the case, and when it appeared that the French were going to increase their Naval Force, we thought that, unintentionally, such an increase might produce an unfair pressure upon that particular case, and we thought it our duty, also, to send a man-of-war also to be present, and which left at the time the increase to the French Force was taken away. In a case of this sort we thought it our duty to take legal advice as to every piece of information; we consulted the highest legal authority, who has taken great interest in the matter; and the fact is that up to this moment we have been positively advised that we had no ground of interference as a Government in this matter. I do not say that circumstances might not arise which might make it our duty to interfere; but up to this time, as we have been advised, we have not been in a position to interfere at all. The noble Earl alluded to a fact that shows the anxiety of the French Government to meet our wishes. The position of M. Roustan as Consul created a considerable technical difficulty with regard to the equality of our Consul; the French Government promised to pay attention to our representation; and the result is that they have appointed another gentleman as Consul at Tunis. Whether the fact is one of great importance or not, it is one that shows the sort of feeling in which the two countries ought to act together in this matter. The noble Earl speaks of difficulties which may arise in the present state of things. I cannot deny that such difficulties may arise; but up to this moment they have not arisen. As to the question whether our Treaty rights have been broken in any way, I have already stated, in answer to the noble Earl, that we have no Treaty rights as regards access to the Bey, and I adhere to that statement. We have no Treaty rights; but we have had the practice of access to the Bey, and I am not aware that it has been diminished by what has occurred. I added, what is obvious, that the importance of access to the Bey is probably much diminished by the present state of things. As regards Treaty stipulations on this point, they do not exist; as regards practice, we are not in the least prohibited from the access to the Bey we have previously enjoyed. The noble Earl could see no difference between the position of Tunis and that of Tripoli; but there are great differences. In one the authority of the Sultan is purely of a nominal character; in the other there has been active interference in many ways. Indeed, in Tunis the French and the Italians deny the suzerainty of the Porte; but as to Tripoli, all the Powers are united in admitting that it is a portion of the Ottoman Empire. I am sure, from what he said, that the noble Earl approves our policy. We have adopted the Treaty of Berlin; we have endeavoured, and we shall endeavour, to remove any difficulty in the way of fulfilling the conditions of that Treaty. We believe that if all the conditions of the Treaty of Berlin are carried out there is no reason whatever why the Sultan should not maintain his authority in Turkey, and we desire that he should do so. As to Tripoli, all we have done, and it was clearly our duty, is this—in the most friendly, and, I flatter myself, the most courteous manner, we gave our opinion with absolute frankness to France, and France has returned assurances of a most definite character. The noble Earl has intimated that there may be some doubt about those assurances; but I cannot think it is desirable that in this House we should question the perfectly definite and clear assurances given by the Governments of great and friendly Powers. For one, I certainly wish to rely on those assurances. I quite admit that in international affairs those who are charged with the conduct of the foreign relations of a country must not take everything for granted, but must keep their eyes open, and must be prepared, when occasion arises, to act in the manner required by the interests of their country. With regard to our position, I really do not think I have any information to give with regard either to Tunis or Tripoli beyond what is to be found in the Papers presented to this House, and I must return my thanks to the noble Lord opposite (Lord Lamington) for having spoken of them as so very satisfactory.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL: My Lords, at this time of the Session and this hour of the evening it is not easy to command the favour of the House on a great subject. If I desired to express at all completely the ideas which have occurred to me during the course of the transaction, or during the long interval in which the Notice was delayed, I ought to look to other channels for producing them. But as I fully share the view of my noble Friend who brought the Motion forward, as the two speeches we have heard have both of them been adverse to it, and as I am led to think he counts on my support, I feel bound, however brief and hurried it may be, if possible, to give it. The noble Lord who followed him indulged in some extraordinary criticism. He complained that the subject was too frequently adverted to. Since the end of June it has never been adverted to at all, although its phases have been multiplying. Before that time, all the Notices on Tunis came from his side of the House. The question has never until to-day been introduced upon these Benches. What is more material, the House has never until to-day had any opportunity to pronounce a judgment on the character of the transaction. The noble Lord has laid down as a maxim that the assurances of foreign Governments should be accepted as substantial. It may be satisfactory that such a maxim should proceed from any quarter to which foreign policy has been a theme of meditation or discussion. But the noble Lord does not go so far as to contend that assurances may be relied on when they are shown to be illusory. Can he maintain that the assurances of the French Government have been performed? The whole series of events involves a constant violation of them. I listened with much attention to the speech of the noble Earl the Secretary of State, but could not ascertain from it a single ground on which the present Motion is objected to. It is not a Motion to reflect on the proceedings of the Government, which I may, therefore, now pass over. It is a Motion to affirm that interference with Ottoman dominion in North Africa tends to endanger the peace of Europe. In that sense alone would I discuss it.

There is one part of the subject which tends, perhaps, more rapidly than any other to the conclusion my noble Friend has recommended to us. The French Government maintain—to justify their violence—that Tunis is not incorporated in the Ottoman Empire. In that manner they admit that if Tunis is incorporated in the Ottoman Empire they have been led into considerable errors. But, according to the Foreign Office, and the noble Earl presiding in it, there is no doubt at all upon the subject. The French Government is thus condemned and reprimanded by the British Government in spite of all its friendly language and ingenious connivance. But the British Government is condemned by itself, since, if Tunis is a portion of the Ottoman Empire, Great Britain was bound either to insure its safety or to protest against its violation. The position of the British Government is, therefore, fatally untenable. They shelter the accused, while they reject the plea on which alone he can defend himself. The French Government can only vindicate itself by a successful reference to history and to Treaties. But no such reference suffices. The connection of Tunis and the Ottoman Empire has had so many illustrations that it is really difficult to choose out of the number which to bring before your Lordships. My noble Friend has mentioned one I never heard before, and which appears to me conclusive—namely, that, in a Conference which happened at Vienna, before the negotiations and the Treaties of 1856, France acknowledged, in a formal way, the dependency of Tunis on the Sultan. It is worth while to add a circumstance which shows that during the whole Crimean War she systematically recognized it. During the Crimean War Tunis was contributing a military force to the united Armies which upheld the Ottoman Empire against Russia. She was either a fifth Ally, in the same rank with the Sublime Porte, with France, Great Britain, and Sardinia, or else a Vassal of the former. She was not a fifth Ally of the co-operating Powers, or history would have mentioned it. She therefore acted—and France considered her to act—on the obligation of a Vassal sending a contingent to the Suzerain. Where is the reply? But did Tunis, after the Crimean War, become divested of the status which then undoubtedly belonged to her? So late as 1863, M. Drouyn de Lhuys, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, when it was attempted to negotiate a Tunisian loan at Paris, pointed out that the authority of the Sultan ought to be invoked to give it the validity it wanted. Since 1863 has Tunis ceased to be dependent? To support the argument is useless; but M. Rousseau, the French Consul, and author of the Annales Tunisiennes, would give voluminous materials for doing so. When the French and British Governments have both been led into a position they are not able to defend their influence is lowered; and when their influence is lowered the peace of Europe is less secure than otherwise it would be.

My Lords, the Motion gains new support by remarking what might have been done, and what has been omitted, as to Italy. It is allowed that the Italian Government were anxious, and in some degree impatient, to combine with us in such precautionary measures as might have guarded Tunis against the fate which has befallen it. Italy, since 1870, when her unity became complete, has been a great, a splendid, and an unappropriated element to tempt the labour of diplomacy. She has resided in the air without a bias or direction, except so far as Germany in some degree controlled her. At length, the opportunity to draw her strongly to the objects of Great Britain, which are not alien to her own, was forced upon the Government. It was abandoned for no purpose. To defend the latter phrase it is essential for a moment to advert to a prevailing fallacy, which is not less unfounded than prevailing, and which, indeed, appears to underlie the whole course the Government have followed as to Tunis. There is a general assumption that France is an Ally to be on that account conciliated or condoned in any deviation she adopts, until it reaches great or insupportable extremity. No doubt, in disposition and in feeling, since the War of 1870 the relations of France and Great Britain have maintained—down to the present year—their former cordiality. But alliance, in the sense of common action, perished with the Empire. It perished as the flag descended from the Tuilleries at half-past 3 o'clock on the memorable 4th of September—an incident which cannot be forgotten by those who happened to observe it. From that time France has had but two pre-occupations—externally, at least—first, to withstand calamities which multiplied around her, then to recover the position she held in Europe before the war with Germany affected it. She has not been able or disposed to share the line, and to pursue the objects of Great Britain as she used to do. She has not been able or disposed to venture upon any course by which Russia would be alienated. So deeply was the situation felt in 1871, that at the Black Sea Conference of London, under the auspices of the noble Earl the Secretary of State, it was not thought worth while to wait for her Ambassador before commencing the proceedings. However, that is but an isolated proof which leads to others more convincing. When the Eastern Question re-appeared in 1874, over a series of transactions in which her aid would have been precious and her countenance important—the alliance of the three Emperors; the Herzegovinian, Servian, and Bulgarian rebellions; the war which they produced, the negotiations which preceded it—the voice of France, which so powerfully operated in 1853, was altogether wanting. Even at the Congress of Berlin—except as regards Greece—you cannot urge that France had any telling weight in the direction it adopted. The French alliance, therefore, we had lost by no fault on either side, but by events which violently drew one Power into a different set of calculations and of thoughts from that which used to bind the two to one another. Until the reclamation of Alsace and Lorraine has been achieved, or else until it is despaired of, the greatest minds and soundest combinations will not restore a French alliance which is more than negative and formal. Since France is unattainable, whatever language she may hold, whatever Rulers may direct her, you have to look to other Western Powers as a substitute. The affair of Tunis, although sinister in itself, presented such a chance of gaining Italy as had never before occurred, and is not likely to come back again. But we have failed to grasp what might have been a substance in order to retain —at no little cost of dignity—what must, until another epoch has been opened, continue to be nothing but a shadow. Italy is not only unattached and undecided in her policy, but embittered against France and discontented with Great Britain. The peace of Europe becomes endangered by her attitude.

If we examine the question still more closely, it seems to me that such interference with the Ottoman Empire in North Africa tends to European war under two categories. It tends, in the first instance, to re-establish an antagonism between France and Great Britain, which we had hoped that many centuries of strife had finished and exhausted. The division is produced when Tunis is encroached upon; becomes more grave when Tripoli is compromised; should Egypt be involved, is certain to be more thoroughly accentuated. In Egypt elements of variance between France and Great Britain are abundant; if only because one Power designed the Canal the other has the greater interest in using and preserving it. Whatever nourishes a French ascendancy in Egypt must embitter the relations of the countries. The comparative tranquillity of France has been purchased by struggles and by sacrifices which elude the grasp of the historian—of which no picture can be adequate. It cannot be denied that Her Majesty's Government have helped her to resume the demon of aggression and rapacity against which William III. first led us to protest, and which the Duke of Wellington was thought at last to have exorcised. But it is not only by reviving discord between the leading Western Powers that the risk of European war has been promoted. We ought to bear in mind the consequences of that discord. As soon as it is felt, an irresistible temptation to revive the troubles of the Eastern Question is administered. Greece observes the moment for reclaiming the Frontier which a recent Conference imprudently propounded. Russia is invited to cross the Pruth again, if only to adjust the difficulties of Bulgaria. Germany and Austria can hardly look on such a movement with indifference. But, disregarding these contingencies, it cannot be assumed that the Ottoman Empire will always be disposed to leave invasion unresisted. The experience of 1877 forbids such an assumption.

But it is not enough to show that any Motion is correct, unless it is seen, at the same time, that it would be productive of advantage to adopt it. In France there is a considerable party opposed to the aggression upon Tunis, which has found organs in the Duc de Broglie and M. Clemenceau—great names abroad, of which the first, at least, is known in this country. They seem to represent extremes of opposite opinion, although concurring on this subject. The debate in the Chamber of Deputies on the 23rd of May, the debate in the Senate on the 25th of July, reveal the current of opinion which the voice of this House would tend to dignify and strengthen. Another result to which the Motion, if adopted, may contribute is that of warning the French Government itself that lawless and insulting policy directed to encroach upon the Ottoman Empire, and not directed to replace it, has found a just interpretation, and may provoke a serious discouragement. They may be led to see that such a policy will make the recovery of Alsace and Lorraine more difficult than otherwise it would be; that Allies will not be found to put an end to losses and to remedy disasters which, instead of being a school of moderation and forbearance, have excited a contempt for right and hunger for disturbance. If, therefore, my noble Friend thinks proper to divide the House, I shall give an unhesitating vote in favour of his Motion.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

House adjourned at 25 minutes to 8 P.M. during pleasure.

House resumed at 25 minutes to 3 A.M.

The Earl of Cork—Chosen Speaker in the absence of The Lord Chancellor and The Lord Commissioner.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL,

Returned from the Commons with an amendment made by the Lords to which the Commons had disagreed and on which the Lords have insisted, agreed to; and with several of the further amendments made by the Lords, agreed to, several agreed to, with amendments, and with consequential amendments to the Bill; and several disagreed to, with reasons for such disagreement: The said amendments and reasons to be printed, and to be considered To-morrow. (No. 214.)

House adjourned at a quarter before Three o'clock A.M., till a quarter before Five o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

IRELAND—PHOENIX PARK.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, By whose authority intakes are made in the Phoenix Park to the exclusion of the public; and, if he will state the name and number of the clubs or institutions for which enclosures and ground have been granted, the dates at which the permission was granted, and the acreage from which the public are now shut out in each case?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, as this Question relates to the Board of Works, I have to answer it on behalf of the Treasury. Intakes in the Phoenix Park are made by the authority of the Lord Lieutenant and Treasury. The clubs for which inclosures have been granted are the "Phoenix," the "Civil Service," and the "Garrison" cricket clubs, at the respective dates of 1837, 1863, and 1877; and about 13 acres altogether are inclosed for them. Some land has also been set aside this year as a cricket ground for working men; this is not inclosed, but the public are requested by notice not to injure it.

STATE OF IRELAND—CONDUCT OF SOLDIERS.

MR. HEALY asked the Secretary of State for War, If his attention has been called to the following paragraph from the "Limerick Reporter":—

"In this city on Saturday evening, July 30th, a quarrel arose between some soldiers, and one of them, Private Ratcliff, of the 9th Regiment, lost his cap. He said he should have a head-dress, and rushing at Fathers Hammersley and O'Flaherty, of the Dominican Order, who were walking down Henry Street, he knocked the hat off the head of the latter clergyman and kicked it about;"

and, if he can state how the soldier has been dealt with?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to the hon. Member I have to state that I have inquired into the facts of the case. It appears that two soldiers of the Norfolk Regiment were taking a third, who was not sober, to barracks. They took his cap and stick from him, on which he went up to two Roman Catholic priests who were passing and snatched Father O'Flaherty's hat off. On this he was set upon by some bystanders, and with difficulty rescued by the two priests. The commanding officer at once wrote to Father O'Flaherty expressing his regret, and that gentleman called the next day at the barracks and requested that the man might be let off, saying that he thought the man intended no insult to his sacred office, and that in a drunken freak he would have taken anybody's hat. The commanding officer very properly declined to let the man off, and punished him with fine and imprisonment.

MR. REDMOND asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been directed to a riot which occurred between the military and the people in New Ross, on the evening of Monday August 8th; whether he has inquired into the origin of the disturbance; whether it is true, as stated in the "Standard" of August 9th, that it arose in consequence of a number of soldiers publicly insulting the Pope in the streets of New Ross; and, what steps he has taken in the matter?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to the hon. Member I have to state that I find that two men in a public-house in New Ross were, on the 8th instant, attacked by a mob of roughs, who stoned them through the windows and beat them with the publican's bottles. They were knocked down, badly kicked, and with difficulty rescued. Several of the mob are about to be prosecuted, and I would, therefore, rather say no more on the subject at present, except that, according to the report of the commanding officer, the men gave no provocation. Two other men on their way home to barracks were also set upon and beaten. With respect to the charge of publicly insulting the Pope, I can only say that when I read the hon. Member's Question, I directed special inquiries to be made, and that the commanding officer assures me that he can find no trace of the supposed occurrence, or even of such a charge having been made before the attack on the soldiers. If they were guilty of it they would have committed not only a military, but also an ecclesiastical offence, as they are all four Roman Catholics.

POST OFFICE—WAGES OF LETTER CARRIERS (IRELAND).

MR. DAWSON asked the Postmaster General, Whether he will raise the wages of the letter-carriers in Ireland to the same standard as that which exists in England for corresponding duties?

MR. FAWCETT, in reply, said, that in consequence of memorials he had received not only from Ireland, but from all parts of the country, the whole question of the remuneration of letter-carriers was under careful consideration, and that until a general decision had been arrived at he was not prepared to give any promise on the subject.

STATE OF IRELAND—PROCESS SERVING, CO. GALWAY.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has seen the statement that a bailiff, with a force of over one hundred police, under command of a resident magistrate and a sub-inspector, assembled at Ballinamore Bridge, county Galway, on Monday last, for the purpose of serving writs for rent for a landlord named Synnott; if it is true that no writs were served, as no such landlord has an estate in county Galway; and, what was the expense of the expedition?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the facts appeared to be correctly stated in the Question, except that 60, and not 100 police, were employed. The cost of the expedition was £21 19s. 10d. The police were endeavouring to find out who the solicitor in the case was.

MR. BIGGAR asked whether the whole thing was not a hoax upon the authorities?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: That is exactly what we do not know yet, and what we are endeavouring to find out.

PRISONS (IRELAND) ACT, 1877—SUPER-ANNUATION OF ROMAN CATHOLIC CHAPLAIN AT CARRICK ON SHANNON GAOL.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that, under the Prisons Act of 1877, the Reverend Thomas Fitzgerald, Roman Catholic chaplain for seventeen years of Carrick on Shannon Gaol, was entitled to a superannuation allowance of two-thirds of his salary as chaplain, or a sum of £26 13s. 4d., and whether, as a matter of fact, he has only been granted £5 by the grand jury of the county Leitrim; whether this sum is proportionate to the superannuation granted to other prison officials; and, whether the Government will take any steps to remedy the grievance?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the facts were correctly stated; but the matter was one which rested with the Grand Jury, and the Government had no power of interference. If the Grand Jury wished to charge the county with a larger pension, the Treasury would, no doubt, entertain any recommendation they chose to make. He found that augmented pensions were awarded to two other officials, in one case in consideration of long and faithful service of 17 years and eight months; and in the other, in consequence of the officer having served 13 years and 10 months, and having been disabled in the discharge of his duty.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND).

MAJOR O'BEIRNE asked the Postmaster General, If it is a fact that daily postal communication has recently been established between Buckode, county Leitrim, and other parts of the said county; and, if it is likewise a fact that a far greater correspondence passes annually through the Post Office at Glenade, county Leitrim, and, if such is the case, if he will explain why the repeated request of the inhabitants of Glenade to have a daily postal communication to other parts of the county Leitrim has not been granted?

MR. FAWCETT, in reply, said, that arrangements had been made for daily postal communication in the districts in question.

STATE OF IRELAND—MAIMING OF CATTLE IN CO. KILKENNY.

MR. MARUM asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to a Report appearing in the "New Ross Standard" newspaper of a Land League meeting held in Innistogue, in the county Kilkenny, and presided over by the Rev. John Lynagh, O.C., whereby it appears that Mr. Henry Miller and Patrick White, of that locality, had been arrested under the Coercion Act for an alleged "maiming of cattle;" that, subsequently thereto, a yearling bull, the sole subject-matter of the alleged injury, was examined by a competent veterinary surgeon, viz. Mr. A. S. Jones, M.R.C.V.S., who has given his opinion, as per formal certificate furnished, that the alleged injury was not caused, as set forth in the informations, by any sharp instrument, but most probably was the result of an accident; and, whether, under the circumstances, he will have these arrests reconsidered, and the parties, respectable men, discharged from prison?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he had seen the report referred to. He found that the examination of the veterinary surgeon was made after a period of three weeks from the date of the offence. He did not consider that the report would lead them to make any difference in dealing with the case.

BOROUGH OF GALWAY (IRELAND)— THE FREEMAN'S ROLL.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, When the Keeper of the Freeman's Roll in the Borough of Galway last held a court for the admission of Freeman; and, whether any notice of holding such a court has been given by the recently appointed holder of the office?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW), in reply, said, the Keeper last held a Court for the admission of Freeman in January, 1876. The present Keeper proposed holding a Court on the first Thursday of next month.

CHELSEA HOSPITAL—BURIALS.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the case that all pensioners of Chelsea Hospital, whether they be Wesleyans, Presbyterians, or other Nonconformists, Roman Catholics or Episcopalians, are, when they die in the hospital, buried according to the rights of the Church of England; and, whether, if it be the case, he will take steps to secure henceforth for pensioners the right of burial according to the forms of their own religious denominations, as is the case in the Army?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, I believe that some misunderstanding on the subject of the Burial Service over Presbyterian pensioners at Chelsea Hospital has arisen between the Commissioners and the gentleman who is doing temporary duty for the Presbyterian chaplain on leave. On the return of the latter, I will look into the matter; and, no doubt, the Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital will act on my advice. I have, as my hon. Friend probably knows, no official control over them.

CHARITABLE TRUSTS — BURKSTONE-LE-WILLOWS CHARITIES.

MR. BURT asked the Vice President of the Council, If he can state whether it is a fact that in February last the Charity Commissioners were asked for a copy of the balance sheet of the Burkstone-le-Willows (Lincolnshire) Charities; that the Commissioners replied that no balance sheet had been received for many years, though application had been made to the clergyman for one; that no balance sheet can be obtained from the Charity Commissioners, or from anyone else; and, if the facts be correctly stated, whether he can compel obedience to the Law, which makes it imperative that these returns shall be published annually?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, no accounts of the Charities in this parish having been received at the office of the Charity Commissioners for several years, they caused an application to be made for them to the rector and churchwardens on the 26th of February last. Accounts for the years 1876, 1877, 1878, and 1879 were received on the 21st of March, 1881, but, being imperfect, were returned for the purpose of amendment.

They have not since been received back; but the application for them has been renewed, and their production will be required by the Charity Commissioners.

CRIME (ENGLAND AND WALES)—RETURN OF ASSAULTS WITH VIOLENCE.

MR. MACFARLANE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he will cause to be prepared and lay upon the Table, early next Session, a Return, showing, for the years 1880 and 1881, the number and description of assaults with violence in England and Wales, and the punishment awarded in each case?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he thought the hon. Member would find what he wanted in the judicial statistics, where assaults were classified.

IRELAND—REGISTRATION OF BIRTHS, &c., BELFAST.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it be true that the registration of births, deaths, and marriages, in the districts over which Dr. Martin and Dr. Torrens are appointed registrars in the electoral division of Belfast, has been, for the past five or six years, and at present continues to be, conducted by Robert Humphrey, publican, of 41, Grosvenor Street, Belfast, who is ineligible by Law from holding the office of deputy registrar, he being a person engaged in the retailing of wines, spirits, and beer; if it be true that this disqualification has been made known to Dr. Martin, Dr. Torrens, and Mr. Boyce, Superintendent of the Belfast Union Registrations, and that they, or neither of them, have taken any steps to discontinue these illegal registrations; if it be true that two-thirds of the registrations are recorded in the public-house, of which Humphrey is the owner, and in which he resides; if it be correct that the said public-house is outside either of the districts for which Humphrey is appointed deputy registrar, thereby forming not only a source of inconvenience but of absolute illegality, and in every respect at variance with the rules laid down for the guidance of registrars of births, deaths, and marriages; if it be true that, when Inspector Mitchell required the books for checking purposes, they were found to contain a large number of incomplete entries; if it be true that a report of this circumstance was made by Inspector Mitchell without any subsequent action being taken thereon; if it be true that the Registrar General has been made acquainted with Humphrey's legal disqualification to act as deputy registrar; if it be true that the Registrar General was personally interviewed by Humphrey on the subject, when he (the Registrar General) consented to give him three months to sell his public-house, or otherwise to forfeit the office of deputy registrar; if it be true that, although this alleged compact was entered into more than twelve months ago, the public-house not having been yet sold, Humphrey still remains in office; if, upon the whole of these serious charges, he is prepared, on behalf of the Executive Government, to institute a rigid inquiry into the conduct of the said several officials; is he able to say how far the registrations effected by Humphrey are legal; if he will not consider it necessary to have fresh legislation on the subject in order to legalise what has been illegally executed; is it a fact that the public-house of Robert Humphrey is carried on in the name of Rachel Kennedy, being the name of his wife before she was married to Humphrey; and, whether it is true that he requires a fee varying in amount in accordance with the condition of the parties on the occasion of the registration of marriages?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he would answer the hon. Member's 14 Questions together. On inquiry, he found that Robert Humphrey held the office of Deputy Registrar of the two districts referred to in the Question. In 1875, he married a widow who held a spirit licence. That licence, even if held by him (Humphrey), would not constitute a legal disability in reference to the office of registrar; but it was contrary to the regulations. Up to May, 1880, the fact of his marriage was unknown to the proper officials; but, in consequence of a letter addressed to the Registrar General, inquiries were made, and the fact of his marriage ascertained. Directions were, therefore, given to remove Humphrey from office. However, after having had a personal interview with the Registrar General, he was allowed to continue in office on his undertaking to dispose of his wife's licence within a month. He obtained a transfer of the licence on the 28th June, which he exhibited to the Registrar General; but it now appeared that on the 22nd December last, the Recorder refused the transfer, which fact was not reported to the Registrar General. Having now ascertained this fact the Registrar General had given orders for the immediate removal of Humphrey from office. Courts for the purpose of registration were held within the bounds of the districts, and though, in 1878, incomplete entries were discovered on the part of Humphrey, their legality was not affected by the fact that his wife held a spirit licence.

INDIA—THE NIZAM.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked the Secretary of State for India, If he will cause a selection of Papers for a long series of years connected with the Government of the Nizam to be laid before Parliament, in order that the real state of the relations of that State with the Government of India may be made known, and that the animadversions on the honour and character of the Indian Government and of Indian officers may be cleared away, or substantiated by the publication of these official documents? He had put the Question on the Paper, because he believed the time had come when the Government of India ought no longer to maintain silence on this matter. He hoped that the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India would be able to give a satisfactory reply regarding these proceedings.

MR. ONSLOW said, that as these Papers would take some time to get ready, he should like to know whether the Secretary of State or the Indian Government had the slightest suspicion that any of these allegations could be verified?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, that with regard to the Question of the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow) he could not add anything to the statement he made on Thursday last. In reply to a Question which his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir George Balfour) put to him on Thursday without Notice, he said that he felt certain that the greater part of these Papers were of so confidential a character that it would be absolutely impossible, consistently with the public interest, to lay them on the Table. Further examination of them had convinced him that that was the case, and that although it was quite possible to procure some of them, the great bulk of the Papers, and these the most important, could not possibly be produced. It was, however, possible that the Government of India, or the late Resident at Hyderabad, might think it necessary to make some statement with reference to the animadversions referred to. If any such statement should be made, supported by the Correspondence, he should, of course, consider whether these should be laid on the Table. He could not give any further reply without communication with the Government of India.

PERU—REPORTED ROBBERY OF JEWELLERY AND MONEY FROM THE BRITISH VICE CONSULATE AT LIMA.

MR. ALEXANDER M'ARTHUR asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether his attention has been called to a reported robbery of jewellery and money deposited at the British Vice Consulate at Lima for safety on the approach of the Chilians; and, what is the nature of the information on this subject which Her Majesty's Government have received; and, if the report be true, whether a searching inquiry into the matter will be made?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: No, Sir; the incident has not been reported to the Foreign Office.

THE CAPE GOVERNMENT—PETITION OF RIGHT.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If the Law Officers have yet given an opinion as to a Colonial Government being a Corporation that cannot be sued except by petition of right, and as to whether that remedy is excluded in the case of the Cape Government; and, if they have confirmed that opinion, whether Her Majesty's Government have any steps in contemplation to put an end to a state of matters so unsatisfactory?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, the case referred to in previous answers in this House as being the subject of an appeal before the Privy Council has now been decided; but the decision does not touch the question whether the Cape Government can be sued by Petition of Right in the Courts of the Cape Colony. The matter is one of considerable delicacy. It is proposed to address a despatch to the Governor of the Colony to inquire whether, in the opinion of the Colonial authorities, the Cape Government can be sued by Petition of Right in the Courts of the Colony; and, if not, to suggest the propriety of taking steps with a view of supplying an apparent deficiency.

ARMY—THE VETERINARY DEPARTMENT—PROMOTION.

MR. GRAY asked the Secretary of State for War, What is the rule regulating the promotion of officers in the Veterinary Department of the Army; and, whether promotion is habitually given according to seniority or otherwise?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, the Regulation governing the promotion of veterinary surgeons is in these words—

“Promotion shall be solely by selection on the ground of ability and merit, due consideration being given, however, to length of efficient service.”

In the case of equal merit, preference is given to length of service.

THE IRISH LIGHTS COMMISSIONERS
—TORY ISLAND LIGHTHOUSE.

MR. LEA asked the President of the Board of Trade, The reason of the delay in the improvement to the lighting of Tory Island Lighthouse by the use of gas as recommended by the Irish Lights Commissioners; and, whether he would endeavour that the new light on Tory Island should be displayed before winter?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, that he had applied to the Irish Lights Commissioners, and had been informed that the delay was caused by the number of other works having a prior claim, with which the time of the engineer of the Commissioners was fully occupied. For instance, a great deal of time had been occupied in the erection of a fog signal. On the Commissioner's engineer being free from other important works, he would take in hand the plans and specifications for Tory Island; but, having regard to the lateness of the season, and the difficulty of access to the Island, the Commissioners would not be prepared to undertake any works at this lighthouse before the ensuing Spring.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT — EXTENSION OF THE NEW CODE TO SCOTLAND.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Vice President of the Council, If he will extend the benefits of the new Code to Scotland not later than next year?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, there are considerable differences between the Education Codes of England and Scotland, arising, to some extent, out of the difference in the Education Acts of the two countries. We proposed to ourselves to deal with the English Code first, and later on to apply the same principles to Scotland. If, however, there should be evidenced a general desire that the Scotch Code should be dealt with at the same time and on the same lines as the English Code, we shall be prepared to meet the wishes of the Scotch educational authorities in the matter.

EGYPT—THE MILITARY FORCE.

MR. M'COAN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, in view of the continued insubordination in the Egyptian Army, and of its now wholly unnecessary numerical strength, Her Majesty's Government has considered the expediency of advising the Khedive to disband that force and replace it by a simple gendarmerie, sufficient for all the mere police wants of the Country?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in reply, said, that Her Majesty's Government believed the Khedive and his Advisers were fully alive to the importance of the maintenance of discipline, and the advisability of not burdening the Egyptian finances by keeping up any larger force than was required for the preservation of order in that country.

MR. M'COAN said, he had got nothing that amounted to an answer. The question was urgent, and he would repeat it on another day—perhaps tomorrow.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that as the hon. Member pressed the Question, he was obliged to make a reply which he had not made since his holding the Office he at present held—namely, that the gravity of the circumstances which lay behind one part of the Question forbade his making any further answer than he had done.

Mr. Chamberlain

ARMY PAY DEPARTMENT—RETIRED PAY.

CAPTAIN AYLMER asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is a fact that some of the oldest and most experienced officers serving in the Army Pay Department, having some forty years' service or more, and holding the vested interests of purchase combatant commissions, the value of which they have not been allowed like some other paymasters to realise, will be compulsorily retired within the next eighteen months on £400 a year, losing use and interest of their combatant commission money, whereas other paymasters who have either sold their combatant commissions or hold no vested interests, never having served as combatants, can, after thirty years' service only, retire on £450 and £400 a year, with higher rank and pension to widow than the former; and, whether it is intended to let these old officers receive their regulation and over-regulation money on retirement, or accord them some increased retirement above other paymasters, in accordance with the precedent established in the grant of retired pay and gratuities to combatant officers, under the Royal Warrant of 21st June 1881, section 2?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, the Question of the hon. and gallant Member appears to be based on the supposition that the addition of £50 to the retired pay of certain combatant officers is given because of their purchase rights. This is not so; and there is, therefore, no analogy whatever between their case and that of the combatant officers who elected to become paymasters. As a matter of fact, I have improved the scale of pensions which I found in force for the Pay Department; and I see no reason for any further change in the arrangement for their retirement.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—MR. HONE.

VISCOUNT CRICHTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he is aware that great dissatisfaction exists in Ireland at the narrow and limited nature of the inquiry made into the circumstances attending the death by poisoning of Mr. Hone in Limerick; and, whether he will cause steps to be taken to have a further and more searching investigation set on foot?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW), in reply, said, his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) had given Notice of a Question to him on the same subject, and, therefore, in reply both to the Question of the noble Viscount and that of his right hon. and learned Friend, he had to say that he had called for a Report into the circumstances attending the unhappy occurrence referred to. Until he had received the Report in question he could not say what course would be taken.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)— DEPARTMENTAL STATEMENT.

MR. DAWSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any statement on the Irish National Education system of a similar character to that of the Vice President of the Council on the English and Scotch systems will be made to the House; and, whether the similar aid to that given to voluntary denominational schools in England and Scotland will be extended to Ireland where such schemes are very numerous, highly approved of by the people and recommended for aid by the Royal Commission on Primary Education which reported to Her Majesty in 1870?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that he should be glad, when he brought on the Irish Education Estimates, to answer any Question on the subject; but he could not promise that a statement should be made corresponding to that made by his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council (Mr. Mundella). He thought, however, he could show in debate that aid was given as in England, and to a larger extent.

ARCTIC EXPLORATION—THE NORTH POLE—COMMANDER CHEYNE'S EX- PEDITION.

CAPTAIN AYLMER asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether, considering the leading part England has hitherto taken in Polar research, and the active energy now displayed by other maritime nations, the Admiralty are prepared to assist in any way the persevering efforts made by Commander Cheyne to organise another attempt to reach the North Pole, especially as the Premier of Canada, Sir John Macdonald, has expressed himself ready to co-operate if the Home Government will support Commander Cheyne's proposed attempt to reach the Pole?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, towards the close of 1880 a Committee, which had been formed to advance Commander Cheyne's project of Polar research, applied to the President and Council of the Royal Geographical Society for countenance and assistance. The details of the scheme were considered, and the reply expressed regret—"That the scheme, as explained by the statement, did not commend itself to the Council, nor, even were it feasible, did the means proposed to be adopted for encountering the great dangers and difficulties necessarily attendant upon such an enterprise appear sufficient."

Naturally, the Admiralty are much influenced in such a matter by the opinion of the Geographical Society, and they see no reason to depart from the unfavourable opinion which they have, in concurrence with the Geographical Society, formed of Commander Cheyne's proposals with regard to Arctic exploration.

INDIA—THE PAUMBAN PASS.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Secretary of State for India, If he will state what progress has been made in the works for deepening and improving the Paumban Pass, and what appropriation will be made for these works in the current financial year?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, his attention had not been called to this subject until the Question of the right hon. and gallant Member appeared on the Paper. He found that no Report had been received at the India Office as to the progress of the works referred to since 1873. He would take care that information on the subject asked for should be communicated at once. He could not find any appropriation made for the works in the current Estimates.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—SALARIES OF IRISH SUB-POSTMASTERS.

MR. BARRY asked the Postmaster General, Whether he intends taking any steps to increase the salaries of Irish Sub-Postmasters (whose income varies from twopence to sixpence per day); how many memorials he has received in reference thereto; whether the hours of business might not be reduced to something less than twelve hours, as at present; and, whether it be unlawful for Irish Sub-Postmasters to memorial for redress of grievance, as well as any other class of Her Majesty's subjects?

MR. FAWCETT, in reply, said, there was no difference whatever in the position of sub-postmasters in Ireland and other parts of the United Kingdom. In addition to their pay, they received a commission on stamps, on registered letters, and on the number of savings bank and money-order transactions. It must be remembered that sub-postmasters did not devote the whole of their time to Post Office work. They, as a rule, had their business to attend to. It was in no respect illegal for Irish sub-postmasters to memorialize for redress of grievances.

WAYS AND MEANS—INLAND REVENUE —THE COLCLOUGH STAMP FRAUDS.

MR. HEALY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether any inquiry would be granted into the Colclough stamp frauds; and, whether it would be conducted independently; and, if so, by whom?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, all the facts of the Colclough stamp frauds have been fully elicited in the long trial which has terminated in the conviction of Colclough. No further inquiry appears, therefore, to be necessary. The Board of Inland Revenue are taking every precaution to prevent the recurrence of similar frauds in the future.

MR. HEALY asked whether the Estimate for the Department in which these frauds occurred had yet to be discussed?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH, in reply, said, that the salary for this official was included in the Inland Revenue Department Vote, which had been taken.

LICENSING ACTS—TRANSFER OF A LICENCE.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the magistrates of Oxford did, on April 26th 1881, sanction the transfer of a beerhouse licence to Stephen Peedell, who, on the 10th of July 1880, was sentenced to four months' imprisonment for bribery committed at the last Oxford Parliamentary Election; and, if this be the case, whether such crime, conviction, and sentence does not disqualify him from holding a licence for the sale of drink?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that, as to the second part of the Question, the disqualification which the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) had in his mind did not arise upon a conviction for misdemeanour, but on a conviction for felony; therefore, the action of the magistrates in granting the licence was not absolutely illegal. If, however, the hon. Member wished his (Sir William Harcourt's) opinion as to whether it was an exercise of wise discretion on the part of the magistrates to grant the licence to a man who had just come out of prison, he would say it was not. If he wanted to know what the view of Her Majesty's Government was on the connection between public-houses and electoral corruption, he would find it in the provision of the Bill introduced that Session by his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General.

CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF EDMUND GALLEY—COMPENSATION.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in conformity with the general feeling expressed by the House in the late Debate, Her Majesty's Government will award the same amount of Compensation to Edmund Galley as was awarded to Habron on a former occasion?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that, in accordance with the undertaking which he gave the other day, he had put himself in communication with the Treasury on this subject, and he hoped to be able to let the hon. Member know the result in a day or two.

LAW AND POLICE—CRUELTY TO ANIMALS PREVENTION ACT—CRUELTY TO A DONKEY.

MR. MACFARLANE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to a case tried before Mr. Mansfield at the Liverpool Police Court on Monday last, in which a man named Mahony was convicted of having driven a four-pronged stable fork five or six times into the side of a donkey, the last time with such force that the prongs of the fork were so bent that it could not be withdrawn, and was, therefore, left in the animal's side all night; and, if the facts are correctly reported, he will express to the magistrate his condemnation of the sentence of three weeks' imprisonment with hard labour, for such atrocious barbarity?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he had already more than once, in answer to Questions, stated it was not within his province to review the gradation of sentences, and if he might be allowed to say so, he did not think it was a function the House could undertake with any great advantage.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL—MURDER OF DR. BARBER.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOOTE asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, What is the present position of the proceedings for the discovery and punishment of the murderers of Dr. Barber; and, what steps have been, or will be, taken to obtain compensation for his family whether the actual murderers are brought to justice or not?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, in reply to the first part of the right hon. Baronet's Question, I have to say that Sir Evelyn Wood telegraphed, on the 11th instant, as follows:—

"Two persons apprehended on the charge of murder of Dr. Barber; but evidence conflicting and undecided. Harrismith Landdrost committed both prisoners for trial on the 14th of September, accepting bail—£5,000—but observed, except for the special circumstances, he should have dismissed the case."

We have heard nothing since on the matter. In reply to the second part of the Question, I have to say that the Transvaal Government have agreed to become liable to a certain moderate amount of compensation to widows and orphans in cases like Barber's.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOOTE: Will any steps be taken to enforce it, and to ascertain the amount of compensation which ought to be paid to the family of Dr. Barber?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, there can be no doubt as to the payment of the amount for which the Transvaal Government is made liable. As to the distribution, that will depend on circumstances.

FRANCE AND TUNIS (POLITICAL AFFAIRS).

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether a French Consul or Consul General has been appointed at Tunis in lieu of M. Roustan; and, whether M. Roustan is invested with any diplomatic or consular function, or is merely the Minister of the Bey of Tunis; also, whether French Diplomatic and Consular Agents claim jurisdiction over Tunisian subjects resident in Ottoman territory; and whether the Porte and other Governments having Diplomatic and Consular Agents in Turkey concur in such a claim?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in reply, said, that the Government had received no official information as to the appointment of a French Consul at Tunis in lieu of M. Roustan or otherwise. Her Majesty's Government had pointed out to the French Government the inconvenience which was likely to arise from the double functions of M. Roustan; and from the manner in which their representations had been received they had reason to believe that a Consul would be appointed, if he was not now appointed. Her Majesty's Government were not informed as to the change of M. Roustan's functions. He had already substantially answered the latter Question, in reply to an hon. Member a few days ago. Papers had been laid before Parliament—Tripoli, No. 1, 1881—showing that the French Consular authorities in Ottoman territory had issued notices calling upon Tunisians to register themselves at the French Consulate. In a Parliamentary Paper recently issued—Tunis, No. 7, 1881, No. 44—would be found recorded the view taken by the Porte on this matter and other Papers; and the hon. Member would see what passed on the subject of the protection of Tunisians in Egypt, and at Paris between Lord Lyons and M. St. Hilaire. Her Majesty's Government could not undertake to say what view other Governments took on this matter.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL, CLAUSE 25
—PURCHASES.

SIR WILLIAM PALLISER asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, If he would explain whether sub-section 3, Clause 25 of the Land Bill, confers power on the Commissioners, with the consent of the Treasury, to grant a reduction of interest, upon the money due by a purchaser, in consideration of a pre-payment, e.g., assuming the cost to the State of the money, inclusive of expenses, not to exceed $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent.; and, whether the Commissioners would have power, with the consent of the Treasury, and in consideration of a pre-payment, to reduce the rate of interest to $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent.?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW), in reply, said, that as he understood the Question, it was whether, under the section as it now stood, the Commissioners would have the power to make special terms with a purchaser as to the amount of interest to be paid for advances? He was of opinion they would. They would, in fact, have the power to deal on any terms that the Treasury might sanction.

RUSSIA — CONDITION OF FOREIGN JEWS—EXPULSION OF MR. L. LEWISOHN, A NATURALIZED BRITISH SUBJECT.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he is aware that Mr. Lewisohn has been granted a new passport by the Foreign Office, and that such passport has been viséd with the words "Bon pour la Russié" by the Russian Consul General in London; whether Mr. Lewisohn, who is obliged to proceed immediately to Russia on urgent business, will be allowed, on the strength of such passport and visa, to stay there for such time as he may find necessary for the transaction of his business, and during his stay there be accorded the protection enjoyed by all other British subjects travelling in Russia; and, whether the Correspondence which has taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Russia relative to Mr. Lewisohn's illegal expulsion from St. Petersburg will now be laid upon the Table of the House?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in reply, said, it was the case that Mr. Lewisohn had been granted a new passport which had been viséd by the Russian Consul General. Her Majesty's Government would, of course, continue to claim for all British subjects their Treaty rights. The question what were the rights of foreign Jewish subjects had been under discussion between Her Majesty's Government and the Russian Government, as it had long been the subject of correspondence between the Russian and the United States Governments. The Correspondence on the subject was not yet complete, but the first portion of it was put on the Table a week or two ago, and the remainder would be published as soon as complete.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS, in consequence of the answer of the hon. Baronet, said, that, being in hopes that the representations which had been made and which he trusted would be made to the Court of Russia on behalf of Mr. Lewisohn would have the effect of insuring to that gentleman the protection to which he was entitled, he would postpone the Motion of which he had given Notice on the subject until next Session.

CONFISCATED ESTATES (IRELAND).

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he will cause to be prepared and laid upon the Table of the House, a Return showing the number of the Confiscated Estates of £5,000 acres and over now held in Ireland by proprietors whose ancestors obtained the same from the English Government in the form which appears on the Notice Paper?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW), in reply, said, there would be great difficulty, if not impossibility, in complying with the request for the Return indicated. In the first place, the Government had no power to trace the title down from the remote period to the present day in order to see whether the present owner was the descendant of the first grantees. He had himself had considerable experience in tracing titles in Ireland, and there was hardly an estate which had not been the subject of repeated purchase, so that the present possessor was not the descendant of the original grantee. Besides, nearly all these Crown grants had been printed 50 years ago, and were accessible to everyone under the direction of the then Record Commissioners.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) ACT, 1870—THE ROYAL COMMISSION
—THE REPORT AND EVIDENCE.

SIR WILLIAM PALLISER asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Bessborough Commission, having received and considered the evidence of the Irish tenants, issued a circular inviting the Irish landlords to send in statements in reply; whether Her Majesty's Government, towards the close of last year, called upon the Commission to forward their Report with the least possible delay; whether the Commissioners framed and signed their Report without having considered the landlords' statements in reply; whether Her Majesty's Government were to a considerable extent guided, in framing the Land Bill, by that Report; whether they were aware, at the time, that that Report was based, as regards evidence, upon the ex parte and un rebutted statements of the Irish tenants; whether the mistaken assertion in the Report, that the landlords' replies were printed in the Appendix, confirmed the Government in the belief that those replies had been considered by the Commission; whether the landlords' evidence was published for the first time upwards of two months after the Report had been signed, and with the dates of the replies expunged therefrom; whether, owing to the suppression of those dates, Her Majesty's Government were ignorant that the landlords' replies had not been considered; whether the Land Bill had been practically settled before the mistake was discovered; and, whether, in consequence, the Land Bill, as well as the Report of the Bessborough Commission was based, as regards evidence, upon the ex parte and un rebutted evidence of the Irish tenants?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I will endeavour to answer the Question as far as the Government are concerned. In the first place, it is quite correct that the Government pressed the Bessborough Commission to forward their Report with the least possible delay. It is also true that that Report was published without certain replies of Irish landlords to evidence which was given before it. But as to the degree to which the Government was guided by the Report in framing the Land Bill, that is a matter of opinion, and everyone can form his own judgment on it by comparing the Report with the Land Bill. We were quite aware that, at the time when that Report was published, it did not contain the counter statements of the landlords; but those counter statements were received about March 10, and the Government had not at that time concluded the consideration of the Irish Land Bill. Perhaps I may here explain, as it is a matter in which interest is taken in the House, that of the 22 editions of the Land Bill to which reference has been made, by far the greater number were unknown to myself. They really signified a wise practice on the part of the draftsman, that whenever an alteration had been made, to put it in print with a view to a more close and accurate estimate of its effect. But I believe there were about four of those editions which went to the Cabinet. The consideration of the Land Bill was not finally concluded until some time after the replies of the Irish landlords had been received and considered. I ought also to say that the consideration of the Land Bill was commenced before the Report of the Richmond Commission was received, with the very important recommendation it contained; but that Commission also made its Report while the plans of the Government were under consideration.

SIR WILLIAM PALLISER said, the right hon. Gentleman had not answered his Question, whether the Government were aware that the replies of the landlords had not been considered by the Commission?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the Government had not received these replies at the time when the Government commenced consideration of the subject, but received them while the subject was under consideration. With regard to the Question as to when and how far the replies were considered by the Commission, that is a question which had better be put to the Commission itself.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL—THE LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

MR. MACDONALD: I rise, Sir, to a point of Order. I wish to ask you, whether it is competent to any hon. Member to move the rejection of the Lords' Amendments as a whole at once, and so save the House the trouble of considering them again?

MR. SPEAKER: On the Order of the Day being read for the Consideration of the Lords' Amendments, the hon. Member, if he thinks proper, may move that those Amendments be considered three months hence. The hon. Member is at liberty to do that; but I think it only right to inform him that, if the Motion were carried, it would involve the loss of the Land Bill.

NAVY—THE POSITION OF NAVIGATING AND WARRANT OFFICERS.

In reply to Sir H. DRUMMOND WOLFF,

MR. TREVELYAN said, that the Naval Lords of the Admiralty watched the fortunes of the old navigating officers, who would not suffer by the ultimate abolition of their service beyond the regret which that abolition naturally caused them. With regard to the warrant officers, the Admiralty were quite determined that that service should always be made sufficiently attractive to bring to it the best men in the Navy.

THE PATRIOTIC FUND — MR. HAMILTON.

In reply to Sir HENRY HOLLAND,

MR. CHILDERS said, he had heard, to his regret, though not officially, that Mr. Hamilton, the Accountant General of the Admiralty, had ceased to be a member, not of the Commission, but of the Committee which was appointed by the Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund. When the Bill now before Parliament received the Royal Assent the Government would then consider the question of the appointment of another Commissioner.

Mr. Gladstone

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.

CONSIDERATION OF LORDS REASONS AND AMENDMENTS.

Order for Consideration of Lords Reasons and Amendments read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Lords Reasons and Amendments be now considered."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. PARNELL said, he wished to ask the Prime Minister whether, considering that the House had already once considered the Amendments, he proposed, before dealing with the Amendments seriatim, to make any general statement to the House as to the course which he recommended the House to take with reference to the consideration or rejection of the Amendments?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, we have endeavoured to weigh with care the question to which the hon. Member has just referred, and indeed we did weigh it with care on a former occasion, when first the Amendments came back from the House of Lords, and we came to the same conclusion on both occasions. The main reason for that decision is this—that it would be unsatisfactory were I to make a selection from these Amendments of what I might think most material, for I might convey a very untrue impression by leaving out Amendments which other hon. Gentlemen might deem equally material. On the other hand, if I were to endeavour to go through the whole of the Amendments and state the course to be taken by the Government upon each of them, I should, in the first place, a good deal bewilder the House by the intricacy of details, and likewise occupy a good deal of its time. I should not like to do that if it can be avoided. So we propose to take the Amendments seriatim upon their merits, and to ask the House patiently to accompany us through them in a task which, at any rate, is one of diminished scope and labour. The first Amendment of the Lords—

MR. SPEAKER: The Motion is, that the Lords' Reasons and Amendments be now considered.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, before that Motion was put to the House, he wished to ask whether it was not a fact that in 1870, when the House was in the same position as at present—namely, considering the Lords' Amendments to the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Bill—the Prime Minister did not, at the request of Mr. Disraeli, make a general statement upon the Amendments before the House?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think that is very likely so; but the Amendments which were in question between this House and the Lords in 1870 were by no means of the same character and of the same complexity as on the present occasion.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he supposed there was no use in an Irish Member putting further questions; but he must express his regret that the Prime Minister had not felt it within his power to make a statement. The conduct of the Government in this matter would tend to embarrass the action of those Irish Members who were particularly interested with the care of the tenants' interests, and would lead to the impression that the Liberal Party had preferred surrender to dissolution.

MR. DILLWYN said, he was sorry to trouble the House; but he and many others had not troubled the House at all on the Land Bill, and he did think it right, therefore, to say a very few words on the present occasion. They had been heretofore almost silent in connection with the passing of that important measure. They had been, in consequence, he might say, exposed to suspicion on the one side among their own Friends, and on the other to the taunts of their Opponents, because of the silent attitude they had assumed. They had been charged with treason on the one hand, and on the other they were told they were blind followers of the Government. They had not noticed these charges, and they had not noticed the taunts. They were willing to sit there, under those imputations, and give a silent and frank support to the Government in pressing on that great measure; but they did that, not out of any indifference to the Bill, not from indifference to the clauses it contained, but from the conviction that Her Majesty's Government had a most important, and most solemn task, he might say, before them, and that their best and first duty was to support frankly and cordially the Government, at the head of which was a Minister in whom they had entire confidence, in passing the measure which he had just now described. They had done so, and their labours, after a long time, had almost been set at naught, as it appeared to them, in "another place." They, the Representatives of the people, supporting the Government of that country, after a long series of discussions, had come to resolutions which had been set at naught by those who were not the Representatives of the people, and those who were not the Government of Her Majesty in that country. They felt deeply grieved at the issue—he did, at all events, for one—and he rather regretted, in accordance with what had fallen from the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Parnell), that they had not at once, before entering on any part of that discussion, had a preliminary statement from Her Majesty's Government. They looked to Her Majesty's Government still pursuing the course that would uphold the main principles of the measure that they had so well brought to a conclusion, as far as they were concerned; and so long as they continued to do so he, for one, should give them his full and cordial and silent support, as he had hitherto done; but he did hope, and hoped most sincerely, that no material concession or change would be made in response to that irresponsible Body he had spoken of. If the Government did make such concessions—he was only speaking for himself, he could not speak for others, although he had been in communication with a large number of hon. Members—he did not think they would receive the cordial support which up to that time had been accorded to them from Radical Members below the Gangway.

MR. HEALY said, that, in his opinion, the House had good reason to thank the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) for the remarks which had just fallen from him. He (Mr. Healy), on his part and that of his hon. Colleagues, however, felt bound to express his dissatisfaction with the course taken by the Government. That course inspired the Irish Members with a great amount of distrust. He and his Colleagues had found, upon all former occasions, that when the Government had taken a course of the kind which they were then taking, and compromises had been arrived at, the Irish tenant was always the sufferer. That was the course pursued in 1870, and it now appeared that the Prime Minister did not propose to make any statement. They, of course, could imagine why he did not. If the right hon. Gentleman had to make a statement satisfactory to the general body of the House, it would simply be that the House of Commons should send back the Bill to the House of Lords. The Commons' Reasons for disagreeing to the Lords' Amendments were in black and white, and the Government should simply insist upon retaining that disagreement. But the Government had chosen another course, in which might be plainly seen the germs and beginnings of surrender.

MR. D. GRANT said, that he should think those who represented large constituencies would best fulfil their duties by stating their opinions in the situation where they now found themselves. He should feel it his duty, if any large concession were made in the Bill as it now stood, to vote against the Government. He was quite sure that those who, on the opposite side of the House, might be intending to urge Her Majesty's Government to surrender, were preparing for themselves a pitfall which they could not at the present moment realize. There were conditions underlying this question and this state of affairs which, if the matter were forced to an issue, would bring about consequences such as hon. Members little dreamt of. They would find that consequences would recoil upon themselves, which even those who might desire so to do would find it impossible to control.

MR. ANDERSON: After some of the remarks made by some of the hon. Gentlemen on this question, I feel bound to say a few words, if possible, to deprecate the violent counsels that we have just heard. I do venture to hope that, whatever happens, the labour that has been expended upon this Bill will not be thrown away. The Bill is, to a large extent, a very good Bill; and if it were carried, even in its present form, it would be a most valuable measure for Ireland. It gives you your Court; you can start that Court immediately, and have it in operation; and, if you refuse, what better will you get and when? I do not wish to accept all the objections that the Lords take; but I say that it is essentially a case for compromise. The two Houses seem to have arrived tolerably near each other, and I do hope that the labour that has been given to the Bill will not have to be gone over again. If you want to fight the Lords—and I am quite as ready to fight them as anyone—it will be quite as easy to fight them upon a Supplementary Bill next Session as upon this one. What I would advise would be to press for all you can possibly get, but do not throw over the Bill. If you cannot get all you want, bring in a Supplementary Bill next Session, and fight upon that.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, as I have only answered the question of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) as to why I did not, upon this occasion, offer a few general observations upon the matter as a whole, perhaps the House will allow me to say one or two words upon what has fallen from the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) and the one or two other hon. Gentlemen who have taken part in this very short discussion. Now, Sir, the principle which we have adopted on the present occasion is that which we likewise adopted on the former occasion. We have gone through the Amendments on their merits, and have endeavoured to consider them on their merits, one by one. I have heard the word "compromise" made use of. Now, that, I must say, is a word I should not wish to apply to our proceedings in the consideration of the merits of the Amendments, with an earnest desire to draw a distinction between real differences in principle, and cases where there may be some motive, some object to be served, not by us yet felt, yet fully understood, and yet not in itself illegitimate as involving any principle. This we consider to be a very important portion of our duty. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Wexford has stated that there should be but one satisfactory method of dealing with the subject, and that would be to make a general statement which should involve a universal negative on the Lords' Amendments. Well, Sir, I do not agree with that. I know not what it may be, whether it is parental instinct on the part of Her Majesty's Government, or whether it be an enlightened view of public policy; but, undoubtedly, I think there is in our minds a much greater desire to keep alive the present Bill, and to carry it into law, than appears to suggest itself to the mind of the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Gentleman refers to the proceedings which were adopted in 1870, and, at the same time, when he says that he considers it an evil omen that the Prime Minister has foreborne to trouble the House with a general statement, he also says that in 1870, in like manner, we compromised the interests of the tenants by the concession we made to the House of Lords. But, at any rate, I think the hon. Member ought to infer, rather hopefully than unhelpfully, from our forbearing to make a general statement on this occasion; because, in 1870, when, as he said, we compromised the interests of the tenant, we did commence the operation with a general statement. With regard to what fell from my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), it is not necessary for me to repeat the expressions of gratitude, which I ventured a few nights ago to lay before the House, with respect both to the amount and the nature of the support which has been afforded to the measure in various quarters of the House, especially on this side of the House, and which alone has enabled us to overcome the great difficulties presented by the subject and the circumstances of the case; but my hon. Friend has told us, with perfect frankness, that if we departed from the essential principles and structure of the Bill, we must expect him giving votes adverse to our own. I am not surprised at that declaration. It will not be any part of our duty to repeat the announcements made at a very early stage of these discussions with regard to the nature of the obligations incumbent upon us. I do not think it is the course most befitting either our own dignity, or the relations between the two Houses of Parliament, to indulge incessantly or repeatedly in declarations which, I think, once made, if they are believed, are sufficient. That is, perhaps, all that it is necessary for me to say on this occasion. I believe, upon the whole, the House, if it is satisfied with the general spirit in which we have endeavoured to conduct our part of the deliberations and of the decisions on this Bill, will be inclined, having trusted us thus far, to trust us to the end, and not to refuse to enter upon the detailed considerations of the Amendments to which we now respectfully ask the House.

Question put, and agreed to.

Lords Reasons and Amendments considered.

Lords Amendments to Commons Amendment to Lords' Amendments in page 2, lines 5 and 6, read a second time.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, there are embraced in this paragraph two Amendments which probably I may be allowed to consider as one, in consequence of their entering into the same sentence, belonging to the same subject, and virtually forming a unity. The first is, that the Lords have struck out our words "substantially maintained," and have inserted "or acquired and have in the main been upheld." The other is that they have left out the word "and" and have inserted the word "or." Now, Sir, with regard to the first of these Amendments, we are not able to concur in it, and for this reason. It divides itself into two parts. The Amendment as it stands—"acquired and have in the main been upheld"—first directs us to the sense of the word "acquired." Well, Sir, the introduction of that word, it appears to us, would, by a strange process, introduce into the category of English-managed estates, estates or holdings which have never had the smallest pretension to that character, but which, notwithstanding, having passed into the hands of the landlord by the total extinction of the tenancy—as, for instance, upon an eviction—do correspond to the term that the landlord has acquired the improvements. For, in that case, undoubtedly, he has acquired them. But, at the same time, these are cases which in no manner enter into the spirit of the original proposal of my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage), or in the steps the Government have taken to give effect to the spirit of that proposal. So also with regard to the words "in the main upheld." These are proposed to be substituted for the words "substantially maintained," on the ground that the words "substantially maintained" might be construed to exclude cases to which it is the apparent intention of both Houses that the clause should apply. Now, Sir, we are totally unaware of what these cases are; and, believing that we understand our own words, and believing that they give a just effect to the intentions of the House, we are very reluctant to agree to the admission of other words which we do not so well understand, and which we think that the Court would be apt to construe, from the very fact that they were introduced as an alternative to the words "substantially maintained," in a sense different to that which we understand and have fully expounded in this House, and which we think was generally recognized as reasonable in this House. Consequently, Sir, we do not agree to that Amendment. With regard, however, to the introduction of the word "or" in lieu of the word "and"—[A laugh—]—though it excites hilarity, I am bound to say that the case was stated with perfect accuracy by the noble Lord (Lord John Manners), that in strictness the word "and" applies to one of the two alternatives "acquired and maintained," and the word "or" to the other; and when we come to that word we shall propose words to give effect to that portion of the Lords' Amendment, so far as it is embraced in the description of the noble Lord. I, therefore, propose, in the first instance, to disagree with the Lords' Amendments.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the said Amendments."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. GIBSON: Sir, the Prime Minister has very clearly given us the reasons why he asks the House to dissent from the Amendments which the Lords made in the present instance. I regret that the right hon. Gentleman is not able to acquiesce in the proposal of their Lordships, for the grounds upon which the other House stated that the Amendment was made were to the effect that the words "substantially maintained" would exclude many cases to which the clause was intended to apply. Those grounds are founded upon this reasoning, that many people who have English-managed estates would be unable to satisfy the requirements of the Court, and to show that every single improvement had been maintained by them, and therefore lose the benefits of the provision. The way in which it now stands is that the House of Lords, although they omitted the words "substantially maintained," have endeavoured, in another form, to present, in a mitigated extent, the original idea of the House of Commons. I admit it is extremely difficult, once the element of substantial maintenance is retained in the Bill, to present it in any form which will not be open to a great deal of criticism. I have criticized it, and there will always be to the end of the chapter criticisms upon the idea intended. I myself would have been very glad if the Prime Minister had seen his way to agree to the drafting sent down from the House of Lords, because, as I believe, it would have carried out the declared intention of the Government, and would, to some extent, have met the objections which I took to the earlier drafting.

Mr. Gladstone

Question put, and agreed to.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) moved to amend the Amendment by leaving out the words ("or acquired and have in the main been upheld") and insert in lieu thereof the following words:—"By the landlord or his predecessors in title, and have been substantially maintained"); and in the next line to leave out the word ("or") and insert the word ("and").

Motion agreed to.

On the Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND, further Amendment made by leaving out the words ("made or acquired").

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) moved to agree with the Lords' Amendment, explaining that the alteration was of an unimportant nature.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with The Lords in the said Amendment."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

MR. PARNELL said, he should consider it a very prejudicial Amendment to the interests of the tenants, and one that should be resisted, if a landlord were to be allowed to claim in respect of improvements which were not made or acquired by him or his predecessors in title.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) admitted that the Amendments were becoming somewhat difficult to follow, and pointed out that as it was required that all the improvements should be made by the landlord or his predecessor in title, it was quite clear that left nothing to be made by the tenant.

MR. HEALY said, that although their Lordships appeared to have had no difficulty in dealing with the Amendment, they had returned it in such a muddled condition that no one could understand it at all.

Question put, and agreed to.

Lords Amendment in lieu of the Lords Amendment in page 2, line 28, disagreed to by the Commons, read a second time.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, this is an Amendment of a somewhat wider scope than the first one with which we have had to deal. Although not, after all, of a very wide scope, it has been the subject of very strong feeling and lively interest on both sides of the House, because each side has thought that considerations of justice were deeply involved in the particular view which they took. It is only fair that I should make this admission—that the House of Lords has, by a recent change in the form of their Amendment, greatly limited its effect as compared with the shape in which it left the Commons. Her Majesty's Government have considered the Amendment in its new form with very great care, entirely with the view of ascertaining what will meet the justice of the case; and I am bound to say that although I give very great credit to the House of Lords for the motives that have induced them to propose this new form of the Amendment, the alterations which they have made in it do not meet the objections in principle which lie against it. It has even, by a strange chance, probably increased the strength of some of those objections. I admit that there is one case, which some hon. Gentlemen have put hypothetically, and which, if it really existed, and was the subject of anxiety, would not fall within the scope of the observations I am about to make. I mean the case in which the landlord is supposed to have purchased the tenancy without a change of tenant. Where that case exists, I freely admit the observations I am about to make will not apply to that particular case; but the case the Government have before them is the ordinary case where the landlord purchases a tenancy upon a change of tenant. Now, Sir, I wish, without distinction of Parties, to put to the House this very commanding consideration, which, I think, does not admit of reply; and, I may say, I am glad to see the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) in his place, because no one has paid greater attention to the provisions of the Bill than he has done, and no one more thoroughly understands its principles than he does. In the opinion of Her Majesty's Government the Amendment, as it now stands, appears to throw overboard one of the main principles of the Bill. It throws overboard the case of three-fourths of Ireland. I will not speak of the usage, somewhat corresponding to the Ulster usage; but it throws overboard everything except the purchase of the tenant right in the case where the Ulster tenant right prevails, and it provides that the Court shall have a general authority, according to what it may think just, to award to the landlord upon the first sale of a tenancy, after the passing of this Act, such consideration in money out of the price realized by the sale of the tenancy as it may think fit and such as will recoup him for the amount he has expended in the purchase of the tenant right. Every care has been taken by the Lords to limit the amount of that claim; but their Amendment, of course, implies that the landlord has a legitimate claim upon that consideration money, and that is an admission which, after very careful consideration, we cannot bring ourselves to make. And the first and main reason for our objection is this. The purchasing Ulster landlord has placed himself, and has placed his incoming tenant, in the exact legal position of the landlord and tenant all over Ireland, and by law his relation to his tenant, after he has purchased his tenant right, is precisely that of the landlord in Ireland to his tenant where no tenant right ever prevailed, or, at least, was ever recognized. That being so, it seems to the Government to follow inevitably from this, that if the legal position and relation of the Ulster landlord and the Ulster tenant is equal to those of landlord and tenant all over Ireland, the Government cannot consent to introduce a distinction to the prejudice of the Ulster tenant. It would be to the prejudice of the Ulster tenant, because the Amendment, as it stands, imposes upon the tenant who may sell his tenancy a liability that does not attach to the price of the tenancy in any other portion of Ireland. I frankly own we think that is a conclusive objection to the Amendment. There are certainly other objections—many other objections. For example, it is proposed to give to the Court a discretion in this matter without any indication of any sort whatever how it is to proceed, or without any guidance from previous practice in Ireland, or from the practice of neighbouring estates. It is not said whether the Court is to consider the price that the landlord may be paid, or the price that the tenant has to get; and we do not think it right to give to the Court this discretion without, at the same time, applying some standard or indication for its exercise. I said just now that other landlords purchased the tenant right, and the landlord and the tenant were placed in the same position as every other landlord and tenant all over Ireland legally; but actually the Ulster landlord is placed in a better position, for this reason, because he knows, and his tenant knows, that every improvement upon the farm up to the date of purchase of the tenant right belongs to him, and him alone; whereas the other landlords in Ireland have no such certainty as to their title to this or that improvement upon their farms. Then, Sir, it must always be borne in mind that when the Ulster landlord purchases the tenant right, the main thing he purchases is these very improvements, and these very improvements are there in his hand. They are not handed over to the tenant for him to sell and pocket the price. They are absolutely the property of the landlord; and by the 8th sub-section of the 1st clause of this Bill, the Government have carefully endeavoured, as they were bound in justice to do, to secure that they shall remain the property of the landlord, unapproachable by the tenant. It may be said that if the landlord, as is perhaps the case in certain instances, has purchased up the tenant right, and has made no addition to his rent, the then tenant has, up to the present time, had the benefit of improvements for which the landlord has paid, without being called upon to pay any rent in respect of it. That may be perfectly true, and so often as it is true it is unquestionable that the tenant has sat at a rent lower than fair rent. No doubt at all about it. But can we go back upon the rent? The Government think not. If we were to go back upon a rent lower than the fair rent, we should be compelled to go back in the case. But there is another inference that can be drawn, and which would be quite irresistible, and it is this—that if we are to go back upon cases where the tenant has sat at a rent lower than the fair rent, we must be prepared to go back upon cases where the tenant has sat at a rent higher than the fair rent; and the consequence of that investigation we were not prepared, nor would it be at all politic, to encounter. On those grounds, and with that understanding of the matter, I am compelled, while I admit the spirit in which the change was made, yet, in deference to what we think the reason in the case, to move to disagree with the Lords' Amendment.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the said Amendment."—
 (Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. GIBSON: Sir, the Prime Minister said no more than was just when, in comparing the present Amendment with that which was previously sent down, he said that it was largely modified, and was confined to a very limited number of cases. Really, this Amendment seeks in the most moderate way, subject, as far as possible, to all the restrictions which justice could suggest, to meet what is a special case, and of course a case of not very wide operation over Ireland. There are a limited number of landlords who have purchased up their tenant right in Ulster, and a few other places in Ireland where an analogous custom prevails, and this provision merely seeks to give to the Court, not a power of paying back to those landlords the purchase money that they gave, but merely the power of considering all the circumstances. I should be glad if the Prime Minister saw his way to accept the Amendment in its present form, or if he would suggest Amendments upon it which would bring it into harmony with the requirements of the case. I do not think the Amendment would operate to the prejudice of a single tenant in Ireland—in Ulster or elsewhere—because it must be remembered that the tenant came into possession of his holding free from the obligations of every other tenant—namely, the purchase of his holding. The right hon. Gentleman said that the remedy of the landlords would be found elsewhere in the Act. That may conceivably be so; but there is not in the Bill a remedy which I think many landlords in Ireland would readily see. I do not think that even under this Act they would, in pursuit of a remedy, gladly raise their rents.

MR. PARNELL said, he had listened with great pleasure to the remarkably clear statement of the Prime Minister, in which he stated his reasons for opposing the Amendment. It must be noticed, however, that the Amendment only affected the Province of Ulster, and it had been rumoured that that Province was to be favoured in the compromise which had been arrived at with regard to the Lords' Amendments; but he trusted that the Government would adopt a similarly firm attitude when they came to the other Amendments affecting the Province of Munster.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, I only rise to say that my right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gibson) has fully expressed the objections which we still feel to the course proposed by the Government. We are not satisfied at all with the reasons which have been given by the Prime Minister; but I do not think it would be advisable to enter into a prolonged discussion of the matter. Still, while reserving our opinion, we do not think it desirable to put the House to the trouble of a division.

Question put, and agreed to.

Lords Consequential Amendments in page 5, lines 10 to 13.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he thought the Lords' Amendments reasonable ones, and he would ask the House to agree to them.

Motion made, and Question, "That this House doth agree with The Lords in the said Amendments," — (Mr. Attorney General for Ireland,)—put, and agreed to.

Lords Amendment to Commons Amendment to Lords Amendment in page 5, line 43.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with The Lords in the said Amendment." — (Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL wished to point out to hon. Gentlemen opposite that this was a distinct concession that would be highly valued by many Irish landlords. By the Common Law the right of killing game belonged to the occupier of the land, though the landlords, when they gave leases, usually reserved the right to themselves; but most Irish holdings were subject to no such reservation, and the Amendment, therefore, gave the landlords a right that would be much esteemed.

MR. HEALY considered the Amendment ought not to be agreed with, and as the Government had made three concessions to their Lordships, he thought it was time there should be a division. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland could not contradict what had been said by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell), and he (Mr. Healy) did not see why they should accept the Amendment, and so deprive the tenant of what was his by law. He, for one, was not prepared to give way on this point, and should certainly divide the House on the subject.

Question put, and agreed to.

Lords Amendment in page 6, lines 3 and 4, as since amended by The Lords.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, that the Lords had assigned the following as the Reason they would give for this Amendment:—

"Because it is essential that there should be no doubt that, during the continuance of a statutory term, mines and minerals, coals, and coalpits, are the exclusive property of the landlord, and that the tenant should have express notice thereof."

He (the Attorney General for Ireland), however, thought it an insufficient reason, because nobody except their Lordships supposed these things were included in a holding under statutory conditions. However, they wished to have it in this fashion, and, as the clause had at length been so altered as to enact nothing inconsistent with the rights that had been recognized as belonging to the tenant, he consequently did not object to the Amendment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with The Lords in the said Amendment."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

MR. PARNELL asked, whether in a case where the tenant, under his contract of tenancy with his landlord, had a right to work a coal or other mine on the holding previously, the tenant would not be debarred from the right by the acceptance of the Amendment?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAW) said, that if such a case were to arise, no doubt there might be such a difficulty as was just suggested by the hon. Member; but he never yet knew of a yearly tenant having a lease of a coal mine. However, there could be no objection to adding the following words:—

"Subject to such rights as the tenant, before commencement of the said statutory term, was lawfully entitled to exercise."

Question put, and agreed to.

On Motion of MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND, said Lords Amendment amended, by inserting after the word "coalpits" the following words:—

"Subject to such rights in respect thereof as the tenant under the contract of tenancy subsisting immediately before the commencement of the statutory term was lawfully entitled to exercise."

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

MR. GLADSTONE said, in consequence of the peculiar nature of the action they were now engaged in, it sometimes happened that a Motion was made for the disagreement with an Amendment when the intention was to meet it, and vice versa, and that was one of the cases he now had before him. In the Bill, as amended by their Lordships, hon. Members would find the words "consequent upon an increase of rent" had been inserted. He should propose to strike out those words, and after that was done he should propose to insert in the blank thus created the words "save as hereinafter provided." The real question at issue was this—whether they were or were not to maintain the security of the tenant against resumption by the landlord, for what he might call landlord's purposes, during the first statutory term. They were distinctly of opinion that they must adhere to the character the House had given to that statutory term. He did not say that no sacrifice of the landlord was involved in imposing that condition on his interest, yet he was quite certain that the sacrifice of the landlord was altogether immaterial as compared with that belief that would go forth in Ireland were they to destroy the idea which he believed so justly prevailed in the minds of the people, that for a certain moderate term they would be free from the landlord resuming possession. On that ground he adhered substantially to the original intention of the Government. The form of the Motion would therefore be to disagree with the Lords' Amendment, with the intention of having it amended as he had proposed. Though apparently agreeing to the Lords' Amendment in form, they were in reality rejecting it.

Motion made and Question, "That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the said Amendment,"—(Mr. Gladstone.)—put, and agreed to.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the said Amendment be amended by inserting, in page 6, line 7, after the word 'tenancy' the words 'save as hereinafter provided.'"—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. GIBSON said, as explained by the Prime Minister, the Amendment involved only a verbal change, and did not make any substantial variation at that point. The words of their Lordships, even if they remained as they were, were only introductory to a change made in a subsequent clause in a different form.

MR. CALLAN asked the meaning of the substituted words "hereinafter provided?" The omitted words, "consequent on an increase of rent," were clear and specific. He thought the change was more than verbal, and he was very suspicious when he found the right hon. and learned Gentleman the ex-Attorney General for Ireland in so amiable a mood with reference to this compromise. This compromise was injurious to the tenant and to the Bill. It was a compromise made in the fell spirit of Irish landlordism.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAW) said, the substitution of these words did not make a particle of difference in the effect of the sub-section. They referred by anticipation to the 3rd sub-section of Clause 7, which created the statutory term.

MR. O'DONNELL asked whether they were to consider that the objection of the Lords to the form of words was of such a character that it could be met by a merely verbal Amendment?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, at this particular place that was the case.

MR. LEAMY said, he could not help feeling that this was a concession of words where they had refused to concede principles, merely for the purpose of pleasing the Lords and soothing the Marquess of Salisbury. It ought not to be made, for it should be recollected that the Government passed this section through Committee and on Report without permitting any alterations.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, that, as he understood it, there were two kinds of tenancies, which might be called first-class and second-class tenancies. As the Bill now stood it was to the effect that during the continuance of a tenancy of the first class there should be certain rights. The House of Lords had proposed to strike out the words confining it to the first class, so as to make the provision applicable to both classes. The Government proposed to disagree with that, thinking it would destroy the Bill, and they proposed to do it in this way—that there should be certain rights in all cases, except those of the tenancies of the second class, which was precisely the same thing. On their side he and his Friends did not agree to the substance of that proposal, as they thought the Lords were right, and that no preference should be given to one class over another. Still, they would not take a division on the question.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, it was a matter of great importance that the power of resumption on the part of the landlord during the first term of 15 years should not be conceded, and the Government had no intention of conceding that point. They thought the words now proposed were really better words for their purpose than the words that originally existed, because they pointed to an after provision which was to be the exception which they thought they ought to maintain.

MR. HEALY complained that Members could not get copies of the Bill, and, therefore, were unable to follow the discussion. This was miserable two-penny-half-penny economy.

MR. SPEAKER said, the re-printing of the Bill was by order of the House of Lords.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

Lords Amendment, in page 6, line 37, as since amended by The Lords.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the question of compensation for disturbance had receded into a position of much less importance under this Bill than it occupied under the Act of 1870. At the same time, the Amendments made in the disturbance scale by the Government, and subsequently by the House, were made after much consideration, and he saw no reason for departing from them. He therefore moved that the House disagree to the Lords' Amendment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the said Amendment."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. GIBSON said, he would venture to say that this was a clause which would be very rarely appealed to, and why the Prime Minister should have so resolutely stuck to it all along, was one of those things which would puzzle posterity. His (Mr. Gibson's) views were that the scale should be struck out altogether, for it was one he could not understand, being both illogical and unnecessary, both root and branch; but what was now in dispute was a small matter, the Lords having only made two modifications on the figures of the scale, and he therefore could not understand the hostility of the Prime Minister to the proposal.

Question put, and agreed to.

Lords Amendment in page 8, lines 15 and 16.

MR. GLADSTONE said, this was a case where substantially there was a great disposition to arrive at an agreement upon this point, and the Government, though wishful to insert words to meet the general views, were prevented from doing so by the Forms of the House. He therefore moved, in point of form, to disagree with the Lords—that was to say, to retain their own words, but to add words equivalent to the Amendment of the Lords which would leave exactly the same breadth of choice on the whole. The words he proposed to add were—

“Or having otherwise failed to come to an agreement with the tenant as to what is a fair rent for the holding.”

It was quite the same thing. [Mr. HEALY: Hear, hear!] But he must add in fairness that the words were founded on what was substantially the sense of the House of Commons.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the said Amendment.”—
(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. HEALY said, it was very evident that their Lordships had been encouraged to make this change in the Bill owing to the action of the Government the other night. The Amendment practically conceded all that their Lordships wanted. The Bill treated the parties on equal terms, and it would go to Ireland not in the shape of a message of peace, but in the shape of a threatening letter. Whenever the Bill passed, there would not be a landlord in Ireland who could not write a threatening letter to every one of his tenantry to bring him into Court. As now arranged, that was an unfortunate and miserable Bill, and every tenant would be shaking in his shoes the moment he had a disagreement with his landlord. He denounced the change in the Bill. It was one of the most disadvantageous changes that had been made, and it would result in making the Land Court one of the most unpopular institutions in Ireland.

MR. GIBSON said, he should be very glad if he could recognize the vital nature of the change; it required the acute ability of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) to discover it. So far as he could see, the Amendment made, practically, but little change in the position of the landlord. He and his Friends had all along contended that the landlord should be able to go into the Court unfettered by any restriction, and on equal terms with his tenants.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the change seemed to him to be calculated to improve the relations between landlord and tenant. The hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) was quite mistaken as to its probable effect. Her Majesty's Government thought it was undesirable that if the landlord wished to obtain a fixity for the first 15 years, the only road by which he could get it should be by demanding an increase of rent. It would be better that it should come by trying to make a bargain with his tenant; and if he could not do so, then he could go into Court. It would be an advantage to the landlord that he should be able to get fixity for 15 years, without demanding an increase of rent. There was no obligation put on the tenant to say what he thought should be the reduction. The Government had always protested against that, because of the different circumstances in which the tenant was placed as compared with the landlord.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY observed, that whether the proposal would be oppressive to the tenant or not depended entirely on the expense. If the Court was constituted as cheaply as it ought to be, there would be no oppression at all. Until lately the tenants had only asked for equal right of access to and advantage before the Court with the landlords. The Assistant Commissioners, if they were employed properly, would be arbitrators going through the country, and would prevent the necessity of formal proceedings before the Court.

MR. PARNELL said, the hon. Member for Galway County (Mr. Mitchell Henry) was in error in his statement, that the tenants were content to be placed on an equal footing with the landlords in regard to access to the Court. The hon. Member had himself voted for a Bill introduced by the late Mr. Butt, which provided that the Court should be open only to the tenant; and when the matter was brought up at meetings of the farmers, and when his Bill was criticized in the House, Mr. Butt always pointed out that it was most desirable that the Court should not get a bad name in the minds of the tenants as being a Court to which they could be forcible brought by the landlord, but should be a kind of refuge to which the tenant could resort whenever he wished. Mr. Butt said the landlord could always bring the tenant into Court by means of a notice to quit, or by trying to increase the rent. The position of the two parties was entirely dissimilar. The landlord had a great many other remedies; he could recover his rent in a variety of ways, and could sell the tenants' interest; and he thought it most unfair that now, at the eleventh hour, an additional remedy should have been given to the landlord. They, by such a proceeding, laid the seeds for the future choking of the Court, and would make the Bill completely unworkable. The significance of that Amendment derived additional weight by the Amendment on the 57th clause, by which the Government gave the Court power to stay the sale of the tenant's interest for arrears of rent for three months until the judicial rent had been fixed. The landlord would now be able to drive his tenants into Court, and so to clog the Court that it would be perfectly impossible to have the judicial rent fixed in three months with the result that he could bring an action for, perhaps, six months' arrears, and issue a writ to sell out his tenant's interest. He regretted that the Government had altered the character of their Bill, as it would make the tenants look upon the Land Court with the greatest distrust, and lead them to associate it with the other Courts where the law was administered entirely in favour of the landlord, and where they never could get justice. It would also give the strongest possible leverage to the Land League, if they wished to keep the tenants from going into Court, as they probably would.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was very sorry that there was a great misapprehension apparently, and, through that misapprehension, a considerable misstatement of fact, with regard to that Amendment. The fact was that there was not one single landlord in Ireland who would be enabled to go into the Court by the Amendment as now proposed who could not have gone into Court under the Bill as it originally stood. The difference was simply this—that, as the Bill previously stood, he would only get into Court by demanding an increase of rent. Well, was it desirable to put upon him that odious and invidious duty in a case where he did not want an increase of rent, but only to have it judicially fixed? He might want to concede a deduction, or to obtain judicial sanction of the present rent. But, as the Bill stood, he could not obtain that sanction without demanding from the tenant an increase which the tenant was unwilling to pay, and then the tenant had no option, in defending himself against that increase on the rent, but to go into Court. It seemed a much fairer thing both to the landlord and to the tenant that the landlord should be able to obtain this fixity if he liked without going through that invidious course, and making a demand which he might not think just or necessary, but because it was the only means of getting the rent fixed.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL believed there was a little more in the Amendment than the Prime Minister seemed to think. Still, he (Mr. C. Russell) thought its importance had been greatly exaggerated by hon. Members opposite. He would vote against the Amendment if it was pressed to a division; but he did not think the effect of it, if passed, would be very appreciable. He hardly thought the Chief Secretary for Ireland's expectation that landlords would apply this clause for the sake of reducing a rent and of giving a fixity of 15 years to a reduced rent was well founded. He had very little hope of that expectation being realized.

MR. WARTON thought the Amendment, as now proposed, did not provide for one case that might easily occur. The landlord might wish to have a rent fixed, which the tenant was willing to pay; but the tenant would not go into Court with his landlord to have it fixed for the statutory term. The landlord was then put in the disagreeable position of having to ask the Court for an increase of rent, which he did not really desire.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL thought that the Government must feel, after the heated language which they had heard throughout the country against the audacity of the other branch of the Legislature, that they had hardly adequately recognized the benefits conferred by the House of Lords in that Amendment. The Prime Minister had fallen into a slight inaccuracy as to the form of the Bill as it originally stood. The landlord could only appear in Court as a defendant, or a prosecuted party. Then the Prime Minister made a concession, and allowed the landlord to appear as plaintiff; but only after doing an act which in Ireland would be generally looked upon as an arbitrary act. The House of Lords would enable the landlord to appear in Court without having the appearance of doing an injury to the tenant. The Lords' Amendment was a valuable one, and he was glad that their Lordships had been the means of bringing the Government to a better frame of mind and inducing them to yield on this point. In the event of a sale of an estate, it might be of great advantage to the landlord that he should have the power of going to the Court and obtaining a judicial valuation of his land, and get a statutory term imposed upon all the tenants.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, that the inconvenience of the course adopted by the Government was now becoming manifest. If the Prime Minister had made a general declaration, the Irish Members would have been better prepared for the change which had been so suddenly proposed. He was driven to what might appear to be a somewhat uncharitable conclusion, that either the Government were endeavouring to slip out of their original intentions with regard to this matter, or else that they did not understand the consequences of their action. He thought the Amendment was a fatal structural change in the Bill, and he must say he disagreed with the view taken by the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry). The clause, in its altered shape, enabled the landlords to go into Court under different circumstances and conditions. The hon. Member for Galway said very properly that if the landlord went into Court, having demanded an increase of rent, a certain amount of odium attached to him, and that the burden of proof was on his shoulders; but now he could go into the Court without the least odium, and that appeared to the hon. Member to be a representation of the tenant's interests. According to the hon. Member, it was a desirable thing that the landlord could now threaten the tenant with an action; the burden of proof that the rent asked was a fair one was not on him, and he could use the statutory term as a Damocles's sword over the heads of the tenants as a means of increasing rents in order to improve his property for the purpose of sale. Was it, he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) would ask, desirable that every landlord should have that power to use it at his will? That was a game at which it was easier for the landlord to play than the tenant. They were making litigation compulsory which was formerly optional, and were thereby arming the landlords with an additional power. His hon. Friend's (Mr. Parnell's) Amendment, that six months' grace should be given in pending ejectments, had been reduced to three months, and the result would be that landlords would commence so many ejectment proceedings that it would be impossible for the Court to fix the rents before the period had elapsed.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY explained that his belief was that the more rents that were judicially fixed, the better for the peace of the country. He knew that what the hon. Member (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) wished was that rents should not be judicially fixed, but that there should be a loophole for agitation.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that the Amendment was the beginning of a clear indication that the Irish tenants were being sacrificed to a compromise to be arranged between the Liberal and Conservative Parties. In the long run, injury would accrue to the Liberal Party, and to the Conservative Party also, from this sort of patchwork concession. Irish tenants would resent most bitterly the proposal to place this weapon of litigation in the hands of the landlords. An Amendment of this kind might pacify the House of Lords; but it would not pacify Ireland. The Conservative Party had got their hand on the key of the situation at the present moment, and he advised them to look to the Irish people, now that the Irish people were being deserted by the Liberals.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he was very much surprised at the vehemence of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. O'Donnell), and would ask the House quietly to consider whether there was the very smallest foundation for all this outcry? There were two modes by which the tenant might get a judicial rent and a statutory term—by decision of the Court or by voluntary arrangement with the landlord as to what a fair rent should be. It was said that this Amendment was a weapon forged by the Government to please the Conservatives; but he (the Attorney General for Ireland) contended that hon. Members opposite would have shown less ingenuity, perhaps, but certainly more candour, if they had described the proposal of the Government as a mode by which the Irish tenantry would be enabled to obtain a reduction of rent more easily and quickly than by going to the Court, and a statutory term without any precedent litigation at all.

Lord Randolph Churchill

It should be remembered that the Lords' Amendment had really been first proposed in the House of Commons, where it was considered by a vast majority of hon. Members as a fair solution of a difficulty, and where it would have been carried but for a merely technical objection. It would surely be unfair to say that no landlord should have a fair rent fixed on his estate except after incurring the odium attaching to a demand for a rent to which he was not justly entitled. He really thought, with all respect to hon. Gentlemen opposite, that they were riding their horse a little too hard. They had hardly given sufficient credit to the Government for a desire to do what was just to the landlord without being at all prejudicial to the tenant. The object and effect of the Amendment was manifest, and it left the tenant perfectly free.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Let the House consider for a few moments the object now declared to be that of the Irish section, according to the declarations of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) and the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell). The House has decided to establish an institution by virtue of this Bill which is termed the Land Court, and this Court is to decide in matters of equity between the landlord and the tenant. The proposal of the hon. Members whom I have mentioned is that this Court shall deal with the subject-matter land, having only one of the two persons interested in the land before it. The other person interested in the land, the landowner, is never to appear in Court except as a criminal, as having violated the chief object of this Act, the establishment of a fair rent, by asking a rent which he must know beforehand, according to this precious scheme, that the Court will reject as too high; otherwise the landlord will have no locus standi before the Court at all. A Court pretending to deal in equity which would be limited to having only one of the two parties interested before it of right would not deserve to be called a Court at all. The hon. Member for the City of Cork has been at much pains to explain to the House that, however iniquitous may be his suggestion, it involves an object which the Party that he represents has contemplated and striven to attain for years, that object being neither more nor less than this—to outlaw the landlords.

MR. DAWSON put it to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland that a landlord, under the Amendment, might induce a tenant to accept a nominal reduction of rent, to which he would be bound for 15 years. The tenant might unwittingly find himself bound to a settlement for that term of years, which was adverse to his interests, and contrary to the previously declared intentions of the Government when the Bill was introduced, for it was understood to be a Bill for the tenant, and not for the landlord.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY also inquired of the right hon. and learned Gentleman what the landlord could require to go into Court for but for an increase of rent? He was astonished at the remarkable change which had come over the policy of the Government, especially as only the other night the Lord Chancellor made a strong speech in support of not giving the landlords the powers now sought to be conferred upon them. He believed that it would simply lead to litigation, and there was no doubt that the clause was the result of a communication between the Leaders of the two Parties, in order to make things pleasant all round for the Members of both Houses.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment amended, by restoring the words struck out by their Lordships.

On the Motion of Mr. GLADSTONE, Amendment further amended, by inserting the words "or after" before the words inserted by their Lordships.

Amendment, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with The Lords in the said Amendment as amended."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

MR. HEALY said, it would be very injurious to the tenant farmers in many cases to apply to have a statutory term fixed, because of the conditions involved in the term, and the penal consequences of any breach of them. Of course, in many other cases, it would be wise in the tenants to apply to have a statutory term fixed. When this Amendment and the Amendment to sub-section 5 were inserted in the Bill it was a permissive Bill no longer. The Government wanted to give fixity of tenure—he begged pardon, he should say durability of tenure—to the tenant; but it was for his own benefit. Where, however, the tenant thought it was not for his benefit to have a statutory term extending to 15 years, he ought to be at liberty to choose a shorter term. The Bill was rendered very mischievous by forcing this statutory term upon the tenant. He begged to move an Amendment on the main question that the amended Amendment be agreed to, that in cases of agreement between landlord and tenant the statutory term should be reduced to such term as the tenant might suggest. He should like to tell the Irish people, if the Bill passed, to improve their holdings at once, and see what foreign competition would do, and then afterwards ask a reduction of rent; but, in the case of persons to whom the rent they were paying was a case of life and death, he would say go to the Court at once and have it reduced.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the hon. Member would not be in Order in proposing an Amendment on the Amendment after the Question had been put from the Chair, that the House do agree to the Lords' Amendment as amended.

MR. HEALY said, in that case, he was content, and would only say a word more. He had formerly desired that the Bill should be passed. Certainly, now he did not desire it at all. He believed that the Bill, in consequence of the alterations which had been made in it, was now an instrument of oppression that might be used against the Irish tenants, and he should not be sorry to see it drop. The Government had done their worst to make the measure unpopular by introducing the most momentous changes into it, which would involve the loss of millions of money to the Irish people. The only course open to the Irish Members was to divide against the clause, and protest against structural changes being made not in Committee, but on the consideration of the Lords' Amendments. The Government had turned a Bill which might have been of some advantage to the Irish tenants into a most mischievous and dangerous one.

MR. LALOR said, he was afraid the Government did not see the disastrous effect of the alterations they had agreed to. There could be no doubt that every Judge in Ireland would differ from every other as to what was a fair rent, and that some Judges would be very favourable to the landlords. Where the landlords found a Judge who was influenced in their favour, they were sure to bring the tenants into Court to get the rents fixed.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 238; Noes 66: Majority 172.—(Div. List, No. 386.)

Lords Amendment, page 8, line 20.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that they came now to an Amendment which would require an effort on the part of the House, first of all, to grasp clearly the nature of the point they had before them, which was rather complex in point of form; and, secondly, to take a thoroughly cool and dispassionate view of it. The most important subject of it was the following words, which had been inserted at the instance of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell), "and having regard to the interest of the landlord and the tenant respectively." Those words, it would be recollected, were accepted by the Government and inserted with the express view of giving confidence and satisfaction, rather than to introduce any new principle or idea into the Bill. When they came before the Lords, however, they were viewed as being intended to bring in again an idea which the Government had always emphatically disclaimed—namely, that the value of the tenant's interest in his holding was to be legitimately deducted from the rent which would otherwise be due to the landlord. The Lords accordingly provided against what they conceived to be a danger. In the first place, they struck out the parenthetical words of the Commons; and, in the second place, as a double security, they introduced a subsection (9) to the clause, which ran in these terms—

"The rent of the holding shall not be reduced in any proceedings under this Act on account of any money or money's worth paid or given by the tenant or his predecessors in title, otherwise than to the landlord on coming into the holding."

That sub-section the House of Commons deemed to be open to the objection of again bringing in the principle of deduction, and as bringing it in, in connection with a supposed "largeness" of tenant right, without taking into consideration the case which might, of course, happen, that the very smallness of the tenant right might be urged as a reason for increasing the rent, just as much as the largeness of the tenant right might be urged as a reason for diminishing it. The House of Commons, perceiving the nature of this one-sided Amendment of the Marquess of Salisbury, struck out that sub-section, and restored its own words, and the Lords responded to that proceeding by again striking out the parenthetical words and replacing the sub-section. He was going to ask the House to treat these two Amendments together; and it would be impossible to take a fair view of the importance of the parenthetical words unless the sub-section 9 was also taken in view at the same time. As he had said, the Lords had replied to them by again striking out the parenthetical words, and again re-inserting sub-section 9; but he was bound to say that the sub-section 9 which they had sent them was of a character, from their point of view, quite distinct from that which they sent them before. It looked to him as if some new and skilful hand had tried its effect upon the manipulation of the sub-section; and he thought everyone would at once see the difference in its character from the sub-section which they formerly had to deal with. The words now proposed were these—

"The amount of money or money's worth that may have been paid or given for the tenancy of any holding by a tenant or his predecessors in title otherwise than to the landlord or his predecessors in title shall not of itself, apart from other considerations, be deemed to be a ground for reducing or increasing the rent of such holding."

Those were words at which they had looked critically and dispassionately, and he was bound to say that they thought they did not contain any injurious element. Therefore, treating that as really one Amendment, the course they proposed to take was this—to agree to the subsequent Amendment as sent back to them, and they proposed to replace the parenthetical words of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk, which, if they contained any element of danger, and they did not admit it, would find that danger sufficiently blocked out by sub-section 9, because it simply said, what was evidently quite true, that the amount of tenant right interest might be an important illustrative fact, and have a strong indirect bearing on the question of rent, but which "Shall not, by itself and apart from other considerations, be deemed to be a ground for increasing or reducing the rent."

Therefore, they acceded to that sub-section upon the deliberate conviction that in so doing, while meeting a difficulty honestly entertained, they were not, in any degree, imperilling any of the interests which they sought to defend by that Bill. The course, therefore, he proposed they should take was this—to introduce the parenthetical words, and then agree to the Lords' Amendment in the closing sub-section.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the first part of the said Amendment."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE presumed that, technically speaking, the effect was to treat these words and sub-section 9 as one; and though they disagreed with the Lords with regard to the words of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell), they were not absolutely rejecting the whole of the Amendment. He thought, under those circumstances, that the course which was proposed by the Prime Minister seemed to be one that would really afford a satisfactory solution of a somewhat curious complication, to which more weight had been given than, in his opinion, the words objected to justified. He had never quite understood the original insertion of the words, except on the hypothesis that they were intended as a direction to a Court that still remained to be constituted, and which might, perhaps, act otherwise, to deal in some special way with the tenant's interest in his holding. At any rate, it was clear that factitious importance had been attached to them; and it was some satisfaction, after hammering the matter out between the two Houses, to have at last removed a misapprehension that might have led to more serious difficulties.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, the object for which he introduced the Amendment was that the Government had originally words which directly referred to the tenant's interest. He thought it objectionable that the clause should leave the House without some words securing that object. In the second place, nowhere in the Bill was to be found admitted, in connection with rent, the tenant's interests in his improvements. As to sub-section 9, he did not quite understand it. He found in it language with which he was not familiar, as usual in an Act of Parliament. He found no definition in the clause itself of what was meant by "the tenancy of a holding." Now, it seemed to him that the tenant's interests in his holding included the improvements either made by himself or paid for by him. Having regard to the nature of that interest, he did not know why it should not be taken into account by the clause, nor could he understand the force of the words "by itself, apart from other considerations." The sub-section was very inartistically drawn. He saw great danger in the words as now proposed, and believed their effect would be exceedingly misleading. He would, therefore, suggest, in order to insure that the interest of the tenant should not be encroached upon, and that he should not be charged rent upon improvements which he made himself, that an Amendment to this effect might be introduced—"otherwise than for improvements."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) observed, that what ought to be the test was what the improvements were worth. He contended that the interpretation which the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Charles Russell) put upon the words was a wrong one, and that the clause as now agreed to would really meet all the difficulties of the case. It must be remembered that this Amendment followed a provision in which there was a distinct prohibition against making an allowance or charge in respect of improvements against the tenant. He must say that, with the most earnest desire to insert nothing in the Bill which would cut down the tenant's interest, he could see no possible way in which it could be suggested that it would prove injurious to the tenant. The Government had also scanned the Amendment most anxiously with the view of seeing if in any way it would operate improperly against the tenant; but they had been unable to see any. They thought it would be of advantage to the tenant and landlord alike.

Mr. Charles Russell

MR. PARNELL said, that, looking at the long history of the Bill from its commencement, it appeared to him that the adoption of sub-section 9 by the House would very materially injure the Ulster Custom, if it would not entirely destroy it. The Bill, as introduced in the House of Commons, directed the Court, in fixing a fair rent, to have regard to the interest of the tenant in his holding; and that interest was defined, in the case of holdings in Ulster, to the tenant right custom which existed there, and outside that Province to any analogous usage. The insertion of this sub-section, therefore, entirely destroyed the tenant right custom. If the amount of the tenant's interest in the open market was not to be regarded in fixing a fair rent, except there were other considerations which the Court could also take into account, he (Mr. Parnell) thought they were entitled to ask the Government what were those "other considerations," apart from the money paid, which were to be regarded in the case of a person who bought the Ulster Custom when he applied to the Court to fix a fair rent? In the case of a tenant who had sold his interest, and the purchaser applied to the Court to fix a fair rent, what were the considerations here? He did not see what other considerations there could be. He had been willing to limit the discretion of the Court by giving the landlord the right of pre-emption; but that was not the meaning of the sub-section. The meaning of it was that there should be other considerations taken into account by the Court in fixing a fair rent apart from the money paid by the tenant for the interest. That dealt a fatal blow to the Ulster tenant right custom and against the intention to confer freedom of sale in other parts of Ireland, because the tenant would not be able to sell his interest at a fair marketable price; or, at all events, he would be greatly hampered in the sale of that interest. He regretted exceedingly that the Government had departed from their original position in this matter. The history of Clause 7 had been one of continual giving way on the part of the Government. As it stood originally, it gave tenants in Ulster the right to say that their interest consisted of the Ulster tenant right custom; and to tenants outside of Ulster, that their interest consisted in compensation for improvements they might be entitled to under the Act of 1870, and in compensation for disturbance to which they might be entitled under the same Act. A strong set, however, had been made against the clause, and the Government for the sake of peace, and for the sake of getting rid of the very strong opposition which undoubtedly would have proved fatal to the Bill, gave in, and said they would leave it to the discretion of the Court; but, at the same time, they assured the Irish Members that the words which they cut out from the original were still suggested in the Bill, and the tenants were protected. The clause had now come back from the Lords, with a very vague addition, which he (Mr. Parnell) defied anybody to explain, and which the Government would not attempt to explain in the slightest degree. If the Government were going to agree with their Lordships in this Amendment, Irish Members were entitled to claim that the clause should be restored to its original state. If the Government were not going to keep their word with the House, and leave the matter to the discretion of the Court, but if, at the eleventh hour, they were going to turn round and introduce a definition against the tenant and in favour of the landlord at the bidding of "another place," the Irish Members were also entitled to turn round and ask that the clause should be defined in the interest of the tenant, and that it should be restored to the form it originally bore before it was altered to get rid of Conservative opposition in this House.

MR. SHAW said, he thought the House of Lords had gone a long way in the solution of the difficulty which arose under that clause. That difficulty commenced when his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Charles Russell) introduced his words into the Bill, which were entirely unnecessary. The words, however, being in the clause he (Mr. Shaw) did not think they could submit to their being struck out. The original intention of the Government was to leave the question of the rent entirely to the Court, and the insertion of these words gave rise to a fear on the part of the landlords that there was some hidden intention of taking the absurd price given in the North of Ireland, and taking 5 per cent on that price out of their rent. He believed no Court in existence would do that. But the fear being there, he thought it was a very natural feeling on the part of the landlords to be rather alarmed on the subject, and this was their mode of solving the difficulty. It struck him at the beginning that there was nothing very serious in these words; but he should certainly preface them with a provision which the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland assured him was already in the Bill, and in fixing the rent any improvements on outlay made by the tenant or his predecessors in title should not be taken as a ground for raising the rent. If it was provided for in the Bill, he could not see that these words would do the slightest harm. He did not think there was any hidden or sinister object in them; but if there was it would be all the worse for the landlord in the long run. He thought, however, that some words might be introduced which would make it discretionary on the Court; and he would suggest that these words should be inserted, in "case the Court should be of opinion that an excessive sum has been given."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he thought there was some misapprehension on the part of hon. Members opposite as to the effect of the words. They always thought that the words inserted by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) were merely a development of the words "after hearing both parties"—that was, that the Court, in estimating a fair rent, would hear the parties; and, having regard to the interest of the landlord and the tenant, consider all the circumstances of the case. He did not, he confessed, think that, even as such, they were necessary. He was aware, however, that the Irish tenants attached a good deal of importance to these words; but that was as nothing compared to the fear as to their import which seemed to exist in "another place." They had, however, got into the clause, and, having got in, the House, he submitted, should abide by them. As had been pointed out, his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk was the innocent source of the Amendment which, he agreed with the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Shaw), had led to the whole of the difficulty. There would have to be some inquiry behind the amount paid for the tenant right, so that the mere money paid at the beginning of the tenancy would not be conclusive in favour of the tenant.

DR. COMMINS said, he agreed with the object desired by the hon. and learned Solicitor General and the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland; but doubted whether the clause, as worded, would carry it out. The defect might, however, be remedied by a very slight change. Why not add, after "the sum of money shall not be taken into account," the words, "apart from the present value of the tenant's interest?"

MR. GIVAN thought that hon. Members opposite representing Ireland somewhat misunderstood the application of the sub-section. It was rather a protection to the tenant than otherwise. In Ulster, he (Mr. Givan) could say from experience that when a high price was paid for tenant right, the landlord generally came to the conclusion that the rent was too low, and raised it accordingly. All the arguments as to the injurious effect of the proposed sub-section on the tenant right of Ulster appeared to him altogether illusory. He was glad that the Prime Minister retained the words which the Lords had struck out. The very reason given by the Lords for disagreeing with that House was sufficient reason for that right hon. Gentleman's course, for the Lords assumed that the tenant had no interest in his holding.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, he was glad that the Government had accepted the sub-section.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, he had been informed that the sub-section, as it stood, would cause a great amount of alarm and discontent amongst the Irish tenants. He would suggest that the words "in excess of what is deemed by the Court reasonable" should be added after the words "money's worth."

Question put, and agreed to.

Words struck out by The Lords restored to the Bill, and subsequent Amendment of The Lords to the same clause agreed to.

Lords' Amendment, page 8, line 23, as since amended by the Lords.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the said Amendment, as amended."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

The Attorney General for Ireland

MR. GIBSON said, he felt in a position of pain and difficulty about that Amendment, as it had been his lot to have spoken upon the subject three or four times, and to go over the same ground on each occasion. He only hoped that, as his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland had pointed out—and as he admitted—it was in the competence of the Court under the Equities Clause, all the matters which had been alluded to would be taken into account.

MR. WARTON said, he entirely disagreed with the view expressed by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland. The Amendment of the Lords only made clear what the right hon. and learned Gentleman wished.

Question put, and agreed to.

Lords Amendment, page 8, line 35, as since amended by the Lords, read.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAW) said, the Government could not accept the Amendment. He must, therefore, move to disagree with it.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the said Amendment, as amended."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he was sorry that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had announced the intention of the Government not to accede to the Amendment. The principle had already been acceded to at the end of a second statutory term, and he could not see why the resumption should be prevented in the case of a first statutory term. It might be necessary in some cases for a landlord to have the power of resumption for the purpose of supplying the wants of the neighbourhood during the first statutory term; but, under the clause, the Court would not have the power of granting it.

The House divided:—Ayes 198; Noes 86: Majority 112.—(Div. List, No. 387.)

On the Motion of MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND, Lords Amendments to the Amendments made by the Commons to the Lords Amendments, in page 9, line 16, agreed to, with Amendments.

The Amendment made by The Lords to the words restored to the Bill by The Lords not insisting on their Amendment in page 9, line 39, to which the Commons had disagreed, read a second time.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he did not think the words proposed to be introduced were at all necessary in that part of the clause. In fact, he thought they might be decidedly injurious. He must, therefore, ask the House to disagree with them. He proposed, however, to add the word "otherwise" before the word "compensated" in the clause, which would suit the case.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the said Amendment."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE admitted that the words, as proposed, were an improvement of the clause as it now stood; but he did not think that they made up for the words which the Lords had put in, and which were almost identically the same as those which he (Sir Stafford Northcote) had moved when the Bill was in Committee. Those words were taken from the Land Act of 1870, and only provided what was fair—namely, that the Court should take into consideration the length of time during which the tenant had been in enjoyment of the improvements at a low rent. The Amendment met the case of a man who took a holding at a moderate or low rent with a view of making improvements which would cost him something, but for which, on the terms on which he had taken his holding, he expected the length of the lease would enable him to recoup himself. He, therefore, hoped the Government would not object to the insertion of the words. It seemed to him to be very fair and reasonable.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that such a case would be sufficiently covered by the words of their Amendment—"paid or otherwise compensated for," which they proposed to introduce after the Lords' Amendment had been formally disagreed with. They were much more simple than the words from the Act of 1870. Their contention was that if there was any doubt about the meaning of the Amendment, that doubt would be removed by the insertion of the word "otherwise." They summed up all the matters that the Court could take into consideration under the words "paid or otherwise compensated." He thought the adoption of the Lords' Amendment would lead to some ambiguity, though, perhaps, it had some basis in reason, and might be accepted if it were modified and made more clear in its language.

MR. GIBSON said, he would admit that the word "otherwise" made an important change; but he did not understand why the Prime Minister objected to the particular words contained in the Amendment of his right hon. Friend (Sir Stafford Northcote). He (Mr. Gibson) thought it was conceived in the most moderate spirit. It only asked that effect might be given to that which nine out of every ten reasonable men would consider the ordinary common-sense view of the case—namely, that the Court should take into account the date when the tenant commenced to make his improvements and the rent which he paid. He could not agree with the Prime Minister that these elements, in a fair decision of the cases which might arise, were, with sufficient detail, stated in the Bill as it stood. If the statement of his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland and of his right hon. Friend were engrafted upon the rules of the Court he would be quite satisfied; but he was not quite content that the Court should alone be guided by the words of the clause as it stood.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL opposed the Amendment, being apprehensive that under it the landlord might receive compensation for improvements for which he had not paid. He did not see that the length of the enjoyment of the improvements had anything to do with the question. He saw no reason why the landlord should, in the rent, have consideration for improvements which he had neither purchased nor given any other compensation for.

CAPTAIN AYLMER supported the Amendment, believing that if it were not adopted a tenant who had already received compensation for his outlay through the payment of a low rent would again receive compensation in money.

He maintained, further, that there were other cases which had been overlooked. Land was often let at very low rents on the ground that improvements should be carried on.

MR. O'DONNELL hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition (Sir Stafford Northcote) would not give the House the trouble of dividing, as Lord Cairns had yesterday agreed with Lord Carlingford that the Lords would not insist on their Amendment. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the late Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Gibson) had not forgotten the interesting conversation he had with the right hon. and learned Gentleman the present Attorney General for Ireland yesterday, arranging what was to be done in the matter. [Mr. Gibson said, he was not in London yesterday.] Well, it might have been on Saturday, but the effect was that they were assisting at a farce. The policy of the Government was based upon two principles—the one was to dish the Conservatives and the other to dish the Irish Members; and at the former operation some right hon. Gentlemen who were still influential amongst the Conservative Party were assisting.

MR. W. H. SMITH thought the Government, in opposing the Amendment, was refusing what was fair. He could not understand what objection there could be to the adoption of an Amendment which recognized the right of a tenant to full compensation for the capital and the labour he had expended upon his holding.

MR. HEALY rose to appeal to hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench not to delay the progress of the Bill. They knew very well what they were to get, so that it was a perfect farce continuing the discussion. The Lords had adjourned till half-past 11, and it was desirable that they should meet to receive the Bill at that time, for punctuality was the soul of business. He would put it to the Members of the Government not to continue that comedy any longer. Having conceded so far to their Lordships they might, with a good grace, grant all the rest.

Question put.

The House divided: Ayes 232; Noes 104; Majority 128.—(Div. List, No. 388.)

Captain Aylmer

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) moved to amend the Amendment by the insertion of the word "otherwise" before "compensated," the object being to allow the Court to take into consideration the lowness of a rent paid by a tenant in awarding compensation for improvements.

Amendment proposed to the words so restored to the Bill, by inserting before the word "compensated," the word "otherwise."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'otherwise' be there inserted."

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, he was opposed to the addition of the words.

MR. HEALY said, that either the word "otherwise" had a meaning or it had not; and if it had a meaning at all, the meaning was in a sense unfavourable to the tenant's interest. He protested against that giving away, bit by bit, on the part of the Government. The proposal was an illustration on the part of the Government of the facilis descensus Avernus. In the original Bill the words were—

"No rent shall be paid in respect of improvements made by the tenant or his predecessors."

But the Lords added—

"For which, in the opinion of the Court, the tenant shall not have been compensated by the landlord or his predecessors."

Here was another "sop to Cerberus." The construction which the Government put upon the matter was exactly that which the Lords had put; and, under this proposal, the Court might take into account the time during which the tenant had enjoyed the benefit of the improvements. [Mr. Gladstone dissented.] The Prime Minister shook his head, but that might mean anything. He feared they were doomed to "or otherwise;" but they should not be doomed to it without a division.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FERRER HERSCHELL) said, there was no such sinister intention as the hon. Member (Mr. Healy) seemed to suppose. It was not meant as a sop to the House of Lords, or anything of the kind. The word "compensated" in the clause might be considered by some purely a synonym for "paid." He understood that hon. Members opposite thought it fair that where a landlord had paid for the improvements they should be his own. But the landlord might pay for them either by money or money's worth. To pay in hard cash was one way of compensating the tenant; but if the tenant got money's worth from the landlord, surely that was another way of compensating him. In that view, the Amendment was fair and reasonable, because it would enable the Court to take into consideration whether money or money's worth—the same thing as money—had been received from the landlord in assessing the value of improvements.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that it was part of the plan which the hon. and learned Gentleman was now carrying out that the concessions were minimized in this House and then maximized and magnified in the other House. For the sake of common honesty, the Irish Members would take a division against the system.

DR. COMMINS said, that the words "or otherwise" would be a dangerous innovation as affecting the tenant's interest, for, with those words introduced, length of time during which the improvements were enjoyed would be looked upon as absolute compensation. That was entirely contrary to the principle of the Bill, which was that if a tenant made an improvement it should be his own, and no length of enjoyment should put a bar to his further enjoyment of it. But there was nothing in this clause to prevent the Judge from saying—"Here is a man who may have spent £1,000 on improvements; but he and his predecessors have been compensated by the length of time they have enjoyed them." Such a principle never existed in our judicial decisions; it was not to be found in the laws of this country nor of Ireland either.

MR. PARNELL said, it was very desirable that the tenants should understand from the wording of the clause that length of enjoyment was not to be taken into account by the Court in fixing the rent. There was nothing in the sub-section, should it contain the words "or otherwise compensated," to prevent the Court from taking into consideration the length of time. Would the Government have any objection to introduce words making it plain both to the Court and to the tenant that the length of time during which the tenant might have enjoyed those improvements should not be taken into account in fixing the rent? It would be easy to do that by introducing words to the following effect:—

"Provided, That the time during which the tenant may have enjoyed the advantages of such improvements shall not be held to be compensation within the meaning of this sub-section."

He begged to move the introduction of those words.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the hon. Member could not do so now. The Question before the House was that the words "or otherwise," be inserted before "compensated."

MR. WARTON suggested the substitution for "otherwise" of the words "in money, money's worth, lowness of rent, or otherwise."

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 262; Noes 93: Majority 169.—(Div. List, No. 389.)

MR. PARNELL moved to insert the words to which he had referred before the last division.

Amendment proposed to the words so restored to the Bill, at the end thereof, to add the words—

"Provided, That the time during which the tenant may have enjoyed the advantages of such improvements shall not be held to be compensation within the meaning of this sub-section."—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. NEWDEGATE: Here, again, Sir, I must ask the House to consider the object of the Amendment which the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) has moved. Every hon. Member who is acquainted with agricultural improvements, particularly with those attempted by the Irish tenants, must know that all of them are calculated to be temporary in their beneficial effect. Take land-draining, for instance. Land-draining as performed in Ireland, especially in the reclamation of waste land, is calculated to be beneficial for from 10 to 20 years. It would be a very liberal estimate to imagine the buildings they erect are calculated to be useful for 30 years; but the substance of the proposal of the hon. Member is that the tenant shall be practically compensated with these improvements for ever, that he has to acquire a perpetual and beneficial interest in the property on which these improvements are made. In all time to come these improvements will continually need renewal, and each renewal is to form an additional claim on the part of the tenant. What is this but a disguise for the old pretension on the part of the Irish tenants to actual possession, and for ever, of great part, if not the whole, of the fee-simple of the property? I am quite sure that no hon. Member who is acquainted with agricultural improvements can vote for the Amendment.

MR. GIBSON said, it was not long ago that his right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition (Sir Stafford Northcote) proposed an Amendment suggesting three elements to be taken into account by the Court. Now, the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), after assisting in the rejection of that Amendment, brought forward a proposal containing one of those elements. The statement of the proposition of the hon. Gentleman carried with it its own condemnation, for it required very little consideration to show that a Proviso of this kind might work substantial injustice. Under no circumstances should any weight be given to it.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he entirely agreed with the proposition which he believed the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) wished to express, that the time of enjoyment during which the tenant might have reaped the fruits of his improvement should not of itself be taken into consideration by the Court. But he was bound to say that was not the Amendment, which implied and declared that, in no circumstances, and under no form, should the element of time be taken into consideration; whereas, in the matter of improvements, it would be a proper and legitimate thing to take into account the amount of compensation the tenant would have received in the length of time he had enjoyed those improvements. Moreover, if the objection on that ground were removed, the Government were still bound to hold that the Amendment was unnecessary, because it was nothing short of impossible that the Court should imagine or adjudge that to be compensation by the landlord which had never cost the landlord in any shape in money, or money's worth, a single farthing. Consequently, the Government could not accede to the Amendment.

Mr. Newdegate

LORD ELCHO said, that he was a tenant of the Crown in St. James's Place, and he had a holding there for 30 years. It suited his purpose when he took possession to spend a considerable sum in improving the property of the Crown. He wished to know whether the Prime Minister would be prepared next year to bring in a Bill by which he (Lord Elcho) would be entitled to receive back at the end of those 30 years the sum he had expended for his own good? If not, he wanted to know why not? He also wished to know how the logical or illogical minds of the right hon. Occupants of the Treasury Benches could draw a distinction between the two cases, because, in his stupidity, he was unable to do so.

MR. HEALY asked the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire whether anybody stole from him or from his forefathers the land which he rented from the Crown? But to be serious. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister seemed to ridicule the notion that the Court would grant compensation in the case put by his hon. Friend (Mr. Parnell); but, to use one of the right hon. Gentleman's own phrases, would he be prepared to lay 10 to 1 that the Court would not do so? He (Mr. Healy) would take the bet at the first opportunity. The Government could not, it seemed, get rid of that bogey of the House of Lords, and they refused to put their own words into the Bill. The House had had no sufficient explanation of the word "otherwise." The Government said it did not mean what the Irish Members in this Amendment said it did mean. He should like to hear now what meaning the Government really attached to it, in plain language. The demand made by the Irish Members in that House was that a tenant should not have his rent raised on account of his own improvements. If a man had brought a mountain or a morass into cultivation, no lapse of time ought to authorize the landlord to raise the rent.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he would tell his hon. Friend (Mr. Healy) what "otherwise" meant. It meant that there was to be no Dissolution.

MR. LEAMY said, that if the Amendment were accepted, the Court would still have the power to say to the tenant—"It is true you have made improvements; but you have held the land for a considerable time under its proper value, and consequently you shall not have compensation." There were but "three F's" in the Bill when it was introduced, and those small "F's," in the words of the Prime Minister; but he (Mr. Leamy) defied any man in Ireland to discover in the Bill in its present altered state more than one of the "three F's," and even that one must be taken on trust.

MR. P. MARTIN contended that the House ought, in common justice and fairness, to accede, in substance at least, to the Amendment put forward by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). The words inserted in the House of Lords left the true effect and extent of the clause in much doubt. There was no slight ground to apprehend that the views expressed by the Prime Minister in respect to preventing any increase of rent upon the tenant's improvements would be defeated if the House now simply agreed to the Lords' Amendment of this clause.

MR. STOREY said, it was a very common thing in England for the landlord to charge an increased rent upon the tenant's own improvements. That being the case in England, he was not surprised that it should be the case in Ireland; and, therefore, he failed to understand why the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister could not accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork. He held that no lapse of time could justify the exaction of an increased rent from a tenant who had improved his land; and he was, therefore, of opinion that no words should be allowed to remain in the Bill which would seem to confer upon the Land Court the power of increasing an improving tenant's rent on the ground that the improvements effected by him had been enjoyed for a certain length of time. The Amendment, at least, had common justice on its side. He was glad that the Government had stood firm to their proposals so far, and hoped they would so alter or modify the clause as to give effect to the Amendment of the hon. Member.

MR. MACFARLANE said, he could see no objection to the acceptance of the Amendment. The agitation in Ireland had been very largely owing to the fact that the tenants were obliged to pay an increased rent according as they improved their holdings. He would suggest, as a way of getting out of the difficulty which had been raised, that words should be inserted in the Bill to provide that consideration of time alone should not be deemed sufficient ground for increasing rents.

Question put.

The House divided: Ayes 91; Noes 262: Majority 171.—(Div. List No. 390.)

New sub-section 9, the next Lords Amendment, read a second time.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he had nothing to do now but to perform the formal duty of proposing to the House to agree with the Lords in the said Amendment. The Amendment was justly treated in substance as part of the Amendment which was fully debated and passed a little while ago. In the remarks on it, he did not hear fall anything which showed that the Amendment required to be amended; and at the present stage of their proceedings it would, he thought, be very undesirable to introduce any Amendment on small and doubtful points. He moved to agree to the Lords' Amendment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with The Lords in the said Amendment."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. PARNELL said, he would move the insertion in the sub-section, after the word "from" in the 4th line, of the words "the reasonable value of the tenant's interest, and." Thus altered as he desired, the sub-section proposed by the Lords in lieu of the sub-section struck out by the Commons would run as follows:—

"9. The amount of money or money's worth that may have been paid or given for the tenancy of any holding by a tenant or his predecessors in title otherwise than to the landlord or his predecessors in title shall not of itself, apart from" (here his words would come in) "the reasonable value of the tenant's interest, and"—the sub-section ending thus—"other considerations be deemed to be a ground for reducing or increasing the rent of such holding."

As the sub-section stood at present, it partook of the same defect as the sub-section which the House had just disposed of. It left the matter in doubt as to whether the interest of the tenant would be had regard to in fixing the fair rent where that interest consisted of a sum of money, and consisted only of a sum of money paid by the present tenant or his predecessor in title. Therefore, he thought the Government ought to consent to the introduction of these words. He agreed it was not right that, on an estate where the rent had been allowed to remain low, and where the tenant right had mounted up to a very excessive number of years' purchase, in such a case the whole of the tenant right should not be taken into account in the fixing of a fair rent, but that it should be left to the Court to estimate the fair interests of the tenants on such an estate, and fix the rent accordingly. The phrase "apart from other considerations" was too vague; but, by the adoption of his Amendment, the power would be given to the Court to intimate what the reasonable value of the tenant's interest was. He, therefore, moved his Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in line 4, after the word "from," to insert the words "the reasonable value of the tenant's interest, and."—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. GLADSTONE said, he hoped that the Amendment of the hon. Member (Mr. Parnell) might not be pressed; but, in any case, the Government could not be parties to the adoption of it. The reasonable value of the tenant's interest might in many cases, according to the Irish practice, be a large element of the case in fixing a fair rent. That was frequently the case, and it was one of the "considerations" here referred to. He did not, however, at all admit that it was a consideration that ought to be singled out from all others. The fact of so singling it out would be to present it as a kind of rule or standard to the Court, and then all the jealousies and alarms with regard to the old doctrine of deduction, which he hoped they had put aside, would revive. He must, on that ground, offer a most decided opposition to the adoption of the Amendment.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he must confess that he saw the Prime Minister gradually assuming an extraordinary attitude towards the tenant right custom compared with what he proposed in the original draft of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman now said that the tenant right "might" be one of the considerations which the Court would take into account; whereas, by the original clause, the right hon. Gentleman said it "must" be considered by the Court. Under the constant metamorphoses through which the Bill had passed, the right hon. Gentleman was minimizing, and was almost leaving out of sight, that very tenant right which had been put first among the points which the Court had to regard. Why should not the Court have the power of deciding whether the tenant had not paid, not an exorbitant, but a reasonable price for the tenant right, and, if he had, of settling what the fair rent to be paid should be?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Law) said, he would point out to the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) that he was under a misapprehension with regard to the action of the sub-section. There could not, as the clause stood, be excluded from the consideration of the Court any consideration which was necessary for the decision of the question at issue. If a fair price had been paid for the tenant right, that view would not be excluded. If an exorbitant price had been paid, the fact would not be allowed to prejudice the landlord.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he considered the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland to be in favour of the Amendment. The fact was, however, that the Government were afraid to carry out their own plan, for fear it would vitiate the secret agreement that had been made behind the back of their supporters, and with the mere object of clinging to Office.

MR. HEALY said, it was clear that an obsequious Government had determined to strike out everything that would be taken into consideration in the tenants' interests, and hastened to put in all that would be taken into consideration in the landlord's interest; and it should be remembered that it was by the weak hangers-on of the Government in that House, as sub-Commissioners, that the provisions of the Bill would be given effect to. They knew the views of their employers in the matter, and would naturally act on them, and bring in a verdict against the tenants. ["Oh, oh!"]

Mr. Parnell

He was not aware that a good honest Whig considered it a disgrace to go to the Government for a place. On the contrary, he considered himself flattered when he got it. ["Question!"] Every hon. Member from Ulster was looking for a place from the Government. ["Question!"]

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member should address himself to the Question before the House.

Mr. HEALY said, that hon. Members should bear in mind that if, in two or three years, it were found that the clause did not give satisfaction, it would be as easy to strike against a judicial rent as it was against the rents of the present time.

Dr. COMMINS said, he really could not see the advantage of this sub-section. When the rent came before the Court to be fixed, a great variety of considerations would be put forward both by the landlord and the tenant. The tenant would put forward a number of things to show what the value of his tenant right was, and the landlord would also bring forward a number of other things to show that the interest of the tenant was very small and of very little value. That being so, he wished to know why "the amount of money or money's worth that might have been paid or given for the tenancy of any holding" was singled out and made a special subject for the consideration of the Court—why was it made a subject of special exception at all? It was evidently made the subject of special exception for the purpose of whittling away the tenant right; and it must have been introduced for that purpose, and for no other conceivable purpose. No reason was offered to the House why it should be introduced exceptionally in this way, and brought forward negatively for the rejection of the Court. Seeing that the matter was brought forward in this manner, it could only be in order that it might tell against the tenant's interest and be a weapon in the hands of those who desired to cut down the interest of the tenant. The result, therefore, would be to make the people of Ireland distrust the Act, and have recourse to other methods for protecting their rights.

Question put.

The House divided: — Ayes 78; Noes 257: Majority 179.—(Div. List, No. 391.)

Lords Amendment, agreed to.

Lords Amendment in page 11, line 12.

Mr. GLADSTONE: This Amendment is purely consequential upon the insertion in a later clause of the parenthetical words we inserted in the early part of Clause 7.

Mr. GIBSON said, there were two differences to be observed. In Clause 8—formerly Clause 7—there were both this Amendment and the Amendment just disposed of, and it was necessary to read both together and in connection with each other. There was now no such Amendment to balance the present Amendment now being disagreed to; and he wished to know if the Prime Minister had considered the effect of striking out the words proposed in the Lords' Amendment. He admitted that the Amendment applied to the class of clauses called voluntary clauses, and that it might be either accepted or left alone.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I am of opinion that, considering the purely voluntary nature of the clause, it would be better not to make any further change.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment disagreed to, in consequence of the Commons agreeing to the foregoing Amendment made by the Lords.

Lords Amendment in page 16, line 9, again read, with reason.

Mr. GLADSTONE: This is an Amendment which is insisted on by the Lords for the reason which has just been read; but it is quite obvious that the terms of that reasoning are quite fatal to what has been admitted to be just and true with regard to the Ulster leases. I, therefore, move that the House should disagree with this Amendment and maintain the substance of the clause. There is, however, an Amendment which we propose to insert in lieu of it, the object of which is to bring the clause relating to this class of leases into analogy with the clause relating to the judicial class of leases, by providing that all leaseholders should be present tenants at the close of a judicial lease, if the judicial lease should be for a term not exceeding 60 years, which is a pretty liberal term. We propose to put in words placing the same regulation as to time, and making the clause applicable to leases not exceeding that term. The exact Amendment we propose is to insert in line 10 of page 16 of the Bill, after the word "leases," the words "or of such of them as shall expire within sixty years after the passing of the Act."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the said Amendment in view of a subsequent Amendment in the words so restored to the Bill."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

MR. GIBSON said, he supposed that the House was familiar, having the Paper before them, with the important character of the Amendment, which the Prime Minister stated that he did not see his way to assenting to. As the Amendment had been repeatedly discussed in the House, and as it was one on which he had himself already expressed his views, he should not weary the House by repeating his argument in any detail. But he must, however, state that he thought it was, in principle, a serious change, and a serious inroad on a principle which had always been maintained. It would seriously interfere with one of the most important covenants that existed in all leases, and it would add to all leases the right at their termination to the lessee of a holding to hold on as long as he pleased. He assumed that the changes made on the last occasion would now be replaced; and, to some moderate extent, that course would meet the objections he had made. The very limited power of resumption given to the landlord would meet the objection in some special cases; but it must be borne in mind that the power of resumption was made difficult to the landlord. It was not left to his own discretion for any purpose, however serious and important it might be to the landlord; but, in the first place, he must satisfy the Court; and, in the second place, he must pay every fraction awarded by the Court. This, of course, raised a serious difficulty, and the power of the Court cut down to the narrowest limit the advantage to the landlord. The Prime Minister now proposed another modification, which, as he (Mr. Gibson) understood it, was this—to provide that the clause should only apply to leases which had 60 years to run.

MR. GLADSTONE: To expire.

MR. GIBSON said, it would apply to leases which at present had 60 years undetermined.

MR. GLADSTONE: Less than 60 years.

MR. GIBSON said, that, of course, was a qualification; but it was a qualification which he did not think would meet many of the objections originally urged to the clause. He himself felt that, even taking the arguments urged by the Prime Minister on a previous occasion, the proposed Amendment did not meet the objections he had raised to the principle of the clause. In these circumstances, he could not allow the clause to pass without again making a protest against the principle involved in it. Even accepting the statement of the Prime Minister that the easy-going way of doing business in Ireland, and the kindness of feeling on the part of the landlord had not, as a rule, induced him to seek the resumption of a farm on the expiration of a lease, the clause laid down that the matter should not be regulated by usage, but by a hard-and-fast contract. It took away from the landlord, in the management of his property, all the grace and kindness of the old usage, and substituted a rigid line arrived at by breaking all the old principles which had been so long established. He could not allow such a step to be taken by the Prime Minister without a protest.

MR. HEALY said, the final words of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University (Mr. Gibson) with reference to this matter, which had all been arranged beforehand, reminded him of the chant of a dying swan. The right hon. and learned Gentleman must still make his last protest; but if he (Mr. Healy) and his hon. Friends were to protest against this limitation of 60 years, it would seem that they had no faith either in Irish Land League principles or in the success of the Home Rule movement. He asked what security there was that when the Bill came back once more, the Government would not insert 30 years, instead of 60 years? If the Government could give an assurance that this was the very last change they would make in the clause, he thought that the Amendment might pass without a division.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, if this point had been reached at an earlier period of the evening, he should have felt it his duty to offer some opposition to the principle involved in the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister; but, under the circumstances, he would only inquire of the Government how they proposed to deal with leases in Ireland which were held for lives and years? It would be quite clear to the right hon. Gentleman and the Law Officers of the Crown that there were many leases in Ireland, especially in that part of it with which he (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) happened to be acquainted, where leases had been granted for lives and 21 years after the dropping of the last life on the payment of a fine. The right hon. Gentleman, on a former occasion, spoke of the defenceless condition of the Irish tenants. On the contrary, he (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) believed that an Irishman was never defenceless at any time; from a considerable acquaintance with the Irish race, he was sure they were quite able to defend themselves. But how could any Irish tenant be said to be defenceless when he had in his pocket sufficient money to pay the fine for the grant of a lease? Now, the form of leases which obtained in the part of Ireland to which he referred was remarkable; he had one in his possession at that moment, and it was quite clear that the Law Officers of the Crown were ignorant of the very important provision which that form of leases contained, giving power to the lessee to determine the lease at six months' notice. That was clearly part of the contract, and he believed that any Court in the land would scout the view that the landlord could be deprived of his right in this respect. The lease which he held in his hand was granted in 1858 for three lives, the ages then being from 7 and 11 years respectively, and was to be continued for 21 years after the dropping of these lives. It was clearly a matter of speculation whether the lease would endure for 60 years or not. The point raised by this Amendment was one of great importance, and one which should be dealt with before the Bill left the House, in order that the tenants, lessors, and lessees, in cases of the kind might not be left in a state of uncertainty. There had been some very extraordinary doctrines promulgated from the Treasury Bench, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law) had concurred in the view that a lease, being under seal, it was to be construed, not by what it expressed, but by some extrinsic evidence derived from nobody knew where. It was rumoured that before long the right hon. and learned Gentleman would hold a very distinguished position in his Profession; but, when that event took place, it was to be hoped that his decisions would in no way be regulated by such doctrines as he (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) had alluded to.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Law) said, the right hon. Gentleman appeared to be under a misapprehension, of which he (the Attorney General for Ireland) would endeavour to relieve him. There was no difficulty in the case he had just presented. If the lives and years did not come to an end in 60 years, the lease would not be within the operation of this clause; if they did so come to an end, it would.

Motion made, and Question, "That in place of the words struck out by The Lords, the following words be inserted:—

"Provided that at the expiration of such existing leases, or of such of them as shall expire within sixty years after the passing of this Act, the lessees, if bonâ fide in occupation of their holdings, shall be deemed to be tenants of present ordinary tenancies from year to year, at the rents and subject to the conditions of their leases respectively, so far as such conditions are applicable to tenancies from year to year; but this provision shall not apply where a reversionary lease of the holding has been bonâ fide made before the passing of this Act; and provided also that where it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Court that the landlord desires to resume the holding for the bonâ fide purpose of occupying the same as a residence for himself, or as a home farm in connexion with his residence, or for the purpose of providing a residence for some member of his family, the Court may authorise him to resume the same accordingly in the manner and on the terms provided by the fifth section of this Act with respect to the resumption of a holding by a landlord: Provided always, that if the holding so resumed shall be at any time within fifteen years after such resumption re-let to a tenant, the same shall be subject, from and after the time of its being so re-let, to all the provisions of this Act which are applicable to present tenancies," —(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland), put, and agreed to.

Lords Amendment, in page 16, line 24, read.

Amendment proposed, to amend the Amendment made by The Lords to the words restored by the Commons in page 16, line 24, by inserting therein after the word "may" the words—

"By leave of the Court, which leave shall be granted unless the Court shall consider the appeal frivolous and vexatious."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. GIBSON observed, that as the Bill proposed to give the Court the power to break leases, under a new system now to be established, it was to the last degree reasonable that that power should be subject to some check. What was the meaning of this qualification? How could it be frivolous to appeal against the setting aside of a lease? The grounds upon which a lease was to be set aside were peculiar, and he would like to ask how an appeal, under such circumstances, could be considered frivolous and vexatious? He presumed that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland would admit that if a man had his lease set aside, he should be able to appeal. That was the substantial point. Would it not be better to leave it so? Plainly, it was intended that the Court should allow an appeal, except in special circumstances; but he was at such a loss to understand what those special circumstances were to be that he thought it would be better not to introduce special words, as proposed.

CAPTAIN AYLMER reminded the House that the landlord was to be charged with the moral offence of having used undue influence and acted unjustly in making unreasonable terms, and he thought every Englishman would wish to see every opportunity given to him to go to the Court to clear his character. He hoped the Amendment would be withdrawn.

MR. WARTON pointed out that the proposed words would make the clause read awkwardly, for it was difficult to connect the word "may" with the proposed words.

MR. HEALY did not think it mattered much one way or the other; but he wished to know something as to the question of costs. If the Court below did not think the appeal frivolous, then it appeared to him that the costs should be equally divided. If it was fair that an appeal might lie, then the costs ought to go to the party who carried the appeal; and he would suggest that the Court should have power to make an order as to costs, without leaving any power to the Court above.

Question put, and agreed to.

Lords Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

Lords Amendment, in page 39, lines 22 to 30, read.

MR. GLADSTONE: I wish, upon this Amendment, to notice some novel insinuations which have been made somewhat recklessly. It is said that there is a perfect understanding and arrangement between this and the opposite Benches as to the mode in which these proposals are to be dealt with, and it is understood that this House is not engaged in deliberative functions, but simply in giving effect to conclusions already arrived at. We have had plenty of opportunity for using hard words, and on the 50th night of this discussion I do not wish to use hard words, and I will withdraw the word "reckless." There are here about 21 of these Amendments, and, as far as I know—and I apprehend I ought to know—hon. Gentlemen opposite were not aware when they came into the House to-day, or at any time during the evening, what course the Government intended to take upon any one of these Amendments. Now, Sir, this is a clause in regard to which we have been very unfortunate. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) pointed out—and, as we thought, justly—that there might be a temptation to use the process known as fi fa for the purpose of selling up peremptorily, by modes open to the landlord like any ordinary creditor, unfortunate persons who were in arrear, and who, if time were given to them to obtain a judicial rent, would be, perhaps, able to extricate themselves from their embarrassments; and, at all events, by selling their holding, to offer much more security than the creditors would have if this time were not given. I do not wish to go over the arguments; but the point that was urged by the opponents of this clause was that it would offer a general inducement to a very large proportion of the tenants of Ireland to withhold the payment of rents, and to rush into the Court for the sake of obtaining a judicial rent, not merely on the genuine and legitimate grounds upon which a judicial rent might be sought, but likewise for the sake of avoiding all payment of rent. I am not going to make an argument generally against that; but we do say this—that, in our opinion, the delay before the fixing of a judicial rent would be a very short delay. I am in the recollection of hon. Members opposite that that was our contention, that the delay would be very short, and would be no hardship to the creditor, viewing the advantage he would have in the better security provided for in the value of the tenancy when the judicial rent was fixed. The House of Lords rejected the clause. It came down here, and we, bearing in mind the argument made against us, that it would be very hard for the landlords as well as the other creditors to be kept out of their rents for a length of time, amended the clause by inserting a provision that the Court must be satisfied that the judicial rent had been fixed within a reasonable time, not exceeding three months. We gave into that, not as a mere concession to the House of Lords, but because we felt the force of the argument that the hardship would be extreme to the landlords and the creditors if the proceedings were not pretty rapid. Having made that Amendment, we found that the hon. Member for the City of Cork, and those who had urged the argument on the side of the embarrassed tenant, took a very severe view of it, and considered that it destroyed the value of the clause. However, we persevered, and sent the clause again to the Lords; but while we have exasperated its friends, we have not propitiated its foes. It is again refused, and it comes back to this House with all those previously opposed to it still in opposition, and those who previously supported it declaring that in its present shape it is of no value. The hon. and learned Member for Meath (Mr. A. M. Sullivan) is stated to have said that practically the Amendment would render this clause entirely valueless to nine-tenths of the people. He said, further, that the provisions of the clause, as they at present stood, were not worth a farthing, and he would prefer to have them out of the Bill altogether, rather than it should be supposed that the Government had made any concession in this respect. The hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Dawson) made an emphatic declaration, I think, to the same effect, and said it would be more straightforward on the part of the Government to omit the clause altogether. And another hon. Gentleman—the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan)—also denounced the Amendment; while the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) recommended its withdrawal. I do not think, if we are in such a condition in respect to a clause like this, we feel bound to insist on the strict limitation of time, and not being able to resist the arguments made against us, and the friends of the clause declaring that that limitation makes it wholly valueless, I do not think we are now in a position to persevere with the clause. We must act upon those declarations. I should have been glad if we could have persevered with the clause, if it could have been done without inflicting hardship and injustice; but we cannot press it in the terms in which we should feel bound to press it, when it is declared to be valueless as holding out to the people of Ireland promise of advantage and relief which they are not really to receive. Under these circumstances, it will be my duty to move, with regard to this Amendment, that the House do agree to the last Amendment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That this House doth not insist on its disagreement with The Lords in the said Amendment.”—(Mr. Gladstone.)

Mr. PARNELL said, that if he supposed that the term was Parliamentary, he would be tempted to say that he considered the conduct of the Government in this matter thoroughly contempttible, and a fitting sequel to the course they had pursued during the evening. The right hon. Gentleman, in leading up the way in explanation of the course he was going to pursue on this clause, laboured to persuade the House that there was no secret compromise entered into with regard to this Bill. He thought the statement of the right hon. Gentleman was scarcely a credible one.

MR. GLADSTONE: I must call the hon. Member to Order. When the hon. Member describes the conduct of myself and my Colleagues as contemptible, I can sit, and I think they can sit, under that imputation without being in the slightest degree annoyed or disturbed; but when he chooses to go beyond the limits of Parliamentary decency, and says a statement of fact made by a Member of this House is not credible, I think he is out of Order.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member will admit, I think, that an expression of that kind applied to a Member of this House is not Parliamentary.

MR. PARNELL said, that, of course, if the Speaker ruled him out of Order in saying that the statement of the Prime Minister, in view of the circumstances of the last few days, and of the entire change of front by the Government in regard to these Amendments, was scarcely credible, he would withdraw the statement at once, and would go on to say that the course of events that evening had plainly shown him that there had been some influences at work which he had not been able to see, and the extent and nature of which he had not been able to penetrate, and that there had been reasons which had weighed with the Government in regard to the course they had taken which they had not given to the House as their reasons. The conduct of the Government upon this clause was a fitting sequel to their conduct during the evening; and the right hon. Gentleman, who was responsible for the inefficient, useless, and illusory shape of this clause as it now stood, coolly attempted to throw upon him (Mr. Parnell) the responsibility of the abandonment of the clause.

MR. GLADSTONE rose to explain—

MR. PARNELL said, the right hon. Gentleman could give his explanation afterwards. By his own action, and against the protests of the Irish Members, the Prime Minister had made this clause useless and illusory for fulfilling the purpose for which the Chief Secretary for Ireland had declared it to be necessary. The necessity for this clause, not in its present shape, but in its original shape, as moved by him (Mr. Parnell) and accepted by the Government, was just as great now as ever. It would be just as possible for the landlord to drive a coach-and-four through the Bill; and the fact that the Prime Minister had accepted the clause, and then mutilated it and made it useless, did not exempt the Government from the odium of having yielded to pressure. For his part, he left the responsibility of the affair with the Government, and he could only say that the organization there was in Ireland would prove a more efficient protection against abuse of power than any wish the Government might have in reference to the matter.

MR. GLADSTONE: I wish to relieve the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Parnell) from the entirely erroneous supposition—which no other hon. Member shares—that I made him responsible. I did nothing of the kind. The responsibility for the abandonment of the clause is entirely with the Government. The hon. Member was responsible for declaring that the clause in its present shape was useless, and all I did was to cite the hon. Member on the clause in its original shape. The Government are responsible for the clause in its present shape.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL regretted as much as the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Parnell) the abandonment of the clause as it originally stood. He thought the clause, if limited to three months, would have been practically of little value; but he entirely disagreed with the view of the hon. Member for the City of Cork, that the Government had by their concession in this regard in any substantial degree impaired or lessened the value of the Bill. As one who had anxiously watched the Bill, as one who had used no language of indiscriminate eulogy towards it, and as one who had laboured to render it valuable for the Irish tenants, he thought it only just to say that he thought in its main and substantial character, for the protection of the Irish tenants, the Government had stood manfully by the Bill.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he was not surprised at the action of the Ministry. He had always regarded himself up to this evening as the one person in Parliament who did not and never could believe in the existence of a crisis at all. From the beginning he had endeavoured to convince people that the whole matter was a storm in a teacup, and the picture of the Prime Minister putting his foot down on the one side, and the noble Lord (Lord Carlingford) in "another place" doing the same, was the creation of an excited imagination. What was the meaning of this transaction? He did not know whether the Government wished to excite some waning enthusiasm, or to make the country forget their errors; but anyone who read the newspapers would be firmly convinced that the Prime Minister had made up his mind to make some radical changes in the Constitution of the country. He was amused to see his hon. Friend on the Radical Benches, with a load of telegrams from public meetings and associations, all eager for the Prime Minister to make the sound radical declaration he made in introducing his remarks upon this clause against "another place." These very things which were declared by all the Ministerial organs to be of the first importance had now been brought down by the Ministry to matters of the most trifling detail. What was the Prime Minister going to put his foot down upon? Upon having regard to the interests of the landlord and the tenant. That had been a great point of controversy and collision between those in "another place." The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland almost fell upon the neck of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), and shed tears of joy at the infallible nostrum the hon. Member provided for a reconciliation. But now what had become of the clause? The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister whittled the period down to three months, and now, taking advantage of his own wrong, he sought to get rid of the clause altogether. He remembered the Prime Minister nodding his head significantly when the noble Lord the Member for Calne (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) was objecting to one of the clauses of the Bill, and said that the interest of the tenant in the tenant right had been reduced to zero. The Jove of the Olympian Treasury Bench nodded his head to signify his acquiescence in the opinion that the tenant right had been reduced to zero. If that were really so, all the tenants were absolutely placed at the mercy of the landlords if they happened to owe arrears of rent. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland was intrusted with the duty of governing Ireland. He (Mr. O'Connor) did not know for how long or how short a time he meant to retain that duty. [Cries of "Question!"] If he was not able to make his remarks clear to the intelligence of hon. Members opposite, it was not his fault. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had the duty of governing Ireland; and a large number of the tenants were in peril of forfeiture of their holdings if some clause like that proposed by his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork were not inserted in the Bill. For his own part, he did not feel much aggrieved by the course the Government proposed to take. He would certainly feel aggrieved if he thought the tenants of Ireland were dependent on the Government, or upon this Bill, or upon any proceedings which the Government might take; but he knew they had something far more stable to found their hopes upon than the friendship of a Liberal Ministry, or any pledges they might make.

Mr. Parnell

MR. O'DONNELL said, he had listened with very great interest indeed to the declaration of the Government that the harmony sought to be established in "another place" was not the result of a compromise, and he was accordingly led to conclude that the warm and interesting discussion which was supposed to have taken place upon the Land Bill between the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) and the hon. and learned Solicitor General (Sir Farrer Herschell) had been a matter for their own private gratification. It was a gratifying thing, in these days of Party warfare, and spoke much for the innate nobleness of political controversy, to find that even common rumour could accurately guess the action of Her Majesty's Government, and predict with certainty that they intended to meet the wishes of the House of Lords, and surrender the protection which, on the initiative of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), they had consented to throw around the Irish tenants. By the surrender of the protection proposed to be given to the Irish tenants, which Her Majesty's Government had now accomplished, thousands and tens of thousands of tenants in Ireland were liable to be deprived of all the advantages which it was presumed they would derive from this Bill. It was left entirely dependent upon the mercy of the Irish landlords whether tens of thousands of tenants were not sold out within the next few months; but very possibly the Irish landlords might prove to be much more merciful than Her Majesty's Government. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had thanked, in the most effusive manner, the Leader of the Irish Party for supplying this indispensable protection to the Irish tenantry. There could be no doubt that all the sincerity and honesty of the right hon. Gentleman's character went forth in that solemn declaration of thankfulness, and that, having made it, he had satisfied his conscience, and would stick to his official position. The proceeding was in perfect keeping with the whole official bearing of the right hon. Gentleman. The conduct of the Government had already been characterized by an epithet which was not altogether undeserved, and it was unnecessary to add to that epithet, as it precisely described the conduct of the Government. He was satisfied, however, that the Irish tenantry had learnt a lesson, teaching them to organize so thoroughly that much of the mischief which might come upon them from this wretched abandonment of the pledges of the Government would not be brought about. But even the abject surrender of Her Majesty's Government to the House of Lords might not give them the satisfaction and peace and uninterrupted enjoyment of their official positions which they doubtless looked forward to. There was "many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip." He concurred with his hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) in never having believed in the occurrence of a serious Ministerial crisis. There was much more danger, and it might still exist, of a crisis on the side of the Conservative Party. No one who had witnessed what had been going on in the last few days, and had seen the quaking Liberal, green with terror at the thought of a Dissolution, could have believed in the reality of a crisis. No one who had watched their heart-born countenances could have supposed there was much of a critical nature about the resistance of the Liberal Party. They had cheerfully surrendered before friend and foe, and they were now being allowed to perform their triumphant retreat as the worthy followers of an unprincipled Government.

MR. HEALY said, the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister stated early in the evening that there had been no compromise. He (Mr. Healy) quite believed the right hon. Gentleman that there was no necessity for making a compromise. The Government was one of surrender and not of compromise. They surrendered Candahar; they surrendered Afghanistan; they surrendered the Transvaal; and what objection could they have to the surrender of a clause in the Land Bill? He was reminded by an hon. Friend that they had even surrendered Mr. Bradlaugh. The Tory Party knew too well the character of Her Majesty's Government to require a compromise; and he did not believe that they had found any necessity for entering into any arrangement or any negotiation with the Government, because they were satisfied that, as a matter of course, they would capitulate, and that a surrender would follow. He could, therefore, quite credit the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister that the proceedings of that night were in no sense the result of a compromise. The House had been told by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) that the Bill had been in no way impaired by the concessions which had been made. It was exactly what they had heard in regard to Candahar; the British Empire was in no way impaired by that surrender. We had surrendered the Transvaal; but after all it must be confessed that justice was on our side. [Cries of "Question!"] He could readily believe that the analogy was much too perfect for hon. Gentlemen opposite. He could easily understand how it was that an Irish Ministerialist could get up and say that the present surrender of the Government was of no account at all. When the House summed up the frightful total of surrender to the House of Lords, which the Government had consented to, they would have no difficulty in believing that the Cabinet weighed and liberated for a considerable time as to whether there should be a preliminary statement of the course they intended to take. It was amusing, in the early part of the evening, to see the bellicose Radicals come down to the House with their telegrams and Petitions. Calling upon the Government to stand fast by the Bill, the Prime Minister must have been aware how horrified the Radicals would be by the work of surrender contemplated by the Government, and he therefore wisely abstained from making a preliminary statement on the Order being read for the Consideration of the Lords' Amendments. They all recognized the wisdom of the course the right hon. Gentleman had taken. Personally, on this the 50th night of their deliberations, he (Mr. Healy) congratulated the right hon. Gentleman upon it. Before he sat down he should like to say one word more. They were now agreeing with the Lords in striking out this clause; but there was a passage in what occurred a day or two ago which he should like to read to the House as a final touch—and it related to the Commons' reasons for disagreeing with the Lords' original Amendments. The Government then found it expedient to put in black and white what their reasons were for insisting on sticking to this excellent clause. He had it before him in black and white, or rather in black and blue—very like the Bill itself—

"The Commons disagree to the Amendment at page 39, lines 22 to 30, for the following reason: because"

—he could almost trace the accents of the Chief Secretary—

"because it is expedient to provide that where a tenant is seeking to obtain a reduction of rent and statutory term through the intervention of the Court, the sale of his tenancy at the suit of a creditor may, under special circumstances, be stayed for a short time so that the true value of his tenancy may be realised."

[Mr. W. E. FORSTER: Hear, hear!] The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland cheered; but the words, like the right hon. Gentleman's Resolutions, had faded—like Hans Breitman's celebrated party. "Where is that party now?" And what had become of the Reasons which the House of Commons felt it necessary to send up to the House of Lords? They were gone; and gone with them were the hopes of thousands of the Irish tenants.

Mr. LEAMY said, the result of the rejection of this clause would be that directly the Bill became law every Irish landlord would commence proceedings to obtain a judgment in execution against any tenant who happened to be in arrear. The landlord would have the full right of selling out all tenants in arrear, putting every penny of the proceeds of the sale into his own pocket and shutting out the ordinary creditor from all remedy.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 196; Noes 70: Majority 126.—(Div. List, No. 393.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Committee be appointed 'to draw up Reasons to be assigned to The Lords for disagreeing to the Amendments made by The Lords to the Bill, to which this House hath disagreed':—Mr. GLADSTONE, Mr. WILLIAM EDWARD FORSTER, Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND, Mr. DODSON, Mr. SHAW LEFEBVRE, Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL, and Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND:—THREE to be the quorum."

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR: Am I in Order, Sir, in moving an addition to the names proposed?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member will be in Order in moving.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR: I have pleasure in proposing that the name of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) be added.

Mr. O'DONNELL: I think it would be more apropos if the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University (Mr. Gibson) were upon the Committee.

Mr. GIBSON: There is no desire on my part to serve upon the Committee.

Mr. HEALY: I have no wish to be a Member of the Committee. I have only to express a hope that the next time the Reasons are printed they will be adhered to.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee to withdraw immediately.

ROYAL UNIVERSITY OF IRELAND BILL.

—[Lords.]—[BILL 247.]

(Mr. William Edward Forster.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. William Edward Forster.)

MR. HEALY rose to Order. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had been appointed one of the Committee that had just been ordered to withdraw, and he still retained his seat on the Treasury Bench.

Question put.

MR. HEALY again rose to Order. The right hon. Gentleman had just been ordered to withdraw, and had not done so.

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman is quite in Order in moving the second reading of this Bill; and I have put that Question to the House.

MR. HEALY asked whether he could raise the question of Privilege? This proceeding affected the Privilege of the House of Commons, inasmuch as the Order of the House had been disobeyed.

MR. SPEAKER: I have already informed the House and the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) that the right hon. Gentleman is in Order. The question of Order has no foundation.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, that hon. Members on those Benches felt very strongly on the subject-matter of this Bill. He objected to the second reading being taken at that hour, and therefore begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."
 —(Mr. T. P. O'Connor.)

MAJOR NOLAN hoped the hon. Member for Galway would withdraw his Motion, otherwise there was no chance of the measure being passed that Session. It would be a great pity if the Bill were not read a second time that night.

MR. W. E. FORSTER regretted that the second reading should have been moved at so late an hour; but he trusted that hon. Members interested in the question would consider that if the Bill was to become law that Session, it was very desirable that nothing should be allowed to stand in the way of the present stage being taken. There was no Notice of opposition to the Bill upon the Paper, and he did not suppose that any objection would be taken. He earnestly desired that all those who were concerned and interested in the question would consent to the second reading being taken; and he would do his best to take the next stage of the Bill at an earlier time. Under the circumstances, he trusted the hon. Member for Galway would not persevere with his Motion for the adjournment of the debate.

MR. GIBSON said, he did not think it unreasonable, having regard to the time of the Session, that the Bill should be read a second time; and he had no doubt that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland would, on the next occasion, do all he could to bring it on earlier in the evening. He had some remarks to make when the next stage was reached on the expense of the Examiners and the unlimited number and indefinite amount of the prizes, to which he would not now refer in detail.

MR. DAWSON thought it would be a great calamity for the Irish people if the Bill were read a second time at that hour without a protest. The Bill provided no education for the Irish people. It was a misnomer to describe the system as one of education. The examination paper had no other result than to bring about the same state of things in the higher branches of education as was disclosed the other day by the noble Lord on that side of the House (Lord George Hamilton) in the case of Mr. Goffin—namely, a system of cramming for the purpose of getting grants. He regretted the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had thought it right to take the second reading without giving Irish Members an opportunity for making a plea that the Irish people should be treated fairly in the matter of education. He thought they ought not, as it were, silently to sell their birthright in this matter for £20,000 a-year; and, although he was not at that moment prepared to discuss the Bill, he trusted that some further protest would be made that Irish Members had been driven, at an inopportune time of the morning, to give it a second reading.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL agreed, to a certain extent, with the objections made by hon. Members opposite. He could not regard the proposed scheme as by any means satisfactory, nor did he think it reasonable to take the second reading stage without some opportunity of discussing the principles of the Bill. Nevertheless, he put it to hon. Members, that if it was not taken then there was no chance of the Bill passing that Session. He thought it would be better to make the Bill, with all its disadvantages, into law than to postpone it until next year.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he rose to support the Motion for the adjournment of the debate. He had worked hard and long in the cause of reform of Irish University Education; but, so far as he could make out the present Bill, it was for the abolition of University Education in Ireland. It did not even provide a good examination paper—the machinery was bad even for that purpose—and he could say that the men who had the interest of education in Ireland at heart despised the Bill. Irish Members should, at least, have an opportunity of expressing their opinions upon it; but those exponents of the national feeling upon the subject of Irish University Education had been kept entirely in the dark with regard to the Bill. There was a great public interest taken in this matter; and, having formerly objected to the inferior character of the education in the Queen's University, he should be false to his principles if he allowed to pass without protest a measure which would make men look back with regret to the Standard at that University. He trusted, therefore, an opportunity of discussing the second reading would be given. It was quite impossible to allow that stage to be taken on the present occasion without a sincere protest on the part of Irish Members.

MR. LABOUCHERE reminded the House that the Prime Minister had promised the House, when he asked for the whole of the time of the House, that no controversial matter should be brought forward during the remainder of the Session. Every English Bill had been set aside for the Irish Land Bill; and he would like to know upon what grounds the promise given was to be departed from? It was very clear, from what hon. Gentlemen opposite had said, that this Bill would, at some stage, provoke a lengthy discussion; and therefore he would like to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland to explain upon what grounds the pledge given to the House was being violated?

MR. GIVAN quite thought this Bill was not sufficiently comprehensive for the requirements of education in Ireland; but, at the same time, he knew that a great amount of interest was concentrated upon the Bill by both Catholic and Protestant clergy. Their arrangements were made in view of the Bill being carried, and he thought it would be a great calamity if the intention to pass the Bill was frustrated. He hoped the second reading would be given to the Bill.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY thought the Bill which was now being attacked was a very small matter; and that if hon. Members had wished to prevent the Bill, they should have endeavoured to repeal the Act passed two or three years ago. The present Bill was only intended to give greater effect to the Bill already passed.

DR. LYONS hoped his hon. Friends would agree to the second reading. The Bill had been a long time under consideration, and it must be borne in mind that some years ago the present Government made an effort to settle this University Question, and he always regretted that the Bill introduced by the present Prime Minister had not become law. After careful consideration of the subject, he thought no such measure, in all probability, would be possible at any juncture of political circumstances in the near future. When a great opportunity, given in 1873, was lost, hopes were entertained that another and a greater measure would be introduced; but those hopes had been falsified, and the only possible measure that could be expected was that now introduced. A body of gentlemen, representing the education, and the religion, and the feelings of Ireland, had sat together for a long time, discussing the framework of a measure to be submitted to Parliament; and this Bill was only carrying out the essence of the Act of two years ago. The responsibility of the framework of the present measure did not rest with the Members of the Government; and he was prepared to say that if there was the smallest chance of a larger measure being considered, he would not accept this as the best settlement of the question. A vast deal of elaborate and scientific consideration had been devoted to this University scheme. It had been under the consideration of the House for some time, and all that the House was now asked to do was to give effect to the previous Act. Therefore, he hoped the House would consent to the formal second reading of the Bill. If this Bill was wrecked, thousands of expectant educationists in Ireland would be greatly disappointed.

MR. HEALY complained of the action of the Chief Secretary for Ireland in this matter. The Speaker had said something which nobody could hear, and all that hon. Members were given to understand was that the second reading of this Bill was being moved. Except the Coercion Bill, he had not read a single Bill that Session; and it was a question whether the Chief Secretary for Ireland, when the second reading of this Bill was moved, ought not to say something in explanation. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, however, had not done that, and had treated the House unfairly.

MR. W. E. FORSTER observed, that no person could speak twice to a second reading, and therefore he had taken the course which he had adopted.

MR. HEALY replied, that there were other right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench who were fully aware of the circumstances of the case, and, therefore, the excuse of the right hon. Gentleman went by the board. To ask the House to discuss, at that hour, a Bill which they did not know anything about was unreasonable; and if the Chief Secretary for Ireland would allow the second reading to stand over to a reasonable time, the Irish Members would undertake not to oppose the second reading.

MR. GRAY sympathized with the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) as to the importance of a Bill of this kind being introduced earlier in the Session. He had no particular admiration for the scheme; but the existing Bill having been passed, it was desirable to pass this Bill also. When the Bill was blocked, there was a feeling of alarm amongst many hundreds of people in Ireland; and if it was now stopped, it might be stopped altogether, and that would create a feeling approaching to consternation in Ireland. The Government, which had already burnt its fingers with the University Bill, could not be expected to decide the question; and, considering that there would be abundant opportunity of discussing the principle of the Bill on the Committee stage, he thought it would not be desirable to persevere in opposition to the Bill.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR wished to explain the course he intended to take. He felt very strongly with regard to the character of this Bill, and took great interest in University questions generally. He did not wish to sacrifice his chance of doing what he thought necessary in this case; but, as he had been appealed to by so many people, and did not wish to be ill-natured, he would withdraw his opposition. At the same time, he would suggest that the Chief Secretary for Ireland should, before the Committee stage, consider how he could bring the Bill on at an earlier hour.

MR. W. E. FORSTER promised to do his best in that direction, for he desired that there should be a good discussion on the Bill.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he did not wish to detain the House. An hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gray) had said that the House ought to consider the expectant educationists in Ireland. He (Mr. Labouchere) was an expectant vacationist, and he was anxious that the House should adjourn as soon as possible. He had understood that no impediment would be placed in the way of that adjournment by the introduction of controversial matter, and he did not understand how the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland could enter into an agreement to afford time for discussing the measure.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) had misunderstood the assurance given by the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister had only pledged himself that Bills of a public controversial character should not be taken. If any hon. Member was prepared to oppose this Bill, of course it could not be passed, and the responsibility would fall upon those who opposed it.

MAJOR NOLAN wished to point out that there was really no controversy with regard to the Bill, and that it received the support of a large number of Irish Members. The only point was whether the Bill was large enough to deal with the general question of University Education ; but there was no dispute as to the necessity of passing the measure in the present Session. A great deal of harm had been done in Ireland through not having a proper system of University Education, and it was quite time that something should be done to remedy the evil. He sincerely hoped that no attempt would be made to delay the progress of the present Bill.

MR. BRYCE said, he did not intend to discuss the merits of the Bill at any length ; but he thought the second reading ought not to be allowed to pass altogether in silence. He was of opinion that the Bill was not properly understood by the House. It was not correct, as had been stated by two of his hon. Friends near him, that the measure was intended merely to carry out the Act of 1879. When the Bill of 1879 was introduced, it was subjected to a considerable amount of criticism, and the reply was that it was only a sketch giving the outline of a scheme, which outline was to be subsequently filled in by the Senate. The Senate were directed to prepare a scheme, and that scheme had now been prepared, and laid before Parliament, and the present Bill was brought in to give effect to it. Objection was taken to the scheme prepared by the Senate, on the ground that it was worse than the one shadowed forth by the Act of 1879. It would have been quite possible to have a much better scheme under that Act, and he sympathized with what had been said by his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Dawson), that the Bill now under discussion was one which would do no good to the cause of education in Ireland. At that late hour (half-past 2) he would not ask the House to listen to any discussion on the merits of the Bill itself ; but the Irish Members who took an interest in education, naturally protested against a scheme which they believed would satisfy nobody, which would not benefit Irish Education in any perceptible degree, and which would only form a basis for future agitation.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the object of the Bill was to provide an endowment for carrying out the purposes of the Act of 1879. He had no wish to go back upon the discussion which occurred in 1879 ; but he thought that the Bill which was then passed did, to a certain extent, make provision for a great want in Ireland. A great number of the Irish people were not satisfied with the Universities then in existence. He held now, as he held then, that it would have been far better to meet the want in a far more comprehensive manner ; but, although that was his opinion, it was not the opinion which the House adopted. A measure was, however, passed, and the object of the present Bill was to enable that measure to be put into practical operation. He thought it would be a great disappointment to a large portion of the Irish people if Parliament refused now to try the experiment of establishing this new University. Not only would it be a great disappointment to a good many people, but it would be a great calamity to the cause of higher education ; because it would be depriving the young men who hoped to take advantage of it of the means already provided, without putting anything in their place. He therefore thought that those who were interested in Irish Education were bound to support the present Bill in order to carry out the Act of 1879 ; and if, at some future time, it was found that that Act was not the best mode of carrying out University Education, an attempt might be made to improve it. His hon. Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce) said the Bill would satisfy nobody, and would not benefit Irish Education. He (Mr. W. E. Forster) must remind his hon. Friend that, after all, the scheme proposed by the Senate was the result of the labours of a large representative body of Irishmen, and, probably, the best representative body that could be found. His hon. Friend might possibly be right in his views ; but, at any rate, he stood alone in those views, and, not being himself an Irish Member, his opinions were contrary to those which had been declared by a considerable number of persons who had carefully inquired into the subject. The mode in which the scheme had been prepared was this. The Senate were instructed to prepare it, and, having prepared it, it had been submitted to this Government and laid on the Table of the House. But the scheme was not binding. It merely contained such information as the Senate desired to lay before Parliament ; and what would really be binding would be the statutes and regulations made under the Act of 1879, and those statutes and regulations would have to be approved of by the Government, and laid upon the Table of the House. The Senate would act with the full knowledge that their recommendations would have to be approved by Parliament; and what the House had now to consider was whether any good object was to be gained by putting the matter off for another year. He would really submit to his hon. Friend whether he was so fully confident in his own views as to what Irish Education should be that he was prepared to subject the Irish people to the great inconvenience which the loss of what they were now striving for would entail? In regard to the future discussion of the Bill, he would do his best to secure the measure being brought on at as early an hour as possible. It had already passed through the other House of Parliament. He was sorry to say that, owing to the pressure of other Public Business, there was not much chance of bringing the Bill on at a very early hour; but, in order not to disappoint those who were interested in the question, he would try to induce hon. Members to submit to the inconvenience of discussing it at a late hour. Personally, he should very much prefer a full discussion, because he thought it was desirable that the public should know all that might be stated in regard to the provisions of the Bill.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR thought the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had scarcely treated the hon. Gentleman opposite, the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce), fairly. The right hon. Gentleman told the hon. Member that he was not an Irish Member, and therefore that he was scarcely competent to discuss a question affecting Irish Education. But the hon. Member, if not an Irish Member, was an Irishman, and was therefore fully competent to take part in the discussion of an Irish question. The present Bill simply made provision for the appropriation of an Irish fund for University Education in Ireland, and by that provision it would save the Imperial Exchequer a certain amount of money now given to the Queen's University, which University, when the Royal University was started, would cease to exist. Therefore, it was at the expense of an Irish fund that the new University was to be established. Personally, he looked upon the sum of £20,000 a-year proposed to be applied to the new University as a very inadequate sum. The Senate, when it drew up the scheme, framed it in a manner that was liberal and reasonable; but the Treasury refused to assent to it, because they considered that it would involve a larger expenditure than they were willing to agree to. The consequence was that the new Royal University was cut down to proportions which, he was afraid, would make it a deplorable failure. That, however, was a question which could be raised just as readily when the Bill got into Committee as upon the second reading. He should be sorry to do anything that could interfere with the second reading of the Bill; but he certainly could not understand why, seeing that it was a Bill of only one clause, the right hon. Gentleman could not have deferred it until a later date, when a full discussion could have been taken on it, and the necessity of discussing it in Committee obviated.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he was glad to hear the assurance which had been given by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland that the scheme which had been drawn up by the Senate was a scheme still open to amendment. He thought it was quite capable of amendment. He quite agreed with the hon. Member opposite (Dr. Lyons), who stated that although the Act of 1879 did not provide for a good University, still, at any rate, it provided a better University than existed at present. He deprecated the limited nature of the provision made by the Act of 1879. The measure did not appear to provide sufficient backbone for the persons who undertook the carrying out of the important business dealt with by the Act. There seemed to him to be too much of the jelly fish in the system, and he was afraid that the new University would totally fail to content the Irish people. At the same time, if there were any further delay in carrying out some scheme or other, great mischief might be done to the cause of education in Ireland.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.

REPORT OF REASONS.

COMMONS AMENDMENTS TO THE AMENDMENTS MADE BY THE LORDS TO THE AMENDMENTS MADE BY THE COMMONS TO THE LORDS AMENDMENTS, AND COMMONS REASONS FOR DISAGREEING TO CERTAIN OF THE SAID LORDS AMENDMENTS.

The Commons propose to amend the amendments made by the Lords to the amendment made by the Commons to the Lords amendment in page 2, line 5, by leaving out the words ("or acquired, and have in the main been upheld"), and inserting in lieu thereof the following words ("by the landlord or his predecessors in title, and have been substantially maintained"), by leaving out the word ("or") and inserting the word ("and"), and also by leaving out the words ("made or acquired").

The Commons disagree to the amendment made by the Lords in page 2, line 23, for the following Reasons:

- (1.) Because the purchase of the tenant right by the landlord in Ulster placed the landlord and tenant in the same relative position as they occupy in the rest of Ireland, and it would be unjust in the application of this Bill to subject the tenants in Ulster to a disadvantage which is not imposed on the tenants in any other part of Ireland:
- (2.) Because the landlord if he has not increased the rent so as to obtain a return for his investment in the purchase of the tenant right (including the tenant's improvements) may still have the rent fairly increased by application to the court.

The Commons propose to amend the amendment now proposed by the Lords in page 6, lines 3 and 4, by inserting after the word ("coalpits") the following words ("subject to such rights in respect thereof as the tenant under the contract of tenancy subsisting immediately before the commencement of the statutory term was lawfully entitled to exercise")

The Commons do not insist on their disagreement with the amendment made by the Lords in page 6, line 8, but propose as a consequential amendment to insert in page 6, line 7, after the word ("tenancy") the words ("save as herein-after provided")

The Commons disagree to the amendment now proposed by the Lords in page 6, line 37, for the following Reason:

Because they believe that their alteration of the scale of compensation for disturbance is expedient with a view to the effectual protection of the tenant against unreasonable and unjust eviction.

The Commons propose to amend the amendment now proposed by the Lords in page 8, line 16, by restoring the words omitted and by inserting the words ("or after") before the words ("the parties have otherwise failed to come to an agreement") inserted by their Lordships.

The Commons disagree with the amendment now proposed by the Lords in page 8, line 23, for the following Reason:

Because the object of the amendment is already fully provided for by the equitable clause (§ 8).

The Commons disagree with the amendment now proposed by the Lords in page 8, line 35, for the following Reason:

Because it is desirable that for a reasonable time after the passing of the Act the tenant should not be liable to disturbance by "resumption" save for some breach of duty or for some public purpose.

The Commons propose to amend the amendment made by the Lords to the amendment made by the Commons to the Lords amendment in page 9, line 16, by leaving out the words ("or acquired and have been in the main upheld") and inserting in lieu thereof the following words ("by the landlord or his predecessors in title, and have been substantially maintained"), and also by leaving out the word ("or") and inserting the word ("and")

The Commons disagree to the amendment now proposed by the Lords to the words restored to the Bill in page 9 at the end of sub-section 8, for the following Reason:

Because, having regard to the clause already inserted in the Bill those words are superfluous, but the Commons propose to amend the clause by inserting the word ("otherwise") before the word ("compensated") so as to indicate that the latter word includes other words of compensation besides direct payment.

The Commons agree to their Lordships amendments in page 9, line 42, and propose, as consequential thereto, to re-insert the words omitted by their Lordships in the same clause in page 8, line 20, and also in page 11, line 12.

The Commons do not insist on their disagreement with the amendment made by the Lords in page 10, line 9, but they propose in place of the words struck out by the Lords to insert the words ("Provided that at the expiration of such existing leases, or of such of them as shall expire within sixty years after the passing of this Act, the lessees, if bona fide in occupation of their holdings, shall be deemed to be tenants of present ordinary tenancies from year to year, at the rents and subject to the conditions of their leases respectively, so far as such conditions are applicable to tenancies from year to year; but this provision shall not apply where a reversionary lease of the holding has been bona fide made before the passing of this Act; and provided also that where it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Court that the landlord desires to resume the holding for the bona fide purpose of occupying the same as a residence for himself, or as a home farm in connexion with his residence, or for the purpose of providing a residence for some member of his family, the Court may authorise him to resume the same accordingly, in the manner and on the terms provided by the fifth section of this Act with respect to the resumption of a holding by a landlord: Provided always, that if the holding so resumed shall be at any time within fifteen years after such resumption re-let to a tenant, the same shall be subject, from and after the time of its being so re-let, to all the provisions of this Act which are applicable to present tenancies")

The Commons propose to amend the amendment made by the Lords to the words restored by the Commons in page 16, line 24, by inserting therein after the word ("may") the words ("by leave of the Court, which leave shall be granted unless the Court shall consider the appeal frivolous or vexatious")

With the preceding exceptions the Commons do not insist on their disagreements to the amendments on which the Lords have insisted, and agree to the amendments made by the Lords to the Commons amendments and to the Lords consequential amendments.

Reasons for disagreement to the Amendments made by The Lords to the Commons Amendments to The Lords Amendments reported, and agreed to :—
To be communicated to the Lords.

UNIVERSITIES OF OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE (STATUTES) BILL.—[Lords.]

(Lord Frederick Cavendish.)

[BILL 241.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH proposed to defer the second reading until to-morrow.

MR. J. G. TALBOT asked if it was really intended to take the second reading of the Bill to-morrow?

MR. BRYCE said, he had had a Notice on the Paper to prevent the Bill from being proceeded with after half-past 12 o'clock; but he had taken that Notice off, and there was now nothing to prevent the Bill being taken at any hour.

MR. J. G. TALBOT asked when the Notice was taken off?

MR. BRYCE: To-day.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, he must repeat his question to his noble Friend the Secretary to the Treasury, whether it was proposed to proceed with the second reading to-morrow?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH intimated that such was the intention of the Government.

MR. J. G. TALBOT remarked, that as the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce) had taken off his Notice against the Bill, the Government would be able to take the second reading at any hour. He wished, therefore, to have a distinct answer to the question whether it was proposed to take it at any hour, because it was only right that those who were interested in the Bill should know whether it was likely to be brought on at an inconvenient hour. Of course, if the Government persisted in bringing on the measure at any time, he must make the best he could of the situation.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON understood that the Government did hope to be able to take the Bill to-morrow; but, no doubt, if the hon. Gentleman was in his place at 4 o'clock and would ask the Question, he would receive an answer.

Second Reading deferred until To-morrow.

NAVY AND ARMY EXPENDITURE, 1879-80.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

1. Resolved, That it appears that by the Navy Appropriation Account, for the year ended 31st March 1880, that the balances unexpended in respect of Votes for Navy Services for the said year amounted to the sum of £208,684 14s. 6d. viz. :—

| Vote 25. Militia, Yeomanry Cavalry, and Volunteer Corps | 2,944 | 5 | 6 |
| | £232,036 | 8 | 4 |

5. Resolved, That it further appears from the said Account that the sum of £189,108 19s. 6d., was realised in the said year in excess of the estimated Appropriations in Aid.

6. Resolved, That the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury have temporarily authorised the application of the said sums, amounting together to the total sum of £421,145 7s. 10d., to provide in part for the following amounts of expenditure incurred in excess of certain other Votes for Army Services for the said year, viz. :—

| | | | |
|---|---------|----|----|
| | £ | s. | d. |
| Vote 1. General Staff and Regimental Pay | 282,010 | 7 | 0 |
| Vote 2. Divine Service | 1,004 | 14 | 11 |

| Amounts written off as irrecoverable | 606 | 15 | 10 |
| | £3,247,471 | 19 | 9 |

7. Resolved, That the said application be sanctioned.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR wished to point out that under Vote 10 of the Navy Estimates for the year 1879-80, there was a sum not required of £64,700, under Section 1, for Naval Stores, and of £58,000 for Steam Machinery, besides £20,000, under Vote 11, for New Works and Repairs. He wished to call attention to the fact, because tomorrow, or at a very early date, the House would be called upon to pass similar Votes in the present year's Navy Estimates, and he thought it ought to be borne in mind that last year more money had been voted than was actually required. He also wished to point out that in regard to the Army Votes—on Vote 10, for Provisions, Forage, Fuel, &c.—there had been a sum voted in excess of the sum actually required of no less than £2,000,000. The Vote was a very large one, and it had been enormously exceeded; and when the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War proposed to take Vote 10 this year, at 1 o'clock in the morning, hon. Members were thought very unreasonable because they objected to proceeding with such an important Vote at such an hour. He thought the fact of the existence of these excesses fully justified the position then taken by hon. Members.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH thought the hon. Member should remember that the excesses had connection with the war in South Africa.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

SOLENT NAVIGATION BILL.—[Bill 207.]

(Mr. Evelyn Ashley, Mr. Chamberlain,
Mr. Trevelyan.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY, in moving that the Order for going into Committee on the Bill be discharged, said, the House must not be alarmed, because it was merely a formal matter. The Examiners of Standing Orders had reported that the Standing Orders had not been complied with, and that the Bill, though virtually a Public Bill, was in reality a Hybrid Bill, and ought to be considered upstairs by a Hybrid Committee, nominated partly by the House and partly by the Committee of Selection.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Order for going into Committee upon the said Bill be discharged,"—(Mr. Evelyn Ashley),—put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, consisting of Five Members, Three to be nominated by the House, and Two by the Committee of Selection."—(Mr. Evelyn Ashley.)

MR. HEALY asked if it was intended to proceed further with the Bill in the present Session?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY replied in the affirmative.

Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That all Petitions against the Bill be referred to the Committee.

Ordered, That Petitioners praying to be heard by Counsel or Agents be heard against the Bill, and that Counsel be heard in support of the Bill.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records:—Three to be the quorum.

STATUTE LAW REVISION AND CIVIL PROCEDURE BILL.—[Lords.]—[Bill 219.]

(Mr. Attorney General.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he very much regretted to have to move that the Order be discharged. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had given Notice of opposition, and it was, therefore, impossible to proceed with the Bill, and he would move the discharge of the Order for considering it in Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Order for going into Committee upon the said Bill be discharged."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he would gladly take off his Notice of opposition to the Bill if the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would accept his (Mr. T. P. O'Connor's) grounds of objection to it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he could not make any conditions, and must, therefore, press the discharge of the Order.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, the course taken in this case showed the impropriety of putting up a Member of the Government to block the Bills of independent Members. If a Bill of the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had not been blocked by the hon. Member for Bath (Sir Arthur Hayter), the hon. Member would not have blocked the present Bill.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR felt that he had been very badly treated by the Government, and he had no doubt that the hon. and learned Attorney General would agree with him that he was justified, under the circumstances, in the course he had taken. He simply wished now to explain his reasons for taking that course.

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Member (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) that at present there is no Question before the House other than the discharge of the Order.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he would take off the block against the Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): Then I will withdraw my Motion for the discharge of the Order, and fix the Committee for to-morrow.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Committee deferred till To-morrow.

POLLEN FISHING (IRELAND) BILL.

(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

[BILL 248.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) hoped the House would allow the Bill to be read a second time. Pollen was a fresh-water herring, peculiar to Lough Neagh, and in season up to the 1st November. Between 300 and 400 persons lived mainly by this fishing, and as the salmon and trout season closed much earlier the Inspectors of Fisheries, up to last year, made separate orders for the close season for salmon and trout and for the close season for pollen; but it had now been found that under the existing law such separate orders could not lawfully be made, and that there could only be the same close season for salmon and trout and for pollen. The consequence of this was that although pollen were in season they could not be captured after the close season for salmon had commenced. This was a serious hardship to an industrious class of fishermen, which it was the object of the present Bill to remedy, and to enable pollen to be captured during the salmon close time and when pollen was in season.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland,)—put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

House adjourned at a quarter before Three o'clock.
